afterwards twice reported unfavourably for drinking, the latter time being placed under arrest; whether he was imprisoned for nearly five months, without being asked for a defence, or tried by Court-martial, and then dismissed from the service without total loss of pension; whether, within three months of being placed under arrest, he was recommended by his commanding officer, and awarded 6d. per day extra pay for zeal and efficiency; whether it is true that his commanding officer recommended him for a pension; and, whether he will have inquiries made into this man's grievance with the view to granting him even a modified pension?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: This case has been repeatedly brought under the consideration of my Predecessor and myself. The schoolmaster referred to was, after repeated warnings, dismissed from the Army because his intemperate habits rendered him unfit for duty. It is true that his commanding officer recommended him on account of his previous good service for discharge with a modified pension. It was held, however, that his removal from the Army being rendered necessary solely on account of his misconduct, this could not be permitted, and he was, as I have stated, dismissed from the Army in 1880. Under these circumstances, I have no power to grant him a pension.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, EDENDERRY DIVISION, KING'S CO.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, at the election of Poor Law Guardians for the division of Edenderry, in the King's County, held last March, Charles Murray, Michael Delany, and Denis Shiel were declared elected; that several objections were lodged against the return of Murray and Delany, in consequence of which the Local Government Board declared the election of Delany invalid and ordered a new election; whether Mr. H. Bor (returning officer), at the supplemental election, held in July, in the presence of the parties concerned, declared that there was a tie, and made a return to that effect to the Local Government Board, but, on the day following, held a private scrutiny, assisted by Delany, Murray, and a man named Tyrrell, all in the Conservative interest, and then made a second return to the Local Government Board, in which he gave Delany a majority of ten; whether Mr. Bor, during the election, assisted by a Mr. Robson, cashier at the Ulster Bank, attended at the house of a Mr. George Dunne for the purpose of inspecting and marking Conservative voting papers then there; and, whether the Local Government Board will direct an inquiry into the return of Delany, and also into the return of Mr. Murray, whose election is challenged as well as that of Delany's, and on similar grounds?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The statements in the first paragraph of the Question as to the last annual election for Edenderry are correct. Mr. Bor did not, at the supplemental election, declare or make a return that there was a tie. The only return he made was one showing a majority of 11 for Delany. Mr. Bor states that he did not attend at the house of Mr. George Dunne with Mr. Robson to inspect or mark voting papers. The Local Government Board has directed an inquiry into the validity of the return of Delany at the supplemental election, but has decided that there are no grounds for disturbing the election of Murray.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked how was it that the inquiry was granted in the case of Delany, and not in the case of Mr. Murray, seeing that precisely similar grounds were urged against each?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: If the grounds were similar, both cases would be inquired into; but the Local Government Board say the cases were not similar.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIANS, EDENDERRY DIVISION—THE DOWNSHIRE TRUSTEES.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Local Government Board have refused to use the powers vested in them to set aside the votes of the Trustees of the Downshire Estate, given in the late election for Poor Law Guardians in Edenderry Division, although the said Trustees have no beneficial interest in the property?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am advised that Trustees are, under certain circumstances, entitled to vote; and in the present case the Trustees appeared to be entitled. The objection raised was as to whether they could vote separately, or should vote jointly; but this turned out immaterial, as they appointed the same proxy. The Local Government Board has, however, ordered an inquiry into the election on other grounds.

ARMY RECRUITING (IRELAND)—OFFICIAL ADVERTISEMENTS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Secretary of State for War, Why the Army advertisement, which appears in The Leinster Express of October 11th, was not also given to The Leinster Leader, the former being the landlord organ and of very limited circulation, and the latter the popular organ circulating largely all over Leinster?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: There are very few counties in Ireland, I believe, in which the Government advertisements are sent to more than one paper. In the present case, The Leinster Express, established in 1831, has been a long time on the list of papers authorized to receive advertisements; and it is not deemed necessary to incur extra expense by sending the Government advertisements to The Leinster Leader, which was only established in 1880, and which circulates in the same district as the older paper. The Leinster Express has a good circulation, and is well filled with advertisements of various kinds, evidently showing that it circulates among all classes.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Is The Leinster Express, can the noble Marquess say, one of those papers which "more or less support the Government?"

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not know.

MR. HEALY: Is the noble Marquess aware that the Secretary to the Treasury promised last Session, when a similar complaint was made, that those advertisements should be impartially given in future?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Is the noble Marquess aware, too, that the advertisement in question was an advertisement for recruits; that The Leinster Express circulates among no portion of the population likely to furnish recruits; and that The Leinster Leader is much cheaper, and has a much more extensive circulation?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I cannot by silence admit that the advertisements have not been given impartially. There has been nothing to call my attention to the facts stated by the hon. Member; but I will have further inquiry made into the matter.

LAW AND POLICE—THE CLEATOR MOOR RIOTS, CUMBERLAND—ACTION OF THE POLICE.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the report, in The Carlisle Journal of the 28th October, of the evidence given, at the Cumberland Assizes, by John Douglass Sempill, Superintendent of Police and Deputy Chief Constable, upon the trial of a man named France, who was acquitted of complicity in the dynamite explosion at Cleator Moor; whether Mr. Sempill stated that, while France was under remand at Whitehaven, a constable from Longtown, named Tomer, whom the witness described as "an experienced detective officer," was put into the prisoner's cell, in plain clothes, for several hours; whether the witness stated that Tomer was shut up with the prisoner for the purpose of taking care of him, but that, "if the prisoner had made any statement, he should have inquired into it;" whether France states that the detective officer represented himself as a fellow-prisoner, pretended to be drunk, swore at the police, and tried to inveigle him into a statement respecting the charge against him; and, whether an inquiry will be held into the conduct of Tomer, and of the officers responsible for directing his visit, and admitting him to the cell of an untried prisoner?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that he had got a long Report from the Chief Constable, and another from the Superintendent, which were too long to read to the House; but the substance of them was that the Superintendent did not say that this officer was an experienced detective officer. He was nothing of the kind; he was a common constable, and he was not put into the cell at all with the view or object of obtaining evidence from the prisoner. The Superintendent stated that he was applied to by Sergeant Graham, who was in charge of the look-up, that on account of the prisoner being in a low and depressed state of mind, which made it unsafe for him to be alone, another prisoner ought to be put beside him to prevent him doing harm to himself. It was found impracticable to place another prisoner with him at that time, and Constable Tomer, who was then at Whitehaven on duty, was placed in the cell for an hour and a-half. As regarded the two last Questions, there was also a statement from Constable Tomer, and he denied the allegations made in the Question. It was a mistake to suppose that Constable Tomer was brought specially from Longtown to Whitehaven for this purpose.

ARMY—COURT MARTIAL ON SERGEANT GREENE, DUKE OF CORNWALL'S LIGHT INFANTRY.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for War, Is it true that the proceedings of a District Court Martial for the trial of Sergeant Greene, of the Second Battalion of the Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry, on the 23rd and 27th December 1883, were not received by the Judge Advocate General until July 1884, and who is responsible for such delay; was this Non-commissioned Officer strongly recommended to mercy by the Court, and was the letter of recommendation detached, and by whom; is it customary for letters of recommendation to be transmitted with the proceedings of all Courts Martial to the Judge Advocate General's office; was it proved in evidence that, under the circumstances, Sergeant Greene acted in accordance with custom in quitting his guard on the 7th of November 1883; and, if Sergeant Greene had been proved guilty of so heinous a Military crime as "quitting his guard," how is it that so slight a punishment as reduction to one grade lower was the award, and that that award was accompanied with the strong recommendation to mercy, and why was the recommendation to mercy not acted upon?

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN), in reply, said, that the proceedings in the court martial for the trial of Sergeant Greene were received by the Judge Advocate General on the 15th of January, 1884, and not in July, 1884, as implied in the Question; and, considering that the trial took place in Alexandria, and was not concluded until the 27th of December, 1883, and that the proceedings were only confirmed on the 1st of January, 1884, there was no delay whatever in the transmission. As far as he could ascertain, the non-commissioned officer in question was not strongly recommended to mercy, nor was he so recommended at all. Recommendations to mercy were, by the Army Act, 1881, required to be attached to, and to form part of, the proceedings of a court martial, and they were invariably transmitted to the Judge Advocate General's Office. Sergeant Greene was not charged with quitting his guard, and consequently the question whether he acted in accordance with custom in so doing never arose. What he was charged with was, neglect of duty in having, when sergeant of the main guard, taken out a patrol and conducted another sergeant to the guardroom of the Ravelin Barracks without making a report of his having done so to the officer in command of the main guard, and the case was fully proved. He could not say that this was a "heinous military crime;" but it was a breach of military duty which could not be overlooked, especially in the case of an Army on active service. The man bore an excellent character; and the Court, apparently taking the most lenient view they could of his offence, sentenced him to the lightest possible punishment—reduction to one lower grade. The recommendation to mercy was not acted upon for the best possible reason—namely, that it never existed.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ACT, 1883—RE-APPOINTMENT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is aware that the Committee on the Labourers (Ireland) Act, appointed last Session, reported in favour of its re-appointment; whether, owing to the defective machinery of the Act, not a single house has yet been completed under the Act; whether the expectation of further legislation has brought operations under the Act almost to a complete standstill over the greater part of Ireland; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will cause a Motion for the immediate reappointment of the Committee?

MR. GLADSTONE: In replying to this Question, I must not be understood to confirm what is stated in the second and third paragraphs—that it is owing to the defective machinery of the Act that the proceedings under it have been brought to a standstill. The state of the case as to Committees is that it will be inconvenient to the House to take up any question which is new, and which will be likely to lead to an extended debate. But there are three Committees which are not new, and which are not likely to lead to any difference of opinion. With respect to these I will not ask the House to exclude the consideration. This is not a new one, and it is one in which considerable interest is felt. Consequently, I think that it is one which might fairly be dealt with in the present Session. I am bound to add that if, when the Motion is made for the appointment of the Committee, there should arise any lengthened debate, I cannot undertake to give any great amount of time for that purpose. Subject to that reservation, we are quite willing to accede to its appointment.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— REPORTED FALL OF KHARTOUM.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish, Sir, to put a Question to the Government as to whether they have received any intelligence from Khartoum or from Egypt with respect to the fall of Khartoum, or the position of General Gordon?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: My right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) has asked me to answer this Question. So far as we are aware, there is absolutely no foundation for the rumour that has been circulated as the fall of Khartoum, or as to the capture of General Gordon. That rumour appears to have originated, so far as we have been able to ascertain, at Cairo; and we have received absolutely no confirmation of it whatever. The latest intelligence, I believe, that we have received arrived late on the night of October 31, in a telegram from Sir Evelyn Baring. He said that Sir Charles Wilson telegraphs—

"Kabbabiah Arab has brought news that Madhi's troops attacked Gordon's position at Omdurman, opposite Khartoum, a few days ago, and were repulsed. We hear also that hostile Arabs are numerous again at Ghabra, on the Debbeh-Khartoum road. I think these reports are likely to be correct."

Sir Evelyn Baring says the substance of this was given to Reuter's Agency to correct reports about the fall of Khartoum, which are devoid of foundation. That is the latest intelligence, so far as I am aware, from Dongola. I believe my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville) has telegraphed to Sir Evelyn Baring to ask whether he can give any explanation of the reports which have been spread at Cairo; but I think the answer has not yet been received. I may also state that we have a direct contradiction to the statement which appears in The Times of this morning, that telegrams had been sent by the Khedive to the Queen and the Prince of Wales giving an account of the alleged fall of Khartoum. My right hon. Friend has also asked me to answer the Question of the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow), which appears on the Paper as follows:—

"Whether instructions have been sent to Lord Wolseley defining the official position between himself and General Gordon, should they speedily meet; and, if so, whether such instructions have been communicated to and have received the approval of the Khedive, considering General Gordon is a servant of the Khedive?"

Instructions have been sent to Lord Wolseley defining the relations between himself and General Gordon, both in their civil and military capacities. These instructions, so far as they relate to General Gordon's civil appointment, have been sent after communication with, and with the concurrence of, the Khedive. It is not considered desirable at the present time that these instructions should be made public until Lord Wolseley is in a position to act upon them.

LOWER THAMES VALLEY MAIN SEWERAGE BOARD.

MR. GILES asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether any inquiry as to the dissolution of the Lower Thames Valley Main Sewerage Board has yet been held; what constituent authorities have, in response to his inquiries, expressed themselves as desirous of being separated from the Joint Board; and, whether he will grant facilities for giving effect to the recommendations in the Special Report of the Committee of last Session, and for enabling the local authorities to carry out schemes for disposal of their sewage in their own localities?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The Local Government Board have been in communication with the several Local Authorities on the subject. The last reply was not received until last week, and my right hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) has directed that the inquiry shall be held as early as practicable. The constituent authorities who, in response to our inquiries, have expressed themselves as desirous of being separated from the joint district are—the Urban Sanitary Authorities of Kingston, Richmond, Heston and Isleworth, New Malden, and East Moulsey, and the Rural Sanitary Authority of the Kingston Union. It is also to be inferred that the Teddington Local Board are in favour of separation. The action of the Board with regard to the future arrangements as to the district must depend on the decision at which they arrive after the inquiry which is about to be held.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Main Question [28th October,] "That, &c."—[See page 69.]

Main Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

AMENDMENT (MR. SEXTON)—COMPOSITION OF JURIES (IRELAND).

MR. SEXTON, in rising to move the following Amendment:—

"But humbly to represent to Her Majesty that it is essential to the public interest that the Criminal Law, more particularly with regard to the composition of juries, be impartially administered to the different classes of the people of Ireland," said, that the Queen's Speech contained no reference to Ireland, and he was of opinion that one branch of the Irish case demanded the urgent attention of the House. He therefore moved this Amendment. It was characteristic of the system under which the affairs of Ireland were administered—a system combined of cruelty and evasion—that there was at this moment in the House no Minister of the Crown to whom the Irish Members could look consistently for an answer to the case which he intended to make. At this critical moment the Minister who for the last two years was responsible for the administration of the affairs of Ireland had discreetly retired to the position of a mere spectator, and the Government had appointed to succeed him a Gentleman whose mind was so absolutely a virgin page in regard to the affairs of Ireland that he might fairly claim to be absolutely absolved from the duty of offering any reply to any question on that subject whatsoever. He thought he was entitled to say that the retirement at this moment of the Minister acquainted with the affairs of Ireland, and his replacement by a Minister absolutely ignorant of the facts of that country, was another of the most conspicuous proofs of the mean policy of evasion on the part of the Liberal Government that had been afforded since they came into Office. The Irish Members said—"By all means let the guilty be punished and the innocent go free, but let these results be produced by the fair and due administration of the law; and let the Government not resort to fraudulent devices, and let them not put sinister designs in force, for the purpose of punishing innocent men, and of giving impunity to guilt." It might be assumed that the Amendment which he now respectfully submitted to the House contained a self-evident proposition. No doubt, in the abstract, the proposition was self-evident, if it was essential to the public interest in Ireland as in every other country that the Criminal Law should be administered impartially between different classes of the people. The Criminal Law in England and Scotland was administered impartially between different classes of the people. The humblest peasant of the Realm in the Island of Great Britain accused of any crime could assure himself of a fair and impartial trial; but many rights that were freely conceded to the meanest subject in England, in Scotland, and in every civilized country in the world, were, in his own unfortunate country, conspicuous only by their absence. It must be apparent that a fair administration of trial by jury was of last importance, both to the individual and to the community at large. If it were essential in every country, it was of the very last importance in Ireland, because in Ireland there was a constant opposition and a chronic conflict between the Government and the people, and because in Ireland the fortune, the liberty, and the life of the private citizen were placed in extraordinary and special danger from the devices of unscrupulous men. He now addressed the House under a heavy responsibility, to speak the truth according to his conception of it, and he was compelled to say that in any criminal case in Ireland in which the agents of the Crown presumed that there was some connection with the movement for the social improvement and the extension of the political liberty of the people, fair trial by jury was a thing that did not exist. The system of so-called trial by jury now in vogue in Ireland was preceded by a system in which trial by jury was altogether ignored. The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) caused the House of Commons to pass an Act giving to his own personal discretion the trial, or personal liberty, of every man in Ireland. In the course of a year he imprisoned, by his own mere will, 1,000 men, including some of the most considerable in the country. After the lapse of a year, it was seen that the failure of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman was the most conspicuous failure exemplified in the whole course of the unfortunate dealings of England with Ireland. He aggravated popular passion without producing any compensating results. The abandonment of this system was accompanied by the political downfall of the right hon. Gentleman himself, and to those who succeeded him in the Government of Ireland he left the evil legacy of encountering an exasperated people, and the infinitely more difficult function of avenging the crimes which his blind fury and tyranny had provoked. But even after the downfall of the right hon. Gentleman the Government did not by just reforms and kindly treatment appeal to the feelings of the Irish people; on the contrary, they entered upon a career of error which they were even at this moment pursuing. They took advantage of one conspicuous crime, and availed themselves of the indignation created in the English mind for applying to the people of Ireland the most drastic and the most ferocious Coercion Act that ever scourged a people nominally free. The Crimes Prevention Act of 1882 allowed the Government of Ireland to supersede the system of trial by jury, and left it to the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant to try any prisoners charged with any one offence by a tribunal of three Judges acting without a jury. The Government had never put the provision into force. Perhaps the reason was that the moment the Act was passed the most respectable Judge upon the Irish Bench—one man who had fought his way to the position by legal ability, and not by political subservience—gave up his Judgeship rather than be put in the position and have to administer this revolting law. Then the Prevention of Crimes Act gave the Attorney General terrible power in regard to the administration of the law, and terribly the power had been used. The Act enabled the Attorney General, of his own free will, as a matter of right—to use the language of the Statute—to remove the trial of any prisoner accused of an indictable offence from any one part of Ireland to any other part, and to confine the trial of the prisoner to a hybrid panel, partly composed of landlords from the county and partly composed of traders from the town. The tribunal was obviously the most hostile possible to the prisoner, and the most favourable to the Crown. This provision, he might observe, was smuggled through the House in the form of a Schedule after the appointed Representatives and spokesmen of the people of Ireland had been suspended. See how this Act worked, and how their powers had been used. A group of peasants were charged with the commission of some offence in the South of Ireland, to which the Crown affixed the character of complicity in a social or political movement. These peasants were thrown into goal. The Crown from the first moment intended to lead up to a verdict of guilty at any cost; and the moment these prisoners, seized at random, were placed within prison walls, the case was given into the hands of some one of the most unscrupulous and most disreputable of the agents of the Crown in Ireland, some man who had cheated his own wife, some man who had swindled his own creditors, some man who had been obliged to appeal to the tribunal of the country to protect him from his legal obligations, some man of abandoned life, some man of broken fortune, some man who, if justice were done, should be placed in the dock himself instead of being a prosecuting solicitor. Such was the man who crawled around from cell to cell at night-time, and told each prisoner the false story that some of his associates had turned informers. At the same time the police spread false rumours that one or other of the prisoners had given way, and, to complete the practice, a magistrate held a secret inquisition upon the friends and relatives of the unfortunate men. Months passed, and in some cases years, one Assize Court passed by after another, and the Crown still refused to prosecute, hoping that from helpless terror, some wretch who felt his own neck in danger might make a statement not only of the guilt of his fellow-prisoners, but a statement swearing symmetrically to the whole of the story prepared for him by the agents of the Crown. Then the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland refused, as a matter of course, to try these men in their own county, and transferred them to the East of Ireland, where they were placed before a panel of 200 special jurors, of whom three things might be said—first, they differed in birth and in creed from the accused; next, they were either landlords in the counties or traders in the towns, who conceived their interest to be summed up in those of the landlords, and who were, therefore, violently opposed to any man of whom the Crown lawyers chose to say he was concerned in the social movement of the people. Then, lastly, these jurors were hostile to the movement of the Irish people for the enlargement of their political rights. The Government resorted to the meanest expedients to pack the juries which tried such prisoners. It, therefore, happened that these poor peasants were placed upon their trial by men who regarded them with religious, political, and social prejudice of the most extreme and violent character. Surely in such a case the Crown might have allowed these men to be tried by the panel they had themselves prepared. But what happened? Some men, of the type of George Bolton, whose restoration to office, as they had heard in the maiden announcement of the Chief Secretary, was an evil omen for the official cares of the right hon. Gentleman—some men, like George Bolton and his gang of obscure and sinister agents, took this special jury panel in their hands, and set about finding out every man who was a Catholic, for to be a Catholic in Catholic Ireland was to the Crown reason enough for refusing credit to any man upon his oath. They found out every man who was in any way identified with any national or patriotic object, and by the simple process of repeating the words "stand by," the 12 men whom the Crown agents desired came into the box and acted as jurors. There never was a more solemn and, at the same time, a more exasperating farce than dealing with the liberties and lives of men by the method he had described. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland might as well have found the men guilty in Dublin Castle, and then selected 12 persons from the jury panel to ratify his verdict. It was within the knowledge of every man in Ireland that the Attorney General for Ireland could get 12 men from the class he had described who would be ready to endorse any finding he chose to make. The Executive which succeeded the right hon. Member for Bradford felt themselves to be under the necessity of doing something to satisfy the cry for vengeance and for blood which had arisen in England; and his study of the events of the last two years had forced upon him the horrible suspicion that they resolved to strike terror without regard, or at least primary regard, to the guilt or innocence of the special individual whom they might select as the object of their vengeance. His conviction upon that point was the more deep when he reflected that the whole system of government in Ireland now was a system of punishing the innocent if they could not find the guilty, and, in some cases, of punishing the innocent whether the guilty were found or not. That system had produced a feeling of the most profound disquiet in the mind of every honest man even in England and Scotland. It had produced in the minds of the people of Ireland amongst whom these terrible wrongs had been perpetrated a feeling of resentment and of horror which would continue to live and to operate long after the present generation had passed away. This system had, no doubt, enabled the Government to claim that they had vindicated the law. It had enabled them to give some innocent men to the hangman's rope; but he would tell the Government that these dead men in their prison graves to-day were far more formidable to English rule than when they trod the earth, and that those who were now wrongfully confined in convict cells behind bolts and bars were far more powerful witnesses of the evils of that rule than any of them who enjoyed their liberty. Having referred to the proceedings of the Crown in regard to these humble peasants, and described the methods which had culminated in their death, he asked the House to allow him to point to a contrast. Within the last few days the Government in Ireland had a golden opportunity of proving to the Irish people and to the world that they were prepared fairly, courageously, honestly, and impartially to administer the Criminal Law. Two high officials of the Crown had to be placed upon their trial. Did the Crown in the case of these men act upon the first hint of evidence? Did they act as they did in the case of the Tubbercurry prisoners? No; but, thanks to the moral courage and perseverance of a daring journalist, who knew that in entering upon that terrible enterprize he carried his fortunes and his liberties in his hand, thanks to the debates resulting from his action in that House, and to the growth of public feeling amongst intelligent and virtuous people in Great Britain, the moment arrived when the Government were no longer able to evade the issue and screen their subordinates. From the outset, however, like many other Irishmen, he felt a deep suspicion as to the course the Government would pursue. Officials in Ireland knew too much of the system of government that, no matter what crime an official committed, it was unsafe for his superior to pursue him. When the government was conducted by base tricks and sinister intrigues it was necessary that impunity should be accorded to subordinates for their crimes. No doubt, Mr. Cornwall was aware of the tampering by the Government with correspondence of certain persons; and with regard to his worthy fellow-official, James Ellis French, no doubt, he was aware of proceedings of a still more strange and questionable character. Did the Government in the case of these men act on the first hint of evidence? No; it was only when public opinion in England drove them to it they consented to act. They allowed French to remain at his post in Dublin Castle for months after evidence was forced upon their notice. They paid him his salary, they allowed a committee of doctors to bring forward a plea of insanity, they rusticated him. They did not dismiss him from his office, and they only determined to proceed against him when in his retirement he attempted to commit a criminal assault upon one of the constables of his escort. So far from endeavouring to find out the truth of the case, the Government had not up to the present time used the evidence which was discovered by the hon. Member for Mal-low. This was an infamous conspiracy. Did the Government apply the Law of Conspiracy to it? Did they place them all in the dock together? They did not. They placed them in the dock one by one, and having got rid of the lowest and least important members of the infamous gang, they faced the cases of the two principal persons. In the case of Mr. Cornwall they had already so fixed the date of the conspiracy, so circumscribed the ambit of time as to shut out the chief evidence from the jury; and as to the composition of the jury itself, would it be believed that, although it must be obvious that a great many of those upon the panel were likely to have strong sympathies with Mr. Cornwall, not a single one of them was ordered to stand aside as they came to the box to be sworn? The Crown were playing for a disagreement—they were angling for an acquittal. They pursued that course which made it quite impossible that a verdict of guilty should be returned. He was informed by a Dublin gentleman with great opportunities of knowledge that in this jury of Cornwall's there were 11 of his fellow-Freemasons; but so flagrant was the case that they were unable to bring in a simple verdict of not guilty—they felt themselves bound to attach the significant and remarkable rider that they had arrived at that verdict because sufficient evidence had not been brought forward by the Crown. That verdict of the Freemasons of Dublin proved in the most conclusive way that the Government, if not criminally, were at least morally, responsible for the failure of justice in this case. They had confined themselves to putting forward two of the most tainted and disreputable witnesses connected with the whole trial, and they had employed counsel who were not usually intrusted with the conduct of criminal cases. Where was the Attorney General, where was the Solicitor General, and where was the tried and truculent Mr. Serjeant O'Brien? They were absent, so that it could not be said afterwards that the Law Officers of the Crown were responsible for a miscarriage of justice. Then, as to French. It would appear that he faced his trial with a light heart. He had written a letter, in which he had said that the Government would not enter a nolle prosequi in his case, as certain Irish newspapers would be down upon them, and he added that—

"If properly worked up, I cannot see why the jury should agree in my case any more than they did in Cornwall's."

An official in Ireland, no matter how heinous the offence with which he was charged, thought himself entitled to immunity and to something more, because he had been an agent in the sharp practice and sinister business which had enabled the Government to hang innocent men. French was anxious that, in his defence, it should be pointed out that he had been concerned in the hounding on of informers, and he said that if this were done "the English Press would take it up," and added, "I should be a regular hero." Here was a fine sample of an Anglo-Irish hero manufactured for British consumption! French went on to say that if the Government would not agree to his terms as to a pension, and as to expenses for "anxiety of mind" in addition, he would "drive them out of Ireland, and will, perhaps, see some of them in the dock, too." Would the Government give their interpretation of this? Well, this letter proceeded—

"Maamtrasna will be a pain in their side, and Reid's letter will support the Nationalist idea of the massacre."

Who was Reid, and what was in his letter? The man who for 20 years conducted the Detective Department in Dublin Castle said that if the letter of Reid, a Resident Magistrate, came out, it would support the demand made by the Irish Party for the release of the four men now unjustly suffering penal servitude. Would the Government produce this letter, or suppress it as they suppressed the dying declarations of the two men in Myles Joyce's case? No. The Crown felt that if the truth were revealed Lord Spencer would be discredited. Whatever crimes were committed, however justice might be flung to the winds, the reign of Lord Spencer must not be disturbed. But the day would come when the three so-called independent witnesses would approach the administration of the Sacrament, which they had not done since the day of the crime, and the whole of the truth of the Maamtrasna occurrence would come out, so that no man could deny it. There would be another opportunity within the next few days for the Crown to reconsider their position when 11 industrious and respectable men now in the County Sligo Gaol would be brought up for "political and agrarian" offences in the very Court where trial by jury in the case of Cornwall was made a mockery. Would the Court which had allowed a jury favourable to that gentleman keep out of the box every man of the same creed as these 11 prisoners, or every man of supposed sympathy with them? If so, the officers of the Crown would perfect their disgrace. But the demands of public policy dictated the adoption of a wiser and sounder course. It was an evil thing to drive home to the hearts of a sensitive people the feeling that hatred of the law was a moral duty, and that a favourite official need have no fear of punishment. He (Mr. Sexton) warned the House that every day in which the Government persevered in this evil policy would be a day of loss, perplexity, and danger to them, and a day of continual and increasing disgrace before the civilized nations of the world. He would conclude by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. O'BRIEN, in rising to second the Amendment, said, that what had come to light with respect to the late Inspector General and the employment of such persons as Noonan and Macdermott, would cause the House to reproach itself for its refusal to grant an inquiry which, sooner or later, would have to be granted into the Maamtrasna case. In the course of recent investigations he had reason to understand the threats which French uttered against the late Inspector General, and to learn the meaning of French's statement that he was in a position to make the Castle officials "bite their nails." It would be found that Colonel Hillier would not be the only official who would have to come to terms with French. In what had come out with respect to Noonan and Macdermott would be found the strongest evidence of crime organized by police spies, and paid for out of the Secret Service money, of which French had the administration. Macdermott was a notorious police spy. It was admitted that he had had interviews with Mr. Jenkinson and the Chief Superintendent during the very period when he was organizing a dynamite conspiracy for which a number of men had been sent into penal servitude. The long correspondence between Noonan and Ball, who was French's factotum, threw a flood of light on these matters. Noonan's statement appeared at the time so astounding and incredible that he could hardly give credence to it; but now the genuineness of the correspondence had been placed beyond all doubt by the admissions in the letter of French. The allegation of Noonan was, and the correspondence could bear no other interpretation, that he was employed by French to organize the murder of one of the Judges in Cork, and that he was to implicate a number of prominent Nationalists in Cork in the conspiracy. Was it possible that charges of this kind, coming from a man who knew so much, should remain uninvestigated? These charges imputed infamy and corruption to be running through the whole official class in Dublin Castle, and was it possible that men of this class, who were at the bottom of all this business, were to continue to be shielded in that House? With regard to the trials of these men, the Crown had arranged in the most scandalous manner to procure their acquittal. The House would remember the "rider" which had been appended to the verdict in the case of Cornwall by a jury which was composed of 11 Freemasons. That rider, as his hon. Friend said, amounted to a very significant intimation from that jury that the conduct of the Crown in the case had excited their suspicion. He was of opinion that, coming from such a jury, there never was a stronger impeachment of the prosecution. He claimed no credit for his part in connection with these revelations; but he stated deliberately that he believed that he had been entrapped into it by the Crown, who were under the conviction that it would be his ruin. Instead of receiving any assistance from the officers of public justice in Ireland, that House was assured up to the last moment that the charges were groundless against men that they had since been obliged to put into the dock. They had handed over their evidence to the Crown, but they had not attempted to procure a single scrap of fresh evidence; and not only that, but they had grossly misused the evidence which had been placed at their disposal. As to the discovery of fresh evidence, it was perfectly notorious that their investigations only touched the fringe of a widespread and perfectly horrible conspiracy. Even without stirring outside the ranks of the Royal Irish Constabulary they could find evidence enough to convict French 10 times over. They had got the names of dozens of men of the Royal Irish Constabulary, but they were not able to utilize their evidence, for one of the Rules of the Force forbade these men to give any information to outsiders. The Crown could, however, have easily commanded their evidence. He could give two names of Sub-Inspectors which had been conveyed to Earl Spencer and to Mr. Jenkinson's personal knowledge, who could confirm these charges against French; but not the slightest attempt was made to utilize them. He wanted to know where were the rewards for information? Where were the autograph letters from Earl Spencer preparing those who obtained it for promotion? Instead of this, a police officer whom he could mention who wrote to Earl Spencer apprising him of the charges against French was watched and dogged by the sleuth-hounds of the Government until a trumped-up charge of drunkenness had been made against him, by which unworthy means, and on that pretence, he was driven out of the Force. Considering the amount of evidence which they, unassisted and even opposed by the Government, were able to amass, what could not the Crown have obtained if they proceeded with the same zeal as they did in the Tubberecurry conspiracy cases? In their investigation they had not used any discreditable witnesses, but had four young men of Cornwall's own rank, who could have no conceivable motive in bringing ruinous shame upon themselves.

These young men did not depose to actual felony; but they could have satisfied a jury as to the infamous acts and criminal practices. The Crown had, however, elected to try him upon the charge of felony, only utilizing the uncorroborated evidence of two young men whose testimony they had deliberately rejected. The jury, of course, acquitted Cornwall of felony, and the Crown had so proceeded as to destroy the evidence for any other charge. They tried Surgeon Major Fernandez, of the Guards, in Dublin, but never attempted to trace up his associations in London.

MR. HEALY: They dared not—they would come upon too much.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. O'BRIEN said, in continuation, that in the case of the miserable old man Pillar, who was induced to plead guilty, because he was the means of exposing his aristocratic fellow-criminals, he was treated with relentless rigour. They would not accept him as an informer, they would not accept his plea to any minor charge than that of felony. If he had brazened it out, he would doubtless have been acquitted without a stain upon his character. By his sentence of 20 years' penal servitude, all the evidence which he might have given against Cornwall and his confederates was effectually got rid of. The two other miserable criminals, Considine and Fowler, were also got rid of, so that the decks were quite cleared for the trial of Cornwall and Kirwan. The whole of the overwhelming evidence which was available against these men was bevilled and mutilated by the Crown so that it was practically useless. The result was only what might have been expected from the course taken by the Government. Had the Crown been in earnest a very different result would have ensued. If, instead of trying these men one by one for felony, and thus whittling away the case that could be made against them, they had indicted them all for conspiracy, a conviction might have been anticipated. That was the course taken by the Government in agrarian cases, and if ever there was a case in which such a procedure would have been legitimate, it was this felony case. It was all but impossible to prove individual acts of felony; but there was ample evidence to convict all the men of conspiracy. Thus, although Cornwall and French had no direct relations with one another, yet they had all relations with the same gang. By refraining from putting these men on trial together, when the evidence, individually insufficient, would collectively have been ample, the Government had really done its best to insure the acquittal of Cornwall and the others connected with Dublin Castle. He would ask any fair-minded man whether the wholeresult of these trials could be contemplated without shame by Englishmen? The Crown also, when these officials were in the dock, pursued exactly the opposite policy to that which was adopted in political cases. In Francey Hynes's case, 26 jurors were challenged; in Thomas Higgins's, 26; in Pat Higgins's, 42; in Pat Joyce's, 39; and Joe Poole's, 47. On the contrary, in Cornwall's case, two jurors were challenged only; in the last case, none; and in the case of Fernandez, two Catholics were challenged. It was no wonder, after these cases, that there should be a feeling of loathing in Ireland for the whole Administration, when the failure of justice was seen, and that the people of Ireland put no confidence in the administration of the law when they saw justice meted out in such a different manner to Connaught peasants and the officials of Dublin Castle. He charged Earl Spencer with being as much responsible for the failure of justice in these cases as he was for the miscarriage of justice in the case of Myles Joyce. Sooner or later the House would have to grant an inquiry into all the matters mentioned in the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), and the sooner it was granted the better it would be for Earl Spencer and for the administration of justice in Ireland.

Amendment proposed,

To insert in the ninth paragraph, after the word "us," the words "but humbly to represent to Her Majesty that it is essential to the public interest that the Criminal Law, more particularly with regard to the composition of juries, be impartially administered to the different classes of the people of Ireland."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. TREVELYAN said, he trusted that hon. Members opposite would observe that respectful silence while he was speaking which had been accorded to the two last speakers by the Gentleman behind him. Their remarks were in the nature of accusations, and what he should have to say would be in the nature of a defence. He regretted that there was not a larger attendance of Members in the House; but he was glad to notice that the House that heard the two previous speakers was substantially the same as that now listening to him. It would, therefore, be for those hon. Members to say whether the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had substantiated the charges made in support of his Amendment, to the effect that it was essential that the Criminal Law, more especially with regard to trial by jury, should be impartially administered to the people of Ireland. He had listened with interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Sligo, knowing that if there was a case to be made out against the Government it would be presented in the best way by the hon. Member. First, then, with regard to the administration of the Criminal Law in Ireland for the purpose of suppressing agrarian crime, the hon. Member had drawn a picture in very high colours, and he (Mr. Trevelyan) should feel it his duty to draw the colours much lighter. The hon. Member went through all those charges which were so very familiar to hon. Members by that time, and he did not endeavour to bring forward any new evidence. He said that cases were withdrawn from the neighbourhood where the crime was committed, presumably that they might be tried where there was more chance of justice, though they were taken where the Government thought they were more likely to obtain a conviction. He (Mr. Trevelyan) should say, on the contrary, that they were transferred from places where public opinion was in some cases of a diseased, and in others of that unfortunate, nature which produced agrarian crime or induced timidity—taken from districts where there was no chance of a fair trial to others where prisoners would be tried without fear or favour. But whether his description or that of the hon. Member for Sligo was right or wrong, this, at all events, was—that change of venue was laid down by the Statute in the 6th section of the Act of 1882, and he maintained it would be in the greatest degree unfair if the same House of Commons which had passed that Statute, and laid on the Irish Executive the obligation of seeing that that change of venue was carried into effect, if that same House of Commons passed a Vote of Censure on the Irish Executive for doing what they did to carry out the undoubted intention of the present Parliament. The hon. Member then spoke of the preliminary investigation upon oath, when there was no defendant specially charged with a crime, and compared it to the worst days of the proceedings of the Star Chamber. But this was a method of getting at the truth, which was devised—and rightly devised—in the interests of the community, and it was a mode of getting at the truth which was practised in several Continental countries, and especially in one Continental country with which Irish public opinion was supposed to be more closely in sympathy with—he would not say than with any country in the world—than any other on the soil of Europe. He alluded to France, and it was a method which, in his own opinion and that of a considerable number of persons who had given the subject a much more enlightened attention than he had been able to give, might very well extend to England and Scotland. It was obligatory on the Irish Executive under the Act of 1882 to carry out this species of examination on oath before a magistrate where they thought it ought properly to be applied. The matter was debated at great length in Parliament, and he maintained that the Irish Executive had no choice whatever except to apply it to crimes of that description which were described in the Preamble of the Act. Then the hon. Member described special juries as a tribunal to which exception had been taken. He thought that they were class juries. He (Mr. Trevelyan) said, on the other hand, that special juries were juries which were not subjected to those peculiar influences and considerations which rendered 61 murders unpunishable in Ireland, and that they were juries with which they had some chance of a fair and righteous judgment. He did not say all these murders were brought before juries under the system, though of common juries which were susceptible to those influences 61 murders went unpunished, and that argument was a most substantial one with the House of Commons in changing the law. When the House of Commons did change the law after several evenings' debate, this provision was inserted in the Bill in the shape of the 6th section, and it was absolutely impossible for the Irish Executive to ignore it. The question of special juries or of common juries and of the complete inability of the system of common juries to cope with the repression of crime in Ireland was discussed on several nights in the House. Of that he was absolutely certain, as he on more than one occasion remembered making speeches, quoting suggestions, and giving statistics of crimes not made amenable to the law. The particular consideration that this scheme was passed at a time when the hon. Member for Sligo and a good many of his Friends were absent from the House—[Mr. HEALY: Driven from the House]—that it was passed under those circumstances did not, in his opinion, and in the opinion of Parliament, hinder the Irish Executive from carrying it into effect. Then the hon. Member made some exceedingly general and trenchant remarks on the character of the nameless official who was connected with the getting up of criminal cases in Ireland. No one could doubt but that he referred to Mr. George Bolton. They, at all events, were matters in dispute, and he took a different view from the hon. Member. The hon. Member supported his observations about the peculiarities of the juries with certain hearsay anecdotes as having passed between jurors and private friends of his own as to their determination to convict at all hazard. The answer to all this very brilliant, but, in this respect, very vague rhetoric, was that the verdicts had been discriminating. There had been the same proportion as they had at the English Assizes of convictions, of acquittals, and of recommendations to mercy. In Ireland at the present time they were almost free of agrarian crime, and he believed the great body of the Irish farmers were heartily glad that murderous crimes had greatly diminished. They recognized the fact that these crimes were growing with fearful rapidity up to the time of the Crimes Act coming into operation, and they looked for the peace of their homesteads and their livings rather to Acts of Parliament, which constituted a more legitimate method, than to those acts of violence which the hon. Member for Mallow said were regarded by them to a certain extent as a safeguard for their property and rights. [Mr. O'BRIEN said, he said nothing of the kind.] The hon. Member might not have said so, but he indorsed the view. The hon. Member for Sligo had also complained that in the case of those persons accused of felonious practices the Government had not exercised the power of previous inquiry. But the Government could not put that power in force in such cases as those. The Prevention of Crime Act of 1882 was never intended to deal with cases such as those. What was the Preamble of that Act?

"Whereas, by the recent action of secret societies and combinations for illegal purposes in Ireland the operation of the ordinary law has become insufficient for the repression and prevention of crime, and it is expedient to make further provision for the purpose."

The hon. Member for Sligo then went to the case of persons accused of certain odious crimes, and complained that the 14th section relating to inquiries on oath was not adopted in that case. He (Mr. Trevelyan), however, said that while the Irish Government was not justified in letting that section lie dormant in cases of agrarian crimes by secret societies, he did not say it would have been justified in putting it in force in the case of these odious crimes. That special power was placed by Parliament in the hands of the Irish Executive in all cases of crimes of a particular nature. It was, indeed, part and parcel of the Prevention of Crime Act, 1882. Hon. Members opposite appeared to imagine that that Act was passed for the purpose of dealing with those odious crimes; but his opinion, and that of the Irish Government, was that it was not passed for that purpose. The hon. Member for Sligo and the hon. Member for Mallow, who supported him at greater length, and far greater detail, said that the charges against these incriminated persons were not followed up with proper zeal, energy, and efficiency; and what were the arguments which were given? The hon. Member for Sligo was told that there were 11 Freemasons upon the jury that tried them! That might be so; but it was certainly new to him that Freemasons, in matters judicial or political, were persons that ought to be excluded from court. Now, he knew something about Freemasonry, and he did not think it was a secret; but there was no more offensive application that could possibly be made by an inexperienced canvasser to a Freemason than to endeavour to actuate his vote at a political election by representing him as a brother Mason. It was a fact that a Freemason resented extremely having his Freemasonry appealed to on such an occasion; and it had never crossed the mind of the most suspicious Old Bailey barrister that it was in the slightest degree to the advantage of a client of his, if he was a Freemason, that another Freemason happened to be on the jury. If it was the case even that there were 11 Freemasons on this jury, it was very difficult to imagine that the Government could be charged with having formed this very curious jury, because one of the charges made against the Government was that they refrained from challenging jurors. On this question of challenging jurors, in the matter of Cornwall and French, the Government appeared to him to stand in a very firm position. The Government was strongly and vehemently accused by both sides in this unhappy affair of having acted most unfairly. They were charged by the hon. Member with not having struck off from the jury the friends or the people who might, from political opinions or from social position, be supposed to be sympathizers of Cornwall; and, on the other hand, they were charged by the friends of Cornwall—notably by his solicitors—with having refrained from using the power of challenging jurors and with having left on the jury well-known Nationalists. In the case of French, jurors were challenged by the Government; and for what purpose? Those jurors who had served on the Cornwall jury were challenged—[Mr. HEALY: One]—and that was the only purpose for which the Government used its right of challenging, which, in his opinion, was a very proper purpose. The Government were then charged with not having brought forward sufficient or proper evidence against these men. The hon. Member for Mallow had complained that the Government tried Mr. Cornwall on the charge of felony first. What would the hon. Gentleman have said if the Irish Government had not adopted that course? The hon. Member had charged Mr. Cornwall in his paper with being a felon. If Mr. Cornwall was not a felon, that was a libel. But the jury distinctly found that Mr. Cornwall was a felon, and then the Irish Government was accused of favouring Mr. Cornwall, because, after that finding, they put him upon his trial as a felon. Surely, the evidence that convinced a civil jury was the evidence to be brought before a criminal jury. [Home Rule interruption, and cries of "No!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Hon. Members must not interrupt.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that when Mr. Cornwall had been acquitted of felony, the Executive Government proceeded against him on the higher charge. The Irish Government proceeded against Mr. Cornwall for conspiring to promote immorality, and that was the only legal indictment upon which he could have been charged with the slightest hope of a conviction. As regarded the evidence, every scrap of evidence which the Government thought was legal testimony bearing upon this charge was collected and brought forward. The hon. Member for Sligo had insinuated that the Government were afraid of proceeding against Mr. Cornwall, because he was in possession of certain secrets. That was an insinuation which could not be brought against them with any effect, because the Government in its action in Mr. Cornwall's case showed that it was not afraid of his exposing any secrets that might be in his possession. The very first moment that the Government had any evidence before them they put Mr. Cornwall upon his trial. ["No, no!"] The moment the civil action was decided, and had gone against him, no time was lost in putting Mr. Cornwall upon his trial upon charges the House might be very certain a Government did not make against a man with whom they had guilty secrets in common. Then the hon. Member for Sligo read a letter from French, and it was extraordinary that there should seem to exist in the mind of the hon. Member the belief that there was in the rhodomontade of French anything which was at all discreditable to the Irish Executive. French declared that he would put them out of Ireland, and that if they wanted to make terms with him without a pension he must get £20,000 and nothing less. That document appeared to him to be about as odious and as disgraceful to the person who wrote it as any document could possibly be, and he was extremely sorry at the use which had been made of it in that House. The threat of French was one of a nature to which the Government could not pay the slightest attention. [Interruption.]

MR. SPEAKER said, he must request that those interruptions, which were unseemly, be discontinued, or he should be obliged to take further notice of them.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the hon. Member for Sligo had stated that he should bewilder the House by his eloquence. He (Mr. Trevelyan) was certain that what that matter required was not eloquence, but a statement of plain facts. He had often objected to making the House of Commons a Court of Law to try cases; but it was much worse still to turn it into a sort of whispering gallery for making insinuation against individuals clearly of a criminal nature, the very name of the crime not being given, and the insinuation, too, proceeding from a foul and corrupted source. A nation whose Representatives could accept accusations against its public servants on the mere insinuation of a man driven into a corner by a criminal charge, would hardly be worthy of Representative Institutions at all. The threats of French proved nothing except that the Government, in the opinion of the man against whom they were proceeding for an odious crime, were acting in a way to provoke his apprehensions, and, with his apprehensions, his indignation. Unfair and unscrupulous the Government was not; but it would do its best to bring to justice men who never would have been placed at the criminal bar but for the belief in their guilt. There was only one other matter to which he had not referred, and that was a short passage in the letter about the Maamtrasna trials—

"The Maamtrasna case will be a pain in the side, though I do not know anything about it; but if Reid's letter comes out, it would help to support the National ideas about Maamtrasna."

There was one clause in that sentence he fully believed—that the writer did not know anything about the Maamtrasna case, for, if he did, he would know there was no letter from Mr. Reid that in any way could be construed to support or assent to the view the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) and his Colleagues put forward on that case. He maintained that the conduct of the Government in all the cases actually referred to by the hon. Members for Sligo and Mallow had been conduct not of a nature to qualify the peroration of the hon. Member for Sligo, or the Amendment he had put on the Paper. He did not believe they would produce on the mind of the House any conviction that the Irish peasant had little or no chance, or that the paid official little or no danger, when it became the duty of the Irish Executive to prosecute the one or the other. Unless the House approved of these two propositions, he was sure they would be very slow to pass the Amendment. To use words he had only too often used in the House, it would render it difficult and even impossible absolutely to repress crime in Ireland.

Mr. PATRICK POWER said, that although he belonged to a Party which had had exceptional treatment at the hands of the House, and although he had to speak on a subject which he knew was distasteful, he trusted that he should receive the indulgence which was always extended to a new Member. He felt that the majority preferred to be informed by Gentlemen on their own side of the House, who, as they supposed, knew a great deal more about Ireland than the Irish Members sitting near him did. Representing as he did a constituency which had suffered long and much at the hands of the officials of the Government, he felt he would not be discharging his duty to them if he did not lay before the House some of the reasons which made the English rule, as administered at Dublin Castle, so hated and detested by the Irish people. In most countries the object of all wise statesmen was to rule the country according to the views of the majority, and to prove to all classes that the scales of justice were held evenly, and where that opinion did not prevail they never could have peace and order. Unfortunately, in Ireland those wise rules were completely set at naught. They had one law for the rich, and another for the poor; one law for the part of Ireland North of the Boyne, and another for the portion South of the Boyne; one law for the freize-coated trespasser, and another for the trespasser in pink. In this country, again, the Crown officials and the Judges of the land were men who conducted the business of the Crown in a way which was a credit to the country and the Constitution; in Ireland, on the other hand, it was very different. There, all was given, not for merit, but for political reasons, and the Judges were thus made partizans. If the hon. and learned Members for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) and Plymouth (Mr. Clarke), who, in a recent Maamtrasna debate, condemned the tone of the speech of the Solicitor General, were to hear some of the political harangues to which the Irish people were treated from the Bench, they would think the speech of the Solicitor General a very weak performance. They were expected, under these circumstances, to respect law and order. They heard that cant phrase from all quarters; but the people who spoke it forgot that the first thing necessary was to make laws worthy of respect. Neither the laws nor those who administered them were, with very few exceptions, worthy of respect. He felt certain that before very long they would have the opportunity of asking a Tory Solicitor General for those depositions and other documents which Her Majesty's present Government did not care to produce. A Catholic chaplain, who had attended at six executions in the prison to which he was attached, had informed him that he was not more certain of his own existence than of the innocence of two of these convicts. The Government officials in Ireland only consulted the public feeling of England. They had a remarkable instance of this the other evening when the Prime Minister appealed to the public opinion of England in support of Earl Spencer, and ignored the feeling in Ireland. Respect for English law had never been at so low an ebb in Ireland before. Talbot, several years ago, visited his district in the County Waterford, and by direction of Dublin Castle was guilty of the most heinous sacrilege with the view of worming himself into the confidence of the Nationalists. A priest residing in the locality had written to him on this subject—"All his villainies were perpetrated under the direct supervision of the Local Authorities." With circumstances like these occurring they were asked to respect law and order. If the English Government wished to make their rule respected, and to obtain that moral support without which no Government could stand, they must change their hand altogether.

MR. BIGGAR said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had not replied to some of the strongest points of his hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton), more especially with regard to what was a very important part of his hon. Friend's speech—namely, the packing of juries. Everybody in Ireland was anxious that the perpetrators of the Maamtrasna murders should be convicted and punished; and he was certain that a jury of the County Galway would have given as impartial a verdict upon the case as any jury in any other part of Ireland.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. BIGGAR, continuing, said, in the case of Joe Poole, tried in Dublin for murder, over 40 jurors were challenged. The duty of the Crown he believed to be, to have, so far as possible, an impartial jury; but what they actually did was to secure a conviction, and to bring about a verdict for political purposes. The result of all this was that the law, as administered, was detested. The Lord Lieutenant in the South of Ireland was received with black flags suspended from the windows, and the president of the local Land League, who shook hands with His Excellency, was turned out of his office and had to apologize. And in the North of Ireland what happened? When His Excellency went to the North of Ireland, a Presbyterian clergyman, who was also a reporter for a certain newspaper, because he shook hands with His Excellency and received him hospitably, was at once dismissed. These incidents showed the feeling that so universally prevailed in Ireland with reference to the administration of the law; and, as a matter of fact, any contempt in which the law was held in Ireland was due to the manner in which it was administered. There was an institution in that City with which they were doubtless more or less acquainted, associated with the name of "Judge and Jury," and Baron Nicholson might be said to preside with quite as much dignity and fairness at that "Coal-hole" as some of the Irish Judges, of whom a certain number were admittedly of an objectionable character.

MR. SPEAKER: I do not think that expression just used by the hon. Member is a proper one.

MR. BIGGAR: What expression?

MR. SPEAKER: I must call on the hon. Member to withdraw it.

MR. BIGGAR: Withdraw what expression?

MR. SPEAKER: The expression was one reflecting on the Judges of the land. I ask the hon. Member to withdraw it.

MR. BIGGAR: Withdraw what?

MR. SPEAKER: The expression made use of, and if the hon. Gentleman does not withdraw it, I will be obliged to take further notice of his conduct.

MR. BIGGAR: But what was the expression? If I knew precisely what it was, I might explain or withdraw it.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member used an expression reflecting on the whole Bench of Judges in Ireland. He said what, according to my recollection, and, I believe, in the recollection of the House, was of a very insulting nature, reflecting on the Judges, and I ask him to withdraw.

MR. BIGGAR: It is clear you have not understood what I said. I said a certain proportion of the Judges were of a very objectionable character. I did not say the whole of them, for I do not hold that opinion. I can name two or three of them for whom I have a great respect. There is Chief Baron Palles, for instance, a man of the highest character, and also Judge Harrison and Mr. Justice Andrews. But, on the other hand, there are several others who cannot be mentioned in the same category. The law is administered in an absurd way, and the magistrates are appointed in a way that deprives them of any respect from the people. The policy of jury-packing has become quite notorious, and the result is that juries are provided from the partizans of the Crown—men belonging to the landlord class, or whose sympathies are entirely connected with that class. The Government will do well to remove that system of jury-packing in such a wholesale manner, and also to see that there is a revision of the sentences on all those who are now in prison, and who have been convicted upon the decisions of these packed juries, and thus make some reparation for their past misconduct. In conclusion, I hope this discussion will be a caution to the Goverment to act more wisely and more fairly.

Mr. LEAMY said, it appeared to him that the announcement of the Chief Secretary, in answer to the Question of the hon. Member for Monaghan, was a far more serious indictment of the Government than anything that had fallen from the Irish Members. The admission that George Bolton had been re-appointed to his former position showed conclusively that the Lord Lieutenant and the present Chief Secretary were not only resolved to set the National Party at defiance, but to ignore the opinion of every honest man in the country. There was one significant fact about the administration of the law under the Crimes Act—namely, that such administration obtained the approval of the Conservative class which in England denounced the Premier as a traitor to his country, and which declared that the policy of the Liberal Party—except in Ireland—was one against which every honest Englishman ought to rebel. Three weeks ago he had an experience in Dublin which he wished every English Minister had. He thought it would make them ask whether their policy in Ireland was a wise one. Going home about 8 o'clock in the evening, he heard a clattering of hoofs and a clanging of sabres. Then he saw a dragoon trotting along, and 40 yards behind him another dragoon. Then came a whole crowd of dragoons, and in the midst of them was the Lord Lieutenant's carriage, surrounded by men armed to the teeth. This was one result of the Liberal Coercion Act, for in the time of Tory rule the Lord Lieutenant was accompanied by but a few soldiers, less for service than for show. This change was owing to the policy of coercion and repression, which, if it had been practised by their political opponents, would have brought down the denunciation of the Liberal Party, whose Irish policy was the only one which was supported by the Conservatives. The late Chief Secretary had made no attempt wholly to defend the policy pursued when he was in Office. He only said that the Coercion Act was given him by that House, and that it would be unfair for the House to blame the Irish Government for the manner in which the Act had been used. He (Mr. Leamy) thought there was a want of manliness about that statement. The right hon. Gentleman did not attempt to justify the manner in which the Act had been employed. Then he said that similar powers were exercised by foreign tribunals—in France, for instance. It was extraordinary to find such a lover of freedom as the right hon. Gentleman going to France to find an excuse for the policy which he was pursuing in Ireland. It was true that Irishmen sympathized with France, for France had opened her arms to their forefathers, who were driven from Ireland by these same infamous British laws, and he (Mr. Leamy) wished to God that every Irish soldier who had fallen under the English flag could have fallen under the flag of France, instead of under a flag which had brought misery and ruin and degradation into every country into which it had been carried. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) had said that the Act had been employed for the purpose of eliciting the truth. The same excuse was made by the Minister of the Star Chamber, and in defence of every species of torture in the worst days of the Spanish Inquisition. The one thing remarkable about the right hon. Gentleman was the readiness with which he came forward to defend every system adopted in Ireland which was opposed to all that was Constitutional in England. Then as to jury-packing, the right hon. Gentleman had said that he could see no reason why, if a Freemason were put upon his trial, Freemasons should be tabooed from the jury. But he would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman why, when he claimed that for the Freemasons, he would refuse the same independence of mind to a man who happened to be a Catholic? In all the trials that had taken place men had been ordered to stand aside; and he defied any man in Ireland to discover any reason why nine out of 10 of those men should have been so ordered to stand aside unless it was because they were Catholics. It was notorious that almost from time immemorial Catholic after Catholic had been ordered to stand aside. Supposing that an indictment resulted from the Birmingham riots, and that three or four Gentlemen of the Liberal Party—those who got over the wall—were empannelled, would any Attorney General have the hardihood to order every man whom he knew to be a supporter of Mr.

Mr. Bigger

Chamberlain to stand aside? So long as the Government administered the Criminal Law in England in a different manner from that in which it was administered in Ireland, so long they must expect the people in Ireland to regard the administration of the law with distrust and hatred. The Irish Members, however, were speaking to a deaf House, because the Tory Party, unfortunately, was satisfied to see them put upon by the Liberals, as they knew that it caused them to hate the Liberals; and the Liberal Party was convinced that the present Ministry was incapable of doing wrong. But as the Prime Minister had been found to have blundered in Egypt and South Africa and other parts of the world, so he would be found to have blundered in Ireland.

Mr. BARRY said, he conceived that in England it would be utterly impossible for jurors to be told to stand down as Catholics were in Ireland; but his special object was to refer to some of the remarkable statements made in the letter of Mr. James Ellis French. He was much struck by the light and airy manner in which the late Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) had passed over that part of the case. On more than one occasion the right hon. Gentleman had stood up in his place and defended Mr. French, and spoken of him as a tried and trusted servant, and did everything he could to shield him from the charges of the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien); and it was not until he was driven by the gathering force of public opinion that he had taken any steps to bring French to justice. That night the right hon. Gentleman had spoken of French as a "wretch," and had used the strongest terms he could in reference to him. That was a remarkable change of front, because, after all, it must be admitted that the unfortunate man had not yet been found guilty, and the cause of that change of front might be found in the letter. The letter was not written to intimidate the Government; it was written by French to a trusted friend, and by a mere accident came into the hands of the Government. Therefore, the attempt of the ex-Chief Secretary for Ireland to neutralize the impression made by it fell to the ground. Statements of the kind contained in the letter, coming as they did from one who had been a high and trusted official of the Crown, demanded searching inquiry on the part of the Government. The letter said—

"Now, as to the pension, I think from the way I am treated by the Government, I will hesitate very much before I come to any terms with them, and expose them as much as I possibly can."

When a man like French was in a position to talk of exposing the Government, it subjected them to very grave suspicions. A little further on, the letter said—

"If Reid's letter came out, it would help to support the National idea about Maamtrasna."

That was also a remarkable statement, seeing the position which Mr. Reid occupied, and considering that in all probability he would be the successor of Mr. Jenkinson. The letter also said—"Then there is Macdermott and many others." Now, this Macdermott, it was said, was a man engaged by French to get up Fenian conspiracies. He hoped they would have some explanations from the Solicitor General for Ireland by-and-bye with reference to the statements in this letter, and that he would give an assurance that the allegations would be thoroughly and fairly investigated. In this country they had been told for the last three months that it was a monstrous and intolerable thing that the will of the people with respect to the franchise should be obstructed by some 50 Peers. But if that was an intolerable thing in England, was it not still more intolerable that in Ireland the will of the people with regard to the administration of justice should be set at naught by one Peer? The Irish Members might not be able to prevent that now, but they were able to expose it; and the time would come when they would be strong enough to put an end to it.

Mr. MARUM said, that it was extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the English people to understand the state of feeling in Ireland upon this question of jury-packing without some knowledge of the previous history of the country; and he would, therefore, proceed to give a short historical retrospect. [The hon. Gentleman then quoted some paragraphs from a work by Mr. O'Connell, passing in review some of the great landmarks in Irish history. Beginning with the period of 1612, when the Irish people were first received into allegiance—before that time they were named in all legal documents and Acts of Parliament "the Irish enemy," and might be murdered by a person of English descent with impunity—he passed on to the War of the Confederation in 1641, at the close of which the property of the Native races was utterly confiscated; then to the Revolution of 1688 and the Treaty of Limerick; and on to the Reign of Queen Anne, when the Penal Laws were imposed.] The system of jury-packing was calculated to revive all those old memories and kindle them into a flame.

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that his remarks are not relevant to the question before the House—the administration of the Criminal Law in Ireland. I must ask him to keep more strictly to the subject of debate.

MR. MARUM said, he would, of course, bow to the ruling of the right hon. Gentleman, and would just sum up. He proposed to make his references relevant by showing that the introduction of the doctrine of ascendancy at trials in Ireland tended to raise bitter feelings with regard to the past. In addition to the testimony of Edmund Burke upon the point, he desired to quote an old Minute published by the Dublin Corporation. That Minute set forth the position of Protestants in Ireland, and advised the Catholics to rest content.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must, for the second time, call the hon. Gentleman's attention to the irrelevancy of his speech.

MR. MARUM said, that, in deference to the ruling of the Chair, he would not pursue the matter further. All he desired to prove was that it would be wrong for the Government to do anything to rekindle the unfortunate difference which existed in the past with regard to religion. At the present time there was no commercial element in Ireland, and the result was that they had partizan juries. In such a state of things he preferred a trial before three Judges, with a right of challenge. If the selection of the jury was placed in the hands of the Judge, he should think the arrangement an equitable one; but to hand it over to the Crown, to officials whose reputation and credit depended on securing a conviction, and to place in their hands an unlimited right of challenge, was plainly unfair to the prisoners. It was only by criticism in that House they could call the attention of the public to the injustice worked by the present system, and the ill-feeling it created among the Catholic population, who were ordered to stand by and excluded from the jury-box. He had received great complaints on this head from many quarters. In one case, within his own knowledge, a magistrate, having considerable jurisdiction in cases where he acted both as Judge and jury, was ordered to stand aside because he was a Catholic. In this way all the old and painful associations which had collected round the difference in creed existing in Ireland were revived, and the difficulty of administering justice and of disposing the people favourably to its administration greatly increased.

MR. MOORE said, he would not follow hon. Members opposite in denunciation of the Irish Judges; but he should not be doing his duty to his constituents, or to his own conscience, if he did not rise and testify to the widespread dissatisfaction which existed in consequence of the continued exclusion of Roman Catholics from the jury-box. He did not so much object to a change of venue; but he deplored, in the strongest language, the trial of men of humble class before juries strictly composed of men differing from them in both class, interest, and creed. He earnestly hoped the time was near at hand when this most obnoxious system of the challenge of Roman Catholics as Roman Catholics should cease, for it was the cause of a widespread feeling of dissatisfaction among the people of Ireland. No doubt, the Royal Irish Constabulary were a highly respectable body of men; but it was desirable that they should be kept under a well-regulated system of control, especially in times of exceptional legislation. He wished to draw attention to the case of some publicans who decorated their houses on the occasion of a Nationalist meeting at Carrick-on-Suir. There was an old Statute which made such a proceeding illegal, and the publicans, on being summoned to the Court, were fined £2 a-piece by the magistrate, who, however, recommended them to appeal to the Board of Inland Revenue for a remission of the fine. A similar case arose during the visit of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts to a remote district in the South of the county of Cork. A number of publicans were summoned for decorating their houses; but the magistrates refused to deal with the case, and dismissed the summonses en bloc. He wanted to know who was responsible for these frivolous and petty persecutions, which simply harassed the people into disloyalty? Even from the Government's own point of view, these prosecutions were injudicious; for they might rely upon it that they would not prevent Nationalism by summoning Nationalists for hanging out a black or any other flag. The condition of the Irish Prisons came within the scope of the Amendment, and with regard to it, the Report of the Royal Commission, which had been presided over by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton-Cross), had caused great uneasiness as to the way in which they were managed. The Commissioners said there could be no doubt that the punishments were greatly in excess of those inflicted in English prisons. They likewise stated that the treatment of untried prisoners under remand was most unsatisfactory. Moreover, it appeared from the Report, and it was one of the most alarming features of Irish prison life, that there was an unduly large number of insane prisoners, particularly in the convict prisons at Mountjoy and Spike Island; and it turned out that in many cases insanity followed the frequent repetition of punishments, for the discipline was very harsh. He wished to know what action the Government intended to take in regard to the Report of the Royal Commission? In conclusion, he would express an earnest hope that something would soon be done to bring these institutions into a satisfactory condition.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, it was exceedingly discouraging to the Irish Members to come down to the House to discuss a subject of such importance as that, and to find no more than about half-a-dozen English Members present to hear what was to be said on the question. It was a fitting illustration of the mockery of the so-called government of Ireland by the House of Commons. It was, however, satisfactory to see on the Treasury Bench three English or Scotch Gentlemen who had been, or were still, connected with the administration of the law in Ireland. He wished to allude to one very important fact as bearing upon the question before the House. Her Majesty's Government had thought fit to retain in the Public Service Mr. George Bolton; and he did not think there could be a circumstance more tending to handicap the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland in his career in Ireland, than that simultaneously with his first public appearance, the reappointment of George Bolton should be announced. The reason he said that was this—that there could be nothing done that would cause more indignation amongst the Irish people than the reappointment of Mr. George Bolton. If the Government were serious in their anxiety to bring about contentment and peace in Ireland, why, in the name of goodness, did the Government appoint men to positions of importance who were actually loathsome to the Irish people? Who was George Bolton? He was a man who was notoriously infamous; a man, the very breathing of whose name would call forth a burst of indignant remonstrance in any part of Ireland; therefore his reappearance in office would be taken by the people of Ireland as a challenge. They would say that the Government had supported Bolton because they were afraid of him. The letter of French, which had so unexpectedly come to light, would strengthen that impression. The phrase contained in it, "and perhaps see some of them in the dock," could only be a hint as to what it was in French's power to do if he did not receive what he considered to be adequate protection from the Government. French was on his trial, and the jury had not been able to agree. But he fully anticipated that French would be acquitted and provided with a handsome sum of money to enable him to withdraw from the country. Mr. Bolton had been liberated because the Government were afraid that he would fulfil his threat of disclosing matters which it would have been detrimental to their interests to make public. If the persons accused in the Cornwall case were guilty of any offence it was one of conspiracy, and yet the Government, instead of indicting them together, indicted them separately, the consequence being that the wealthy and influential persons got off, while those without money, friends, or position were convicted. He wished to know why the Government had not proceeded against French,

[Eighth Night.]

Cornwall, and the others charged in this conspiracy at the same time, as had been done in the case of Mr. Parnell and the officers of the Land League? If he might supply a reason, he would say it was because the Government did not wish to punish Cornwall, French, and the others, but merely to carry on what was little better than a sham trial for the purpose of keeping up the character of the Irish Administration. The rule of Lord Spencer had resulted in his being unable to cross the street unless he was protected with soldiers with drawn sabres; and even if the whole of the Royal Family of this country were to transfer their residence to Ireland, "bag-and-baggage," from Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen down to the most insignificant understrapper in Windsor Castle, there would be the same guards, the same suspicion, and the same trouble in the administration of justice. They would never rule Ireland from this House, because the people did not believe in them. He did not say that people in Ireland had made up their minds in a blind way to oppose every rule and all rulers. They were as sensible to kindness and good government as any people; but, from the past maladministration, there had been aroused suspicion and hatred of the law in Ireland which would never be eradicated from the minds of the people until an Irish Parliament on Irish soil should make the law and administer it after the hearts of the people themselves. Sooner or later, if the Government did not pay attention to the men who were sent to that House to speak on behalf of Ireland, they would be obliged to listen to men in Ireland who would perhaps command their attention more fixedly, and who would not be satisfied with evasive replies from the Treasury Bench. If anything could tend to the continuance of the Union between the two countries it would be that English Members should show more interest in Irish affairs.

Mr. PLUNKET: I can assure the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. W. Redmond) that I do not ask the indulgence of the House in the character of an official or ex-official. I desire only very briefly to contribute my opinion and testimony on the question before the House as an Irish Member and as an Irishman. I have no intention of following in detail the course of the arguments to which we have listened this evening. I cannot claim any special official knowledge on the subject, but I have taken an interest in this discussion through the common sources of information which are open to all of us in the newspapers, and I have heard to-night the whole case debated, first in the impassioned speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), and then in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan), and I think I am now in a position to form an impartial and independent opinion on the subject. The first thing I have to say is, that most of the points raised in the course of the debate have been discussed over and over again. The only new salient features in the case are the circumstances connected with the prosecution of French, and the very extraordinary letter which has been read this evening. It would be most unjust for me to express any opinion I may have formed on this subject, whether for or against French, and of the character of the charges now made against him, for the very simple reason that, as I understand, French is to stand his trial again; and hon. Members below the Gangway ought to bear in mind that it is impossible for these charges to be made without prejudicing in a most unfair way the trial of French. [An hon. MEMBER: He may trust the Freemasons.] The hon. Member, I think, has Freemasonry on the brain. I say we cannot discuss this matter of French's with any degree of fairness. I am not going to argue either the case of Cornwall or the others? How on earth can we retry them here? If those gentlemen had been convicted, there would have been very little said on the sentences pronounced upon them; but they have stood their trial, they have been acquitted, and having been acquitted, are entitled to all the consequences resulting therefrom, and to be regarded as innocent. Then, again, as regards the special charges made against the juries who were empannelled under the Crimes Act, why, we have often heard those charges before. Ever since the Crimes Act was passed, ever since convictions began to be had, in cases in which our own consciences as well as that of the civilized world were fully satisfied of the justice of the verdicts, from time to time these complaints have been reiterated, though they have never been substantiated. But now hon. Gentlemen from Ireland bring a new charge, and complain that many of these special jurors are Freemasons, for that is what the hon. Member for Sligo says. I hope I shall not forfeit his good opinion of me when I say that I have myself been a Freemason, and have held high office in the Order, and my only regret is that I have not been able of late years to attend to those excellent and pleasant meetings of the craft as often as I once was able to do. But to charge the Freemasons with a desire to influence men in their politics, or in the discharge of their duties as special jurors, is the wildest imagination. It is no disclosure of a secret to say that both political and religious discussions are left outside the door of Freemasonry altogether, and are absolutely forbidden. ["No, no!"] I say they are absolutely forbidden so far as regards Freemasonry in Ireland. I do not know what may be the practice abroad; but no one who knows anything about Freemasonry in these Islands will venture to suggest that a man can gain or lose a single vote on the ground of his being or his not being a Freemason. Such a thing is really absurd; and, certainly, I have never expected to gain a Liberal vote or lose a Tory one on the ground of my Freemasonry. Nothing could be more odious and revolting to the spirit of Freemasonry than to shield a man guilty of such offences as were charged against those persons; and nothing could be more misleading or insulting than to make such a statement. All through the State trials, the special jurors summoned under the Crimes Act took their part in the administration of justice, and they have been exposed not only to these severe criticisms in the House of Commons and on the public platforms, but they have done their duty in the face of perpetual danger to their property and their lives, and in fact, in some instances, have almost lost their lives. This I say, that whatever improvement may have come over the face of my unhappy country in recent times has been due more to these special jurors, who have continued to do their duty in difficult times, than to any other cause. I feel it is my duty to bear my testimony to the services of these men, considering they have been so severely denounced by some hon. Gentlemen from Ireland. As to the Government, they have defended themselves, and I am not going to say anything in addition to what has been urged by the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland. For my own part, I must say that on most subjects connected with the government of Ireland, it is my misfortune to have strongly condemned, step by step, their public action, and much of their public policy, and the more I think of it, and as the time goes by, I feel more and more convinced that they are responsible for very much of the misfortune, difficulty, and disgrace that has fallen on my unhappy country. But that is not the question to-night. I have listened to the debate, and can only give my most independent and unbiassed opinion that the charges and attacks made in this instance have not been substantiated; and I, therefore, feel it my duty to support the Government in what I believe to have been their conscientious administration of the law in Ireland.

MR. KENNY said, he was of opinion that Freemasonry had, to a considerable extent, influenced the verdicts of the special jurors. If hon. Members would refer to a letter written by French, but which had not been intended for publication, they would find the following words:—

"The clerk here, a nice young fellow, is a Mason. The head porter told me so to-day, who is a Roman Catholic, in his presence; so we have a look at each other. I nearly think the clerk wished me to know it."

That would show how this question of Masonry came in even in French's case. Irish Freemasonry was very different from English Freemasonry; in fact, as different as was English Freemasonry from Continental Freemasonry. He thought that the discussion was very appropriate, because it coincided with the notification made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland that Mr. George Bolton had been restored to his position as jury-packer-in-chief in Dublin Castle. Mr. Bolton had been whitewashed by the moral officials of Dublin Castle; and they might now look forward, in these cases of treason-felony and conspiracy to murder, to Mr. Bolton being left to pursue his ancient devices, and to packed juries being sent to try men dragged from remote villages throughout the country. He would refer to two or three cases which had come within his own personal knowledge of jury-packing in Ireland within the last year or two. Although hon. Members protested against the House of Commons being used as a Court of Appeal, he thought it might very appropriately be used for the review of certain judicial proceedings, especially such as the manipulation of jurors for the purposes of the Government of the day. He remembered that, some time ago, when an analysis of the Dublin Jury List was circulated, a gentleman was arrested who was residing in Liverpool on suspicion of having manipulated the Jury List. He was tried, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment for having put forward a list of jurors for the City and County of Dublin, in which he gave the names of the jurors, specified their religion, and gave other particulars about them. He also remembered, about 12 months ago, calling the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to the case of Thomas J. Bower, a special juror of the same city and county, who had been employed by the Crown at the trial of certain of the Phoenix Park prisoners. He had mentioned the case in order to ascertain from the right hon. Gentleman what special qualification, or what qualification at all, Thomas J. Bower possessed for serving as a special juror in the City and County of Dublin, because he had found, on inquiry, that the position held by Thomas J. Bower was that of a messenger employed in the Custom House of Dublin by the Board of Works Department, with a salary of 20s. a-week. He was told by the right hon. Gentleman, in reply, that Thomas J. Bower had the necessary rating qualification which entitled him to act as a special juror, and, on making further inquiry, he ascertained that Bower's rating qualification was derived from some room he occupied over a riding-stable in Dublin, which he had advertised as an insurance office. Apart from the question whether it was legal or illegal to appoint such a man as Bower to the position of special juror, there was this fact—that the real qualification which entitled him to be a special juror in Dublin was that he was the secretary and paid official of three or four Orange Lodges, and that he had acted as an Emergency man under an assumed name in the county of Tipperary and other places. When he (Mr. Kenny) mentioned those facts to the House, the reply of the ex-Chief Secretary for Ireland was that he was holding up the name of Thomas J. Bower to public odium, and that similar consequences might befall him as had happened to others who had performed their duty. He (Mr. Kenny) cited the case now, because he thought there could not be the slightest personal danger to Bower in repeating it, and he only repeated it as an instance of the manner in which the Jury List of Dublin City and County had been manipulated by George Bolton and his confrères. There had been numerous instances in which unfortunate men had fared badly owing to the manner in which George Bolton and other Crown officials had manipulated the Jury Lists. In Ireland, on the most trifling evidence, which in England would convict no one, men had been sentenced to penal servitude for life. In Cork, in one instance, two men, whose case he had brought before the House, and in regard to whom some remarkable circumstances had transpired—namely, the brothers, Delahunty—they were tried at Cork, and he wished to direct the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland and the right hon. Gentleman the new Chief Secretary to the way in which they were arrested and tried by a jury in Cork composed entirely of Freemasons. They were transferred from a remote district in the county of Clare to the city of Cork, of which they knew nothing, and where the witnesses who were necessary for their defence were not likely to be known personally or to be credited. The chief witness summoned on their behalf was a lady of high standing belonging to a wealthy family; the men had been in her employment, and she swore a distinct and clear alibi for one of them, the evidence going to prove that it was highly improbable that the other man could have been in the place where it was alleged a certain individual was fired at. The evidence of this lady would have been fully believed if the case had been tried in the County Clare; but in Cork it was entirely discredited; and one doubtful point which was not cleared up on the trial—namely, whether a servant girl had supplied one of the men with a revolver beforehand or not, was not cleared up owing to the fact that the solicitor for the defence was not present to instruct counsel. The men were convicted, and at the present moment were undergoing penal servitude for life. A remarkable fact had since transpired—namely, that a man had made a declaration that he had suborned the evidence against these men. No doubt, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland had stated to the House that this evidence, even assuming it to be suborned, was not essential to the conviction; but that was a statement very common for an Irish Law Officer to make. There were many other instances he could recite of prisoners who had been convicted by juries composed of persons opposed to the principles, the political life, and the religious sentiments of the majority of the Irish people. He wondered what Englishmen would think if it was the habit in this country to try every Protestant by a jury of Catholics! If England were only for a short time subjected to that sort of treatment—if upon every jury panel the names of Protestants were studiously omitted, and Catholics carefully put on—if, whenever a Freemason was brought up for trial, the jury was packed and well-known Papists were empanelled for the unmistakable purpose of securing a conviction, he wondered how long the English people would tolerate such a system. It was only by endeavouring to bring the case home to themselves that they could realize the feeling of exasperation and hatred which must be engendered in Ireland against this system, so opposed as it was to fair play and common justice. The ex-Chief Secretary for Ireland had for the second time that night trotted out the number of unpunished murders that had occurred in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman had mentioned that there had been 61 persons murdered in Ireland, in connection with whom the murderers had been undetected. Did that list of 61 include the name of Michael Joyce? Because it struck him (Mr. Kenny), in computing the number of murders which had taken place in Ireland, it was not only undesirable, but improper, to exclude those who had been murdered by process of law. He thought that if the total number of murders which had taken place in Ireland, and the total number of innocent men who had been executed by judicial process were counted, the number of those who had been wrongfully executed would exceed the number unpunished. Unhappily, it seemed to be in that House a perfectly useless task to direct the attention of English Members to this condition of affairs. In the condition of affairs in Ireland, the administration of justice, or rather the maladministration of justice, could only be brought home to Englishmen by startling occurrences. Whenever a great crime took place in Ireland, it startled the people of this country and they directed their attention to the condition of things there. They had it from the Prime Minister in Mid Lothian, when recently speaking there, that so concentrated was his attention upon other matters, that the condition of Ireland for some four or five years had practically escaped his examination. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No.] A statement to that effect had certainly appeared in the newspapers; but he was not surprised at the right hon. Gentleman's contradiction, because, in the first place, he knew how inaccurate the newspapers were, and, secondly, he was aware that the Prime Minister never admitted the accuracy of any newspaper report. He believed, however, that the Prime Minister was not so conversant with the condition of things in Ireland as he might have been, and that a great political crisis would come upon his Government before he was at all cognizant of the exact position of things. It was only by startling evidence that the attention of the people of England was directed to the condition of affairs in Ireland; and, for his own part, he thought it an almost useless thing to call attention to the maladministration of justice in Ireland, if he did not look forward with hope, and he would add with anxiety, to the time when they would have an opportunity of bringing about a change in the administration of justice in that country, and of putting an end to an Administration whose policy had not been, as one of its Members boasted, to steer an "even keel," and to do justice between man and man, but to hang innocent men and to cloak and shield official reprobates of the worst type.

statement which had been made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) with regard to Freemasonry in Ireland. The statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was totally misleading, and calculated to deceive English Members. Everyone acquainted with the verdicts of juries in Ireland, and the manner in which various appointments were given in Ireland, from that of a Petty Sessions clerk upwards, would know that Freemasonry exercised a powerful influence in that country, and that it was brought to bear in favour of Protestants. Everything that had been stated on the opposite side of the House in reference to Freemasonry was literally and strictly true. As it was known in England, it was a most honourable Society; but it was nothing of the sort in Ireland. In Ireland it simply meant Orangeism, and it was the curse and bane of the country.

MR. DEASY said, the House were naturally anxious, at that hour of the night, to hear something from a Member of Her Majesty's Government. They had had one speech already from the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan); but, as far as his (Mr. Deasy's) opinions went, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman had failed to touch upon the main points of the question. Now, the present Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had only visited Ireland for a very short time a few days ago; but he had been in communication with many of the Irish officials, and any statement he might make, or any answer he might give, to the charges which had been preferred, would be attentively listened to. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite had always expressed their anxiety to ameliorate the condition of the oppressed people of Bulgaria and other places; but, with a few honourable exceptions, they never raised their voices on behalf of the oppressed people of Ireland. He thought the question raised by the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Moore) was one which deserved the attention of the Government. It had reference to the treatment of prisoners in the Irish gaols; but, so far, it had not been touched upon by any hon. or right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench. He (Mr. Deasy) believed the question had been investigated by a Royal Commission recently; but he fully expected that the Report of that Royal Commission would be treated with the same neglect as the Reports of other Royal Commissions. He did not think the inquiry recently entered into would have any more beneficial result than the other Royal Commissions which had sat. But with regard to the subject of their inquiry, he must say that in the South of Ireland, prisoners had been treated by the Governors of prisons in a very harsh and brutal manner. Those observations applied particularly to persons who had been sentenced to short terms of imprisonment under the Crimes Act. At Waterford, a short time ago, a man died from the treatment which he had been subjected to in prison; and it was with the utmost difficulty that one of the Members for the City of Waterford (Mr. Leamy) was able to direct the attention of the Government to the fact, and compel them to grant some kind of inquiry. What the result of that inquiry would be, he (Mr. Deasy) could not say; but he had received some information as to the way in which the Governor of that gaol had behaved to prisoners who had been sentenced to two or three months' imprisonment. He admitted that some effort had been made by the Government to remedy the old state of things with regard to Cork Gaol, and he thanked the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland for having inserted the clause in an Act passed last summer, which would, to some extent, give prisoners in that gaol a mode by which any ill-treatment they might receive at the hands of the Governor or minor officials could be made public. But it was obviously unfair to place the supervision of these persons in the hands of unpaid magistrates. The result would be that the prisoners would be neglected. The Government, if they really meant to do justice, must revert to the old system of paying independent men salaries, and compelling them to visit the prisons once or twice a-week, so that they might be able to stand independently between the prisoners and the officials. Until the Government consented to make such appointments, there would be constant and, he feared, well-founded complaints against the manner in which these prisoners were treated by the Governors of gaols. He regretted to say that the way in which the Coercion Act was administered in the South of Ireland had been a cause of very great irritation to the people there. One or two cases had been mentioned by preceding speakers as to the way in which the Crimes Act had been enforced in Skibbereen, Millstreet, and other places. There was a Question put to the Government the other day as to the prosecution of a large number of the inhabitants of Skibbereen for carrying torches about the town in honour of the Member for the Borough of Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), and also to celebrate the visit of the Baroness Burdett-Coutts. On that occasion, the Sub-Inspector took it into his head to prosecute men for carrying tar-barrels and torches; but, fortunately, as the House was sitting, and the case was likely to be reviewed, the Government immediately ordered the prosecution not to be proceeded with. One man was brought into Court, but the case was dismissed, probably because it was understood that the Government objected to the discussion which was likely to take place in that House. Captain Plunkett had suppressed several meetings in the county of Cork during the last few weeks. It must have been within the knowledge of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland that those meetings had been proclaimed; and he would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, as he was the only Irish official in the House who could throw much light on the matter, if he could give the House any reasonable excuse for their suppression, or whether Captain Plunkett had given any explanation? At Donoughmore, a meeting was advertised, at which one or two Members of Parliament were expected to attend; but the day before the meeting was to take place, he (Mr. Deasy) had been served, in one of the most crowded streets of the city of Cork, at 12 o'clock in the day, with a notice of the proclamation of the meeting. He did not think that that was a proper way in which to serve a notice upon a Member of Parliament; but it mattered little to him. What he feared was that if meetings were wantonly interfered with, the people would, some day or other, insist upon coming together; probably only to be made the victims of the bayonets and buckshot of the police. There had only been one outrage at Donoughmore for many years. That occurred last year, and the learned Judge who presided at the trial of those charged with the murder, declared, distinctly and emphatically, that it had nothing to do with the present or any past agitation. On the face of that statement, and in the absence of crime at Donoughmore, he confessed that he could not understand the action of the Government. But he could understand why a meeting on the following Sunday at Millstreet was proclaimed. Only a few days before, the Lord Lieutenant had paid a visit to Millstreet, and His Excellency got the reception he might have expected, for the people closed their doors, and hung out black flags. He knew it was for that reason the meeting was proclaimed by Captain Plunkett as soon as it was announced. But he failed to see what advantage the Government gained by the proclamation; because, in this particular case at Millstreet, as well as at Donoughmore, a most successful meeting was held three or four hours before the proclaimed meeting was advertised to take place, and certainly the speeches made at it were of a far more violent character than those which would have been delivered if the meeting had been allowed to be held. There could be no doubt that the people were far more incensed against the British Government and the Executive than if the meeting had been permitted to take place. Why was it that the Government, on those two occasions, did not act as they were in the habit of acting? Why did they not send down an official shorthand writer to the platform, to take a note of the speeches; or even send a policeman, who was scarcely able to write long hand, to report the speeches? It was the easiest thing in the world to obtain a conviction against any man who made a speech on an Irish platform; and it would not be the first time that several of his hon. Friends had seen the inside of a gaol, and suffered all the tortures of a plank bed, for speeches for which, if they had been tried by an impartial Judge, they would never have been convicted at all. It was the custom under Captain Plunkett to send policemen to these meetings, who only reported isolated sentences, and then to proceed against the speakers for having used violent language. Then, again, he complained that the Resident

Magistrates, by whom those charged with breaches of the Crimes Act would be tried, were selected from a class of persons who did not care one jot what evidence was adduced to obtain a conviction, so long as a conviction could be recorded. Nor did he know of a single case in which a sentence had been set aside on appeal by a Chairman of Quarter Sessions. He did not think it would be possible for such a thing to happen. There might have been cases where sentences had been reversed, but he did not recollect them. With regard to the Tubercurry prisoners, whose case had been mentioned in the House that day, he had one or two words to say as to the treatment which one of his constituents, Mr. Fitzgerald, had received at the hands of the Government, and of the police authorities at Galway. In the first instance, he was arrested without a warrant; and after having been detained for a long time in Sligo Gaol, without any charge having been formulated against him, the police authorities in Cork, acting, as they always did, under the direction of Captain Plunkett, sent a detective to Mr. Fitzgerald's house, in order to induce his wife to say something which might implicate her husband. It had not been denied, in answer to a Question which had been put in that House, that a detective was sent, in order, if possible, to obtain some evidence which might really open up a way to a conviction. He felt bound to say that he had never heard of a more cowardly act. But it was notorious that some officials would have recourse to any act of baseness in order to retain their present position, and secure the enjoyment of their present large salaries, with the prospect also of a further increase; for he could not forget that the House of Commons had been kept until 6 o'clock in the morning discussing a proposal to increase the salary of Captain Plunkett and the other Divisional Magistrates by £500 a-year. The manner in which police officials manufactured offences for their own benefit was well known in Ireland. He would give one or two instances. It was reported in the newspapers one morning that the police had made a large seizure of arms in Cork, near the military barracks; but he had it on the best authority that only one or two rusty rifles had been taken, and there were strong reasons for believing that those rusty rifles were placed where they were found by the very men who afterwards went to seize them. Another feat of the police occurred a short time ago, three miles from the city of Cork. In the centre of a field 200 yards from the road, the police dug up a couple of sods of earth and found a bottle, which they carried away in triumph. He was told that the bottle contained nothing more dangerous than whiskey; but he could not vouch for that fact. He did not know what it contained; but it was made a pretext by Captain Plunkett for the continuance of an extra force stationed in the city of Cork on account of the dangerous character of the neighbourhood. He had been surprised to hear the ex-Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan) state that jury-packing did not prevail to any extent in Ireland. If the right hon. Gentleman knew of the way juries were manipulated by Peter O'Brien & Co., he (Mr. Deasy) did not think he would have stated anything of the kind. He had been supplied from the city of Cork with several lists of jurors under the Crimes Act, in which were the names of those who had been empannelled on juries for the last year and a-half, and he found that all of them were Protestants with the exception of four or five—those four or five being magistrates who had signed the Petition protesting against the dismissal of Lord Rossmore from the Commission of the Peace, and who were more strongly opposed to the interests of the people of Ireland than the very worst Orangemen. The Crown had been in the habit, latterly, of challenging from 36 to 38 and 40 Catholics, and not one single Protestant; but they always managed to put on in every jury one or two of the Catholic gentlemen he had just referred to, to try and save appearances; so that, of course, a verdict was given in every case, no matter what the evidence might be. No doubt, last summer, Peter O'Brien had proceeded in a more satisfactory manner, in consequence of the severe strictures which had been placed upon his conduct in that House. It was now the practice of the Crown to challenge three or four Protestants, in addition to 38 or 40 Catholics, so as to show their impartiality, and he congratulated Peter O'Brien on having adopted that ingenuous expedient. He had informed the House

a few nights ago, of an instance which occurred at the last Assizes. In one or two cases the jury disagreed where Peter O'Brien thought a verdict ought to have been given, and, after the cases were over, he followed one or two of the jurymen into the street. One of these gentlemen said that Peter O'Brien asked him who were those who disagreed, and who were those who were in favour of a verdict. He had submitted that fact to the House the other night, and he had since received letters from the city of Cork, giving unquestionable proof that similar instances had occurred on more occasions than one. It was evidently the object of Peter O'Brien to find who the dissentient jurymen were, in order that they might be excluded from the jury panel in future. They had an admission from the ex-Chief Secretary for Ireland that Freemasonry in England might be very different from what it was in Ireland. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman, and if the right hon. Gentleman knew how different it was in Ireland, and the construction the people were likely to put upon his admission that he was a Mason, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman would have made it. People would now say that it was because he belonged to that Society himself, that he screened French and Cornwall when he was Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. But to return to the subject of jury-packing, he thought it was extremely hard on respectable citizens of the city of Cork, and other parts of the country, that they should be brought from their business, many of them at considerable expense, and then simply told by the Crown, when their names were called, to stand aside. Those gentlemen must feel very keenly the slur thus cast upon them by such men as Peter O'Brien, because there were only two inferences that could be drawn from the action of the Crown—either that the persons challenged were unworthy of sitting upon a jury, or else it was the object of the Crown to obtain a conviction at any cost. Not content with getting convictions by the amount of evidence they were in the habit of producing, they did not hesitate to have secret inquiries of the character the right hon. Gentleman the ex-Chief Secretary for Ireland had not scrupled to produce before the House that night.

Men of the most respectable character, occupying good positions in Cork, one of them a Town Councillor of the city, had been brought up before these Special Commissions, and because they refused to give evidence as to any Societies with which they might have been connected 10 or 20 years ago, they had been sentenced to imprisonment week after week. These men were determined they would not be the tools of the Government, and had made up their minds that they would remain in prison rather than state what was not true. Neither would they state anything outside the matter they were called on by summons to answer. The result was that the Inquisition had to be abandoned, and the Government had to fall back upon the Secret Service money, in order to obtain witnesses to swear against those men who were marked out for victims. He should like to know how much of that money Detective French had put into his own pocket, and what account he had given of it to the Government. French, three or four months ago, resided near a farm he had purchased; and since he had come into possession of it a great deal of money had been laid out upon it. During his suspension he (French) had remained with a relative near Cork, who was in comparatively poor circumstances up to the time of the appointment of French as Inspector Director. Since then matters had changed, and the worldly circumstances of the relatives of Mr. French had marvellously improved. Whether this was due to the employment of Secret Service money or not, he (Mr. Deasy) did not know; but he was really interested in obtaining some statement of the manner in which that money had been expended by French. Of course, the Secretary of State would consider himself quite justified in making a simple declaration that the money was spent as Parliament desired; but the Government did not know anything, he was quite sure, of the manner in which it was employed. Up to recently, the people of Cork and the police had been on good terms with each other. Latterly, Captain Plunkett, for some reason or other, had removed most of the Catholic constables from the city, and brought down Orangemen to take their places. He did not attach much importance to that fact; but he should certainly like to have an explanation. On the whole, he thought the less the people had to do with the police the better; but, no doubt, there was some motive in the course Captain Plunkett had taken. He hoped, before the debate proceeded much further, to have a full and satisfactory statement, or at least some attempt at a reply, from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland to those speeches which had been made on that side of the House. It would not do for the hon. and learned Gentleman to tell the House to be satisfied with the speech they had just heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan). That really was no kind of answer at all to the speeches which had been made by the Irish Members; and it was not too much to hope even now, after the treatment they had received from the Government both this week and last, that the hon. and learned Gentleman would get up and frankly acknowledge that the case made out by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was unanswerable, or do the best he could to give an answer to it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he had listened with great attention to the arguments adduced by hon. Members opposite in support of the Motion on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), and which the hon. Member had supported in a strong and able speech; but he thought some matters had been introduced into the debate by hon. Members opposite which he did not think the House would expect him to deal with. The question of the administration of the Irish Prisons was certainly not germane to the Motion before the House, although he admitted that that question was a large and important one, and deserving of substantial consideration. Nor did he think that the question of the way in which public meetings had been dealt with in Ireland was raised in the present issue. The few meetings which had been proclaimed had been suppressed on principles which had been applied throughout the country with consistency, uniformity, and impartiality. They had been prohibited either on the ground that outrages had been committed in the district in which they were to be held, or that outrages and danger to individuals were to be apprehended, either directly or indirectly, if the meetings were allowed to be held. Anyone who had read the reports in the newspapers during the Recess must have come to the conclusion that the right of free speech in Ireland had not been abridged, but, on the contrary, had been largely exercised by many persons. But dealing with the question immediately before the House, as he understood it, there were two impeachments against the Government which, in effect, came to this—first, that the Government had used the Crimes Act and the powers which it conferred on the Executive; and, secondly, that they had used those powers in an unfair manner. ["Hear, hear!" from the Irish Members.] So far had some hon. Members gone—and not the less those hon. Members who now cheered—that they accused the Government of having deliberately, wilfully, and intentionally packed juries in order that innocent men might be convicted. He failed to understand the force of the accusation against the Government, and he did not think that any hon. Member could really believe it. With regard to the first point, the allegation as to the Crimes Act might have been a very good one before the Crimes Act left the House of Commons; but when it was proposed, under the Crimes Act, that powers should be given to the Executive to change the venue, and to examine witnesses without the presence of the accused, those matters were fully discussed, and it was only after a full discussion that these powers were intrusted to the Executive to use them and put them in force, and they would have been neglectful of their duty if, when the occasion required, they had not done so. What was the principal charge as regarded the Crimes Act? It was that this change of venue had taken place. But the change of venue had taken place under the authority of the Attorney General for Ireland by powers intrusted to him by an Act of Parliament. The object was to take away the cases from all local prejudice. If his right hon. and learned Friend came to the conclusion that a fair and impartial trial could not be had in the district in which the crime occurred, he had power to change the venue under the provisions of the Crimes Act. Why was it that the venue had been changed? As he had stated, it was to prevent anything in the shape of local prejudice, local terrorism, and to bring these cases before a jury thoroughly impartial, who knew none of the parties, who had never seen them, and who for, the first time, heard the facts as they were presented to the Court by the witnesses. It was said that the special jurors of Dublin were incapable—he used the words of the hon. Member for Sligo—of trying the cases fairly, because they regarded the prisoners with political, religious, and social prejudices—because they differed from the creed of the accused, and because they were landlords in the country and traders in the towns, who were hostile to their interests. How could it be supposed for one instant that the special jurors of Dublin, comprising not only gentlemen, but its first merchants, would view with prejudice a case in which a peasant from Connemara, or Munster, or from any other part of the country, was accused of murdering another peasant? Almost all the cases which came on were trials of one peasant for murdering another. Surely it was too much to state to the House of Commons that the first merchants which Ireland possessed were, in connection with these cases, so imbued with prejudice that they were incapable of approaching such a trial fairly and impartially? Then it was stated that being a Catholic was sufficient to induce a juror to refuse to believe a man on his oath. Hon. Members opposite complained that there was only one Roman Catholic, or two Roman Catholics, or three Roman Catholics, on a certain jury; and, further, that they were selected because they shared in the prejudices of Protestant jurymen. He thought that it cast an undeserved slur upon the Catholic jurors of Dublin, many of whom were his personal friends, to tell them that they were incapable of serving with Protestant jurors, without sharing in their prejudices, and that, therefore, they were incapable of trying prisoners fairly. As for the allegation that there was a combination to put Protestants on juries, because the Crown were afraid of Roman Catholics, he would tell the House who the Law Officers of the Crown were. The Attorney General for Ireland was a Roman Catholic, and the two gentlemen associated with him in the prosecutions were Mr. Fottrell, the Clerk of the Crown, another Roman Catholic, and the Crown Solicitor, who was also a Roman Catholic.

Mr. CALLAN asked, whether at the time the jury principally referred to was empannelled the Crown Solicitor and the Crown Prosecutor were Roman Catholics?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, he was speaking of the state of things at present, and what he said was literally true. Hon. Members would not deny that, at this moment, every official connected with the administration of the Criminal Law in Dublin, except himself, was a Roman Catholic.

An hon. MEMBER: How about George Bolton?

Mr. HEALY: Since when?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that two cases had been cited as an illustration of the mode in which the law had been administered. Mr. Cornwall had been spoken of as an official of the Castle; but it was well known that Mr. Cornwall was not a Castle official at all. He had no more connection with Dublin Castle than any hon. Gentleman below the Gangway, nor had he ever had any connection with it. Mr. Cornwall was an official connected with the Post Office. Now, what was the course the Government had taken in the case of Mr. Cornwall? As soon as the prosecution against him resulted in a verdict—he referred to the case in which the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) was defendant—immediately that verdict was given, proceedings were taken against Mr. Cornwall. The complaint now made by several hon. Members opposite was that all the persons accused of different conspiracies, different crimes, and different acts had not been joined in one charge. He was astonished to find that such an accusation should ever have suggested itself to the mind of anyone—namely, that persons charged with different crimes should all be joined together in one charge. Everyone who knew anything about law knew that such a course was perfectly impossible, and that each case was bound to be dealt with separately. Then it was said that the Public Prosecutor had acted from first to last with a desire to screen Cornwall. The charge was preposterous, considering that Cornwall had been tried for felony at the instigation of the Crown.

Let them see how the case stood. The men accused of these crimes had been tried one by one, it was true, and except in a case of conspiracy that was the only course that could be taken.

MR. HEALY: That was not the course pursued in the charge against the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell).

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, that was a case of one conspiracy. The charge against the hon. Member for the City of Cork was not at all an analogous case, and was a perfectly different thing from the cases they were now dealing with. It was said that the Government had tried to screen Cornwall; whereas, after the jury had found that Cornwall was a felon by the verdict they gave in the action brought by him against the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), the Crown tried him for felony. If the Crown had not tried him for felony, but misdemeanor and conspiracy, there would have been fair ground for the charge that they had endeavoured to screen him; but, properly and naturally, they tried him for the felony the jury had found against him. The complaint on the side of Mr. Cornwall's friends was that the Crown had pressed unduly against Cornwall, not only in challenging the jury, but in the way in which they had conducted the case, and in trying him twice. Indeed, the Crown went so far as this—that, after he was acquitted on the charge of felony, they pressed the other charge, and tried him for conspiracy, and the jury disagreed. In the meantime another case was tried—that against Dr. Fernandez. Several jurors of the jury who acquitted Dr. Fernandez were challenged, and had said that he left the Court without a stain upon his character. And yet they were told in that House that they were trying to screen Cornwall. In the present Commission, Cornwall had been put upon his trial again for the same charge; and the complaint now was that no juror had been challenged. The objection on the part of Cornwall's advisers was that the Crown did not challenge men of national sympathies, who were likely to find him guilty. The complaint on the other hand was that the Crown did not challenge men who, from the social position they occupied as Freemasons, were likely to acquit Cornwall. The Government were impeached in the House of Commons, because, in an important case like this, out of a panel of 400 jurors of which the special panel consisted, no challenge was made at all, and the jurors, as they came into the box, were allowed to try Cornwall. It was said that that jury was composed almost entirely of Freemasons. He was not a Freemason himself, and he knew nothing about that Body; but this he did know, that, according to the statement of the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), there was one Roman Catholic on that jury, and if there were 11 Freemasons who would act contrary to their oath, he did not and could not believe that they would be able to find a Roman Catholic who would be ready to act with them. The statement that there were 11 Freemasons on the jury was made, he imagined, from hearsay, because he did not suppose that anything so incredible could happen as that the first 11 men out of a panel of 400 would be Freemasons, and would be allowed to be sworn without challenge.

MR. SEXTON said, the number was 200, not 400.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, it was quite incredible that of the first men who entered the jury-box out of so large a panel, 11 should be Freemasons. It had been said that a rider was attached by the jury to their verdict, in the case of Cornwall, to the effect that the evidence adduced by the Crown had not been sufficient. What was the meaning of that? The Crown examined every available witness, and, among others, Johnson and Taylor. The verdict was simply a verdict equivalent to one of "Not proven," which meant that the evidence of Taylor, Johnson, and others was not reliable. Anybody who read the evidence given at the trial would understand, having regard to the cross-examination, that the jury were unwilling to believe, or at least place implicit confidence in, the evidence of Taylor and Johnson, having regard to the mode with which that evidence had been procured, and to the fact that the man who had been employed in getting up the evidence—Meiklejohn—had reduced them to such a state of abject terror that he had compelled them to confess to their own guilt.

Other complaints had been made. The hon. Member for Sligo asked why the ordinary Law Officers of the Crown had not conducted the prosecution? So far as his Colleagues and himself were concerned there was an obvious answer. At the time the Commission sat, he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) was engaged in his Parliamentary duties, and could not possibly have been there; but it was asked why was not the Attorney General for Ireland there? In that case, also, there was an obvious reason. When the Commission sat, his right hon. and learned Friend had gone down as special counsel to conduct a very important prosecution at Sligo. With regard to Serjeant O'Brien, there was a complete answer also, as he had been one of the counsel employed in the case of "Cornwall v. O'Brien." Failing the ordinary Law Officers of the Crown, Serjeant Hemphill, one of the most eminent members of the Irish Bar, was retained to conduct the prosecution. That was the answer to the charge of not employing the ordinary Crown counsel. He came now to the case of Mr. French. The trial of French was actually going on at that moment, and had been going on during the whole of that day. It was most unfortunate, therefore, to have it discussed in that House, or that anything should be said by hon. Members opposite which might be read to-morrow by the jury engaged in trying the case. For his own part, he should abstain altogether from saying anything in reference to cases which were absolutely pending. He denied that there was any foundation for the allegation that the Crown had been any party to the absconding of one of the defendants; and as regarded the letter of Mr. French, that letter was actually used and put in by the Government against Mr. French for two reasons. It was first alleged on behalf of French that he was incapable of pleading. As the jury had found that issue against him, he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) could say, without injustice to him, that he was sane and perfectly capable of pleading. This letter, having come into the hands of the Crown, was used first, because it showed conclusively in the judgment of the Crown Prosecutor that French was sane; and, secondly, because it contained a threat against the Government; and, in his opinion, no Government would be worthy of the name of Government, if, when they obtained possession of a letter charging them with improper conduct, under a threat to extort exceptional terms as regarded a prisoner, they had refrained from using it. French was a man who had been for some years in the Public Service, and he now suggested that he held State secrets which he would disclose against the Government. If the Government had refrained from using a letter written by a man about to be tried, containing such charges against them—if they had at all evinced a disposition to hold it back, they would have been guilty of most improper conduct. They felt themselves at once compelled to bring it forward, and as openly and as publicly as they could to meet the allegations made against them. As to the letter of Mr. Reid, which was referred to in French's letter, and upon which so much stress had been laid by the hon. Member for Sligo, according to the best information he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) could obtain, there never was any such letter in existence. He knew nothing about the matter himself; but he had received a communication stating that no such letter existed containing one word in support of the statements of hon. Members opposite. He made that assertion on the best information he had been able to secure. The trial of Fitzgerald had been referred to; but French, admittedly, had no earthly connection with the case. Fitzgerald was arrested subsequently to French leaving the service of the public, and French was neither directly nor indirectly connected with it. The main charge against the Government was that of jury-packing. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Sligo, that it should be the object of everybody to secure a jury which would be fair and impartial, thoroughly free from bias, and free from the imputation of undue influence. Men possessing those qualities were the men whom everyone wished to see performing the duties of jurors. Those being the objects every man desired, and which he believed every honest Crown Prosecutor desired, they were secured by certain safeguards as old as the law itself. In the first place, in the interests of the prisoner himself, he was given the right to challenge, and the right of "stand by" was also possessed by the Crown. In the ordinary class of cases they had to deal with in Ireland no difficulty whatever arose, and it was considered that every juror as he came forward was just as capable of trying a case fairly and impartially as another. But the House must remember what the history of the country had been. Hon. Members would not forget that within a very short time the history of Ireland had been so lamentable that it was difficult to obtain men who would discharge the duty of a juror; and, in one celebrated case, a jurymen, for no other reason than that he had discharged his duty fearlessly, was all but murdered. That case would be fresh in the recollection of the House, and all that this juror did was to perform his duty in the jury-box, and to give a fair and honest verdict. Another jurymen had his life spared almost, as it were, by the interposition of Providence. Threatening notices had been sent broadcast throughout the City of Dublin in the case of an important trial; and with the knowledge that these influences were at work, were the Crown to be blamed for trying to secure an impartial jury, and for endeavouring to free the jury-box from the influence of terrorism and fear? Their only desire was to secure jurymen who would try to do their duty fairly, honestly, and impartially. Catholics, no doubt, had been ordered to stand aside in many cases; but there was no slur upon them. This grievance was not put forward by them, but for them, and it was a false issue altogether that was raised. There were also many persons who, for their own sakes and from the nature of their business, were ordered to stand by. [Interruptions.]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland must be allowed to proceed without interruption.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The hon. Members opposite were, perhaps, not aware of the mode of procedure in these cases. Jurors were not placed upon the jury panel by the Crown. They were placed on it according to the rating, and the Executive had no more to do with that than any Member of that House. So much for the composition of juries. Then, under the rules laid down, persons were in some cases ordered to stand by for their own sakes, and, in many cases, from the nature of their trade. And, again, in the case of persons known to be subject to fear or influence, the Crown would neglect its duty, if it did not order them to stand aside, and call in their place fair and impartial men. Anyone acquainted with criminal trials in Ireland would know that there were many persons whose trade, and whose lives, perhaps, might be endangered by their serving as jurors. But in ordinary cases, those rules did not apply, because they were laid down solely for the purpose of securing a fair and impartial jury—free from fear or influence. For that purpose they were framed, and for no other purpose were they applied; and he appealed to the record of jury trials, to the results known to that House, to the state of crime in Ireland as it was now and to that which existed some years ago, as affording the best proofs that juries in Ireland had fearlessly and impartially discharged their duties. Finally, he said that the jurors of Dublin—merchants and gentlemen—who were unpaid and unrewarded, with nothing to gain, but with much abuse, at least, and sometimes danger to fear, and who had thus discharged their duties, deserved the thanks of the community.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted." ["No, no!"]

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

MR. PARNELL said, he had hoped that the House would have had the pleasure of listening to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the new Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on this question. It was true that the right hon. Gentleman was not responsible by the actual tenure of his present Office for the course of the events which had given rise to the Motion of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). But, still, he (Mr. Parnell) thought they were entitled to assume that the right hon. Gentleman had been an attentive observer of those events, and that he would not have assumed the Office which he now held, without having examined and carefully considered the nature and general bearing of all these complaints of Irish Members, at least during the two years which had elapsed since the Crimes Act of 1882 had been in force; and, therefore, he believed that the right

hon. Gentleman was in a position, on the present occasion, to give to hon. Members on those Benches, and the House generally, the benefit of his opinion and his judgment upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Sligo, and upon the proceedings of the Irish Executive, which that Motion impugned. The right hon. Gentleman, by the assumption of his present Office, had, to a certain extent, made himself responsible for the doings of his Predecessor; and although they had had the able assistance of the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan), yet, at the same time, he (Mr. Parnell) thought it would be more satisfactory to hon. Members around him—he did not know whether it would be so to the House generally—if they were to have the benefit of hearing the voice of the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion. Certainly, it was rather an unusual occurrence, when the adjournment of the debate was moved upon a question of the present magnitude, involving such important issues, and connected with such very serious charges against the Irish Executive—it was rather unusual that the Question should be put from the Chair without any observation whatever, or reply, from the Minister responsible for the defence of the Government to the charges made. He should have thought they would have heard why the Government intended, as it was evident that they did intend, to oppose the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, and that the hon. Member for Athlone (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy) might have received some reason for that opposition? Without going into the nature or the merits of the case, which, on the present Motion, it was impossible for him to do, he submitted that the questions involved were of the greatest moment and weight, that they required greater time for consideration, affecting, as they did, the lives and liberties of many persons in Ireland, which in some instances had been menaces, and in others actually taken away; and that, therefore, the Government would do well to yield to the Motion before the House. He could not understand how they expected in the long run to gain that time which they wanted to gain, or to obtain the earlier discussion of the Franchise Question, by curtailing the minutes and hours asked for by hon. Members on those Benches.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Sir, I feel it my duty to offer a decided opposition to the Motion of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy). I have heard the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) urge two reasons for that Motion. One is that my right hon. Friend the present Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) has not entered into this debate. That, Sir, is perfectly true; but the present Chief Secretary for Ireland has no special responsibility for what has occurred in Ireland up to the present moment, and the right hon. Gentleman who has such responsibility for what has occurred during the last two years has entered fully into the debate, as has also the Legal Adviser of the Crown. The other reason of the hon. Member is that the subject of the Motion of the hon. Member for Sligo is most important. No doubt, Sir, it is most important; but there are other important subjects awaiting discussion in this House, which, if they were raised, might occupy us for 12 months. Sir, the debate on the Address is not the occasion for discussions merely because they are important; and if that principle is to be applied, as it is now being applied, to an extent which threatens to be fatal to the dignity and efficiency of this House, I can only say that a new revolution will have been introduced into Parliamentary practice. We have had, I believe, eight days of discussion on the Address. Parliament was called by the Crown for a special purpose, and was exhorted to give its immediate attention to that purpose; and it is impossible for us, as the Advisers of the Crown, not to appeal to the House to assist us in giving effect to that intention, which I believe to be sustained by the entire voice of the nation. Therefore, Sir, the House having exhibited great patience already, we are not able to consent to this indefinite extension of the debate on the Address, and I hope the House will by a large majority refuse the Motion before it.

Mr. HEALY said, the Prime Minister had truly stated that the subject of the Motion of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was most important. Of course, hon. Members on those Benches did not deny that, in the opinion of the Government, the Franchise Question was of more importance; but that was not their opinion. To them the lives and liberties of their fellow-countrymen were of much greater importance than the possession of votes at quinquennial elections; and he could not but think that the fact that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland was allowed to sit down a few moments ago with an absolutely empty Treasury Bench, and that the Speaker was obliged to rise and put the Question without a word from the Government, when the whole of the Radical Party cried "No!" was most noticeable. And then they had all the occupants of the Treasury Bench trooping in by preconcerted arrangement from parts unknown, where they had remained at a time when he (Mr. Healy) thought they would have been much better occupied in attending to the debate raised on a question which the Prime Minister himself had admitted to be most important. He would ask how the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman had shown their sense of its importance? By coming into the House at half-past 12 o'clock, when the Motion was made for the adjournment of the debate, and by their absence while the debate was going on. It was in that way hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench showed their sense of the importance of the Motion of the hon. Member for Sligo. When the adjournment of the debate was moved, they had a speech from the Prime Minister, and Irish Members very well knew with what intent and purpose calculated speeches of the kind were made; they knew that, to all appearances, there was a prearranged scheme.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member (Mr. Healy) must confine himself to the Question before the House.

MR. HEALY said, that, while following the ruling of Mr. Speaker, he would remind hon. Gentleman opposite, even at that hour of the morning (12.35), of the words of Dr. Watts, and ask them not to "let their angry passions rise." The Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy) for the adjournment of the debate had been made distinctly on the ground that hon. Members on those Benches had not had sufficient opportunity for discussion. One night only—from 5 to 12 o'clock—had been occupied in the discussion of the Motion of the hon. Member for Sligo; and he would put it to any reasonable man whether, considering the practices which had been going on in Ireland—considering the extraordinary revelations made by Inspector French, the Motion for the adjournment of the debate after six hours' discussion was reasonable or not? They knew that, on other occasions, Motions of the kind had not been resisted by the Government, because they were made by the Tory Party; they knew it was not considered irregular to devote four nights to a discussion on matters relating to some wretched corner in South Africa; yet one night only was considered sufficient for the debate on a question affecting the lives and liberties of 5,000,000 of Her Majesty's subjects. He (Mr. Healy) himself had been anxious to speak earlier that evening, in consequence of what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan). Again, there was, of course, an anxious desire to hear the reply of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, which had led the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and other hon. Gentlemen interested in the debate, to reserve their speeches. And now the proposal was that a species of garotte should be put in operation, and they were to be compelled to make their speeches at an hour when not a single word that they might say on this grave and important subject could be heard outside the House. He would not question from a Radical point of view the importance of the Franchise Bill to which the Prime Minister had referred, or the necessity of making progress with that measure; but it was for hon. Members in all quarters of the House to give their opinions as to the necessity of Motions for Adjournment, and as to the fair amount of time which should be allotted to the discussion of important questions, and he maintained that the action of hon. Members on those Benches was perfectly reasonable in asking for the adjournment of the present debate. They could not but suppose that the right hon. Gentleman the new Chief Secretary for Ireland was anxious to make his maiden speech upon an Irish question; and he said it was not respectful to that right

hon. Gentleman, who had just come in, that he should be compelled to address the House at that hour of the morning. Because, if this Motion for Adjournment were not acceded to, what would happen? After a prolonged wrangle, such as, unfortunately, they were becoming seasoned to, the speeches of hon. Members who had not spoken on the previous question would begin, and then, at an unreasonable hour, they would be obliged to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to go into the facts of the case. Anxious as the right hon. Gentleman must be to free his soul as to his experiences at the Castle, they were unwilling to inflict that upon him on the present occasion. Nor were Irish Members desirous that the Autumn Session should begin with a wrangle of the kind he had alluded to, for the sake of saving a little of the Government time, which, after all, might not be secured. It was desirable that the Government should consider what the continuance of the debate at that hour involved. When the Franchise Bill was last before the House, he (Mr. Healy) surrendered a whole sheet of Amendments rather than have time wasted, because he found his Amendments were being used by the Tory Party for obstructive purposes. Were the Irish Party to be deprived of a few hours' debate, when, perhaps, later on, if the Amendments to which he referred were to be put down and discussed at the length their importance justified, several days would be occupied in their consideration? As they had undertaken this discussion, let them conclude it quietly. The Irish debate would, in the nature of things, close to-morrow night; the Government would be able to bring up the Report of the Address, provided they "squared" the ship-owners, on Wednesday; and they could begin the debate on the Franchise Bill on Thursday. He supposed the Tory Party would not require more than three nights for the debate on the second reading of the Bill, so that the Division could be taken comfortably this night week. In his opinion, a more convenient arrangement could not be arrived at. As one who took considerable interest in the fate of the measure which would so soon be laid before the House, he respectfully urged the Government not to inaugurate the discussion on the Franchise Bill in unseemly wrangles. A Division would show the sense of the House as to an adjournment of the debate; but then somebody else—some one on the Tory Benches, for anything he knew—might object to continuing the debate at that hour of the night (12.45). Thereupon, there would be another wrangle; and no doubt in the end, when they had got tired, the Government would give way as they had done on other occasions. He appealed to the Government to let the House decide the matter in an amicable and reasonable spirit. He and his hon. Friends did not ask for more than another night's discussion. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork had not had an opportunity of speaking a single word on this question. It was quite unreasonable that the Leader of a great Party, not perhaps in numbers, though there was every promise that bye-and-by it would be great even in that respect, should be expected to discuss a question of this kind, after a series of wrangles, at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning. Once more he appealed to hon. Gentlemen to act reasonably in the matter. He supposed that after a few of his hon. Friends had spoken they would be called upon to divide. It would then be 2 o'clock. Two or three more speeches would be made, and about 3 o'clock, or possibly some time later, an hon. Member would propose a surrender, and the adjournment would be granted. He trusted the House would agree to the adjournment of the debate without any further waste of time.

Mr. LEAMY said, that at 20 minutes to 9, when the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) concluded his speech, the Irish Members who were then in the House called on the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) to speak; but the hon. and learned Gentleman refused to rise. If he had risen then, and delivered his speech, it was more than probable that the debate would now have been concluded. The hon. and learned Gentleman following, he (Mr. Leamy) supposed, the example set him by a late Irish Law Officer, refused to speak because it was the dinner hour. The result was that Irish Members of no importance in the House, like himself, had to continue the discussion. The Solicitor General for Ireland had spoken at such an hour as to make it quite unreasonable to expect the hon.

Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and other Leaders of the Irish Party to reply to him. They asked for an adjournment, and the fault, if there was any, must be placed on the head of the Solicitor General for Ireland, who was too vain to speak in a comparatively empty House.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he was at a loss to understand with what show of justice the Prime Minister asked them to cut short, or rather to suppress, this matter after a few hours' discussion, and before any of the prominent Members of their Party had taken part in the debate. He asked hon. Members opposite, who were so proud in their strength of numbers, to remember that those questions which were mere Party questions for them in England, were questions of life and death for the people in Ireland. It was very likely the Prime Minister would remind the Irish Members that they had had a couple of nights' discussion upon the Maamtrasna revelations, a couple of nights which were chiefly occupied with the protests of English Tory and Radical Gentlemen against the conduct of the Government in Ireland. Why did they have two nights' discussion upon the Maamtrasna case? Simply because the Government would not yield an inquiry which was demanded by the entire public opinion in Ireland, and which was demanded in the secret hearts of many of the Government's own supporters.

MR. RUSTON: I rise to Order. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether the hon. Gentleman is speaking to the Question before the House.

MR. O'BRIEN was sorry the hon. Gentleman, who had not yet discovered himself to fame—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman must confine himself strictly to the Motion for Adjournment. He is not in Order in travelling beyond the Motion.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he had not been called to Order; he was simply replying to the interruption of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ruston). He knew there was not much use in appealing to men who had big battalions on their side; but he reminded the House that they were engaged to-night upon as important business as could well engage their attention. They were engaged in showing that the English rule in Ireland rested on infamy and corruption—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is not the Question before the House. The question is the adjournment of the debate.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he was trying, against a good many difficulties, to show that the debate ought to be adjourned, because this was a subject they had not yet had an opportunity of discussing fully, a subject which was of vital importance to the people as well as to the Members of the Ministry in Ireland. He wished to remind the House that for three months past, Parliament not having been sitting, tyranny had had full swing in Ireland—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I have twice observed that the hon. Gentleman is speaking irrelevantly. I call upon him to resume his seat.

MR. O'BRIEN resumed his seat accordingly. [Cries of "Cowards, cowards!"]

MR. SEXTON said, it was a matter for extreme regret, regret not confined to any Party, but regret, he believed, which would be shared to-morrow by all thoughtful Members of the House, no matter to what political Party they belonged, that the Prime Minister, guided and controlled by some intelligence less competent than his own, had entered upon the course which he had announced that night. He (Mr. Sexton) did not for a moment question that the reasons existing in the mind of the Prime Minister appeared to him to be sufficient to justify the course which he had adopted. No one, indeed, ever doubted that the reasons of the Prime Minister for the adoption of a particular course always appeared sufficient for himself. But the reason which the right hon. Gentleman had assigned to-night for refusing an adjournment of the debate was not a reason concerned with the inherent importance of the question under discussion. It was not asserted that they had fully debated the question. No; the Prime Minister had set forth the importance of some question which the House was to discuss in future as a reason why the present debate should not be adjourned. Whatever that question might be—if it be the question they all had in their minds—he respectfully suggested to the Prime Minister that the chances of the rapid and complete success of that question did not depend upon one Sitting more or less. Whether they adjourned the debate, or they were compelled to close the discussion on the Irish Question that night, it appeared to him the important question to which the right hon. Gentleman referred stood an equal chance of arriving at a successful issue. He submitted to the Prime Minister whether or not he increased or improved the chances of that important question by the course he had taken up to-night? No man had shown more than the Prime Minister a keen sense of the necessity of mobilizing Parliamentary force; and he asked the right hon. Gentleman whether, in refusing the adjournment of this debate, he was taking that course which was most judicious and most likely to secure permanent success for the important measure he had in mind? From the point of view of the Irish Members, the question they had been discussing was more important than the question which was in the mind of the Prime Minister. The question which the right hon. Gentleman contemplated was very much of the nature of an abstract question concerning the political rights of persons in this country—a question which would not be brought into practical operation for months or years. But to-night they had been discussing the conduct of the Government in a series of trials proceeding at this very moment. He wanted to know, before that discussion closed, what course the Crown meant to take in the case of James Ellis French? Before this discussion closed, before any attempt was made to put a gag on their mouths, he and his hon. Friends must know whether the Legal Advisers of the Crown in Ireland meant to repeat upon the second trial of James Ellis French their scandalous conduct of last Friday. He was personally interested in this discussion, because the liberties of 11 of his constituents were now at stake. The House was aware that during the last six months he had repeatedly called attention to the case of these men. He had fruitlessly endeavoured that night to extract from the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), or the Legal Adviser of the Irish Government, the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), some assurance that when these men were placed on their trial for political offences, they would get treatment as fair and as liberal, treatment as little calculated to cause a harsh verdict to be given against them, as the treatment which had been extended to the officials who had been placed upon their trial in Dublin. The debate ought not to close until they knew what was done that day in the case of James Ellis French, and until they knew what course the Government intended to pursue in the case of the Tubbercurry prisoners. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the ex-Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan) was very academical and ingenious, one in which he kept wide of the question at issue. The speech of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, on the contrary, went very close—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is not entitled, upon the Motion for the adjournment of the debate, to discuss the speeches delivered during the last debate.

MR. SEXTON said, he was pointing out that, while the speech of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was remote to the subject, the speech of the Solicitor General for Ireland went close to the subject, and they, the Leader of the Irish Party (Mr. Parnell), the Vice Chairman of the Party, (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), and several of the important Members of the Party, had had no opportunity of replying to that, the only important and only relevant speech which had come from the Government Bench in the course of the discussion. He (Mr. Sexton) was the less disposed to yield to the dictation of the Prime Minister, because he plainly saw that there was, he would not say a plot, but would use the word arrangement, to oppose any adjournment of the debate. When his hon. Friend the Member for Athlone (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy) moved the adjournment of the debate, there arose loud cries of "Divide, divide!" which made it clear to him there was something unusual in the wind. He had never before heard a Motion for Adjournment received, at the very moment it was proposed, with such—

MR. SPEAKER: It is my duty again to tell the hon. Gentleman he is not in Order. [Cries of "Clôture!" from the Irish Benches.] I must ask hon. Gentlemen to be silent while I am addressing the House. For the second time, I tell the hon. Gentleman he is deviating from the point before the House. I must ask him to keep to the question of the adjournment of the debate. It is a painful duty I have to perform; but if the hon. Gentleman offends again, I shall be obliged to take notice of the fact.

MR. SEXTON thanked the Speaker for the warning he had given him. He was aware the Speaker had twice expressed the opinion that he was deviating from the Question before the House. The Speaker, too, had very properly said that he had a duty to perform from the Chair. But the humblest Member of the House had also a duty to perform, and he (Mr. Sexton) was endeavouring respectfully, reasonably, and calmly to state his reasons for supporting the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Athlone. If he again incurred the Speaker's displeasure, he would gladly welcome any penalty that might be imposed upon him. He repeated that he was inclined to resist the course proposed by the Prime Minister, because it appeared to him there was a disposition on the Government side of the House to prematurely close the discussion which had been raised to-night. He maintained that that disposition was evinced and emphasized by the sudden appearance of Ministers of the Crown when the Prime Minister rose. Seeing that no valid reason had been assigned against the Motion of the hon. Member for Athlone, and that it was clear there was an arrangement to prevent an adjournment of the debate, he invited his hon. Friends to resist with all their force the proposal of the Government.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, that in supporting the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Athlone (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy) for the adjournment of the debate, he would appeal to Her Majesty's Government to look at the matter, even from their own point of view. A most important discussion had taken place in the House that night with reference to matters of the utmost consequence to the Irish people, and if Her Majesty's Government wished that the Irish people should rest in any degree satisfied with the discussion which took place they must provide that the discussion should appear to the Irish people to have been exhaustive. The Government would not be serving any good or wise purpose if they insisted upon the debate being closed that night; because he could assure the Government that the Irish people would not consider as either satisfactory or exhaustive any discussion in the House upon Irish affairs which was not participated in by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), the Vice Chairman of the Party, the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), the hon. Member for Galway City (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), and several other hon. Gentlemen who were regarded by the Irish people as their leaders. He did not appeal to the Government from their own point of view, or because he had any sympathy with the anxiety of the Prime Minister regarding the Franchise Bill; but he appealed to them to agree to the adjournment of the debate, because such a course on their part would be most satisfactory to the majority of the Members of the House. He appealed to the Government, not because he sympathized with the right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench, but because he sympathized with a great number of English Members he saw at hand to support the Government, and who, he believed, if they only spoke their minds, would be very favourable to the Motion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy). It was a monstrous proposal that the discussion should close that night. What would the conclusion of the debate mean? It would mean that whenever the Government wanted to stifle debate, or to shut out of the debate the voices of the most important Members of the Irish Party, all they would have to do in the future would be to keep the Government officials on the Treasury Bench from making their speeches until the eleventh hour in the debate, and then oppose every Motion for Adjournment. If he and his hon. Friends were not to insist upon the adjournment of the debate, they would be giving their sanction to the very undesirable precedent he had described. The Prime Minister and every Member of the Treasury Bench must know that the Irish Party would not permit any debate to close to which Members such as those he had before motioned had not contributed their opinions. He appealed in this matter to whatever sense of fair play there might be amongst English Members; and he put it to those Members whether they considered he and his

hon. Friends were making an unreasonable demand when they asked that the Leaders of their Party might have a proper opportunity of expressing their opinions upon this burning and important question?

MR. BIGGAR said, the Prime Minister had told them that Parliament was called together for the transaction of very important Business—namely, the consideration of the Franchise Bill. He (Mr. Biggar) did not know whether he spoke in accordance with recognized custom or not; but, as far as his experience had gone, it had always been a practice on the Address to draw attention to subjects which were of a pressing nature.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is wandering from the subject now before the House.

MR. BIGGAR: I think that —

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman has taken no notice of my remark. I said he was wandering from the subject before the House. He must keep strictly to the question.

MR. BIGGAR apologized for the transgression. He had forgotten for the moment the Rule with regard to Motions for Adjournment. However, he did not intend to pursue that branch of the subject further, but to point out that the question which had been raised by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was one of great importance to the Irish people. He could not help thinking that the Government would do well to agree to the Motion for Adjournment, in order that the subject might be fully and reasonably debated, instead of being cut short as suggested. It had been pointed out that there were some points in the speech of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) which required a reply. The hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), who was well qualified for a job of that sort, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and other influential Members of the Irish Party, were in the House ready to reply; but the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland did not give them an opportunity of replying, because he did not sit down until 25 minutes past 12 o'clock, a time when it was quite unreasonable to ask a leading Member of any Party to commence a speech in reply, seeing that a proper and fair report of the speech could not appear in the morning's papers. It must be borne in mind that if the Government succeeded in closing their mouths that night, he and his hon. Friends would find other opportunities of raising the same question. He really did not see that any practical good was to be gained by the Government in forcing Irish Members to close their mouths on this particular occasion. If they were gagged now, they would feel themselves called upon to make the speeches they had intended to make that night at a not very distant time. He asked the Government whether, as a matter of self-interest, they were playing a judicious game in endeavouring to put the clôture upon the Irish Party?

MR. BARRY said, he was strongly inclined to think that if the Prime Minister had followed the course of the debate that night, he would not have opposed the Motion for Adjournment. What were the facts? After the statement of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) and the speech of the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien), the Irish Members waited patiently for some declaration from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker). Just before 9 o'clock, there were cries from the Irish Benches for the Solicitor General; but the hon. and learned Gentleman refused to rise. He (Mr. Barry) put it to the Government, as a matter of common sense, was it likely that any time would be saved during this Autumn Session if it came to protracted wrangles of this kind? Something was said about the dignity of the House. To enter upon a physical struggle at 1 o'clock in the morning, was certainly not at all likely to add to the dignity of the Assembly. He hoped that, on further reflection, and after having heard the true bearings of the case, the Prime Minister would see fit to give way, and grant the adjournment.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, there was one observation of the Prime Minister which ought not to pass without some kind of challenge. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Athlone (Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy) moved that the debate be adjourned, whereupon the Prime Minister rose and opposed the Motion on the ground that there was very important Business of another kind to be transacted by the House, and then the right hon. Gentleman said that this Parliament was assembled on this particular occasion for the special purpose, and that the Crown enjoined upon the House to do certain Business. That appeared to him (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) to be language of a strange and unconstitutional character. If there was one thing more largely written upon the history of the House of Commons, it was the unceasing and determined efforts made to vindicate its independence of the Crown. The Crown had no right and no power to enjoin on this House to proceed to any work at any particular time.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would like to explain. He did not speak of the Crown as enjoining that House.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he took down the word.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that word was never used. He did not speak of the Crown enjoining on this House. The word "injunction," however, did escape him, and he wished to withdraw it.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR accepted the disclaimer of the right hon. Gentleman, and assumed that he himself made a mistake. He thought it was the verb, and not the substantive, that he noticed. He reminded the House that at the commencement of every Session it was the constant practice to proceed with a Bill of no importance, before the debate on the Address was concluded, simply and solely because the House was determined to vindicate its independence. Under these circumstances, the House must remember that it was not bound to proceed with the consideration of any Franchise Bill. Whatever might be said in the Speech from the Throne, the House was not even bound to consider a Franchise Bill; but, having entered his protest against the remark of the right hon. Gentleman, he would not occupy further time.

MR. KENNY said, he had expected that some Irish Member sitting opposite, and giving a regular support to Her Majesty's Government, would have entered his protest against the proposal of the Government to close this debate, contrary to the unanimous feeling of the Irish Representatives. It must be borne in mind that, with one or two exceptions, only unimportant and uninfluential Members of the Irish Party had expressed their views upon the question raised by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), besides which, not a single Member of any consequence sitting on the Government Benches had enlightened the House upon the subject. It struck him that it was extremely unwise on the part of the Government to refuse the adjournment of the debate, when it was asked under circumstances so reasonable as those which had been put forward by his hon. Friends who had already spoken. It was a strange thing that the Government should attempt to get rid of this question, which was one of vital importance to the Irish people, after only a few hours' discussion, and that at a time when subjects of very much less importance to the vast body of the people had been allowed to occupy the attention of the House for days together. A squabble or row amongst a horde of ruffians in Birmingham was debated seriously in the House for a whole night, and would have been discussed another night if only an adjournment had been proposed. He was hopeful that in the course of this discussion a gleam of light might dawn upon the Treasury Bench, and that the Government might see that resistance to the wish of the Irish Members, or an unseemly effort to close their mouths, was not the most effective way to dispose of questions which might appear frivolous to the House, but which were of the utmost importance to the welfare of the Irish people.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he had hoped that Her Majesty's Government would give way upon the question of adjournment. He did not attribute very much importance to the question whether there was another day or not occupied in continuing this debate, if debate it could be called. It could scarcely be called a debate when all the speaking had been on one side. There was one very powerful reason why the Government should agree to the adjournment, and it was this—that if they did not, whatever might be the real facts of the matter, it would be believed throughout the length and breadth of Ireland that the Government attempted to stifle discussion when subjects of vital importance to the lives and liberties of the Irish people were brought before the House. He belonged to a class of people in Ireland who strongly objected to the course which the Government had pursued in the administration of the Crimes Act. Probably, there was not a peasant in that country who felt more intensely than he did the contrast between the manner in which the law was administered in this country, as compared with the way in which it was administered in Ireland. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would consent to the adjournment of the debate for another reason. At that late hour of the night, Irish Members could not feel themselves able to discuss the Speech with that advantage and propriety which they thought its importance demanded. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would withdraw his opposition to the Motion, and not, in what the Irish people would regard as an unseemly fashion, press the Motion to a Division after what had occurred.

MR. DEASY said, he had hoped that, after the expressions of opinion which the Government had heard during the last three-quarters of an hour, they would have seen the propriety of acceding to the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Athlone (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy). He (Mr. Deasy) was quite sure that if the Prime Minister had heard many of the speeches which had been delivered in the course of the evening, he would have felt that it was impossible for the Irish Members to conclude the debate that night. The question which had been raised by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was one of great importance to the Irish Members, and of great importance to Ireland. It was felt that there ought to be a further opportunity of alluding to the numerous cases of hardship and injustice which had occurred in remote localities in Ireland, and which, if the debate were brought to a premature close, there would be no opportunity of referring to during the remainder of the Session. Apart from that injustice, it was undesirable for the Prime Minister, or any other Minister of the Crown, to close the debate summarily, without having given his opponents a full and adequate opportunity of discussing questions of importance which might arise, simply because the Government, for the time being, were able to command a majority of the House. Irish Members knew very well that in any action taken by the right hon. Gentleman and persevered in, they would be out-numbered at least 10 to one. ["No, no!"] He did not know what the exact number would be; but he felt confident that they would be defeated by a large majority, and that almost all hon. Members opposite, whether Radicals or Whigs, would be certain to go into the Lobby against them. The Solicitor General for Ireland had had several opportunities of speaking during the night, and he (Mr. Deasy) believed that the hon. and learned Gentleman would have let the debate close if it had not been that he (Mr. Deasy) intervened, against his will, for a short time, in order to give the hon. and learned Gentleman to understand that the Irish Members were determined to hear him. He was followed by the hon. and learned Gentleman who did not rise until about midnight, so that his speech was not concluded until after half-past 12. Of course, at that hour of the night, the Leader of the Irish Party felt that he was unable to reply, and it would be highly improper for the debate to close until the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had had a full opportunity of addressing the House. He (Mr. Deasy) had taken the liberty, a short time ago, of pointing out how desirable it was that the House should hear something from the new Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). They were all of them anxious to know his views on the question which had been raised in the course of the debate, and it was useless for the Prime Minister to tell them, as he did a short time ago, that as the right hon. Gentleman was in no way responsible for what had taken place during the last year or two, that upon that ground they could not expect him to take part in the debate. Surely, when the right hon. Gentleman undertook the Office of Chief Secretary, he also undertook the responsibilities of that Office, and should be made responsible for everything that took place before he came into Office, just as much as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Trevelyan) or the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) would have been. Whether that were so or not, he thought it was unseemly on the part of the Government to endeavour to compel the Irish Members to continue the discussion at that late hour of the night. If the Government persisted, the House would be compelled to sit until 5 or 6 o'clock in the morning; and, as far as he was concerned, he did not look forward to that prospect with any feeling of pleasure or satisfaction. It would not, however, be the first time, in his short experience of the House, that the Government had forced an All Night Sitting, and it would not be the first time that the Government would have come out of that All Night Sitting second best. The lives and liberties of the people of Ireland were at stake; and whatever the dignity of the House of Commons might be, the welfare and liberties of the Irish people were considered by hon. Members on that side of the House to stand far above the dignity of the House, or the convenience of any of Her Majesty's Ministers. He could not conceive for a moment what the Government expected to gain by forcing on this discussion that night. Surely, as had been pointed out by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), if the Irish Members chose to put down interminable Amendments on the Franchise Bill, and persisted in discussing them, the Government would lose more time than they would gain by closing the present debate.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that he is not discussing the Question before the House, which is the adjournment of the debate.

MR. DEASY said, he was endeavouring to point out that the Prime Minister, in saying that the House had been called together this Session for the purpose of considering an important measure about to be introduced, had altogether miscalculated what the effect of his words might be, and had not taken into account the result of peremptorily closing the discussion that night. The effect of closing up the discussion that night, might make the passage of that Franchise Bill rather more difficult than it would be if the Government allowed the present debate to stand adjourned, and the discussion to continue until it was fully threshed out. The Irish Members did not propose to continue the debate much longer, and probably it would be over at an early hour to-morrow. He was therefore satisfied that if the Motion for Adjournment were agreed to, the Government Business would be greatly facilitated. He trusted that those Members of the Government who were now present would come to the conclusion, on second thoughts, that they would be acting wisely, even from their own point of view, if they would allow the adjournment to be carried without any further discussion.

MR. WARTON said, that it was extremely difficult, under the New Rules, to discuss a Motion for Adjournment, even although the word "strictly" had been struck out of those Rules as originally drawn, and the debate was required to be simply confined to the question of the adjournment. He hoped he would not incur the displeasure of the Speaker in any observations he was about to make. The request made to the Government seemed to extend to the delivery of two or three speeches, and probably half-a-day would be sufficient to finish the debate. The Government might then have the Address disposed of, and the Report agreed to to-morrow, so that by Thursday they might proceed with the Franchise Bill. Under those circumstances, he would ask them to extend a little latitude to the Irish Members.

MR. JOHN REDMOND said, he thought the Irish Members had been treated with great unfairness in this matter by Her Majesty's Government. When the prolongation of a debate was objected to by the Government, it was usually objected to on one of two grounds—either that the subject under discussion was a trivial one, which did not demand any further attention on the part of the House, or that its importance had been threshed out. Neither of those reasons could be alleged by the Government on the present occasion. Certainly, it could not be alleged that the subject which they wished to discuss further was a trivial one. As every Member of the House was aware, it was a subject which raised the whole question of the administration of the law in Ireland, and a subject which raised the whole question of the government of that country. Therefore, no one could be found who would say that that subject was a trivial one. Then the question which occurred was, had it been threshed out? He trusted, in the few words he was about to say, that he would not incur any interruptions from the Chair, because he desired to keep strictly to the question whether the debate should be adjourned or not. Had the subject been fully threshed out already, when the question of the whole administration of Ireland, and of the government of that country by the present Administration, had only been debated for one night? He did not believe there had been any previous Session in which the Irish Question had been debated so little as it had been on the present occasion. It was usual, on the consideration of the Address to the Crown, to discuss at length the various phases of the Irish Question. On the present occasion, that question had only been discussed for one day; because it must be remembered that the discussion which took place last week was not the Irish Question, but a particular point in relation to a verdict which had been given in a Court of Law. He submitted that the question now under discussion—namely, the administration in Ireland generally; the conduct of certain officials connected with the Irish Executive in the empannelling of juries; in fact, the whole question of the government of the country, was raised by the present Amendment, and it had only occupied the attention of the House for one day. He thought it most unreasonable for the Government to attempt, on the present occasion, to limit a discussion which, on previous Addresses to the Crown, had never been attempted to be limited in a similar way. The few words addressed to the House by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) contained, he thought, a great deal of common sense. He did not think the Government had anything to gain by entering into a squabble with the Irish Members on a matter of this kind. He believed they would facilitate the passage of the important Business to which the Prime Minister had alluded much better by enabling the Irish Members to thresh out thoroughly to their satisfaction the question raised by the Amendment of his hon. Friend, than by bringing it too summarily to a close. During his short experience of the House, he never remembered any attempt being made by the Government to close an important debate immediately after the only important speech delivered in their behalf. He remembered, on a somewhat similar occasion—namely, an Amendment to the Address—that an important speech was delivered late at night which did not conclude until half-past 12. The speech to which he referred was the speech of the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) at the time when the right hon. Gentleman had certain Irish Members under lock-and-key in Ireland. On that occasion, he (Mr. Redmond) rose himself to move the adjournment of the debate, and, although the discussion had then lasted for several days, the Prime Minister at once got up and stated that the important speech which had been made on behalf of the Government deserved the consideration of the Irish Members, and therefore the debate ought at once to be adjourned, in order that they might see the speech in print, and have an opportunity of answering it. He (Mr. Redmond) now claimed the same right of seeing the speech of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland in print, and also the right of the Irish Members to answer that speech. He would frankly say that he believed it to be the duty of Members on that side of the House, if the Government persisted in their present attitude, and prevented them from discussing this matter, further to avail themselves of the opportunity to-morrow of bringing forward another Amendment to the Address, which would enable every one of them to continue the discussion. It was beating the air in vain to attempt to smother this discussion, and he believed the Government would find in the result that they had only wasted their time, their patience, and the temper of the House. In the end they would have to listen to the speeches which his hon. Friends were ready to deliver on important points connected with Irish administration, and which no section of the Government, or of the officials in that House, would be able to suppress.

MR. R. POWER said, he thought the proceedings which had taken place that night fully justified the opinion which he had formed when he first entered the English Parliament—namely, that it would be an utter impossibility to get anything from that Parliament; and when he had the honour of addressing his constituents, he told them, plainly and frankly, that he did not believe they would ever get anything from Parliament by simply coming over here and arguing out their case. If anything could prove the truth of that assertion, it had been proved by the proceedings which had taken place that night. Ten Irish Members had spoken upon this question, and only two English Members had replied to them, notwithstanding the fact that this was a case of the greatest importance to their country, and a question which the whole Irish people took the deepest interest in. He asked English Members to show fair play to Ireland. He regretted to say that the people of Ireland did not believe that fair play was displayed towards them. He would ask them, was it fair play, when they had presented their views of the question in the best possible manner, that only two hon. Gentlemen from the Treasury Bench should get up and reply to them? English Members had always said that they were anxious to study this Irish Question, and to arrive at a true solution of the difficulty. So were the Irish Members. But how were they to come to a solution of the question, when the Leader of their Party and the principal men among them had not been able to speak that night, and when only two hon. Members on the other side had got up to defend the policy of the Government—what he would call their vile and infamous policy—in Ireland?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is quite out of Order in using language of that kind, and he must confine himself to the question of the adjournment of the debate.

MR. R. POWER said, the intimation of the Speaker was quite sufficient. He would at once withdraw the words "vile and infamous," and allow the Irish people to form their own opinion about the matter. It was, however, a remarkable fact that when the debate was over, the new Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) walked out of the House, and since it had closed, he had been absent. He should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman, if he wished to understand anything about Ireland, ought to have been there to listen to the remarks of the Irish Members. He (Mr. R. Power) was afraid the right hon. Gentleman would know very little more in 12 months, or in 12 years, than he knew already, for it was an impossibility—

MR. SPEAKER: I must again point out to the hon. Member that he is not discussing the question of adjournment, which is the only question before the House.

MR. R. POWER said, that again he would bow to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. R. Power

He would ask if that was the Government idea of English fair play? Were hon. Members, who boasted that they were prepared to see fair play all over the world, not going to allow the adjournment of this debate to take place in order that they might continue their arguments in support of the Motion to-morrow, and show how erroneous had been the statements of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker)? He earnestly appealed to the Government not to bring forward at that moment their physical-force argument, because, although their supporters had come down in their numbers, and hon. Gentlemen who supported the Motion were comparatively few, they would find that it was not in their power to stifle the discussion of that question. Although the Motion of his hon. Friend for adjournment might be negatived by an overwhelming majority, the Government might depend that, even if discussion were stifled that night, as it might perhaps be to-morrow, he and his hon. Friends would bring up the question again and again, and would not rest until they had proved finally, as they were constantly doing, that the Government rule in Ireland had been to them not only ruin, but disgrace.

MR. CALLAN said, he could excuse the hon. Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny) for expressing a wish that some of the nominal Home Rulers, or Whig Irish Members on the Ministerial side of the House, would stand up and support this Motion. He could excuse him on the ground of the frankness and innocence of youth.

MR. SPEAKER: I must call the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that he is not confining himself to the Question before the House.

MR. CALLAN said, he withdrew the expression "frankness and innocence of youth." They had had a discussion on an important subject relating to Ireland, and they had heard one of the scare-crows of the Castle—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is trifling with the House. I ask him to resume his seat.

MR. CALLAN resumed his seat accordingly.

MR. O'KELLY said, he hoped the Government would allow themselves to be convinced of the uselessness of the struggle they were forcing on Irish Members, and that they would agree to the adjournment of the debate. If hon. Members had taken the trouble to follow the course of the debate of that evening, they would be aware that the Government had really made no effort whatever to answer the more serious charges made against them, but had hung their defence on matters of altogether secondary importance. Under those circumstances, and, further, owing to the lateness of the hour at which the hon. and learned Solicitor General (Mr. Walker) replied, hon. Members on these Benches had had no fair opportunity of discussing the position taken up by the Government on this question, and he thought that the Government would only be doing justice to themselves if they were to agree to the adjournment of the debate. Unless they did so, it would be within the power of hon. Members to take the hours which the Government proposed to save now, tomorrow, by having recourse to the practice of the House. Under the circumstances, there was nothing to be gained from the struggle on which the Government proposed to enter, and he would, therefore, repeat his appeal to them to give way to the Motion of the hon. Member for Athlone.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the manner in which the Motion for Adjournment had been treated by Her Majesty's Government was characteristic of the whole of their treatment of the question that was under debate. A number of hon. Members had supported the Motion for the adjournment of the debate; but not a single Member of the Government had spoken, with the exception of the Prime Minister, whose speech he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had not the opportunity of hearing, but to which he understood that the most extravagant computation would not assign a longer duration than four minutes. Here, then, was a question of the gravest importance, as the Prime Minister admitted it to be, and it was to be disposed of by the right hon. Gentleman in four minutes. The situation was clear; the Prime Minister found it impossible to give any answer to the arguments of hon. Members in favour of the Motion for Adjournment. The first of the two arguments of the right hon. Gentleman was, that Irish Members should cease to debate the question, because there was an injunction from the Crown to debate the Franchise Bill; and the second was, that there were other questions of importance awaiting settlement. But with regard to those two arguments which the Prime Minister put forward in the course of his four minutes' speech, the right hon. Gentleman had, so to speak, been obliged to swallow one of them, because the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had been able to show that the right hon. Gentleman, notwithstanding his long acquaintance with the affairs of the country, had taken upon himself to recommend to the House a doctrine completely at variance with Constitutional Law. The right hon. Gentleman had then abandoned that argument, for the very obvious reason that it was an insult to the intelligence and historical knowledge of hon. Members to put it forward as a ground for closing the debate. The second argument was, that although the question was important, there were other questions quite as important remaining behind.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg pardon; that was not my argument. I said there were questions of importance which, if they were debated on the Address, would occupy the entire time of the House for 12 months.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was sorry that he had misrepresented the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, and he was glad that he had given him an opportunity of correcting the impression he was under. But he took issue upon the argument of the Prime Minister as now presented, that there were other questions of importance which, if discussed, would occupy the time of the House to the exclusion of all other Business. In the first place, what were those questions; and, in the second place, what other opportunity was there open to Irish Members for bringing forward questions of this kind? If the Prime Minister were to have his way, and the programme which he had laid down for the guidance of the House of Commons were strictly followed, immediately the debate on the Address was closed, the attention and time of the House would be entirely occupied with the consideration of one piece of legislation. However, the right hon. Gentleman must know that there were other occasions than the Address on which this question could be raised; and he had moreover been told and received warning, in no unintelligible or obscure language, that those opportunities would be taken advantage of. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) was sure his hon. Friends would be driven, with great reluctance, to take that course, and if the Government were to see their way to adopt wiser counsels, that they would get rid in an easier way of the troublesome question of the Franchise, which was now vexing hon. Members. Having had experience of prolonged discussions on similar questions to that immediately before the House, he believed that no one who had been engaged in them would wish to go through the ordeal again. If the Government would yield to the Motion of the hon. Member for Athlone (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy), he did not think that their concession would be taken undue advantage of, but that the debate to-morrow would be kept within reasonable and fair limits, which would enable the House to get on to other Business sooner than they were likely to do if the present attitude of the Government were maintained.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he trusted the Government would see their way to accede to the appeal which had been made to them so temperately by the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. T. P. O'Connor); if not, he thought they would be doing a very unfair thing in a very ungracious way. He would remind the Prime Minister that they had not had any opportunity of discussing the general question of Irish Administration up to that moment, because it would be in the recollection of the House that, in the course of the debate on the Motion of the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington), certain words were struck out which referred to that general question, and the discussion was, consequently, confined altogether to the one question of the Maamtrasna investigation. He had himself been anxious to offer some observations on the present question; and he wished for the adjournment of the debate on that ground, and also in behalf of other hon. Members who had not had an opportunity of speaking.

MR. MOLLOY said, there was one other reason in favour of the Motion for Adjournment made by his hon.

Friend (Mr. Justin Huntly M'Carthy), which, he believed, had not yet been laid before the House. It was that they had in the House, for the first time during the debate, a new Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and that the speech which they had heard from his Predecessor in Office was not a speech pertinent to the arguments put forward from those Benches, inasmuch as it was more in the nature of a personal defence, or, as he (Mr. Molloy) would call it, that sort of self-defence which consisted in having the last word. It was irrelevant in the last degree, and throughout the whole of it the right hon. Gentleman did not touch the subject under discussion, so much so that hon. Members who were interested in hearing a speech from the Government on the subject before the House waited until the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker) arose. He (Mr. Molloy) would not repeat the argument so ably put by his hon. Friends—that the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman required an answer, which could only be given to it after further consideration, but would return to the point which he wished to press on the attention of the House. They had all waited to hear the voice of the present Chief Secretary for Ireland, because the speech that he would make would have afforded an indication of the policy which he intended to adopt in future with regard to Irish matters; it would, in short, have shown whether his advent to Office was to mark the continuance of the old, or the commencement of a new policy. They knew, from past experience, that changes did take place in the policy of Governments at such times. Now, the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland would have affected, to a large degree, the continuation or otherwise of this debate. Hon. Members on those Benches were, therefore, asking nothing that was unreasonable; indeed, it was only fair that they should on this occasion, probably the last opportunity they would have during the Franchise Session, hear the voice of the new Chief Secretary on this important question. He would put it to the Prime Minister, and, if the right hon. Gentleman did not hear him, to the Government generally, whether it was not fair, upon an appointment like the present, which affected the whole

policy of the Government in Ireland, and the welfare of the whole people—whether it was unreasonable that Irish Members should ask that the new Chief Secretary should be permitted, or have the opportunity afforded him, of informing the House with regard to his views and policy? Now, if the debate were closed without a speech from the Chief Secretary for Ireland, it seemed to him that the construction would be put upon it that the arguments of Irish Members were of such a character that the Government thought it wise to curtail the debate, and get rid of the subject before any further discussion could take place. For these reasons he supported the Motion of the hon. Member for Athlone for the adjournment of the debate; and he begged to assure the Chief Secretary for Ireland that his observations with regard to him had been made with absolute sincerity and conviction, and from no desire to occupy the time of the House. He thought it very hard that the speech asked for was denied them by Her Majesty's Government. Had it been intended to occupy the whole of to-morrow with the remainder of the debate, there might have been some ground for the view taken by the Prime Minister, which, however, did not exist, for it had already been indicated by several hon. Members on those Benches, who were cheered by others, that the debate would be confined within reasonable and fair limits. He hoped the Prime Minister would see his way to granting the request which had been made to him, and which he (Mr. Molloy) would make again with all respect and with all sincerity. He thought that in a question of this sort, even if the Prime Minister considered the debate had continued long enough, seeing that the difference between them was so small—that was to say, seeing that the question was not one of a whole day, but only of a few minutes—a concession might well be made to the Irish Members to enable them to continue the debate, with satisfaction to both sides, and to enable the House to proceed in an amicable spirit, and with that calmness, good feeling, and kindness which should characterize all their discussions, to the consideration of the next question before it. [Cries of "Order!" and "Divide!"] He was making an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister on the question of adjournment, and in so doing was perfectly in Order. He would continue that appeal. He would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that only two or two and a-half hours would be necessary for the conclusion of the debate, and that it could not be a satisfactory policy in its present effect, nor lead to satisfactory results in the future, to allow so small a question to continue to stand between them. He earnestly appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to form a different opinion to that he had expressed. He appealed to him, in all sincerity, for the sake of peace and the progress of Business generally, and for the sake of the satisfaction it would give, not only to hon. Members on those (the Irish) Benches, but in all parts of the House. An adjournment was desirable, in order to allow the new Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who was the only Minister—if he might call him so—they had connected with Irish affairs, to say something on the subject they had been engaged all night in discussing. He (Mr. Molloy) would ask the Prime Minister to consent, not to the prolongation of the debate to unnecessary length, not to Obstruction, but to the continuation of the discussion for an hour or two longer to enable it to be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman with some confidence, as he could not believe that, for the sake of a couple of hours or two and a-half hours, the right hon. Gentleman would allow an unpleasant feeling to be engendered between the Irish Party and the Government on a matter of importance. He hoped the Prime Minister would pay some little attention to the appeal he had made, and which he had urged with all sincerity.

Mr. GRAY said, that the Irish Members were placed at great disadvantage during the present discussion. In consequence of the Rules of the House, it was not open to them to call in question or discuss the ruling of Mr. Speaker; and the great majority of Members and Ministers now present, including the Prime Minister, had not been present during the debate, and, therefore, were not in a position to form any kind of judgment or estimate as to whether the question had or had not been adequately discussed, and as to whether the claim of the Irish Members for a little more time to discuss it to-morrow was or was not a reasonable one. He himself believed that if the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. Gladstone) had been present during the debate, he would see that the claim was a most reasonable one, that the Irish Members had not been met in a fair way during the debate, and that it was impossible for them to carry on the discussion satisfactorily until a late hour. It was late when they became possessed of the arguments of the Irish Government, and knew what they had to answer; and the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and others who were entitled to speak for the Irish Party—and who, he believed, the House desired to hear on the question—had not been able to speak in such a manner as to make their speeches effective, for the reason that it was too late for the newspapers to report what fell from them. It was very late when the Prime Minister came in, accompanied by a large number of his Colleagues, and announced that they had determined to close the debate. That was a somewhat peremptory course. He (Mr. Gray) would not go into the arguments advanced by the right hon. Gentleman in support of it, because they had been answered more than once. Practically, however, they amounted to this—that the Government wished to save the time of the House. Now, was that really the sole motive which was guiding the Government on this occasion?—and he would put the question to the Prime Minister or any other Member of the Government—because, if it were, he would point out that it would be far easier to attain that object by the adoption of an opposite line of policy. If the Government consented to the suggestions of the Irish Members, and gave them two or three hours to-morrow, on the understanding that the hon. Member for the City of Cork would use his influence with his Colleagues to limit the duration of the debate to two or three hours, instead of leading to a waste of time such a concession would eminently conduce to its economy. If the Government persevered in their present course, apart altogether from the question of exasperating a small minority, and strengthening in them the feeling that they were not treated as any other section of the House would be under similar circumstances, and apart from the question whether such treatment was not calculated to stimulate the minority to exercise their rights to the utmost, quite irrespective of the loss of time it might involve, they would be unwise, because, if the adjournment were conceded, only a limited number of Irish Members would speak to-morrow, and the discussion would be concluded; whereas, if the Prime Minister's policy were carried out, and some form of clôture were applied to the Irish Members now, it would be open to every one of them to rediscuss the question on the Report of the Address. If there was to be warfare, it would be well to understand that the provocation had not come from the Irish Members. The conduct of the Treasury Bench throughout this debate was eminently calculated to exasperate and provoke. He (Mr. Gray) did not wish to incur any censure from Mr. Speaker—any movement on that right hon. Gentleman's part would quite suffice to stop him. The Irish Members had discussed the Motion for Adjournment with an earnest desire to apply themselves to the facts. They desired now only to obtain a reasonable time for the purpose of enabling the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and one or two other Members, to make speeches which they deemed to be necessary to the full elucidation of the subject under discussion; and before the present debate reached an acrimonious pitch, they appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to say whether it would not be more fair and more reasonable, and whether it would not better conduce to the attainment of the objects he had in view—if his avowed objects were his sole objects, and if there were not behind them something which he had not given expression to—if he assented to the proposal of the Irish Members and permitted an adjournment, on the understanding that not the whole of to-morrow should be given, but that after two or three hours' discussion the Division should be taken? He did not think the right hon. Gentleman fully appreciated, at that moment, what the result of perseverance in his determination summarily to terminate the debate would be. In the course of a very few minutes, a decision must be had on the particular Motion now before it. It might be open to some of the Irish Members then to move the adjournment of the House, and that Motion might be fully debated. Then a third Motion might be made for the adjournment of the debate, and it would be open to anyone to put an end to the discussion, and, judging from the crowded state of the Ministerial Benches, some such course—which would terminate this discussion in a forcible manner—was in contemplation. It was perfectly easy to put an end to these debates in that way. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had only to propose it to have it done. The Irish Party, at the present moment, did not number 40 Members—they were only about half that number—and were powerless in the face of the Rules the right hon. Gentleman had given himself so much trouble to pass in the Autumn Session two years ago. What would be the effect outside the House of the course the Government were now pursuing? That would be the first time that Session, that this form of summary closure—whether it were the formal clôture or not—

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that he is now discussing the clôture, on the Question of the adjournment of the debate. The hon. Member is not entitled to do that.

MR. GRAY said, he was inviting the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to consider what the effect of closing the debate that night would be. He had used the word clôture, but not with the least desire or intention of discussing that method of putting an end to discussion. He wished to invite the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to what would be the effect of perseverance by him in his determination to refuse to permit further discussion on the subject just now before the attention of the House. The effect—to put it in a few words—would be this—to show that, at the invitation of the Prime Minister of England, backed by every Member of his Government, the House was determined to put an end to a discussion raised by the whole body of the Irish Members, and determined to do it for the purpose of screening James Ellis French, Bolton, and Cornwall. That would be the conviction of the Irish people at home; and he could not suppose that, when the right hon. Gentleman came calmly to consider the matter, he would not believe that the nominal saving of some three or four hours by the success of his Motion was dearly purchased at such a price.

MR. COMMINS said, that at that late hour of the night it was not his intention to add more than a sentence or two to what had been already said in support of the Motion for the adjournment of the debate. He did not exactly know what the arguments against the Motion had been. He had not had the pleasure of hearing the speech of the Prime Minister, neither had he had the pleasure of hearing the speeches which had been made in answer to the terrible indictment which had been brought by the Irish Members against the administration of justice in Ireland. He had sat here for three or four hours, waiting in vain for some answer to come from the Treasury Bench, or from the Irish Law Officers—the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland—or someone else capable of speaking for the Government on the question of this terrible indictment. The indictment was one which filled the public mind in Ireland, and had been debated in the House for some hours. He had not heard the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, as he had been obliged to leave the House for the purpose of dining; but he should like to have an opportunity of reading it, and, in his weak way, of answering the arguments in it—such as they might have been. It would be an advantage in the way of satisfying public opinion outside the House, if a proper opportunity for the continuation of the debate were afforded. He did not know whether the object of the Prime Minister was the saving of time. The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) had told them that a couple or three hours to-morrow would enable them to complete the debate, to the satisfaction of both sides of the House, and of the people of Ireland, who were deeply interested in the matter. This debate on the adjournment commenced nearly two hours ago, and those two hours might just as well have been used in continuing the debate, if the Government had only conceded that it should terminate to-morrow. The Government had not gained anything by the attitude they had taken up, for they would have to face this subject to-morrow, or the day after. The matter would have to be fought out—if not to-morrow, then on some other occasion—and other two hours might be lost in useless debates, as they had been lost to-night. He was entirely of the same opinion as hon. Members who had preceded him—namely, that the Irish Members represented the feelings of the people of Ireland. They were told they were not representing the opinions of Ireland—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member is now travelling beyond the Question before the House.

MR. COMMINS said, he should be very sorry to exceed what Mr. Speaker considered the fair and proper discussion of the Motion before the House. It was a subject which would have to be discussed outside as well as inside the House, and he had been merely pointing out the importance of satisfying the opinion of the public outside, as well as the opinion of Members in the House. If it were not too late, and all opportunity of concession were not entirely lost, he would again appeal to the Government whether they could not now make a concession? If a concession were made, the Irish Members surely would not abuse it to-morrow, but would confine their remarks within the narrowest limits.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he only wished to make one or two observations in order to call attention to two important points which hon. Members must have overlooked—at any rate, they had omitted to refer to them. One of these points related to Party tactics, and the other to the question of Party courtesy; and they were, he thought, worthy of the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. In the first place, with regard to courtesy, if it had been intended, from an early period, to summarily close the debate, it would only have been just to have hinted, through the Parliamentary Secretary, or some other subordinate, to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), that such was the case, so that the hon. Member might have had an opportunity of rising to reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. He did not blame the Prime Minister for that. Probably the right hon. Gentleman did not know that no intimation had been given to the Irish Party of the intentions of the Government; but, whoever was to blame, it was a curious omission. He had made every inquiry amongst his Friends to find out whether any suggestion as to the course to be adopted had reached them, and he was assured that not so much as a hint had been dropped. When one of his Friends had endeavoured, in other ways, without going to the Parliamentary Secretary, to find out what was the intention of the Government, he had not been informed that the debate would be closed to-night. Seeing, then, that in this case there had been a breach of ordinary Party courtesy, he would put it to the Prime Minister, whether it was right to hurry the debate to a conclusion? If the right hon. Gentleman had taken measures to advise Irish Members of his intention early in the evening, no doubt those hon. Gentlemen would have made their arrangements accordingly. Fancy the Prime Minister, on a question of interest to the Conservative Party, telling the Leader of the Opposition, the last thing at night, that the Government intended to insist upon a Division being taken without an Adjournment. If the right hon. Gentleman had done such a thing, the whole of the Opposition would have been up in arms in a minute to denounce such a breach of Party courtesy. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had dealt in this way with the Irish Party—or some other Members of the Government had done so, for he (Colonel Nolan) did not like to think that the Prime Minister was responsible for this information having been kept back from the Irish Members. Whoever had done it, had invited the House to enter upon a serious Constitutional struggle. They wished to trample the Irish Party under their feet. It was all, no doubt, owing to simple negligence, or to the whole of the Liberal Party being so set up with the result of the Scarborough election, that they forgot ordinary politeness to the Irish Party. He had always noticed that when the Irish Members were not treated with the same courtesy as the great Conservative Party, there was trouble in the House. He had said the same thing over and over again to the Conservatives when they were in Office—that whenever the Irish Members were accorded less consideration than the Liberals, there was trouble—and he had told them, as he now told the Liberal Government, that his Colleagues would use the Forms of the House to compel ordinary courtesy. With regard to the second point which he wished to refer to as a piece of Party tactics, it was so conspicuous that he wondered no one had noticed it. The Prime Minister was in his place, and, no doubt, it was more his business than his (Colonel Nolan's); but still he would take upon himself to bring it to the notice of the right hon. Gentleman. He referred to the conspicuous absence of the Conservative Party. As a rule, he observed that when the Irish Members were to be crushed—

MR. SPEAKER: This is really not germane to the Motion before the House. The absence of the Conservative Party has nothing to do with the adjournment of the debate.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he bowed to Mr. Speaker's ruling, and, in making his apologies for having been irrelevant, he would only say that the point he had intended to deal with was that he had generally observed that whenever the Irish Party was to be suppressed, there was a combination between the Liberals and Conservatives. As Mr. Speaker had ruled him out of Order, he should reserve his observations on this subject to another occasion.

MR. MARUM said, he rose for the purpose of preventing the Government using the argument that the Irish Party were not unanimous on this question. If no deference was paid to the Irish Members in the House of Commons on this occasion, when they were asking for the adjournment of the debate, at least some deference ought to be paid to the constituents of those Irish Members. Their constituents, he could assure hon. Members opposite, were more exacting than might be supposed. They were not so educated to the ways of Parliamentary life as hon. Members, and they naturally thought that their Members ought to express their sentiments, even if their speeches only amounted to reiteration. It was owing to this fact that they frequently found nearly all the Members of the Irish Party anxious to speak on the same subject—as they had all been anxious to speak on the subject now before the House. The Amendment before the House said—

"It is essential to the public interest that the Criminal Law, more particularly with regard to the composition of juries, be impartially administered to the different classes of the people in Ireland."

Already, in the debate which had taken place in regard to the Maamtrasna case, the great interest they took in these matters and the vital importance they attached to them had been abundantly manifested. On that subject he should not be, he thought, within the line of the strict rule which Mr. Speaker applied to them, in confining them to the question of the adjournment, if he were to refer to what had fallen from his Colleagues who had preceded him and the two speakers who had addressed themselves to the subject on the side of the Government.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is trifling with the House.

MR. MARUM said, he would not detain the House further than to say that he entirely concurred with the Members of his Party in the question which they had unanimously addressed to the Prime Minister, requesting that, in view of the early stage of the Session and of the important Business which had to be gone through, he would not commence with a policy of exasperation against the Irish Party. If the right hon. Gentleman took no notice of that request, probably it would not facilitate the transaction of Business in the future.

The House divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 118: Majority 88.—(Div. List, No. 4.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Government had felt it their duty to take the sense of the House, not with reference merely to the particular debate that was before them, but as the most practical protest that they could make against the growth of a system which appeared to be more obstructive of the order and proper transaction of the Business of the House than any other system which could be imagined—the system of accumulating so much discussion on the Address.

MR. HEALY rose to Order. He wished to know what was the Question now before the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The Question is, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HEALY: Is it in Order, upon a Motion of this kind—

[Eighth Night.]

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister is in possession of the House.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was speaking to an amicable purpose. He wished to explain that the Government did not wish to press hon. Gentlemen too hardly upon matters in which they took a deep interest; and having, as he had said, taken the sense of the House with regard to the general practice, he was himself prepared to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. SPEAKER: If the House negatives a Motion for the adjournment of the House, it would then be competent to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. GLADSTONE: Then I will move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Gladstone,)—put, and negatived.

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HEALY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Healy,)—put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter before Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 4th November, 1884.

The House met for the despatch of Judicial Business only.

House adjourned at Four o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—Ordered—First Reading—Municipal Franchise (Ireland)* [27].

QUESTIONS.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF CHAIRMAN OF BOARD OF GUARDIANS, CLIFDEN UNION.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why, after the decision of the Local Government Board in May, that two of the guardians who voted for the present chairman of Clifden Union were disqualified, they allow the chairman to retain the position, seeing that he was only elected by a majority of one vote; and, is it the fact that, in the case of three other guardians, whose qualification was also disputed, the Local Government Board refused to grant an inquiry, unless documentary evidence was forwarded them, when it is alleged the facts to be proved only admit of oral evidence which on the spot is abundantly obtainable?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Section 30 of the Irish Poor Relief Act provides that no defect in the qualification of any person acting as a Guardian at a Board of Guardians shall vitiate any proceedings in which he may have taken part. Therefore, the subsequent removal of two Guardians from the Board did not affect the validity of the election of Chairman. With regard to the three Guardians referred to in the second paragraph of the Question, the objection made was on the ground of alleged non-occupancy of the premises or holdings in respect of which they derived their qualifications. The Local Government Board consider the explanation of the Returning Officer on this head to be satisfactory. They have communicated that explanation to the objector, and informed him that he should sustain his objection by some documentary evidence. The Board consider that objection on the ground stated should admit of such proof, and they cannot, on the unsupported allegation of an objector, institute a local inquiry without some prima facie evidence to show that there are reasonable grounds for the objection.

SALMON FISHERY (IRELAND) ACT—EMPLOYMENT OF CONSTABULARY AT BLACKROCK AS WATER BAILIFFS.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

On what authority and by whose directions the Constabulary in the Blackrock Police Barrack, county of Cork, are employed as water bailiffs?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am informed that it is not a fact that the Blackrock constabulary act as water bailiffs. They do what they can to assist the employés of the Conservators to detect poaching, which has been extensively practised. Their action is purely for the protection of the public interest, which it is the duty of the Constabulary to enforce, and which they are empowered to do under the Fishery Act.

EMIGRATION (IRELAND)—RETURN OF STATE-AIDED EMIGRANTS BY THE UNITED STATES.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the attention of the Government has been called to the fact that several families have recently been sent back from New York to Queenstown by the United States Government in a state of great destitution, and have become a burden on the rates of the Cork Union; and, what steps the Government propose to take with regard to such cases?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is true that several families have been sent back from New York to Queenstown as stated. When persons thus returned had been State-aided, arrangements were made by the Local Government Board that their expenses to their own Unions should be paid. But neither the Government nor the Local Government Board could take action with respect to the removal from Cork of returned emigrants, who had been sent to America by other means. The Board have obtained a list of the returned emigrants who have received relief in Cork Union, and are causing inquiry to be made as to the circumstances under which their emigration was carried out.

FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—TEELIN PIER.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to recent correspondence in the press about Teelin Pier, and to General Sankey's explanation on behalf of the Board of Works; whether he still adheres to his former statements; and, whether it is intended to grant any inquiry into the alleged waste of public money?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, he had seen the Correspondence. The hon. Member was, perhaps, aware that the case would come before the Donegal Grand Jury, and it was not possible to give any opinion upon it until afterwards.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. VAUGHAN MONTGOMERY, J.P.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How the prosecution against Mr. Vaughan Montgomery, J.P. now stands; has the attention of the Lord Chancellor been directed to the report of the trial in The Belfast Morning News of 29th September; is it intended that he should continue in the Commission of the Peace; was the second summons taken out against him by the Crown as intended; and, what course do the Government mean to take in his case?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I have seen the report in The Belfast Morning News referred to in the Question. The Sessional Crown Solicitor reports that owing to the mode in which claims to vote were received, the magistrates decided that there was not sufficient proof of the tendering of the claim within the Statute. A second summons could not now be sustained, having regard to the date of the claim. The case is one which, as regards Mr. Montgomery's conduct, will be submitted to the Lord Chancellor.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF — PAYNE.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If it is the fact that a young man named Payne, servant to a justice of the peace in the county of Wicklow, and who had formerly been in the employment of Mr. Gustavus Cornwall, Ex-Secretary to the Post Office, was committed to Wicklow Gaol, after a magisterial investigation, in camera, to take his trial for a felonious offence; whether the principal witness against him came over from Wales to give evidence, but was informed by the police at Newtown Mount Kennedy that he was not wanted; whether it is the fact that when the case was called on the Crown entered a nolle prosequi; and, if he can state the reason why the prosecution was not proceeded with?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): A man named Payne was returned for trial to the Wicklow Assizes; but on the information being laid before the Attorney General, he was of opinion that no offence was disclosed by them on which a prosecution could be sustained. A bill was found against the same man for a minor offence; but the prosecuting counsel considered that the case was not one in which the Crown should proceed, and the Attorney General saw no reason to disapprove of the judgment exercised by them at the Assizes. No one connected with the prosecution knows or has heard that the man had been in the employment of Mr. Cornwall, and the first suggestion of it, so far as is known, appears in the Question.

PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT, 1877—EXPENSES OF CONVEYANCE OF PRISONERS.

MR. DEASY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is a fact that the Budget of 1882 made provision for the sum of £100,000 to recoup English Counties for moneys paid by them for the conveyance of prisoners after committal, from the passing of "The Prisons Act, 1877," to the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Mullins v. Treasurer of the County of Surrey; and, whether the Government will adopt a similar course in regard to Irish Grand Juries, and make good the sums paid by them under the same Act, from 1877 to the passing of the Amendment Act of the present year?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, he was afraid that the hon. Member had been imperfectly informed as to the facts of the case. The decision of the House of Lords on the English Act imposed a retrospective liability on the Exchequer which it was necessary for the Government to meet out of taxation. The Irish Act was differently worded, and the decision in question did not apply to it. Moreover, it expressed correctly the intention of the Legislature in passing that Act which had failed in the English case owing to an error in the wording. There was no obligation to make the provisions of the amended Act retrospective, and he saw no reason in justice for so doing.

Mr. Sexton

IRELAND—THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY—THE QUEEN'S COLLEGE, GALWAY—MR. CHARLES GEISLER, PROFESSOR OF MODERN LANGUAGES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the inquiry, promised by his predecessor, into the qualifications of Professor Geisler, F.R.U.I. and Professor Queen's College, Galway, has taken place; and, if so, with what result?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The charges made against Professor Geisler and his reply thereto were, at the request of the Government, investigated by the President of the Queen's College, Galway, who has reported upon them, supporting his conclusions by original documents. The result is that the Government are satisfied that Professor Geisler did not obtain his appointment at Galway on the strength of a degree which he did not possess, but because he was thought by the Government of the day to be the best candidate for it, and that he subsequently obtained a degree at Vienna in the usual way, and not on the strength of his holding a Professorship in the Queen's College, Galway. I may add that Professor Geisler is borne in high estimation by men competent of judging of his qualifications, and is, as I am informed, a man of estimable character, who has faithfully discharged all the duties of his position.

MR. HEALY wished to know if it were not the fact that this inquiry was conducted by a gentleman who was to some extent particeps criminis in the alleged fraud—namely, the President of Queen's College; and if an independent inquiry had been made by any gentleman unconnected with the Queen's College who would command public confidence?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that the President of the College, who had inquired into the matter, had supported his Report by original documents, which were of such a character as to satisfy the Government that the allegation of fraud was not well founded.

MR. HEALY asked whether the hon. Gentleman would lay the Report on the Table of the House?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, if the Report was not a confidential document, the proofs accompanying it undoubtedly were, and without them the Report would not be intelligible.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS—REDISTRIBUTION—CENSUS OF WALES.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked the Right honourable Baronet the Member for Wigton, in reference to his Redistribution Bill, on what principle he computed the population of Anglesey at 193,511; what are the "latest available returns" of population mentioned in his Bill, Schedule A, in contrast with the Census of 1881; and, what is his authority for the statement that the population of Wales is "stationary," seeing that, according to the Census Report of 1881, the population of Wales had increased 11.7 per cent. since the Census of 1871, being a greater per-centage of increase for Wales than for Scotland?

SIR JOHN HAY: I have to thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for his courtesy in giving me private Notice of his Question. In column 3 of Schedule A of the Bill the urban and rural population of Anglesey is correctly given as 51,416. The error in column 2 is owing to an error of the copyist, who has inserted the number of statute acres 193,511, taken from the next column of the table. This is an error, however, which I ought to have detected, and for which I express my regret to the House. As the number of Members to be returned in column 6 is based on column 3, the error makes no change in the other parts of the Bill. The latest available returns of population are to be found in the quarterly return of births, deaths, and marriages, 1884; but I have also to express my obligation for information derived from the returns of the hon. Members for Salford, East Staffordshire, and Stafford, and from a return circulated by Sir Henry Peek, lately a Member of this House, and from The Statesman's Year Book, Whitaker's, Oliver and Boyd's, and Thom's Almanacks, and other sources of information. The population of Wales in 1871 was 1,217,135; in 1881 it was 1,460,513; and in 1884 it was 1,376,480. From 1871 to 1881 it increased 11.7 per cent; but from 1879 to 1881 only 1.3 per cent, and the rate is now even less, and may, I think, be described as stationary. As the hon. and learned Member is aware, the civil and registration county of Anglesey is not conterminous. The population of the civil county, exclusive of boroughs, in 1881 was 36,570; in 1884 it was 35,141, a decrease of 1,429 in four years.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD: On what has the right hon. Baronet founded his calculation of the number of inhabitants of Wales in 1884?

SIR JOHN HAY: On the Registrar's Returns of births, deaths, and marriages, laid on the Table of this House in May, 1884.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—COLLECTION OF POOR RATES, BANDON UNION, CO. CORK.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that a Mr. Dineen has tendered to collect the poor rates of the Bandon Union, county Cork, at a poundage of fourpence; whether a majority of the Board, made up principally of ex-officio Guardians, have elected a Mr. Stanley at a poundage of sixpence; and, whether, if the facts are as stated, the Local Government Board will order the appointment of Mr. Dineen?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The facts are substantially as stated. But the resolution of the Board of Guardians fixing the poundage at 6d. was formal and legal, and requires no interference on the part of the Local Government Board.

WESTERN HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS (SCOTLAND)—THE CROFTERS OF SKYE.

MR. D. CAMERON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has received any official Report of the disturbances alleged to have taken place in the Island of Skye; and, whether the nature of those disturbances is such as to call for exceptional measures; and, if so, what steps Her Majesty's Government propose to take to vindicate the Law in that part of Her Majesty's dominions?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Yes, Sir; we have received official communications from the Justices—the local authorities in the county of Inverness—who informed me that in Skye the police have been attacked and overpowered; and, in my opinion, it is quite clear, under these circumstances, that it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to take such measures in connection with the local authorities as may be necessary for supporting the police in the execution of their duty and the maintenance of order and law.

THE CROWN COLONIES—COLONIAL EXPENDITURE.

MR. HEALY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If, according to the Colonial Regulations, all expenditure of public money in Crown Colonies is strictly forbidden until sanctioned by the Secretary of State; if so, and Lord Derby admits that the grant for the Anglican Parsonage in Grenada was improper, and "would not have been sanctioned if submitted to him," he can say who is responsible for not only voting but disbursing the money, without the permission of the Secretary of State; is he aware that in the Legislative Council the Local Government stated they had obtained Lord Derby's sanction; what notice has been taken of the irregularity and misrepresentation; why should not the authors of the misappropriation, and not the taxpayers, suffer by what has been done; and, what guarantee exists against the recurrence of such incidents?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The hon. Member can see in The Colonial Office List, published annually, what are the rules and regulations affecting the question at issue. They do not prohibit all expenditure of public money in a Crown Colony until the sanction of the Secretary of State is obtained, although it is generally understood that, except in case of emergency, the Governor should not propose a Vote or authorize expenditure of an unusual description without such previous sanction. In the case referred to in the Question, Lord Derby considers that both the Governor and the Legislative Council committed an error of judgment; but, under the circumstance of the Governor holding a bond fide belief that there was a legal obligation to put the rectory-house in repair, Lord Derby does not think it necessary to take any action beyond that which he has already taken. He does not anticipate the recurrence of such incidents, and, therefore, does not consider it desirable to lay down any more stringent rule fettering the discretion hitherto wisely exercised by the Governors of Crown Colonies. We have no reason to believe that the local

CIVIL SERVICE (IRELAND)—MR. GEORGE BOLTON.

MR. HEALY rose. The following Question appeared on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member:—To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the present position of Mr. George Bolton; is he in receipt of a salary from the Crown; and, what are the intentions of the Government respecting him?

MR. SPEAKER, interposing: This Question is in identical terms with one put on the Paper and answered yesterday; and it is contrary to the Rules of the House to put it again.

MR. HEALY: I was about to explain that the Question had been put down without my knowledge or consent.

PUBLIC MEETINGS—THE RIOT AT ASTON HALL, BIRMINGHAM.

MR. LEWIS asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he will state to the House which of the original sworn papers, quoted or read by him to the House on the 30th October, are now or ever were in his possession?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The original sworn papers quoted by me, or rather read by me, to the House in extenso on the 30th October, were all of them at that date in my possession. The whole of them have now been forwarded to the solicitors in Birmingham who have the conduct of the proceedings. I may add that some objections having been taken to these papers on the ground of some irregularity in them, I am informed that the whole of these statements have now been repeated in the shape of statutory declarations, and the Tory solicitors have been informed that they will be at their service if they desire to found any proceedings upon them.

EGYPT—THE MILITARY EXPEDITION—INSTRUCTIONS TO LORD WOLSELEY.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Lord Wolseley has been instructed to proclaim the abandonment of the whole Soudan; and, if so, whether, and in view of General Gordon's statement that the policy of abandonment was the chief difficulty in his way at Khartoum, Her Majesty's Ministers will withdraw the above instruction to Lord Wolseley, and will direct him to press on with all speed to the relief of Khartoum?

MR. ONSLOW desired to know whether the Government before proposing the Vote of Credit in respect of the Egyptian Expedition would lay upon the Table copies of the instructions to Lord Wolseley defining the relative position of himself and General Gordon in the Soudan? If the Government wished it, he would give Notice of the Question.

MR. GLADSTONE: With respect to the Question of the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), there are no instructions to Lord Wolseley bearing on the subject of his Question beyond those which are printed, and they do not contain the instruction that is supposed in this Question. It is not an instruction to Lord Wolseley; but he would have authority to proceed to Khartoum if he saw occasion. As to the time and manner of any such advance, that is left in Lord Wolseley's hands.

NAVY—STATE OF THE NAVY.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is now in a position to state on what occasion he proposes to make his promised statement with regard to any steps intended to be taken in order to secure the efficiency of the Navy and the security of our coaling stations abroad?

MR. GLADSTONE: I understand my hon. Friend to signify by this Question that the Franchise Bill ought to be postponed in order to have a discussion on the Navy. If that is his intention—

MR. LABOUCHERE: No, Sir. Perhaps I may be allowed to explain. I was in hopes that the Franchise Bill would be passed in two or three days, and I wanted to know if a statement about the Navy could be made immediately?

MR. GLADSTONE: Well, I am very glad to have called forth that explanation. I am not quite so sanguine as the hon. Member, and I may now remind him that we are really in exactly the same position, with the exception of the introduction of the Bill, that we were in on the first night of the Session. Indeed, I may say that we are in a worse position, because on the first night of the Session the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote), I think, wisely made an observation in his speech which appeared to contemplate, and which tended to bring about the close of the debate after what I might call the old fashion. I should be glad if my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) can give me any positive information as to that point. No doubt, when we see that we are going to be clear of the Franchise Bill, then I think some Question of this kind may very well be put, and I understand that right hon. Gentlemen opposite have it in view.

SIR DONALD CURRIE: I beg leave to give Notice that on the earliest available opportunity after the Franchise Bill has passed this House, I shall call attention to the state of the Navy, and the condition of our Eastern and Colonial Defences and Coaling Stations, and move a Resolution.

EGYPT—MILITARY OPERATIONS—THE RAILWAY FROM SUAKIN TO BERBER.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in order to facilitate the return of the expedition from Khartoum, and to avoid the most serious complications in the future, Her Majesty's Government are taking any steps towards opening out a Railway from Suakin to Berber?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: This question relating to the railway from Suakin to Berber was one which was fully considered and discussed with Lord Wolseley before he left England, and had been under his consideration before. There is no intention at present of making any further preparation for the construction of that railway.

IRELAND—THE LAND COMMISSION COURT—APPEALS—FINES FOR NON-STAMPING.

MR. HEALY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the question of the imposition of the penalty where appeals in land cases, &c. in Ireland have not been stamped; can he give a guarantee that the penalty where the fine is paid and the appeal proceeded with will not afterwards be remitted by the Stamp Office; and has this been done in any instance; and, if so, why?

MR. COURTNEY: My attention has been called to this matter. The question of the validity of a notice of appeal, either not stamped at all or not stamped until after service, is one of law, which the Lands Commission, in its judicial capacity, must decide upon a case brought before it by the party affected. I am informed that some notices have been allowed to be stamped after service, presumably on the ground of unintentional error; but this will not be allowed in future.

MR. HEALY: Can the hon. Gentleman say how many cases?

MR. COURTNEY: I do not know. There has been no remission of a fine, because no fine has been exacted.

FISHERY PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND)—FISHERY PIER AT PULLENDIVA, CO. SLIGO.

MR. SEXTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is the fact that the new pier at Pullendiva, county Sligo, and constructed two or three years since, at a cost of over £5,000, is entirely useless to the fishermen of the district, as their boats cannot enter into it at low water, the harbour being dry, with a rocky bottom, and the boats, whenever they enter, cannot remain there without sustaining damage; whether a portion of the cost was contributed by the locality, expressly on condition that the harbour would be made available for fishing smacks at all times of tide; whether the design for the pier was made by the engineer of the Board of Works, and whether he has made any fresh design for any further works to render the pier available for its purpose; whether the Fishery Commissioners have offered any opinion as to the need of further works in connection with the pier; and, how soon the Board of Works may be expected to execute such works as are requisite to make the pier a useful structure?

MR. COURTNEY: I do not know on what grounds the hon. Member says that a tidal harbour is useless, such harbours being not uncommon throughout the Three Kingdoms. The Pullendiva Pier is only dry at very low spring tides, and could not have been carried out to deep water without a very large expenditure. There is no evidence that any condition was attached to the small local contribution received. The Fishery Commissioners have suggested an extension, and a design for it was sent them on July 22, since which date nothing has been heard from them on the subject. The Board of Works will put the works in hand as soon as the Commissioners communicate their decision.

ALKALI WORKS REGULATION ACT, 1831—ALLEGED DEATHS FROM NOXIOUS VAPOURS FROM SOAP AND ALKALI WORKS, RUNCORN.

MR. WARBURTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the death of two children from suffocation by chlorine gas, at the Soap and Alkali Works near Runcorn; whether he is aware that noxious vapours, destructive to vegetation and life, are constantly allowed to escape from these works; and, whether he will take steps to compel the owners of these works to adopt measures for the prevention of this danger in the neighbourhood in future?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: We have not received any information as to the alleged deaths from suffocation by chlorine gas from the alkali works referred to; but we will at once make inquiry on the subject.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—KHARTOUM.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, considering the fact that the food supply at Khartoum must of necessity be exhausted by the time our Troops can arrive there, if not before, and owing to the probability of a great famine existing in the Country, through the failure of the Tribes to cultivate their land, Her Majesty's Government have arranged to send up sufficient supplies to provide means of subsistence for the Troops, and for the beleaguered inhabitants of the town; and, whether, inasmuch as it was known at Cairo, early in August, that grave doubts existed as to whether General Gordon's ammunition would hold out, he has arranged that sufficient munitions of war should be sent with the Expedition, for the use of the Governor of Khartoum?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Supplies in large quantities are being concentrated at Dongola, upon which Lord Wolseley will be able, in case for necessity, to draw. There is no reason to believe that supplies of the character used by the Natives are deficient in the Nile Valley owing to the failure of the tribes to cultivate their land. Ample supplies for munitions of war of all kinds have been provided from this country for the Nile Expeditionary Force, and their disposition rests entirely with the General Officer commanding.

EGYPT—(EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—GENERAL GORDON—TELEGRAMS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I should like to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has received any telegrams from Lord Wolseley as to the safety of General Gordon?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Messages have been received from Lord Wolseley to Sir Evelyn Baring. I do not think, as they have been received en clair, there is any reason why they should not be placed before the House; but the information they contain is not of great importance, but it tends to show that Lord Wolseley knew nothing of the unfavourable reports with reference to General Gordon. The telegrams are as follows:—

"Sir Evelyn Baring, Cairo, 10 A.M. (noon), Nov. 4, 1884.—Following from Wolseley, dated Dongola, yesterday:—Kitchener telegraphs to Wilson:—Message begins:—I saw a man named Ibrahim Wad Beel, who recently came from the Arabs some distance south. He has sent a letter to the Mudir. He said all was quiet, and when Gordon received our messengers he fired salutes and had parades. He appeared unwilling to give information. I suppose you know that both English and French Consuls were with Stewart. Greek Consul Nicola supposed to have remained behind in the boats, and to be safe.—Message ends. Kitchener again telegraphed yesterday:—Message begins: Hadji Abdullah arrived from Wady Gamr, and says that a man from Shendi reports that Hashem-el-Moos has formed a post there, and has been fighting with Jaalin. The Mahdi, with a large force, came to Omdurman, and asked Gordon to surrender. Gordon replied that he would hold Khartoum for 12 years. The Mahdi then retired without fighting to El-Goz Elmek, one day south of Khartoum and half-a-day from the river, and gave out that he would not fight for two months. Many left him. Sid-el-Hasan has sent word from Kassala to Gordon that he will soon come and help him. He is an important man. Sheikh Sala, son of Hussein Pasha Khalifa, in pay of Government at Korosko, has opened the Murad wells and sent a letter to Robatat, offering peace if they will come in. Mahomed-el-Khair is still in Berber as Emir, but the people are afraid. Road from here to Khartoum not open except by Metammah, and there the Mahdi's men come in at night.—Wolseley's telegram ends. I think that the place called El-Goz Elmek in this telegram is the same as that called Emmek on the map."

QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Resolved, That any further proceedings on the Address appointed for this day or to-morrow have precedence over the Notices of Motions and Orders of the Day.—(Mr. Gladstone.)

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Main Question [28th October,] "That, &c."—[See page 69.]

And which Amendment was,

To insert in the ninth paragraph, after the word "us," the words "but humbly to represent to Her Majesty that it is essential to the public interest that the Criminal Law, more particularly with regard to the composition of juries, be impartially administered to the different classes of the people of Ireland."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Debate resumed.

AMENDMENT (MR. SEXTON)—COMPOSITION OF JURIES (IRELAND).

MR. HEALY said, that everyone would agree, who had witnessed the exciting scene before the close of the last Sitting, that it was much more decorous to have the reply of the new Chief Secretary to-day. They were very anxious to know what his view was of recent occurrences in Ireland, and what policy he intended to pursue; or, if he was merely elevated to a higher position on the Treasury Bench, to have Questions fired at him as a kind of Ministerial "Aunt Sally?" The late Chief Secretary made last night a speech which he regarded as very remarkable. The House and the country must remember that it was because of their attack upon the

Government in reference to James Ellis French, that the President of the Board of Trade charged them with acting the part of savage warriors, and with making use of "poisoned wells and explosive bullets." He wished for a moment to contrast the attitude of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster last night with his attitude upon the same subject some three months previously. Last night, James Ellis French was "This wretch!" "A fellow!" "One who, if the Government had anything to do with him, would lose them the support of honest and honourable men!" Three months ago, when the Irish Members showed that so far back as September, 1883, James Ellis French committed perjury in swearing in an affidavit that he had not been suspended or removed from office, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster backed him up, had no apology or condemnation of the perjury, and said he hoped he would recover and be able to proceed with his action against the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien). He would quote the right hon. Gentleman's words, so that the next time Irish Members brought forward charges they might be favoured with some better answer than that the Lord Lieutenant was well aware of the distinguished character of the official impugned, and would not listen to the attacks of men like the hon. Member for Mallow. A Motion was made on the 17th of June, last Session, by the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) for a Select Committee to inquire into the conduct of the Government with regard to the criminal charges against James Ellis French, Detective Director and County Inspector, Gustavus Cornwall, Secretary to the General Post Office, Dublin, and George Bolton, Crown Solicitor. The Chief Secretary immediately rose, and how did he meet the allegations?—

"The hon. Member for Monaghan and the hon. Member for Queen's County have had, I do not hesitate to say, false evidence laid before them, which they are not in the least to be blamed for believing; and I can very well guess whence this evidence comes, because there has been in Dublin for some time past a man of the name of Meiklejohn, who was formerly in the English Detective Force, but who was dismissed from that Force—put upon his trial—a criminal trial—for levying black mail, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. . . . The House may imagine the terrible danger which Irish officials run when a man of this sort is in Dublin trumping up cases against them."—

That speech was made on the eve of the Cornwall trial for the purpose of influencing the jury. It was a statement that Irish Members had employed a felon and an odious character for the purpose of trumping up charges. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on—

MR. TREVELYAN: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. The false charge to which I referred was a charge against myself. My business was with a charge made in the House on the evidence, as I believed, of Meiklejohn.

MR. HEALY: No charge was made from first to last against the right hon. Gentleman. It is futile for the right hon. Gentleman to say there was. What was the charge?

MR. TREVELYAN: The hon. Member will find, if he continues to read the speech. It was a personal charge against me of having had interviews with French, which interviews I was able to state and show to the House I never had. [Cheers from the Ministerial side below the Gangway.]

MR. HEALY: Do not cheer before your time.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. HEALY said, there was no such charge made by any hon. Member. Even if there were, was that a criminal charge? Would it have put the right hon. Gentleman in "a terrible position?" Why, it would not have in the least surprised them if the right hon. Gentleman had interviews with French, and had told him he must clear his character or leave. In fact, it might have been his duty to see him. Now, the right hon. Gentleman attempted to put an ex post facto construction on his words. The words did not bear the right hon. Gentleman's interpretation—

"The House may imagine the terrible danger which Irish officials run when a man of this sort is in Dublin trumping up cases against them."

Where was the terrible danger to the right hon. Gentleman in saying that he had had an official interview with French? It was monstrous for the right hon. Gentleman to pretend that his words had reference to that. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

"How can any Irish official be free from most horrible charges?"—

Horrible charges of having seen Mr. French in an interview!—

"when a man of this character is in Dublin, spying about to the right and left. I do not know what charges he has brought against other Irish officials; but if they are of the same value as that which he has brought against me, I must say the House must be very careful before it accepts the outcry with which these charges have been published."—[Ibid.]

That speech was practically a statement for the plaintiff in the libel action of "Cornwall v. O'Brien," which was to take place a few days later in Dublin. But in spite of that carefully-prepared statement Cornwall was practically convicted by a jury of his "chums." There were only five or six Catholics on the jury which gave a verdict for the hon. Member for Mallow, and of the others several were Cornwall's brother-Masons. Then look at the conduct of the Government in the case of their other official, French, who had since been dismissed the Service with the question of pension left open, though he was now in Kilmainham Gaol. With the full knowledge that French was then swearing perjury for the purpose of defeating the action of the hon. Member for Mallow, by denying on affidavit the allegation that he had been suspended or in any way officially interfered with, the Government deliberately kept silence; and it was only when driven by the force of public opinion, and when French could not be spurred or kicked into going on with his action, that the right hon. Gentleman admitted he had been suspended long before the date of the affidavit. If the Government had only had the common honesty to acknowledge that French had committed perjury, and to have treated him as a perjurer, some satisfaction would have been given. The Irish Party wanted to know from the new Chief Secretary, was he prepared to back up these wretches in the same way as his Predecessor had done? Would he imitate his Predecessor, and, with the knowledge that wilful perjury had been committed in the interests of the Crown to crush an opponent, would he back up those guilty officials? It was time that the hon. Gentleman should speak out. It was time that they should have a distinct statement of the intentions of the Government. Would the hon. Gentleman liberate his soul on the subject? Would he state whether he was prepared to take up the role adopted by his Predecessor? Since the accession to Office by the hon. Gentleman, an announcement had been made that George Bolton had been reinstated. In his (Mr. Healy's) opinion, that augured very badly for the future career of the hon. Gentleman. Did the new Chief Secretary know that, on the certificate of an English Judge, George Bolton was declared to be guilty of the most heartless conduct in swindling his own wife of £40,000? He surely knew that an Irish Judge—Judge Walsh—in the Bankruptcy Court, also condemned his conduct in the most emphatic manner as "monstrous." He knew that in the Sligo murder case, Judge Barry commented most strongly, in words of condemnation, on Bolton's conduct in concealing a deposition of the mother of the murdered man. He knew that Judge Barry, in the case of "Bolton v. O'Brien," commented afresh on Bolton's conduct. He knew that in the Maamtrasna case, when the important and vital depositions of the dying boys were withheld, George Bolton was the solicitor for the Crown, and that he also appended to the statement of Patrick Joyce in the Crown brief the statement—"Patrick Joyce survives, but his evidence is worthless." The Irish Party asked the new Chief Secretary whether, with these facts before him—with this swindler and bankrupt and keeper-back of depositions—with this record before his eyes, was it the way to ingratiate himself with the Irish people to protect and reinstate this man after his suspension? In the Sligo murder case, in which Judge Barry commented on the withholding of the important deposition, the Judge had to use the prisoners' counsel's brief to supply the absence of the document, which, as his Lordship said, "should have been in the custody of the Clerk of the Crown;" Judge Barry strongly denounced this at the time; and afterwards in Bolton's action against United Ireland, for its criticisms on it, the same Judge, in his address to the jury, commenting upon the proceeding, said it was—

and further that—

"It was eminently unsatisfactory, and one with reference to which the feeling of a Judge could not be realized. It was a terrible thing that, in a trial involving human life, a document that should have been in Court was not forthcoming."

The Judge also observed upon the fact that "the original document had disappeared." Yet this was the worthy official whom the Government had reinstated after his suspension, because the bankruptcy proceedings were stopped. These bankruptcy proceedings were unduly and illegally postponed, over and over again, contrary to the Statute. And why? To give Bolton an opportunity of waiting for the result of the Belfast trials against Mr. O'Brien, when, as his affidavits declared, he hoped to reckon a verdict among his assets. The section of the Act under which the bankruptcy proceedings took place provided that, "after the granting of an order for protection, the Court shall appoint a private sitting to be held forthwith." That, however, was not done. The Act also provided that the petitioning trader, 10 days before the private sitting, should file a full account of his debts; and yet, from the 1st of May, when George Bolton filed his petition, down to September, nothing was done to give Bolton his chance of getting a verdict against the hon. Member for Mallow. He never could pay the £90,000 he owed, as he only offered his creditors a composition of a few hundreds a-year out of his salary; but, as they knew, if they made him a bankrupt, he would be dismissed, and they would get nothing, they abandoned the proceedings in the hope that they could still recover 6d. in the pound. It was to a transparent transaction of this kind that the new Chief Secretary thought fit to impart his patriarchal blessing. Why did the Government take this extraordinary course in reference to such a man? They made the "arrangement" with him because they were afraid of him. When he put the Question to the Solicitor General for Ireland, whether Bolton would be dismissed or not, the reply was that the matter was of such a serious character and of such importance that it should lie over until the new Chief Secretary took his seat. At that time the Government evidently had not made up their minds. But in the meanwhile a very remarkable letter from James Ellis French came to light—a letter in which he said, referring to Government officials, that if he took a certain course he would "perhaps see some of them in the dock." While the Government were considering what it would do with George Bolton, French wrote his letter from Kilmainham, not for publication, but it came to light, having been intercepted; the Maamtrasna debate took place, the Irish Members were voted down, and, of course, the Government knew that Bolton could, if he chose, put this House of Commons to shame and turn Lord Spencer out of Ireland, if he told the truth about Maamtrasna, to spite them. George Bolton had only to come forward in the position of a repentant culprit, and, of course, he had Lord Spencer in the hollow of his hand. Bolton knew too much, and therefore he was reinstated—in fact, for the past two months since his suspension he had been going about threatening what he would do if the Government dismissed him. One thing Bolton said he would do was, that he would not oblige Earl Spencer by making a bankrupt of the hon. Member for Mallow. He had been treated badly by the Government, he said. He declared he had performed jury-packing; had had men hanged by the connivance of Earl Spencer; and he would expose the Government if he was thrown over, and so the Government did not throw him over. George Bolton put a pistol to Earl Spencer's head, loaded it—he might use the metaphor—with the blood of innocent men, charged it with the knowledge of unwholesome and fatal secrets, and so the Government put back Bolton—a man branded with the guilt of the most odious crime by English and Irish Judges. This was the man with whose reappointment the new Chief Secretary opened his official career in Ireland, and on which he made his maiden announcement. Did the Chief Secretary think that such a course was a wise one? They knew, however, he was not acting on his own judgment, or acting on the dictates of his own feelings, but was just doing what Lord Spencer ordered him to do. Was it not absurd to have such officials in this House, just like puppets, the strings to be pulled from Dublin Castle or elsewhere, as the case required? When answers were read out in that House, they knew that the answers were not the answers of those who read them, but of those over whom they had no control. It was absurd to suppose that the House was carrying on a Representative Government when the Representatives of the people were confronted by officials with replies dictated by some arbitrary and tyrannical power outside the House. It was a flagrant dereliction of a representative position. When they placed gentlemen in Dublin as Viceroys, with full control over the fortunes of the people, and contented themselves by having in that House a mere whipping boy to answer Questions and receive attacks, it was a prostitution of the representation. He was surprised that, living as they did in so-called Radical days, when they were pretending to give every man a vote, and pretending that in that House should be voiced the opinions of the people, a system more akin to what was going on in Russia than what would be expected in Her Majesty's Dominions was permitted to prevail. The Irish Members showed that one of the leading instruments of the system was George Bolton, and another, James Ellis French. They asked the House, which had intrusted the Irish authorities with a Crimes Act admitted to be of the most ferocious character, whether it was the way to obtain the confidence of the people to put the administration of that Act into the hands of the most unworthy and the filthiest instruments? Let the Government pass Coercion Acts; but let them give the people coerced the satisfaction of knowing that they would be administered by honourable and impartial men. But were they to be told that when the highest men the Crown had administering the Act, finding out criminals in Ireland and packing juries, were men of tainted character, of loathsome lives, men with whom no one in decent society, or with a shred of self-respect, would be seen, and with reference to one of whom the Chief Secretary said it was a monstrous charge against him to say that he was ever seen with or had spoken to him—

MR. TREVELYAN: I rise to Order. This is certainly very strong. The hon. Gentleman refers to French, I presume. Well, French had no more to do with the packing of juries than the police constables at Scotland Yard.

MR. HEALY said, that if he was inclined to comment on that interruption, he should say that that interruption was about as irregular an interruption as ever he heard in the course of his life. As that interruption had been made, however, he would just say something on the point which it had raised —that French had nothing to do with jury packing. He would read an extract from French's letter—

"You are not up in criminal cases, and Orr has not had practical experience in heavy cases. But I have had, and perhaps there are very few who could work up a case for the Crown or the defence more closely than I could, as John Atkinson and Peter O'Brien said to me in Mary Brosnahan's case, in which I had about 70 witnesses, that they never saw a case worked up closer to the wind than it was."

MR. O'DONNELL: Infamy!

MR. HEALY: Here was a case in which the official now in custody on a charge of beastly and abominable offences had "worked up" for the Crown, and with reference to which the learned Serjeant, Peter O'Brien, said he never saw a case "worked up closer to the wind" than it was. No wonder they who lived in Ireland should love British rule! No wonder they should be in ecstasies at the gentlemen sent over to them! No wonder they should bow down before those creatures engaged in nameless crimes in high places—men, like French, described as a filthy wretch by the right hon. Gentleman who defended him so long! But he only introduced this digression because of interruption of the ex-Chief Secretary. The Government had clearly no intention of acceding to the proposition before the House, and yet they were told that on occasions like this the conduct of the Irish Members was calculated to alienate the Radicals. Their charge was that, having had a Coercion Act passed, care was taken on the juries under it to exclude every Catholic, especially in murder cases; whilst in grave cases like that of Cornwall, which, according to the statement of Crown counsel, involved the commission of the most odious crimes that could be committed—worse than any agrarian or political crime—they challenged no juror, and connived at an acquittal. This Act gave power to the prisoners to call for a special jury; but no prisoner before Cornwall ever thought of taking that step. The special jury system was invented by the Government in order to exclude Catholics, and if any happened to be on the panel the Crown had an unlimited right of "stand by." The panel was drawn—100 from the city and 100 from the county—consisting of people of high rating. The present panel for Dublin consisted of 155 Protestants, and about 45 Catholics. One might say that that ought to fairly satisfy them. But what did they do when they got these gentlemen into Court on heavy fines? It was admitted by the late Chief Secretary that George Bolton sent the panel a few days in advance to Mr. Welch, the secretary of the Tory Club in Dublin, and he marked off the politics and creed of every juror upon it. In the case of the county panel, the Royal Irish Constabulary did the same; and by this means the Crown made up their minds in advance as to who the persons were who would be on the jury. How did they manipulate their number? In the case of Myles Joyce they challenged 28; in the case of Francis Hynes they challenged 26; in the case of Thomas Higgins, for the Lough Mask murder, they challenged 54; in the case of Pat Higgins, 42; in the case of Pat Joyce, 39; and in the case of Joe Poole, 47. Consequently, all these men were hanged. The jurors ordered to "stand by" were almost invariably Catholics, although in some instances they were Justices of the Peace. That showed that the Crown manipulated the panel, not to get a true finding, but in order to get the type of persons they required to find the verdict they desired. Yet that was called fair play. Would such a system be tolerated for a moment in England? Take the case even of the Claimant. He ventured to say that if the Claimant had been found guilty by a jury so composed, there was not a Magna Charta Association in the land that would not, at the present moment, be alleging that the Claimant was unjustly convicted. How much more would the Irish people entertain this opinion, knowing, as they did, that the panel was unfairly juggled, and that the whole machinery of Government was against them? Contrast this challenge system with what was done by the Crown in the case of French and Cornwall. The jury in French's and Cornwall's case was a special jury. The section of the Crimes Act on that point appeared to have been drawn with a prophetic eye for the benefit of gentlemen like these. Out of a panel of 200 there were only 45 Catholics. It might, therefore, be supposed that the Crown, knowing that French and Cornwall were Freemasons of high rank, would make use of that process of elimination which they practised on other occasions to so unlimited an extent. They did nothing of the kind. At the outset no previous announcement was made from the Bench that the panel would be called over on heavy fines, as was done in every agrarian case. The consequence was that Mr. Cornwall's Freemason friends, in obedience to a whip, came into Court; and the few Catholics on the panel, knowing they would not be fined, remained away in order to avoid being present at a disgusting trial. Mr. Cornwall had the right of 20 challenges, and he was easily enabled to eliminate all the Catholics. What did the Government do? They did not challenge a single person. How admirable! They challenged 54 in the case of Thomas Higgins; 42 in the case of Pat Higgins; 47 in the case of Joe Poole; but none at all in the case of Mr. Cornwall, who was accused of a crime that they were told in Holy Writ cried to Heaven for vengeance. Oh yes, it cried to Heaven for vengeance; but it did not cry to Dublin Castle for vengeance. Were they in that House told by the Crown, as in the case of the poor peasants who were struggling to remain in the homes of their fathers, that as the existing law did not reach these blackguards, the Government would bring in a new Bill? No. Where jurors acquitted or disagreed in agrarian cases, the Irish were told they were in sympathy with crime, and that the Government would take care to provide machinery for putting the proper men into the box; but they had not a single suggestion to make in reference to the escape of these abominable offenders. It was not for him to charge the Freemasons of Dublin with sympathizing with abominable offences; but if he put the same construction upon their acquittal of Cornwall, of French, and of Dr. Fernandez, of the Guards, that the Government did upon the actions of jurors throughout the country on political trials, he would be inclined to say that the 11 Freemasons who acquitted their fellow-Mason in Dublin last week held very peculiar views on the subject of nameless crimes. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) stated last night that "mistakes might have been made," and men might have been hanged in the wrong; but, at least, "the Government had the consolation of knowing that crime and outrage had ceased." He had not a word to say about the crimes which cried to Heaven for vengeance,

He had not a single word to say in reprobation of the jury that acquitted these men. The Irish Party alleged that if in the case of French and Cornwall the Government wanted to get evidence, they could have obtained it by the Crimes Act inquisitions. The answer of the late Chief Secretary was that the Crimes Act was a method of getting at the truth, and was not passed for offences of this nature. But, if so, why was Mr. Cornwall tried under the Crimes Act? He had the benefit of a Crimes Act special jury, and he might have suffered the disadvantage of a Crimes Act inquisition into his conduct. The Government, as his hon. Friend the Member for Mallow said, bedevilled the entire case. They did not produce a single witness against Cornwall on the felony charge, except those his hon. Friend had declined to call. Was not that disgraceful? They did not bring forward a single one of the witnesses upon whose evidence his hon. Friend obtained his verdict. His hon. Friend was offered the testimony of two wretched creatures named Magrane and Clarke, who alleged that Cornwall had committed felony with them; but he honourably declined to call them, as he was determined that Cornwall should be condemned upon the testimony of men of his own class—men who went to flower shows and social parties with him. The Government did not call one of these men. They called to prove the charge of felony the two wretches Magrane and Clarke, whom nobody would pick out of the gutter except Crown officials, and upon the evidence of these men the case was sent to the jury. Of course, the jury found a verdict of not guilty. They could hardly do otherwise. No man's life would be safe if the testimony of such wretches was accepted. But why did not the Government call Malcolm Johnston, the heir of £40,000? Why did they not call M'Kiernan, the bank clerk? Why did they not call Taylor, or Johnson Little, or the others who moved in the select circles of Castle society? No; they first got him acquitted on the main charge, and having thus got him the benefit of a verdict, they indicted him for conspiracy, and only then produced the witnesses who convinced the jury on the civil action. They refused to challenge one of his friends on that jury—on which the only Catholic was a man who had to leave the Dublin Corporation, because of his refusal to vote the freedom of the City to Parnell and Dillon; but, though they brought him in not guilty, they added the stinging rider to their verdict—"Because the Crown have not brought forward sufficient evidence." What did they do in French's case? French wrote the precious letter already referred to, and the Solicitor General for Ireland made a great point that it was the Crown that produced it. Yes; but the Irish Members first got a copy of it. The gentlemen who gave them Crown briefs also enabled them to have other documents. A fortnight before this letter was produced in Court a statement as to its contents appeared in United Ireland; and they did not, therefore, thank the Government very much for producing it. What did the Government do in French's case? They called the same witnesses who had been disbelieved in Cornwall's case; but not a single man of the scores of policemen with whom French had had guilty practices was called. The Inspector General of Constabulary was called as a witness of character for the accused; but though the Crown knew that he had summoned two Sub-Inspectors by telegraph to find out whether French had committed felony with persons they knew, he was never asked a word about it. What fine, delicate feelings the Crown had! The sub-constable in charge of French, who was assaulted by him two days before he was arrested, and whose deposition existed, was not called to give evidence; nor were any of the scores of cadets in the Constabulary Depot who had been feloniously attacked by this wretch brought forward by the Crown. The English Government expected the Irish people to respect the justice so given them. What did they do in the case of Fitzgerald and others, who would be tried in a few days? In that case they kept 11 men in custody for seven months, though repeated applications had been made before the Lower and Superior Courts for their admission to bail; and after having kept them in horrible confinement all that time without trial, they suddenly allowed them out on bail of £18 each the other day, knowing that there was not a single bit of evidence against them. But they kept in a man named Fitzgerald; and on the very week that he was to be tried they had recourse to a scandalous trick to "stampede" the jury, as they would say in America. They arrested at midnight a clerk named Allen, and they produced, in the most melodramatic fashion, a number of papers and documents found in his possession—all in order to get up a panic among the special jurors who were to try Fitzgerald in a day or two. In the same way Mr. Jenkinson scattered a number of rifle cartridges in the Phoenix Park, with green strings and the words, "The impregnable Invincibles will yet have revenge," attached to them, just before the trial of the Barbavilla prisoners, who were, of course, found guilty on evidence which the informer himself now avowed to be false. This little scheme of Mr. Jenkinson's operated upon the minds of the jury in the Barbavilla case, and it was hoped that the arrest of this young Methodist gentleman, Mr. Allen—delayed until the eleventh hour, and made with every show of importance at the dead of night—would have the same influence upon the jury which was to try Fitzgerald. These were the tricks and stratagems employed in political cases by the Crown in Ireland, while they winked at the crimes that cried to Heaven for vengeance. They winked at those crimes, and the Irish people respected them accordingly. Of the 1,000 men arrested by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) on suspicion, how many had they brought to trial under the Crimes Act? Not 2 per cent. What did the Radicals say to that? Of course, they did not care. They had a Government to keep in, and the old saw, Fiat justitia, was no longer included in the list of Radical maxims. The House was expected to believe that the Government were acting very fairly when the late Chief Secretary could also produce a letter from the solicitors of the "unspeakables" complaining of the composition of the juries. It just happened that the letter of Cornwall's solicitor was intended simply to give the Government an excuse. It was written practically for the purpose of intimidating the Crown into not challenging a single man, and to help them with the public if the Nationalists complained of their not doing so. The hon. Gentleman said—

Mr. Healy

"Mr. Ennis, solicitor, wrote to the Government that the Government were not challenging the Nationalists."

Of course, he did. Mr. Ennis would have had the interest of his client very badly at heart if he did not take every means in his power for obtaining for him a sympathetic jury. The Government knew very well that that complaint was utterly unfounded. He stated so himself; and, of course, they could only conclude that the letter of Mr. Ennis was only a plant between himself and the Government for the purpose of an excuse of this kind being made. From the way the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster spoke of the men, it would appear that French was "a mean wretch," and that Cornwall was a respectable party. He was "Mr." Cornwall throughout all his speech. He would like to know, did this "Mr." import a pension? They had heard from the Secretary to the Treasury, in the case of the notorious Corry Connellan, that he was to be paid a pension. He did not know whether Mr. Corry Connellan had applied for this pension since the debates last Session, when it was promised that he would have to apply for it in person at the Treasury, instead of getting it through the Bank of Ireland in foreign parts; that matter would not be lost sight of—they would find out presently all matters connected with it. The excuse of the Secretary to the Treasury for continuing that pension to the infamous Connellan was that a pension was "deferred pay." But would that apply to Mr. Cornwall? The Government had kept him so tenderly and carefully and gingerly in Kilmainham, that they muddled away the evidence against him, and did not get up any themselves, but merely put before the jury the evidence that was put into their hands by the "disreputable" man Meiklejohn. Was this "Mr." Cornwall to be favoured still further with a pension out of regard for his aristocratic relations, Sir Robert Dalyell and others? That was a matter upon which they had no information. He ventured to say that, as the Government had given a pension to Mr. Corry Connellan, they would, in due time, give a pension to Mr. Cornwall. These Questions would be asked, and he trusted they would hear from the Government some better statements on the subject than they had already made. He would say, in conclusion, that, in his opinion, this letter of French looked as if the Government had made no attempt to convict him. It read very like as if the Government before the trial were opening up negotiations with him. His letter was addressed to a confidential friend. He gave it to another confidential friend to take it out of the prison; but the confidential friend handed it over to the Governor. It was never intended to see the light; and some of the expressions in it were of the most remarkable character. He first discussed the morale of the Government. He said—

"The Crown will not enter a nolle prosequi. They dare not do it in my case. United Ireland and all such papers would be down on them, so that even if anxious they would not do it as a matter of policy."

How well he gauged the position and bona fides of the Government, having been in their employment for 30 years. "As a matter of policy they would not do it." Such was the statement of a man whom the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster last night stated was one of the best witnesses that could be produced as to the conduct of the Government. French went on to say—

"If I take a pension I must also get £5,000 at least and expenses for anxiety of mind. If not they may keep all, and I will put them out of Ireland, and perhaps see some of them in the dock, too. If they want to make terms with me without a pension I must get £20,000."

Was Mr. James Ellis French simply liberating his soul to his confidential friend, Mr. Good, by those reflections; or, rather, was he not telling his confidential friend—"You must go to the Government, and say to the Government—'If you wish not to have my statement made you must make this settlement with me?'" Of course, they knew that the Government had entered into one portion of the compact, because French would never suffer one hour of penal servitude, or pick one ounce of oakum, if they could help it. Mr. French would get off, and, of course, they would not know what had been paid him from a Secret Service fund of £30,000 a-year. How could they tell that Lord Spencer or, some of the officials referred to by French, would not make this bargain with that distinguished official? Was there anything to prevent them? They got himself and Cornwall off the felony charge. They knew that they had got £30,000 of Secret Service money, and was it not very easy to stop their mouths? His (Mr. Healy's) interpretation would be, should he escape on the charge of misdemeanour, if French's memoir was not rapidly issued, that he had got his £20,000 as he asked for it; and he warned the Government that that would be the interpretation put upon it by the people of Ireland. The logic of the thing was plain. French must now be more or less at war with the Government. He declared himself that he would put them out of Ireland, and that he might put some of them in the dock unless he got a pension. They would see whether he would put them out of Ireland. They would see also whether he would make a revelation. If he did not make a revelation, he (Mr. Healy) ventured to say that the people of Ireland would be able to draw their own conclusions. There was a remarkable portion of his letter bearing upon the Maamtrasna case. He said—"The Maamtrasna case will be a pain in the side." This was an expression used by a gentleman who had been getting up cases, and sailed so very close to the wind, who had hanged men in the wrong practically according to his own statement. "Though," he says, "I don't know anything about it; but if Reid's letter came out"—Reid was the gentleman who had charge of the Phoenix Park cases, and who was promoted to be Resident Magistrate—"if Reid's letter came out, it would help to support the Nationalist idea about Maamtrasna." Of course, the Government said no such letter existed; but if French was allowed off, and if he was interviewed, not by a correspondent of United Ireland, but of what was called an impartial journal, and if the correspondent asked him what had induced him to hold his tongue, he (Mr. Healy) ventured to think that a discriminating public would be able to understand the reason if a satisfactory explanation was not forthcoming. French went on to give a list of his doings on behalf of good government in Ireland, and remarked—"Got two letters of recommendation from the Treasury for exertions in political case." The letters, mayhap, were signed "L. Courtney;" and he presumed Mr. French would get them framed and hung up in the most distinguished place in his house, if he escaped from Kilmainham. He added—

"Employed Stephen Noonan for some months, and then discharged him on his handing all my letters to Maurice Healy, solicitor, Cork, who is brother to Tim Healy, M.P., sending him down to watch the proceedings at Mallow election, where the Attorney General and William O'Brien were candidates."

He (Mr. Healy) certainly said that these letters were handed over by Stephen Noonan; but, as he appeared to be a disreputable fellow, of course he would have nothing to say to him. He did not believe a word Noonan was saying, and he believed the letters he gave up were forgeries; but it appeared now that they were genuine, and he was sorry that at the time he did not draw the attention of the House to them. Noonan came to his brother and said that he had letters in corroboration of what he stated, that French wrote to him and told him to get up a conspiracy for the Winter Assizes at Cork in 1882-3, and to get Judge Barry attacked on the way from the Court to the Judge's lodgings. He told him to be sure to get all the Nationalists of Cork into it, and that when Judge Barry was attacked, he (French) would be there with the police, and they would save the Judge; but he added, very pleasantly, that it did not matter much whether Barry was killed or not. Of course, if he were killed, the credit of having found out the assassins would be all the greater for Mr. James Ellis French. He could quite understand his taking that view of the matter. But Stephen Noonan, he supposed, either was not supplied with sufficient money by Mr. James Ellis French, or he found that the Nationalists of Cork would have nothing whatever to do with crimes of violence, although they were continually charged with them in that House. They repudiated him, and, of course, as he could get up no plot, Noonan was no longer of use to Mr. James Ellis French. If he (Mr. Healy) had brought forward the letters at the time he could fancy what would be the splendid indignation of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He would not have much difficulty in anticipating the sort of speech the right hon. Gentleman would make. He would say—"Sir, the hon. Member, on the evidence of a worthless wretch named Noonan, has brought forward the most horrible charges against a most distinguished officer of the Constabulary. I have the honour of the acquaintance of that distinguished officer. He has been in the service of the Crown now going on 33 years. His record during that time has been of the most stainless character. He has been engaged in matters of the first importance by the Crown. The most weighty and the most delicate cases have been intrusted to his hands; and I say this is simply a piece of revenge on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite in their attempt to take away the character of this meritorious official, because he has been successful in coping with disorder, outrage, and murder." He thought that was pretty like it. If he had not given a fair idea of what his speech would be, he regretted that he had sat at the right hon. Gentleman's feet so long in vain. He would pass from that, and show the accurate views Mr. James Ellis French took of English public opinion, and especially of Radical opinion. In giving instructions to his solicitor for his defence he said—

"The attacks made on me by United Ireland of bolting with large sums of money, the hire of informers, spies, and setters, and others, all these, which can be easily proved by John Dawe and other Castle officials, will, to my mind, show strong and powerful motive for a conspiracy, and when proved would be taken up strongly by the respectable Press in the United Kingdom and elsewhere, and would, I believe, create a wonderful reaction in my favour outside the United Kingdom."

Then he said—

"This line of defence would have a wonderful reaction. All the Press would take it up, and I would be a regular hero."

So he would. He would probably be knighted, like Sam Anderson. At any rate, his pension would be doubled, and the Lord Lieutenant would ask him to all his parties at the Castle. The Irish Members were attacked from time to time with having referred to Freemasons. He took Mr. French's view of Freemasons, as given in his letter. The hon. Member for Leitrim (Colonel O'Beirne)—whose testimony he was glad to have, as he was not acting with the Irish Members, but gave the Government a thick-and-thin support in and outside the House—stated last night that Freemasonry in Ireland and Freemasonry in England were two totally different things. He (Mr. Healy) was aware that in Ireland Freemasonry was nothing but an odious secret conspiracy got up by the landlords and their officials for the purpose of oppressing the people, getting themselves out of any trouble whenever they got into it, and collaring all the official swag that they could get hold of. In the concluding sentence of his letter there was a very neat commentary on the Order. It began—"The clerk here, a very nice young fellow, is a Mason." Of course he was. No clerk would be employed at Kilmainham if he were not a Mason. But how did French happen to know that he was a Mason? He continued—"The head porter told me so to-day, who is a Roman Catholic, in his presence," meaning that the Roman Catholic official knew so much about the operation and influences of Freemasonry, that he was not ashamed to tell the filthy prisoner, who was charged with the most abominable offence that could be committed, that the clerk, an official, was a Mason. "And so," he said—"we have a look at each other. I nearly think the clerk wished me to know it. The head porter is a pensioner from the Royal Irish Constabulary." He (Mr. Healy) nearly thought so too. Now, the Government had admirably succeeded. They had twice acquitted Cornwall; they had acquitted Fernandez; they would acquit French of the misdemeanour as well as they did of the felony, or get the jury to disagree and let him off. They had hanged Poff, they had hanged Barrett, they had hanged Francey Hynes, they had hanged Miles Joyce, Joe Poole, Pat Higgins, Tom Higgins, and Patrick Walsh; they had hanged all the other men whom packed juries had sent to their doom. On the one hand, they pursued with unrelenting persistence and used all the forces of the Crown against a peasant; on the other, their own officials, who knew their deadly secrets, and who were charged with the most abominable offences, were allowed to go scot-free. They were asked from time to time—and they were taunted with the fact by virtuous Liberals—why they gave no support to the excellent Government of Lord Spencer. Why should they not, it was asked, when in the Cabinet they had a number of Radicals, such as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, the President of the Local Government Board, and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster? They were told that they were ruled in Ireland by a Viceroy who was one of the most amiable and admirable of men—a man of the greatest attainments, a man of lofty character, of great experience—in fact, a compendium of the virtues. And yet, under this excellent Government of Lord Spencer, this beautiful system of government by archangels, or at least by angels in disguise, those horrible things occurred. On the one hand, the peasant was sent shrieking to his doom, with a cry of agony and a despairing protest of innocence upon his lips; while Government officials, such as French, Cornwall, and Connelan, who were accused of the most abominable offences, might retire to spend their pensions on the Riviera. Look upon that picture and upon this! He asked the people of Ireland, who were judge and jury in this matter, what was to be thought of a Government of this sort? In his opinion, it was a Government of hypocrisy and rottenness, and dead to all principle—a Government which, elected as a Radical Administration, had passed the Coercion Act; which, professing to be Liberal, had kept 1,000 men in prison without trial; a Government whose Head attacked Turkish atrocities in Bulgaria, yet connived at the most oppressive rule in Egypt; a Government which declared that the Press Laws of India were of such a character that no honest man in England or Scotland would venture to reimpose them, and yet which sent Mr. Harrington to a plank bed for six months, and seized his types and machinery, for the fault of an apprentice; a Government which in England talked of "an even keel," but which in Ireland showed its impartiality by acquitting Cornwall and hanging Myles Joyce; a Government composed of men of the highest character, who used tools and instruments of the most loathsome description. Such a Government as this asked for confidence and support from the Irish people; but he asserted that the Irish people would be unworthy of their seven centuries of oppression if they did not continue to offer the most persistent and long-continued resistance.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that a moral assassin had been reinstated to continue to do in the future the work of moral assassination for the Government in Ireland. In listening on the previous evening to the speech of the right hon.

Gentleman who had risen from the dirt of his Irish occupations to the dignity of the Cabinet, he was astonished to hear him say that because the House had passed the Crimes Act they must not inquire into and must not condemn the exercise of these exceptional powers. No one but an Irish official would use such an audacious argument as that. He was surprised at the silence of the Government after the most convincing exposure of the infamous character of the means which they employed for supporting their rule in Ireland. Could there be a more monstrous and horrible spectacle than upon the one side the Administration thrusting into prison the men who had come into their grasp for having adopted desperate means of getting rid of such a Government, whilst upon the other the organs of the Government in that House were excusing and shielding the infamy of their wretched agents in Ireland? Who was it but the Government who enlisted unfortunate youths in Ireland into desperate courses by their employment of persons of such an infamous character as Bolton? He had no doubt whatever that they were entering upon a new era and a new phase of increased agitation, what was known to British law as treasonable agitation, not only in Ireland, but amongst the Irish race throughout the world. The reason was because the Government, represented upon the Bench opposite by the deliveries of Bulgaria and elsewhere, had continued to invent and keep up a system of hypocrisy unsurpassed in any country in the world. He had little hope of anything until the Government which retained such men as Bolton in their service were reconstituted. He was unable to distinguish the guilt of the moral assassin from the guilt of the employer of the moral assassin. He was unable to distinguish the guilt of the responsible Government from the guilt of the responsible majority which supported the Government. Every act of this kind condoned by the House, and supported by the Ministerial majority in that House, was another of those acts which cut at the root of the Upas tree of British Government in Ireland. He did say that the rule of a direct and outspoken tyrant—call him Cromwell if they wished—would be more endurable, would be more respectable, and would appeal more to the moral sense at least of the people, than the rule of the Government of prevarication, suppression of evidence, and maintenance of rotten officials—that Government which excused and gloried in the retention of the very worst instruments of their policy. Supposing the infamous creature Bolton, who suppressed evidence in the Sligo cases, was sent down to represent the Crown in another case, even though under other circumstances there might be popular readiness to believe and accept the guilt of the accused, must it not be the impulse of every man throughout Ireland to expect foul play where George Bolton was employed? He regretted the conduct of the Government, which was hastening the grave and terrible issues which, if persisted in, would drive the Irish race to despair. If they did so, they must expect the rewards of their conduct in a growing spirit of hatred and hostility to English rule. If the Government chose to be represented in Ireland by villains and scoundrels of the Bolton and French type, upon their own heads must be the responsibility. Every American journal which recorded the carefully managed acquittals of the Castle officials, and recorded the reinstatement of others equally odious, would preach in no unintelligible language an appeal that the Irish nation should have recourse to other means than Parliamentary agitation. He believed that further opportunities would be taken for keeping the Ministerial nose at the Irish grindstone; and though he did not expect his view would be fully accepted, he felt that he had done his duty in protesting on this occasion against the policy which this most hypocritical Government was carrying out in Ireland, and he was very sorry that the Irish Party had no immediate means at hand by which it could testify its sense of the conduct of the Government.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON said, he thought it would be an abuse of the Forms of the House to enter upon the general question of trial by jury in Ireland. He could not in any way concur in the attacks which had been made from the Benches opposite on the conduct of Lord Spencer and of his right hon. Friend the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Whatever duties the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary had had to perform had been intrusted to them by that House. He was sure no more high-minded and generous men could have been found for the discharge of their arduous duties. But, at the same time, he heard with dismay the announcement of the present Chief Secretary that the Government intended to reinstate Mr. Bolton. He would not go into the recent proceedings; but there were already facts ascertained in connection with Mr. Bolton which made it highly improper that he should be employed in a position of such delicacy and responsibility in Ireland. Animadversions had been made upon his character by an English Judge which rendered it improper that he should occupy a Government office. The execution of an Act like the Crimes Act, which he had felt it his duty to support in its passage through that House, ought at least to be placed in the hands of men who were absolutely above reproach. Those Members on his side of the House who supported the Government in the passing of that measure could not shirk the responsibility of their individual action; and if the Crimes Act, in the administration of justice in Ireland, was to be maintained in its present form, it must be carried out, he would not say in accordance with popular opinion, for that was of a somewhat unknown quantity, and certainly, in Ireland, of a very shifty character, but, at least, in such a manner as to command respect, and so long as Mr. Bolton held the office of Crown Solicitor, and had the handling of the Crimes Act, fair and impartial people who were by no means in favour of the extreme National views expressed by hon. Members opposite, felt that there was a very serious ground for complaint. He hoped that when the question of Mr. Bolton's salary came on, it would be challenged by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and he believed they would receive a considerable amount of support from Members on his side of the House. He trusted that even at the eleventh hour the Government would discover some way of removing Mr. Bolton from the office of Crown Solicitor.

MR. COMMINS hoped the wise word spoken by the noble Viscount would be the beginning of wiser counsels among those with whom his Lordship usually voted. Nearly every one of the broad facts adduced in support of the Amendment were now admitted. In supporting the Amendment, he did not pledge himself to maintain the accuracy of every statement made by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), but there were certain broad facts which nobody seemed to dispute. In face of the facts relating to the Maamtrasna and the other trials, it would be futile to deny that juries had been systematically packed by omission on the one side and by commission on the other. The jury-packing system took away all confidence in the administration of law in Ireland. For years and years it had been regularly brought before the House, and it was a significant fact that none of the speakers who defended the Government attempted to deny for one moment that the practice prevailed. The arguments of the Solicitor General were in reality the strongest condemnation of their policy, for if, as he asserted, the Catholics were incapable of doing a prisoner an injustice, how came it that the Government ordered them from time to time to stand down? It had been admitted that 11 members of a jury of 12 selected to try a Freemason were themselves Freemasons. The hon. and learned Gentleman thought it was a remarkable thing to suggest that a jury of Freemasons would try a Freemason as impartially as an ordinary jury, and he was surprised that a gentleman of his experience and abilities should have made such an assertion. He was no Freemason; but the fact was, it was an open secret that Freemasons were a body sworn to defend and support one another, and that, therefore, a Freemason would stand a far better chance when tried by his brethren than when tried by an ordinary jury. The information on which a large number of the "suspects" were committed to prison was derived from French, and, therefore, according to the admission of the late Chief Secretary, it came from a foul and corrupted source. He was afraid that the latest reappointment of the Government hardly gave very much earnest of their intention to change the existing system. He denied that there had been any necessity for the exercise of the power conferred by the Prevention of Crime Act of changing the venue and striking special juries. Why had not the Government used the other machinery which was at their disposal, and tried some cases before three Judges? Personally, he should prefer three Judges—with Mr. Justice Lawson and Mr. Justice O'Brien among them—to a special jury manipulated by the Government's agents. He hoped the House would clearly understand that the Irish Members had no sympathy whatever with genuine crime, but they did sincerely sympathize with the poor who were oppressed by infamously unjust criminal charges.

MR. W. J. CORBET said, the law as administered in Ireland was used against the people and in favour of those who took sides against them. The charge was a sweeping one, but it was supported by the unanimous voice of the people of Ireland, who were naturally indignant at the system of jury-packing by which Roman Catholics were ordered to stand aside. In proof of this he would remind the House that the late Chief Secretary, in refusing to produce a Memorial sent to him on this subject from the town of Wicklow, said that it "belongs to a class of communications of which they receive many hundreds in the year."

MR. O'KELLY thought that any impartial person who had listened to the course of this debate must come to the conclusion that the Government had no good defence to offer. He congratulated the noble Viscount (Viscount Lymington), who was the only man on the other side of the House whose conscience had been touched to the extent that he protested at least against the reappointment of Mr. Bolton. He thought that reappointment, in view of the evidence lately produced against his character in that House, was the strongest condemnation that could be offered of the character of the Government and of their methods of carrying out the law in Ireland. The defence made of jury-packing seemed to him at once shifty and hypocritical. In the trials of Cornwall and French, the Government took care that there were in the box 11 men who were open to the suspicion of sympathizing with the prisoners. That was called "fair" trial. Suppose Mr. French or Mr. Cornwall had been Fenians or Ribbonmen, would that House have selected 11 Fenians to try them? If not, how then could the Government claim to have done substantial justice in choosing men to try French and Cornwall, who, he would not say sympathized with the crimes for which they were charged, but were, from their social and political relations with the prisoners before the bar, open to the gravest suspicion of having that sympathy which would try to shield the men from punishment, because they felt that any punishment inflicted on those men would involve a loss of indignity and ascendancy to the class which they all represented. The juries were packed with Protestants, and, therefore, anti-Nationalists, and these men were set to try prisoners belonging to a different religion and to a different class—a class they regarded with feelings of hostility. But this was not all; in agrarian and political cases the Crown Solicitors, not content with striking a panel on which nearly all the jurors were Protestants, sifted this list still further, and ordered all Catholics and Liberal Protestants to stand aside. When people saw this contrast in the administration of justice, could it be wondered at that they were obliged to call constantly the attention of the people of England to the subject? This system of jury-packing was one of the most infamous signs and accompaniments of the Government in Ireland. It was one of the attendant consequences of the English Government, which made it most determinedly hated by the Irish race everywhere. It was one of the things the Irish people could never forgive England for. The masses of the people of Ireland were Catholic, and they were reminded every day when they went into court that they were foreigners in their own land. They had the old Penal Code thrown in their faces every day when the Crown counsel told them to stand aside in their own country, and refused to permit them to go into the jury-box to try cases on the virtue of their oaths. The Government played in the Courts of Justice with loaded dice; they selected an Orange jury to convict their enemies or acquit their friends. In the opinion of the people of Ireland many of the death sentences inflicted had been little better than assassination by law, and that opinion he himself shared. As long as the system under which they went to trial continued, the carrying on of English law would always be open to the grave suspicion that they were juggling with justice. This was a very serious charge; but it was one, he thought, that no honourable man who would impartially examine the evidence which had been brought before the House would even affect to disbelieve. This House by its majority might support the Government in the course which it had been pursuing. All he had to say was, so much the worse for this House and so much the worse for this Government. Their large majorities would not settle this question; and if the Irish people could not get justice, they would find a method of making it very uncomfortable for England in the government of her own country and in the government of Ireland. They should certainly protest in the strongest possible way, and bring the opinion of Europe to bear upon it, and the opinion of every honest man to bear upon the system, which was as infamous as any that had existed in any country. Worse even than jury-packing was the organization of crime by the Government. The special Crimes Act constable was a spy of the old Rody the Rover type. With regard to Freemasonry, it was used more or less for political purposes in all countries where it existed, and in Ireland it was notorious that it was synonymous with Orangeism. Another point to which he would refer was the organization of crime by the spies of the Government under the Prevention of Crime Act. Then with regard to the change of venue, which they had been told was necessary in the cases against poor peasants, why had it not been resorted to in the case of French and Cornwall? Why had not their trial been removed out of the influence of the social and political circle with which they were connected? With regard to the case of Mr. George Bolton, there was but one conclusion in the minds of the people of Ireland—that the Government were afraid of Mr. Bolton. They dared not dismiss him. He knew too much about them. He might put some of them in the dock. They had reinstated him in order that he might not be put to the trouble, probably feeling that it might be difficult for some of them to plead. If the Irish Members had the manipulation of the jury to try the Government in the same way that the Government had manipulated the juries to try Irishmen, they could, indeed, make it pretty warm for the Irish Government.

nistration of justice in Ireland had been treated too much from the point of view of two or three isolated cases of crime, instead of being treated generally. With regard to the condition of things in Ireland, it was not true, as hon. Members opposite suggested, that nothing had been done in that country except during the last four years. Gentlemen of the Party sitting on that side of the House had for the last 60 years been struggling to procure relief for the wrongs of Ireland. He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) had been thrown into official connection with Mr. Cornwall; further than that he knew but little of that gentleman. [MR. BIGGAR: Hear, hear!] He knew absolutely nothing of Mr. French, and was unacquainted with Captain Kirwan, though he did know his father, who was a high-minded, honourable gentleman. He had been accused of being a place hunter. ["No, no!"] Well, not, perhaps, within the memory of the hon. Gentleman opposite, who the other day, in the King's County, did him the honour of comparing him to Shakespeare's "Yorick." He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) should have been happy to return him the compliment, and call him "Young Hamlet," were it not that the application of the name might be attributed to his knowledge of the hon. Member's eccentricities. The extreme purism of hon. Gentlemen opposite might condemn him, when he avowed that he concurred in the universal practice of the Irish Law Room in Dublin, to his knowledge for over 30 years past, of hunting out of the country, under the threat of instant prosecution, those few—he was happy to say—atrocious ruffians who were discovered as having committed unnameable offences, thus preserving the purity of Ireland from being offended by acquaintance with abominable practices. The question was, whether Cornwall, French, and other persons who had been mentioned, had received a fair trial? The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) admitted that they had; but the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) attacked the jury-packing system in regard to these trials. Why did not the hon. Member for Sligo pull down the hon. Member for Mallow, and tell him that he had forgotten his mandate when he said the trials had been fair? His idea was that if Ireland was the Ireland of 10 years ago, and if the people were left free to express their opinions, it would be a disgrace to any Government to refuse, on the grounds of either religion or politics, any respectable man duly qualified to act as a juror. [Mr. BIGGAR: Hear, hear!] He believed that in his time—to use a well-known Irish phrase—he had “got more fellows out of the jug” than all the hon. Members of the Irish Party put together. But he did not do it for himself while they did it for a bit of business.

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Baronet that he is not dealing with the administration of the Criminal Law in Ireland.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he submitted at once to the Chairman's ruling, and he hoped that hon. Gentlemen opposite would submit as readily when called to Order.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had recently read a book having reference to military tactics and operations, and he found that resort was had, in some cases, when iron, steel, and stone failed, to sandbags. A sandbag was described as solid, impenetrable, or irresponsible; and if he were to describe the present Chief Secretary, he would apply just such a description to him. Member after Member had got up and had arraigned the conduct of the Government, yet no Member of the Government appeared to have a word to say. Last night he was induced to make a statement, certainly not under the impression that they would get no defence from the Government. They would have allowed the debate to close after the unanswerable speech of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), or almost immediately after, if there had been something like an attempt made to meet the case; but that had not been done, and the policy of obstinate silence had been resorted to. He now wished to call the attention of the House to a matter that had come to his knowledge. He heard the President of the Board of Trade speak with considerable bitterness of the attempt made by his foes to injure him as a political opponent; and he (Mr. O'Connor) wished to draw attention to the efforts made against the Members of the Party to which he belonged. One hon. Member received a card with the name of a lady, who, it was stated, was waiting outside the House to see him. He went to her, and found her seated in a carriage, attended by servants and every sign of wealth. The lady requested his hon. Friend to take her to the Strangers' Gallery, and subsequently came again, wrote him letters, invited him to her house, and ultimately made to him a most odious suggestion. That lady turned out to be an agent of the present Ministry. He was very glad that the late Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan) had just come in to hear what he was saying. That lady was a spy, employed by the Ministry of which the Prime Minister was the Head, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland a chief official. That woman was a police spy, employed by the Irish Government to entrap Irish Members. Were these proper tactics for Members of the Government to resort to in dealing with their political opponents? [“Hear hear!”] The House might well be astonished at hearing such a statement made from those Benches; but he challenged the Government to contradict him, or to deny that they had made use of women spies against hon. Members of that House. He was not sure that he ought not to call upon the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair to say whether such conduct on the part of the Ministers of the Crown was compatible with the honour and dignity of Members of that House; and whether it was befitting that the halls and corridors of that House should be infested with women police spies? This lady had employed towards the hon. Member in question all the provocative arts which used to distinguish the latter part of the Reign of Napoleon III., and she had endeavoured to incite him into the commission of odious and detestable crimes. She, however, failed in her object, and those upon whom she was exerting her fascinations fooled her to the top of her bent, and she was allowed to subscribe £15 towards the Dynamite Fund, and that £15 was the money of the English Government. The right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland had reminded hon. Members that, if he was Chief Secretary for Ireland, he was also an English gentleman. Was this the conduct of an English gentleman to allow money to be spent in this manner for the purpose of provoking the worst of criminal offences? He did not propose to go over the ground which had already been gone over by others, but would leave the Ministry to answer that point.

Sir Patrick O'Brien

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that the hon Member who had just sat down had complained that the Members of the Government had not spoken sufficiently in this debate; but it was perfectly obvious that it was only those Members of the Ministry who had actually been engaged in the administration of Ireland who could answer the charges that had been brought against the Irish Executive. Those charges had been fully met by his right hon. Friend the late Chief Secretary for Ireland and by the Solicitor General for Ireland; and it would be worse than useless for other Members of the Ministry to pretend to enter into the details of the Government defence, and to repeat in a weaker form the arguments which had already been laid before the House. The hon. Member also said that when he and his Friends promised last night not to abuse the adjournment of the debate, it was on the assumption that the Government was to speak. He (Sir William Harcourt) derived an entirely different impression from the demand that was made—namely, that the adjournment was in order to allow the principal speakers of the Irish Party an opportunity to reply to the speech of the Solicitor General for Ireland. The hon. Member had called his right hon Friend the new Chief Secretary a stolid sand-bag. [Mr. BIGGAR: Hear, hear!] That was a cheerful way for a man to be received on entering upon a new Office; but he knew of no man less likely than his right hon. Friend to be affected by epithets of that description, or who was more likely to show his quality of a "sand bag" in receiving the barbs of the hon. Member. Was it reasonable, or sensible, that his right hon Friend, who had just entered upon his Department, should be asked to answer to an indictment of the past administration, of which he could only have an imperfect, or, at all events, a second-hand acquaintance? For his own part, he knew just as much on the subject as his right hon. Friend did. Charges had been made against the Government of jury-packing; was it meant by that that the Crown had carried their power of challenge to an unlimited point? [Irish cheers.] Well, he had heard no facts adduced in support of that charge. Even if that were the charge, only those responsible for the administration of Ireland could answer matters of that description. Another thing which surprised him was the charge that Freemasons could not possibly be faithful jurors if the prisoner charged with crime were himself a Freemason. Nothing could be more absurd. He did not, however, intend to go into the details of the indictment which had been brought by the Irish Members. People against whom charges were made must be the best judges of their own defence. The Government had made their defence, and they were satisfied to allow it to remain there. If it were inadequate, hon. Members would profit by it. He had listened with almost thrilling interest to the romantic history given by the hon. Member of a mysterious lady. They were all aware of the literary faculty of the hon. Member; but he did not think the hon. Member had ever displayed it to more advantage than on the present occasion. The picture of the confiding gentleman, who was summoned to go downstairs, and meet a lady outside with every display of wealth, and then with that confidence which "is a stranger to aged bosoms" immediately offered his arm to this unknown fair one, and conducted her to the Strangers' Gallery, was a picture of innocence which he could hardly believe existed, even on the opposite Benches. All he could say was, neither the late Chief Secretary nor himself had ever heard of this mysterious person.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I asked the right hon. Gentleman a Question on the subject last Session.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Gentleman says that he asked me a Question on the matter; but this is the first I have heard of it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I did not ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself, but the late Chief Secretary.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: My right hon. Friend tells me that he seems to have been almost more fortunate than the hon. Member who conducted the lady to the Strangers' Gallery, because my right hon. Friend received £15 anonymously in an envelope.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman will allow me to explain. This lady sent £15 to some gentlemen in Dublin, whom she supposed to be connected with a dynamite conspiracy. Those gentlemen were not going to keep the money, and they therefore remitted it to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, return it, as they supposed, to the fountain head.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he could assure the House that his right hon. Friend never heard anything about the transaction beyond receiving this £15. Did hon. Members opposite really think that his right hon. Friend or anybody else connected with the Irish Government had been engaged in such a transaction? If they did, all he could say was that hon. Members would believe anything. It was rather too much to be called upon to disavow such a transaction; but, if necessary, it was disavowed. They had listened patiently to what had fallen from hon. Members below the Gangway—to the charges which they had preferred—sometimes in rather strong language—against the Government; and having made their defence through the mouths of their Colleagues, who were responsible for the Government of Ireland, they were prepared to stand by it before the country.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he was a little surprised to hear from the Home Secretary that the Government had now closed their Irish case. The whole of the Irish policy of the Government was now submitted to the House, and he did not know that the Irish Members had any reason to be displeased at the announcement. They understood now that Ministers had nothing to say in defence of the reappointment of Mr. George Bolton. The Government had not said one single word in vindication of their policy in reappointing that man—a man who had been branded by an English Judge in language sufficient to drive him out of the society of decent individuals. They had made no reply to many of the charges brought against them by the Irish Members, and they had not cleared up several points in French's letter. That document reminded him of a passage in Romeo and Juliet—

"The letter was not nice, but full of charge,
Of dear import; and the neglecting it May do much danger."

This letter was not nice, and was full of charge and of deep import to Her Majesty's Government.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY, resuming, said, that an entirely novel statement had been made in the course of the debate, of which he thought some notice should have been taken by the Government. Mr. French stated in his letter that he had employed a man named Stephen Noonan, and then discharged him because of his handing all his letters to Mr. Maurice Healy, a brother of Mr. T. Healy, M.P. That did not seem in itself a very important matter; but a new light was thrown on it by the hon. Member for Monaghan, who said that at the time referred to certain letters were shown to him by a person named Noonan as written by French, but that they disclosed so abominable a plot that he did not think French could have written them, and believing Noonan to be a man of infamous character, he thought them beneath contempt, and did not call attention to them even by a Question in that House. Now, however, that French acknowledged the letters, the case was different. The hon. Member for Monaghan stated that the letters contained proposals to get up a sham plot for the assassination of one of the Irish Judges, and during the attempt French's emissaries were to come forward and make an heroic rescue of the Judge. The letter said something to the effect that if in the course of the attempt Mr. Justice Barry got shot, it would not matter in the least. Had the Government nothing to say with regard to that? Did they consider it a matter of such insignificance that they would not put up some of their number to state whether they believed the story or not? He supposed that the Government would say that their views with regard to certain Castle officials were not in the least affected, notwithstanding those letters. The Home Secretary thought that he had disposed of another statement with regard to the employment of a lady stated to have exercised a subtle influence over certain Members of that House. As a professional romancist, he was, perhaps, more familiar with stories of that sort than many other Members; but they all knew that the employment of female spies was at one time common in Ireland. At all events, the story was believed by a great many intelligent Members of that House, who said that they had the best reasons for believing it. He was quite convinced that the Home Secretary never had anything to do with such a plot. He did not suppose that any man in high Office had anything to do with such things; they were always left to the lower class of officials. But now that the charge had been brought forward, he would not have been surprised if the new Chief Secretary had said that he would make inquiry, and that if such things were going on, he was not the man to endure their continuance. Such a declaration would have tended to smooth the serious task now before the right hon. Gentleman. The Home Secretary had asked—Was not the Crown to exercise its right of challenge? That would depend on the conditions of the case. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said—"If you do not like the law, you must get it changed." He would like to know how Irish Members in that House were to get the law changed? The right hon. Gentleman knew that there were certain privileges given to the Crown on condition that it did not abuse them; but if in every case, agrarian or political, Roman Catholics were to be excluded, that was jury-packing of as disgraceful a sort as if it had been done under Jeffreys or Scroggs. Then as to the charge with respect to Freemasons. There was no question of politics being joined with Freemasonry in England; but in Ireland it was different. One of the supporters of the Ministry—he might say one of its most servile supporters—the hon. and gallant Member for Leitrim (Colonel O'Beirne), told the House from his own experience that Freemasonry in Ireland was regarded everywhere as mixed up with politics, and as opposed to the doctrines of the Catholic Church. When, therefore, a Freemason was to be tried in Ireland, to manipulate the Jury List so as to give him a jury of Freemasons, was jury-packing of the worst order known to them. Then, as to another point, he never before heard that it was anything extraordinary to ask a Minister newly come into power for some general expression of his policy. When the late Chief Secretary came into Office, he was subjected to something that in the Border Burghs would be called "a heckling;" and he remembered warning the right hon. Gentleman not to be led away by the counsels or practices of his more experienced Predecessor.

He would like now to warn the new Chief Secretary not to be led away by the policy of those who had gone before him. His great anxiety was that this debate should be kept up to allow the right hon. Gentleman a chance of speaking, in the vain hope that he might show some disposition to deal with Irishmen more fairly—he was going to say more honestly—than some of those who had gone before him; but the right hon. Gentleman's only place in that debate was to act the part of a mute at the funeral of his Predecessor's career.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR rose to Order. The only Members of the Government present were the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. Evelyn Ashley and Mr. J. K. Cross), and therefore he would draw attention to the fact that there were not 40 Members present.

House counted, and, 40 Members being found present,

MR. JOHN REDMOND contended that the charges which the Irish Members had brought against the Government had not been met by the speech of the Home Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman denounced them because, in his opinion, they dealt in their speeches with vague generalities; but the fact remained that the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy) that evening had given specific cases. As to the Freemasons, he would never have objected to their presence on the juries if the Government had not been the first to attach a stigma to a particular class in Ireland. With regard to jury-packing, he wished to point out that, although a prisoner had a right to make 20 challenges, the right to challenge on the part of the Crown was unlimited. The Government, therefore, had the power of packing juries, and that power was exercised by men like Mr. Bolton. Reference had been made to a female detective, and he quite believed that the Home Secretary and the late Chief Secretary for Ireland had no knowledge of the woman. These things were done by underlings in Ireland; and he appealed to the Chief Secretary to make a searching inquiry into the employment of this spy, and to announce to the House the result of his inquiries. That was a very moderate demand; but the right hon. Gentleman would not venture to reply before consulting his masters at Dublin Castle. Doubtless the right hon. Gentleman had brought an open mind to the consideration of Irish affairs; but, unfortunately, he would only go to the permanent officials, and not to the Representatives of the Irish people, for instruction. The debate was a popular protest against the reappointment of Mr. George Bolton, who was one of the most characteristic instruments of the law in Ireland under which the people groaned. He assured the Government that their action in the administration of justice in Ireland, and their reappointment of the one man who was the embodiment to the Irish people of everything unfair, underhand, and infamous in the system of rule, could have no other effect but that of multiplying the difficulties of the new Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. The first to denounce Mr. Bolton was an English Judge, who designated him a swindler and a scoundrel, and reported him to the Irish Lord Chancellor. Therefore, it was not true to say that the Irish Members denounced him for doing his duty. His conduct in the discharge of his duty in Ireland had been infamous. In the Boyd murder case he took three girls to Dublin and lodged them in an informer's den. In vain did Members of the House urge their release, which was effected only by legal process, when it came out what means he had resorted to in order to extort evidence from them. The Home Secretary openly admitted that his information on Irish affairs was imperfect and second-hand, and the general body of the English and Scotch Members did not trouble themselves to do more than vote the way the Chief Secretary told them. On one occasion an English Member of Parliament was convinced by himself that the Irish Party were in the right, and that English Member promised to vote with them and against the Government; but, to his astonishment, he saw that Member, in spite of his pledge, vote with the Government. This was an illustration of the difficulties of Irish Members in obtaining fair and independent judgment from Members who rushed into the House, on the ringing of the Division Bell, in order to support their Party, without reference to the merits of the grievance which had been brought forward. The government of Ireland by Parliament was based upon culpable ignorance and mistaken Party loyalty, under which hon. Members evaded their responsibility. The conduct of the scandal trials in Dublin had led to a strong public opinion that justice was not done. The ringleaders were allowed to escape; but their moral guilt was unquestioned. The verdict of the jury in the Cornwall case—that the Government had not brought forward sufficient evidence, was alone enough to cause the gravest dissatisfaction in the minds of the Irish people.

Mr. WARTON said, that he had spoken last night in favour of the prolongation of the debate, because he was of opinion that complaints of that character ought to have a patient hearing, and that Ministers ought to be present while they were being made. Moreover, though Ministers complained of the undue extension of debate on the Address, that extension was mainly due to their persistence in avoiding discussions on the questions so raised on every other occasion. He regretted, however, to note a certain want of generosity in the references made by a certain section of the House to the new Chief Secretary. That Gentleman had, in the Office he previously filled, displayed the utmost courtesy in answering Questions; he had been up to his business; had stated his facts carefully and impartially, and had never tried to hide or conceal anything. That being so, he thought they ought to trust him for the future, and not make attacks on him immediately he assumed a position of considerable difficulty and trial. But it would have been more graceful on the part of the Government if the announcement of Mr. Bolton's reappointment had been left to some other Member of the Government, or had been made by the Prime Minister himself. It was scarcely kind to leave the odium of that announcement to the newly-appointed Minister. He wished also to protest against the constant calculations made with respect to the constitution of juries. It was fallacious reasoning to argue that the composition of the jury panel in the matter of religious belief should exactly correspond with the proportion existing between the Catholic and the Protestant populations. He was sure that, when once the jury was constituted, every member of it did his duty without regard to the religious convictions of his colleagues. Such considerations should, in all cases, be studiously ignored.

MR. CALLAN, referring to the denial by the Home Secretary of jury-packing in Ireland, said, that he distinctly remembered several cases in which there was an obvious resort to the practice. Two of those cases occurred at the April Assize at Dublin. One was at the trial of an Orangeman for the murder of a Catholic in County Cavan, in which not a single Protestant was ordered to stand by, and the jury, composed exclusively of Protestants, acquitted the prisoner. In the other, which was a trial for conspiracy to murder, heard by the same Judge, and coming before the same Commission, including a magistrate, 32 Catholics were ordered to stand by, and not a single Protestant; and the jury contained only three Catholics, although the prisoners were Catholics. He had seen the jury panels of Dublin manipulated by the Whig Government officials for 20 years, and the feeling among the Catholic population in Ireland was that trial by jury under the present system was, to use the words of Lord Denman in reference to the trial of O'Connell, "a mockery, a delusion, and a snare."

MR. PARNELL: Some considerable disinclination was evinced last night to give us permission to carry on this debate during a portion of another evening, and it was suggested that affairs of weighty importance were for consideration, of greater importance than those which we had to discuss to-night. Well, of course, that may be altogether a matter of opinion; but my own opinion is very clear and defined on this question, and it is, that the right of the Irish peasant to live in his own land, free from the constant dread of penal proceedings, of imprisonment, of penal servitude, nay, even of death itself, as the result of the hired testimony of informers, as the result of that judicial system which you have erected into law by the Act of 1882, under which you have established a system—a so-called system—of trial by jury, and of secret examinations, and of public and private terrorism such as has never been equalled, I believe, in any country for its infamy—I say I consider that the right of the Irish peasant to live free from this constant terror and constant dread is a more important and a higher one to him and to us than that pretended extension of a sham Constitutional right to a section of the people of Ireland. Certain charges have been made in this discussion, and on the present occasion the Government have not pursued the course which they adopted on the Maamtrasna Amendment. They then felt the force of what was said so much that they took the case out of the hands of the ordinary defenders of the proceedings of the Irish Executive. It was felt that the matter could not be allowed to go to a vote while it rested solely on the defence of the Solicitor General for Ireland and the late Chief Secretary, and accordingly we had, in addition, the advantage of hearing the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary, the Attorney General for England, and, I believe, another Cabinet Minister, all of whom devoted their enormous power and influence with the House to secure that the Irish Executive should not be condemned as a consequence of the Amendment on the Maamtrasna question. On the present occasion, however, the Irish Government have sought refuge almost in silence, and we have had to contend with that great difficulty in all debates where, trusting to the insurmountable prejudice which seems to exist on every Irish subject, the Government leaves the Irish Members to carry on the debate, and have, practically speaking, made no defence against the very serious accusations which have been adduced. That may be a very satisfactory result to the Government, but it certainly is not satisfactory to the Members from Ireland, and I doubt whether it will be satisfactory to the Irish people. The charge is that juries have been packed in Ireland by the selection almost exclusively of Protestants, who constitute a small minority—one-sixth—of the whole population. I do not think any previous Government have in so barefaced a manner selected Protestant jurors for the trial of cases of a political or semi-political character. It is one of the gravest charges which historians have to make against your dealings with Ireland in times past that you tried persons in Ireland and took away their lives by means of trial by jury—juries selected from the Protestant garrison of Ireland, and your historians do not pretend now to defend that course. On the contrary, in debates on Irish questions it is the habit with English statesmen to turn up their eyes with holy horror at the actions of their Predecessors in times long gone by, and to point to the weighty debt of gratitude which is due to the statesmen of to-day as a recompense for the misdeeds of those who went before them. Yet when fresh from the consideration of the iniquity of their Predecessors they go and do exactly the same things themselves. I believe I speak with historical accuracy when I say that no injustice which ever has been committed in the name of England in Ireland has sunk more deeply in the minds of the Irish people, and has produced worse or more rankling recollections of this period, than the treatment of persons belonging to the Catholic majority of the country, the original inhabitants of the country—if you like, the natives of the country—by members of the Protestant community, whom you sent there some few hundred years ago to act as the garrison of Ireland. Well, that course has been repeated by the present Irish Executive in such a way as I could never have believed to be possible if it had not fallen to my lot to live during the past two years. Trials have been held in Ireland in which, from the constitution of the juries and the proceedings, I am sorry to say, of the Judges in many cases themselves, and the nature of the political excitement of the time, it was absolutely certain that it was utterly impossible that the accused persons could get that fair and impartial trial which your laws and your Constitution require for the people of England, and which has never been admitted to the people of Ireland. We have repeatedly brought forward instances of this. It is a matter which cannot be denied that the juries which tried the prisoners who were accused of agrarian crimes during the last two years were almost entirely composed of Protestants, who were placed on a special panel struck under the Coercion Act of 1882. Those special jurors belong to a class almost exclusively Protestant. Unhappily, owing to the long continuance of the Penal Laws, one can in Ireland draw a line between persons above and below a certain valuation, and those above it will be found to be almost all Protestants. That is just the line that the Government have taken, and the special jurors belong to the Protestant landlord class. It has been thought that the Government obtained that power of striking a special panel, in order that they might avoid the obnoxious task of selecting the juries by ordering persons to stand by. But that is by no means so. The jury-packing goes on as much as ever. In several instances, no fewer than 47, and, I think, in one case 49, persons were directed to stand aside out of a panel of 200 taken from this special class; and in every case the Government did not scruple unblushingly to select persons from this panel of 200 whom they might rely upon for a conviction. It may be that the Executive considered at that time that everybody who was brought to trial before these selected juries was guilty, and that no harm would result; but I deny that it is possible for the Irish Executive to think so now. The result of recent disclosures has been to show that many miscarriages of justice have taken place; that there are many persons in penal servitude now who are as innocent as hon. Members sitting opposite of the crimes of which they were accused; and that more than one unfortunate person has been hurried into the presence of his Maker by the cruel death of the gallows for the commission of no crime whatever. That indicates the terrible danger of reversing the judicial principle that it is better that 99 guilty persons should escape than that one innocent man should be convicted. The Government have reversed that, and they cannot deny it. They cannot deny that among some of their subordinate crime-hunters in Ireland, the wish does not exist that somebody should be executed as soon as possible after the manufacture of the new-fangled Coercion Act two years ago, even if guilt was not proved. The risk and peril to many persons in Ireland is very great, owing to the fact that by the operation of the law, and by the course pursued often by the Executive officers of the Crown in Ireland, juries are empannelled for the purpose of trying persons accused of crimes arising out of the late semi-political and semi-agrarian movement, juries chosen entirely from the class which suffered in pocket by the movement—suffered not only in pocket, but in prestige—and who bring with them into the jury-box bitter animosities against the rest of the Irish people, chosen from a class which never wished well to the Irish people. They will admit it to you. They will say it is a great mistake that Ireland should be peopled by any other persons than those of their own persuasion; that it is better fitted for the rearing of sheep and bullocks than for rearing men and women. Now, I say, without hesitation, that if I were accused of a crime of which I was innocent, I would very much prefer to be tried by a tribunal of three Judges, which the Prevention of Crime Act authorizes the Government to institute, than by the excited partizans who would be herded into the jury-box for my condemnation. We have now stated what the foundation of our complaint is—that no person accused of crime in Ireland can feel any assurance that they would have anything but the most foul trial by jury in Ireland if they should be brought before the tribunals of the country. We have had very important evidence to bring before the House in support of our contention. We have had the history of Mr. Bolton, who has been restored to his bank-books, as a sop, I suppose, to Earl Spencer. We have had the history of Chief Detective French, whom the late Chief Secretary for Ireland sheltered so long. The trials were conducted in such a way that it was absolutely certain that they could not be convicted. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) admitted as much in his speech last night. Cornwall and French were charged with felony; but if they had been charged with conspiracy, the evidence of seven persons would have been forthcoming against them. What steps, I would like to know, were taken by the Crown to hunt up evidence? Last year we called attention to the conduct of the Government for the way in which they met the Orange riots. Large counter-meetings were summoned for the purpose of opposing and breaking up by violence meetings of Nationalists in the North, and when this was pointed out to the Government they made the plea that they had no power to stop them. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had asked for large forces of military and armed police for the purpose of quelling disorder, and stated that it was necessary to proclaim both meetings. The right of public meeting was, therefore, taken away from the Nationalists of the North. When we asked why the Prevention of Crime Act was not put in force, we were informed that the Act had not been passed for that purpose. Yet finally it was, after repeated representations by us, put in force against the Orangemen, and their opposition immediately melted away. Ever since meetings have been held free and unmolested. In the conspiracy in Dublin it was perfectly obvious that they had a much higher reason for putting the Act in force; but, again, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster stated that the Act had not been framed for that purpose. Why was it that the resources of the Prevention of Crime Act were not put in force for the purpose of stemming the conspiracy, the ramifications of which had acted like a cancer—I will not say upon the people of Dublin, for it has not affected them much, but upon certain officials in Dublin Castle? We have never heard of its being employed for the production of evidence in that conspiracy; on the contrary, it was left to my hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) at vast expense and almost ruin to himself, to save himself from an action which the Government had hounded on Mr. Cornwall to take. It was left to my hon. Friend to discover all the evidence that has been used against Cornwall and French. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Act of Edward III., under which he imprisoned the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Healy), was passed for that purpose? In the days of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), the Prevention of Crime Act was used against ladies on account of their political acts. I am not, however, going back to that time; I am now only referring to the misdeeds of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; and I will ask him whether he recollects certain proceedings that were instituted, not against the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Harrington) himself, but against his printing press, against his means of living? There is a section in the Prevention of Crime Act that empowers the Government to seize implements which it may be suspected are to be used for illegal purposes; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, in defending that Act in this House, explained that that meant machinery for murder—daggers, revolvers, and so forth. But it was under this section that the printing press of the hon. Member for Westmeath was seized. Did Parliament have any idea when it passed the Act that this section was going to be used for the purpose of allowing the Irish Executive to steal other people's printing presses? That disposes of the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that he was unable to use the Prevention of Crime Act in the detection of a conspiracy that has sapped the foundations of a considerable section of Castle society, because it was not passed for the purpose of dealing with such an offence. In following out the contention which we have been endeavouring to establish—namely, that persons in Ireland are in danger of their lives owing to the infamous system that has been pursued, at all events by the underlings who are charged with the detection of crime—I wish to call the attention of the House to a letter from French, that has recently come to light. In that letter he threatened the Irish Government that—“If they did not come to terms with him he would make them very uncomfortable. He would expose them as much as he possibly could. If he got a pension he must get £5,000 at least expenses for anxiety of mind. If they did not he would get the Government put out, and perhaps some of their Members put in the dock. Fitzgerald was there, and would be tried at the Commission, and he would see what evidence would come out. If the Maamtrasna case and Reid's letter came out, it would be serious for the Government.”

Well, we asked for Reid's letter, and were first of all told that it did not exist, and again that it had no reference to the case. I should be very glad if Reid's letter could be placed upon the Table, and it will form another portion of the suppressed evidence. As well as the allusion to the Maamtrasna case there is an allusion to a man of the name of M'Dermott. That allusion requires some explanation, which I am now able to give. M'Dermott was a secret agent of the police in Ireland employed by French. He had come over from America to get up a dynamite conspiracy among a few misguided men in Cork, and he had taught them to manufacture a sort of sawdust powder, the composition of which is best known to the Home Secretary. When this dynamite had been manufactured it was packed in a box and sent over to Liverpool by two young men. On the arrival of these two men, Fitzgerald had had men ready for them; they were arrested, and after being tried were sentenced to penal servitude for life, while M'Dermott was tried and acquitted in the same way as Cornwall. The Irish Members have evidence of that, and they believe that this man M'Dermott is at present in the keeping and pay of the authorities. It is known that in carrying out this Government concocted plot, French actually threatened seven persons in Court with assassination because they refused to have anything to do with him, and he was only saved from being handed over to the police at the time because he was discovered to be an agent of the Government. That will explain the allusion in the letter to M'Dermott. He says—“There is M'Dermott and many others,” showing that this hellish work has been going on in the cases of many people. Not satisfied with the unexampled facility which the Prevention of Crime Act gave you for the detection of Crime, you set secret agents to work to manufacture and to get up other crime. He alludes to Connell, the informer, who he says had a revolver to shoot him once. Connell, the informer, was a notorious murderer in the county of Cork, whose evidence was accepted by the Government against persons whom they charged with very much lesser offences than murder; and upon that evidence they were convicted, although the Government knew at the time that he had been guilty of the brutal murder of a young man named Leary. He got up, he says, all the Royal Irish Constabulary for the State Trials. He had 200 policemen from different parts of the country as witnesses against my Friends and myself; but, fortunately, the Government did not possess the Prevention of Crime Act in those days, and they were unable to convict us—

“I employed (he says) Stephen Noonan for some months, and then discharged him, as he was handing all my letters to Maurice Healy, brother of Tim Healy, M.P. I sent him to watch the proceedings at the Mallow election.”

Nothing was too high for this Detective Director of the Royal Irish Constabulary, so he has a shy at politics occasionally—I suppose for diversion. We know, Sir, more about Stephen Noonan. We have letters in our possession from French to

Noonan, and from French's orderly, "John;" and Noonan asserted to us long ago, before French's letter, that he was employed by French to get up outrages in the county and city of Cork, and to endeavour to implicate leading Nationalists of Cork, and that he received money for this purpose. The letters mention remittances of money. He specifies one particular outrage and plot which he was engaged in, and the men whom it was intended to implicate. Noonan attempted to get up during the Commission at Cork an attack upon Judge Barry, for the purpose of assassinating that eminent and clear-minded Judge. His directions were that he was to endeavour to implicate Mr. John O'Connor, of Cork. The attempt, of course, was to be an abortive one; but it would have had its result. John O'Connor, of Cork, is known as one of my prominent supporters, and the prospect of implicating such a person was very present to the mind of Detective Director French. Of course, all these things are to be hidden. No inquiry would be given in the Maamtrasna case. Will you give us an inquiry into this case? Noonan is in Ireland. His evidence is to be had. Now, I have a word to say to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. That right hon. Gentleman I consider to have a heavier responsibility to bear than ever had his Predecessor. The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) went to Ireland at a most difficult time. He was not provided with a Prevention of Crime Act for the purpose of stemming the semi-revolutionary movement which was going on in that country at the time. He had a real movement to contend with; and it is not to the discredit of that right hon. Gentleman, as a man of ability, and as a statesman, that that movement swept him off his legs. But the position of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was entirely different. He went to Ireland when that movement was practically over, when as the result of the passing of the Land Act the natural reaction had set in after a lengthened period of excitement and exertion, and with the provisions of a Prevention of Crime Act, his path and his task were very easy. Well, I say that this blame is to be attributed to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, from the English point of view, not from our point of view—that instead of using the Prevention of Crime Act in such a way as to insure that at its termination at the end of three years it might be possible for the English Government in Ireland to resume the government of the country under the Constitution, he used it in such a way—and continued to use it, and it is being used to this day—as to insure and make it absolutely necessary that you should renew that Act, and indefinitely postpone the time when it will be possible to govern Ireland by Constitutional means. That is my charge against the right hon. Gentleman. I do not know whether he or Earl Spencer were tempted by the desire to pose as great men—that they wished to impress onlookers with the notion that they had to contend with a great crisis. That was the impression they spread by their public utterances, and by the way in which the exceptional powers placed at their disposal by this House were used. I took very great risk, personal and otherwise, for the purpose of preventing the passing of the Coercion Act of 1882. There is a section of men in Ireland who think that the more coercion Ireland gets the better. That was the opinion of the late John Mitchel, a man whose name is revered by the Irish people, whatever part of the world they may be found in, as a pure and single-hearted man, who honestly desired the advantage of his country, and sacrificed his prospects, his liberty, and we must also think his life, to attain that end. The action of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was the very thing to meet the views of men who think like the late John Mitchel. However, I did not think at that time it would have been for the advantage of either England or Ireland that that Coercion Act should be passed. It was passed; but even then it might have been possible for the Irish Executive to have used it in such a way as to have rendered its subsequent enactment unnecessary; but that does not appear to have been their wish. Of course, such powers are very tempting to retain; but I do not pretend to guess motives. I can only deal with the facts as they stand; and I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he does not think now he would be a greater man in his own estimation, and in the estimation of history, if, instead of being compelled to lay down his Office before two-thirds of that Act had expired, he had been in a position at the end of that Coercion Act to come to the House and say—"I have governed Ireland so that coercive legislation is no longer necessary?" But from the peeps we have been able to make behind the curtain, that is not the view of the right hon. Gentleman, or of Earl Spencer; and we are threatened with the prospect of the re-enactment of the Act of 1882, in all its barbarity and severity. I do not pretend to say that we have formed any opinion yet as to how we are to meet this position. It is a very serious position for Ireland, undoubtedly; and I think, Sir, in all probability the result will show that it will be a still more serious position for this country. Can you say you have succeeded in your mission in Ireland, so long as from your point of view such an enactment is necessary in order to save yourselves from being driven into the sea? You have now governed Ireland for the space of 84 years, under the United Parliament, and can you honestly say that you are any nearer the end than you were at the beginning? Is there any greater recorded failure in history? You are much cleverer, of course, than Irishmen are. You have a greater capacity for government. Therefore, you must govern the Irish, because they are not able to govern themselves. But I say—and I think the vast majority of the Irish people will say with me—that if, after seven centuries, you have failed in the first elements of government; if your greatest statesmen sent to Ireland, one after another, come back and hold out no hope for that country, except a continuance of these stern and drastic measures, I say, in the words of Wendell Phillips—

"For seven centuries you have failed in your task of governing Ireland—you had better give it up."

The House divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 140; Majority 106.—(Div. List, No. 5.)

Main Question again proposed.

AMENDMENT (MR. GORST)—SOUTH AFRICA—BECHUANALAND.

MR. GORST, in rising to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice, said: Sir, I wish I could feel quite certain that I should not incur the Prime Minister's displeasure in bringing forward this subject on the present occasion. I know that it would be useless to plead the importance of the question, because the Prime Minister would probably say that the importance of the subject is no excuse for bringing it forward in the form of an Amendment to the Address. But my real excuse, in asking the attention of the House to the question to-night, is not only that the question is important, but that it is extremely urgent. I hope I shall be able to convince the Prime Minister that nothing but a very strong sense of public duty has induced me to brave the accusations which will be made against me of impeding the progress of Public Business by raising a question of this kind. The story to which I have to direct the attention of the House is a very shameful one, but a very short one. It comprises two periods. The first is a period of three months, during which Montsiosa enjoyed the formal protection of the British Government. It began by a visit paid to him by the Commissioner sent to Bechuanaland, and ended with his defeat and entire subjugation by the freebooters of the Transvaal. With reference to this period, the charge made in the Amendment which I am about to propose against the policy of the Government is that they have been guilty of a want of precaution in not taking effectual measures to protect Montsiosa against these freebooters. Of course, that is not an urgent matter. It is important; but it is a matter which may, no doubt, wait. The second period, about which I shall have a story to tell, is a period of two months which have elapsed since the entire subjugation of Montsiosa became known to Her Majesty's Government. The charge in reference to that period is that Her Majesty's Government have delayed declaring to the Government of the Transvaal, and to the marauders who have taken possession of Montsiosa's territory, their intention of using force, if necessary, to turn them out of that territory. That is a matter that is urgent, because every day that elapses without that declaration of intention from Her Majesty's Government not only prolongs the dishonour of this country, but increases the difficulty of any ultimate settlement. These marauders have now been upwards of two months in occupation of Montsioa's territory. They are establishing farms there; they are creating new interests; and in a short time vested rights will have grown up in this country—just as they grew up in Stellaland—which the Government will find it very difficult to interfere with, and the restitution of the territory which has been seized will become impossible. That, I think, is a justification for asking for an immediate declaration, at this moment, of the intentions of the Government. But there is another reason which might be urged in favour of a discussion in this House, and even in favour of passing some Resolution by the House—namely, that if the Envoys of the Transvaal have formed a correct estimate of the Earl of Derby, he is a Nobleman extremely disposed to make himself pleasant to the acting Powers. He has no desire to interfere with their requests; he does not wish to coerce and control them in any way whatever, and they have told their fellow-countrymen that it is only the mischievous results of public opinion in England which prevents this amiable Nobleman from doing everything they desire. If this is to be the case, it might be well to bring the pressure of a little of this wholesome public opinion to bear upon the Earl of Derby, and induce him to prefer the interests and honour of his own country to the desire to make himself agreeable to foreigners. I do not intend to trouble the House with any of the history contained in the Blue Book so recently laid upon the Table of the House, and I shall, therefore, not travel back to the early history of Bechuanaland; but I think it right to remind those Members of the House who are not so familiar with the history of the question that there were debates on the subject of Montsioa's territory running on during the whole of the year 1883. At that time this same Chief was undergoing an attack from freebooters, who issued from the territory of the Transvaal, and who are said to be, and who are believed to be, encouraged by the Transvaal Government. Those debates were never brought to a conclusion. I believe they were adjourned down to the very end of the Session of 1883; but in the course of those debates the Government were compelled, by information which turned up from time to time, to make several admissions of which I wish to remind the House. They were obliged to admit that Her Majesty's Government were under obligations to Montsioa; in consequence of his fidelity to British interests in time of trouble; they were obliged to admit that the Transvaal Government had broken the Convention of 1881; and they were obliged to admit that the British Government was bound to protect Montsioa against the incursions of these Transvaal maulauders. They promised the House of Commons that they would fulfil their obligations, and the particular mode by which they chose to fulfil them was by entering into the Convention of 1884—a Convention made at the beginning of this year with the Government of the Transvaal. In that Convention they stated that their only direct interest, as far as the Convention related to Bechuanaland, was that involved in the protection of Montsioa and Mankoroane, so that the desire of protecting those two Chiefs was the sole motive which had induced the Government to enter into that Convention so far as it related to Bechuanaland; and the Transvaal Government undertook, on their side, strictly to maintain the boundary and to guard against trespasses and irregularities. Now, having said that, I should like to ask the Government whether past experience has induced them to place implicit reliance with any Convention entered into with the Transvaal Government? It seems to me that they were bound to take adequate steps for the protection of these Chiefs, whom they admit they were under obligations to protect, and if they chose to rely exclusively and solely upon a Convention with the Boers, they must be liable to censure if the result of that Convention was not to afford the protection they were bound to give. They had no right to pay their obligations to those two Chiefs by a draft on a Government so bankrupt of all honour and credit as the Transvaal Government. I come now to the story of the result of this effort of Her Majesty's Government to protect Montsioa. He was visited on the 20th of May in the present year by the British Commissioner. There was a formal British Protectorate announced. A Treaty was made, and a cession of jurisdiction from Montsioa was accepted. The country at that date was clear from any freebooters. Montsoia himself had driven them out, and they were living under a man called Gey, at a place called Rooi-Grond, which was within the Transvaal territory. These men were informed by the Commissioner of the establishment of a British Protectorate, and they were warned of the necessity of respecting it. So far well. Perhaps I ought to mention that from that date down to the time when Montsoia was entirely subjugated, he had a British officer living in his place; not only Mr. Bethell, about whose appointment as an English officer there may be some question, but a Deputy Commissioner constantly living with him, and there is the testimony of that British officer that no aggression ever took place on the part of Montsoia, and that he never broke the peace. But hardly was the back of the British Commissioner turned when, on the 13th of June, the people from Rooi-Grond robbed Montsoia's garden and fired on his people. A week later, on the 20th of June, they attacked a reaping party—persons engaged in industrial pursuits. These Natives were attacked by two parties—the one fired upon them outside the Transvaal territory, while the other fired a cannon 100 yards inside the British boundary. They killed a number of these peaceful people, and afterwards rode over the ground despatching the wounded and all those who had concealed themselves. On the 24th of June, the man Gey published a proclamation in The Volksraad, a newspaper issued in Pretoria, in which he declared war against Montsoia, although Montsoia was under British protection, and called for volunteers to enlist at Pretoria, offering them a share of the booty, and inviting their co-operation. On the 25th of June, the day after this proclamation, the freebooters attacked a party about three-quarters of an hour from Montsoia's place—Mafeking—and murdered one of his men. On the 1st of July, about a week later, four waggons were sent out for wood with eight people in charge of them. When they were about a mile distant from Montsoia's place, they were attacked by Rooi-Gronders. Six were killed, some of whom were boys. A little boy of seven had his leg shattered by an explosive bullet. One man only was lucky enough to escape. This story is not told by Native evidence, but it is given on the evidence of the British officer officially appointed. On the 8th of July the Rooi-Gronders seized 60 cattle, and killed 11 men and one woman, who were in charge of the cattle. A little child of eight years, who had got bewildered by the firing, ran from a garden towards the Boers, and was deliberately murdered. This little child under eight years of age was deliberately murdered by these freebooters. On the 17th of July, emboldened by the outrages they had already committed, they attacked Montsoia's place at Mafeking, in force, and attempted to take it, but failed. On the 28th they took 3,000 cattle and 400 sheep; and on the 31st they paraded the cattle in front of Montsoia's place for the purpose of tempting his people to recapture them. They succeeded in their design and killed 100 men—Mr. Bethell, our officer, being among the slain. I will not enter into the question of his murder now, because that subject formed part of the debate last Wednesday, and it is my desire to keep clear of anything that was stated on Wednesday, and to confine myself, as far as possible, to the new information which has now been laid before the House. It must be remembered that I am not giving one-half of the atrocities which are reported in the official Papers. If any hon. Member wishes to see a more complete list of these atrocities than I have given, if he will turn to page 123 of the Papers he will find a list given there by our Assistant Commissioner, who not only gives an account of the atrocities, but the evidence by which they are supported—many of the cases having come under his own personal knowledge. On the 2nd of August the Transvaal Government itself came upon the scene. A most remarkable deputation was sent out. A Mr. Snyman, who called himself, and who was, a Native Commissioner of the Transvaal Republic, and therefore a Government officer, came with six others as a deputation from the South African Republic. He produced a letter signed "Paul Krüger," in which the Commissioners were instructed to do their utmost to stop the fighting. But a certain field cornet named Theumissen, who was with him, as one of the deputation, said he had received verbal instructions from the Transvaal Government to get Montsoia's consent to the annexation of the Baralong territory to the Transvaal. This Mr. Snyman refused to address Montsioa in the presence of the British Commissioner, and the British Commissioner had to go away, leaving Montsioa and Mr. Snyman by themselves. Mr. Snyman then made an address which will remind the House of the address of Rabshakeh, when he was sent by the Assyrian King to stop Hezekiah and the beleaguered subjects of Jerusalem, for he used the same arguments and spoke in the most scornful way of England and the British Government. He said—

"Don't trust England. She has no soldiers, and she will never fight for you against the Transvaal. Paul Kruger has entered into an alliance with 10 European Powers, among whom are France and Germany, by which the independence of the Transvaal is secured, and English interference prevented. Look," said he, "at Mankorane. England promised to extend her protection to him, and the result is that he has nothing now; all his land has been taken from him."

Snyman also said that he had power to withdraw "the Volunteers," as he called the freebooters, and he took an oath to that effect. Montsioa replied that he had always recognized the Transvaal as making war upon him; but he added that since the country had been proclaimed British territory they had been making war not on him alone, but on the British Government, and he could not withdraw his word which he had given to Her Majesty's Government. Perhaps the House may suppose that these people—Snyman and Field Cornet Theumissen—were enthusiasts, who were not acting in the name of the Transvaal Government in this mission of theirs; but what took place was communicated to the Transvaal Government not only by our Resident at Pretoria, but by Sir Hercules Robinson himself, and they did not repudiate Snyman, nor say that he had not acted in their name. It was, therefore, concluded that his mission was genuine, and that he had really been sent to deliver the scoffing message he had delivered to Montsioa. In the meantime, while Snyman was scoffing at Her Majesty, poor Bethell's body was lying unburied in Rooi-Grond, exposed to the indignity of being kicked by the freebooters. Then they sent a flag of truce to ask that men and waggons might be sent to take the body away; and when they were sent they confiscated them, and seized the persons who were sent with them. They next sent a second flag of truce, and Mr. Wright, the Assistant Commissioner, went out to speak to the freebooters himself. Although under a flag of truce, they treacherously made our officer a prisoner, carried him off to Rooi-Grond, threatened to put him in irons, and kept him a prisoner there until he succeeded in making his escape. It may be supposed that when these facts were communicated to the present Government, some regret was expressed; but when the Transvaal Government were made aware that a Queen's officer had been thus treacherously seized under a flag of truce and kept a prisoner in their territory, they did not express a single word of regret for the outrage which had been committed. A despatch from the Secretary of State at Pretoria to the High Commissioner would be found at page 82 of the Blue Book, in which he said—

"Through the hon. Mr. R. Rutherford, temporarily acting as Consular official of England at Pretoria, this Government has been informed that the Volunteers of Rooi-Grond, under cover of a flag of truce, have taken prisoner Mr. Wright, Assistant British Commissioner in Bechuanaland. While taking cognizance of this, I have the honour to acquaint Your Excellency that this Government has no doubt that both the Special Commissioners who have been sent off will know how to adjust this matter also."

They took cognizance of the fact, but simply intimated that their Commissioner, M. Joubert, would, no doubt, adjust the matter with the British Commissioner; but there is not a single word of regret for the atrocious outrage committed on a British Commissioner. Of course, they were promptly informed by our officials of the events which had taken place; and their only remark was that they considered it only possible to put an end to the troubles in Rooi-Grond by going to work in a peaceable manner and not employing force. That was the course taken by a Government which had promised England, in a Convention concluded only a few months before, that it would strictly maintain the boundaries and guard against trespass and irregularity. On the 25th of August, about three months after Montsioa had been received under the protection of the British Government, Mr. Rhodes, our Commissioner, visited Rooi-Grond for the purpose of meeting M. Joubert, who had been sent for by the present Government in order to put a stop to these troubles. It was a very remarkable thing that when Mr. Rhodes wished to go to Rooi-Grond, he found he could not go through British territory, but that he was obliged, by a circuitous route, to make a detour through the Transvaal. The territory under the protection of Her Majesty was absolutely closed to our officer who was acting on behalf of Her Majesty's High Commissioner. The night he arrived at Rooi-Grond, a desperate attempt was made by the freebooters to capture Montsioa's place at Mafeking. Firing was heard going on all night, and Mr. Rhodes was so indignant that he refused to enter into negotiations unless 14 days' armistice were at once entered into. They refused to make an armistice unless Montsioa would sign the terms of a Convention practically surrendering at discretion, and giving up the whole of his territory to the freebooters. Mr. Rhodes accordingly left; and M. Joubert remained behind, to what was called, "mediate," and the result of his mediation was the unconditional surrender of Montsioa to the freebooters. His fortifications were to be broken down in eight days, and he was stripped of the whole of his land with the exception of 10 farms which were left to him. Before that Treaty was made, and while Mr. Rhodes was at Rooi-Grond, he found that he was not able to visit Montsioa or to see him, so beleaguered was he by the freebooters. But Montsioa managed to send a messenger to him—like General Gordon at Khartoum—and that was the last that had been heard of Montsioa. This message expressed to Mr. Rhodes the unswerving fidelity of Montsioa, and warned the Commissioner that although Montsioa was in the hands of his enemies, and might be made to sign Treaties and make declarations, no importance was to be attached to them, because they were wrung from him by superior force. That ends the history of the three months during which Montsioa enjoyed British protection. I think I am not exaggerating, or using language too strong, when I say that a more disgraceful story was never put before a British House of Commons. Just notice the points of the story. First, a formal protection was announced to this unhappy man; this formal protection was immediately followed by most atrocious attacks—most cruel and barbarous atrocities committed on his people—a British officer stationed with him was murdered; another British officer was captured under a flag of truce; and the Transvaal Government gave their open sanction to the proceedings. Perhaps some people may say that I am using language too strong when I say "open sanction." That, however, is not my language, but the Earl of Derby's. In one of his despatches the noble Earl is betrayed into the expression—

The result of our protection, then, is that this unhappy man has been completely subjugated, his land has been seized with the exception of 10 farms, and all his fortifications and means of further resistance are destroyed. I now close the first period and begin the second. What did the British Government do? It was on the 6th of September that the Earl of Derby received a telegram announcing that the Transvaal Government had taken Montsioa under their protection, and that all his rights would be respected. It was not a telegram which dropped upon him like a thunderclap from a clear sky, for, on the 3rd of September, or three days before, he got a telegram from the High Commissioner, Sir Hercules Robinson, giving him a full account of the atrocities I have related to the House—giving a full account of the peaceable conduct of Montsioa since our protection was accorded him, together with a full account of Snyman's mission to scoff at British protection, of its being communicated to the Transvaal Government, and of its not being disavowed by them. All this the Earl of Derby knew on the 3rd of September. I do not know if he ought to have taken immediate steps in the matter or not. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade told the House on Wednesday last that there had been no delay, and the Papers not being then before Parliament, the right hon. Gentleman could not be contradicted. Since then the Papers have been produced, and I should like to hear the President of the Board of Trade venture to tell the House a second time that there has been no delay.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg the hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon, I did not say there had been no delay.

MR. GORST: In that case, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to justify the delay now that the facts of the case are happily known to the House of Commons. Let me ask the House once for all to contrast the pusillanimity and delay of the Colonial Office in Downing Street with the energy and courage of the High Commissioner in Cape Town throughout the whole of these proceedings. On the 8th of September, the Earl of Derby, having got this telegram on the 6th, after two days, sends a telegram to Sir Hercules Robinson, asking for his observations. He gives those observations on the 11th, by informing the Earl of Derby of the result of Mr. Rhodes's visit to Rooi-Grond, and all the remainder of the information I have laid before the House in full. In that telegram on the 11th of September, Sir Hercules Robinson counsels delay pending the arrival of Mr. Rhodes at Cape Town, and I have no doubt that the Earl of Derby most thankfully accepted that advice. But on the 15th of September there was another telegram received from Sir Hercules Robinson, which the Colonial Office has not thought fit to print in these Papers. It is a common practice, I am sorry to say, in the preparation of Government Papers, that the most important documents are frequently left out; but there is secondary evidence of the contents of this telegram, because at page 79 there is printed a despatch from Sir Hercules Robinson, dated September 24; there is no date as to when it was received at Downing Street, but it contains secondary evidence of the missing telegram of the 15th. On the 11th, a telegram was sent from Sir Hercules Robinson, giving a full history of the case and counselling delay. On the 15th, a telegram was sent which is not printed, but the substance of which I am able to give to the House, because Sir Hercules Robinson says in the despatch of the 24th—

"I had the honour, on the 15th, to despatch a telegram to your Lordship."

I should like to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies where the text of that telegram is which is mentioned in the despatch of the 24th? I find a subsequent reference to the telegram on the 17th; perhaps that may be the one. The despatch says—

"At Rooi-Grond, the position is calling for immediate consideration, as the freebooters have invaded the Protectorate, and have taken possession of Montsioa's country, and there is only the choice of turning the freebooters out by force, or abandoning Bechuanaland."

Mr. Rhodes and Captain Bower reported that the Rooi-Grond, and Zululand movements are said to be believed to have been instigated by Transvaal officials. I ought to have mentioned to the House that the reason for delay counselled on the 11th was that Mr. Rhodes and Captain Bower were expected to arrive immediately, and therefore that telegram was despatched. The despatch further states—

"That Mr. Rhodes was of opinion that if it were only known that Her Majesty's Government were determined to maintain the Protectorate by force of arms,"— the old story all over the world—

"it might be possible, even then, to make an arrangement which would clear Montsioa's country without fighting."

Sir Hercules Robinson concluded by saying that if Her Majesty's Government should decide to enforce the Protectorate, he would recommend that Mr. Rhodes should be authorized, on his return to Bechuanaland, to announce that decision, and to avail himself of any opening for a possible settlement. Sir Hercules Robinson said—

"The case was one calling for immediate decision, before the Rooi-Gronders established themselves at their farms."

That was the despatch forming the telegram of the 15th of September. On the 17th, there was another telegram giving the full details of all the attacks made on Montsioa and of Snyman's mission, and adding that the accounts had not been disavowed; and there was a telegram on the same day from the State Secretary of the Transvaal, stating that—

"Being implored by Montsioa, the Transvaal Government had taken him under their protection."

A statement which the Earl of Derby, from information already in his hands, knew to be a deliberate misstatement of the fact. After that, will the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade say anything about excusable delay? We have now reached the 17th of September. On the 21st, the Earl of Derby is still most attentively considering all these telegrams; and he telegraphs to Sir Hercules Robinson to know the extent of the co-operation which would be given by the Cape Colony if active steps were taken. [An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!] Some hon. Member seems to think that that was a very fair telegram. So it was, but it might have been sent with a little less delay. On the 23rd he gets an answer to his telegram stating that no assistance was to be expected from the Cape Colony except in the event of annexation, and referring him to a despatch in which it was stated most distinctly that it was only proposed to recommend the annexation of Bechuanaland to the Cape Colony on certain conditions, one of which was that the British Government should pay every 6d. of expense incurred up to the day of annexation, and from that declaration the Cape Government have never for a single moment swerved; so that on the 28th the Earl of Derby knew very well that the Cape Government would give no pecuniary assistance, and no assistance of any kind to the operation of turning the freebooters out of the Montsias Territory, although, when they were turned out, the Cape Government were perfectly willing to annex the territory. Sir Hercules Robinson became evidently anxious at the delay which the President of the Board of Trade says did no harm, because on the 24th, the next day, he telegraphed again to the Earl of Derby respecting the telegram of the 17th, which is also not printed, and which cannot be the same telegram as that mentioned as of the 11th.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: These despatches take the place of telegrams. When there is a formal despatch it is not the custom to print the telegram, the two being word for word the same.

MR. GORST: This is a despatch, then, confirming the previous telegram?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes.

MR. GORST: Very well. A despatch was sent on the 17th, and would be received on the same day. In the despatch of the 24th, Sir Hercules Robinson points out that the steps taken by the Transvaal Government in placing Montsia under the protection of the Republic, was an open and defiant violation of the Convention. He says—

"I pointed out that this was simply the annexation by the Transvaal of about one-half of the British Protectorate, and was an open and defiant violation of the Convention. It appeared to me clear that the choice of Her Majesty's Government lay between the abandonment of the Protectorate and the Convention, or an announcement that existing engagements would be insisted on, if necessary, by force of arms."

The first telegram arrived on the 6th of September, and on the 17th you find Sir Hercules Robinson laying down, in the most distinct way, that the only choice was between the abandonment of the Protectorate and the immediate announcement that existing engagements would be insisted on, if necessary, by the force of arms; and yet the President of the Board of Trade says there was no unjustifiable delay. The delay did not stop there. The Earl of Derby still sat doing nothing. On the 1st of October, the Transvaal Government became impatient. They reminded him that they had sent telegrams, and they seem to have had some misgiving lest the wicked organs of public opinion might produce some undue effect on the pliant and gentle mind of the Earl of Derby, because they commence their telegram by saying—

"I trust this matter will not succeed in disturbing friendly relations."

Well, the Earl of Derby does nothing; but "justifiable delay" still goes on, and on the 6th of October his officer at the Cape endeavours further to stir him up. Sir Hercules Robinson telegraphs on October 6th, to say that greater delay will greatly increase the difficulties of any settlement, and it was not until the receipt of that telegram that the Earl of Derby took any action at all. On the 7th of October he did take action, and the action he took was to send a telegram to the High Commissioner, not making the heroic announcement which the High Commissioner desired, and which he said was the only alternative to the abandonment of the Protectorate, but saying—

"I informed you by telegraph yesterday that Her Majesty's Government desired you, on receiving the concurrence of your Ministers,"—

To do what? To turn the freebooters out of Montsia's territory? No; but—

"to call upon the Government of the South African Republic to annul the recent acts by which it acquired jurisdiction over the Chief Montsia, as a violation of the Convention of 1884."

So that, after whole months of delay,

being pressed by his officer to come to some decision of some kind, he at last screws himself up, on the 7th of October, to desire the South African Republic to annul its recent acts. But the High Commissioner, on the 11th of October, in informing the Earl of Derby that the Government of the Transvaal had annulled its recent acts, goes on thus—

"Practically, this withdrawal leaves matters unchanged in Montsioa's country, which is in possession of the freebooters calling themselves the Government of Goshen, who are parcelling out the land among themselves. I have asked Ministers what part they will be prepared to take, and as soon as I receive an answer will advise fully as to the measures I consider necessary for expelling marauders."

Sir Hercules Robinson, two days after, on the 13th of October, sent a full and perfect sketch of the measures he considered necessary, and on the same date he informed the Earl of Derby again that the Cape would do nothing except what was indicated in the Memorandum of July 6th, that being the answer they had given on the 23rd of September, and the answer from which they had never swerved. Sir Hercules Robinson does not seem to have had faith in his official superior, because, on the 14th of October, he again telegraphs to the Earl of Derby, and in his last telegram he says—

"I think, the Proclamation having been withdrawn, the Government of the South African Republic should now be informed that Her Majesty's Government are determined to expel the freebooters from Montsioa's country, if necessary by force of arms; and that Her Majesty's Government expect the Government of the South African Republic to carry out in good faith the Convention of 1884."

With that last attempt to stir up the mind of the Earl of Derby the telegraphic correspondence ends, and what further despatches may have passed since the 4th of October we do not know. But we know one thing, and that is, that the Earl of Derby, from the 6th of September down to the present time, has never yet made that announcement which the High Commissioner at the Cape says is the only alternative to the abandonment of our Protectorate of Bechuanaland—an announcement to the Transvaal Government and the freebooters, that the latter will, if necessary, be expelled by force from Montsioa's territory. The Earl of Derby has known all these things. I suppose now, after what has been stated by the President of the Board of Trade, he will defend the course which has been taken, and say that there has been no unnecessary delay; but I should like to hear the argument by which he justifies it. The position of the Transvaal was known to the Earl of Derby on the 6th of September. After more delay up to October 11th, he knew that the Proclamation was withdrawn; but he knew that matters remained just as they were, and he has been pressed three or four times, as I have shown, in telegrams from Sir Hercules Robinson, to make the announcement which would pledge the British Government to the restitution of the land taken by the freebooters, and that announcement he has never yet made. One thing is perfectly clear, and that is, that the views of the Cape Government and the views of the British Government are directly opposed in this matter. The Cape Government have now gone upon a sort of Roving Commission to Rooi-Grond for the purpose of making terms with the freebooters—of settling matters with them as they settled with the freebooters of Stellaland, and of leaving them in the same way to remain in possession of a portion of Montsioa's territory, persuading Montsioa to agree to allow the matter to be patched up in some sort of way or other. The policy of the High Commissioner is to declare to the freebooters and to the whole world that, coûte qui coûte, the British Government will turn these men out of Montsioa's territory, and restore him to his possessions. I have said enough to show the House that this is an important matter and an urgent matter. It is very important and urgent as regards Montsioa. His three months' enjoyment of our protection, and his two months in the hands of his enemies in absolute subjugation to them, must make him, at all events, somewhat impatient at the decision of the dilatory Earl of Derby. But important as this question is in regard to Montsioa, I think it is ten-fold more important as regards our own position in reference to South Africa. The Earl of Derby, before the deputation which waited upon him yesterday, made use of some very brave words; but they were very general words, and did not pledge him to any particular or specific line of policy. But I do not think that our position in South Africa can be maintained now by mere brave words. The incidents which I have described to the House show that our authority and our protection have been scoffed at and trampled upon, not only by the South African Republic, but even by the little Republic of Goshen. Our allies, immediately after our protection has been accorded them, have been slaughtered and subjugated. Our protection has proved utterly futile, and our promises to these Native Chiefs have been ignominiously broken. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think I am justified in asking the House, for the sake of the preservation of the honour and interests of Great Britain, to address Her Majesty in the words of which I have given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To insert in the ninth paragraph, after the words "us," the words "humbly to express our regret that Her Majesty's Government should have assumed a formal protectorate over Bechuanaland without taking effectual precautions to prevent Montsioa from being conquered by freebooters domiciled and organised in the Transvaal under the sanction of its Government:

"And, further, to express our regret that, after Her Majesty's Government had received full information of the forcible appropriation of Montsioa's land by the Rooi-Grond freebooters, delay, greatly increasing the difficulties of any settlement, has been permitted to take place in announcing the intention of Her Majesty's Government to turn out the freebooters, by force if necessary, from the territory under Her Majesty's protection."—(Mr. Gorst.)

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The hon. and learned Member was certainly right in saying that the matter is one which contains important points, and my answer is that Her Majesty's Government have already dealt with all those important points, and that it is not necessary to enter at any length into the other matters referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman. I shall therefore answer the hon. and learned Gentleman very shortly. The first part of the hon. and learned Member's speech was devoted to what he called the first three months of the period over which these Papers extend, and he worked upon the feelings of the House, and no doubt would succeed in working upon the feelings of people outside, by reading a harrowing account of what these freebooters have done during that period. I am not here at this Table to say that those accounts are not harrowing; I am not here to say that the Transvaal Government have done all that they ought to have done; but what I am here to say, and what I do say, is that Her Majesty's Government are not to blame for what has taken place during those three months. The position assumed by Her Majesty's Government was that they, having concluded a Convention with the Transvaal Government, which they had every reason and every right to look upon as a Convention that would be observed, proposed to declare a Protectorate over the territory, and to provide the force necessary for maintaining the police required to keep order in that territory. The position we assumed, with the full consent of this House, related only to matters of police. In conjunction and consultation with Sir Hercules Robinson, we selected Mr. Mackenzie to go out as Deputy Commissioner, and in concert with Sir Hercules Robinson and Mr. Mackenzie, it was settled before they left England what was the force which, in their opinion, was required to maintain order on the border of the territory. Sir Hercules Robinson and Mr. Mackenzie went out to that country armed with full power to raise the force which had been settled as being the necessary force, and Her Majesty's Government have refused no demand made by the High Commissioner for the means of carrying out the arrangement thus entered into. It is, no doubt, quite true, as the hon. and learned Member says, that this force was not ready and fully organized until the end of June or the 1st of July; but Her Majesty's Government were not responsible for that. They could not undertake to order about a police force in local districts thousands of miles away. They left it in the hands of men on the spot, who knew the local requirements, and were acquainted with the local circumstances, to arrange the working of the force. In justice to Sir Hercules Robinson and Mr. Mackenzie, I have laid on the Table of the House to-day a copy of the telegrams with respect to the raising of the Bechuanaland police force, so as to show the difficulties they had to contend with in raising that force. There were difficulties both in regard to horses, accoutrements, and the raising of the men, and this Correspondence had been omitted from the other Papers; but when I saw the question was going to be raised, I thought it was right that the telegrams which had passed between Her Majesty's Government and Mr. Mackenzie should be published, so as to show the difficulties which had to be contended with in getting the force together. Mr. Mackenzie went up to Montsioa's territory, and, as the hon. and learned Member says, up to the time of his arrival comparative peace had existed there. From the moment of his arrival the attacks on Montsioa began, and there was no police force there to protect him. Mr. Mackenzie knows the country far better than we do, and he had complete discretion to go as far as he liked to go, and to proclaim a Protectorate whenever he thought it would be most useful to proclaim that Protectorate. If Mr. Mackenzie thought it better not to wait for the presence of an organized police force, but to proclaim the Protectorate and to go up himself to Montsioa's house without a police force, I am not going to criticize his acts. These are the circumstances which have occurred, and it is very easy to be wise after the event. As far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned, they undertook to provide that force which the Deputy Commissioner and the High Commissioner considered indispensable. Every facility was given by Her Majesty's Government for the raising of the force, and Her Majesty's Government regretted the circumstances that prevented the force from being raised as rapidly as they expected. It appeared that it would take two or three months to organize that force, and if Mr. Mackenzie had stood by, and had delayed proclaiming a Protectorate until the police force was ready, I think the hon. and learned Member would have had much more serious fault to find than he does now. It was then, as the hon. and learned Member says, that the Transvaal Government came upon the scene. The hon. and learned Member has condemned the Colonial Office for having, when it came to the conclusion that force must be used—a forcible demand made upon the Transvaal Government to withdraw their Proclamation—the hon. and learned Member complains that we did not send direct to the freebooters, but sent direct to the Transvaal Government. Was it not natural that Her Majesty's Government should communicate with the Government of the Sovereign State, and not with mere individuals? I have yet to learn that when the Sovereign State comes forward, acting as a State, that we are to pass by an act of a Sovereign Power, and to address ourselves to certain individuals who may be acting under the control of that Sovereign Power. It seems to me that Her Majesty's Government were bound, when they had these facts brought before them, to take immediate notice of them, and to call upon the Transvaal Government to withdraw from the attitude it had assumed. As soon as that Government had withdrawn from the position it assumed, Her Majesty's Government proceeded to announce their intentions in reference to the freebooters. The hon. and learned Member says that Her Majesty's Government have never yet announced their intentions. I am perfectly astonished at that statement. It seems to me that Her Majesty's Government have been doing nothing for the last fortnight or three weeks except announcing their intentions by their acts. They have already announced in this House that Sir Charles Warren is going out as Commissioner, and I have read the telegram announcing that he is going out. Let me take this Blue Book. What is there on page 139? I find there a telegraphic despatch from the Earl of Derby to Sir Hercules Robinson, dated October 18, in which he says—

"I have the honour to acquaint you that I have had before me your despatch of the 17th of September, transmitting a communication from the State Secretary of the South African Republic respecting the action of the State with regard to the marauders in Montsioa's territory. I fail to see in the arguments in this despatch, or in the action taken by the Government of the Republic, anything which can alter the view which Her Majesty's Government have taken, that the Republic should be held responsible for any expenses which may be incurred in expelling and punishing these marauders."

The fact is, that if hon. Members expect to have every Paper laid on the Table the day it is sent away, I can only say that that would be a very novel thing. This Blue Book is really brought up to the 23rd of October. On the 22nd of October the Earl of Derby sent a telegram to Sir Hercules Robinson, the last paragraph of which referred to the telegram from Sir Hercules Robinson to the effect that an intimation should be conveyed to the South African Republic that steps would be taken against the freebooters. The hon. and learned Member has complained that that telegram has not been answered.

Mr. GORST: Upon what date was it received?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: It was received, I think, about the second week in October.

Mr. GORST: On the 17th?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes; I think it was. The reply forwarded on the 22nd states—

"Referring to your telegram, I approve of the suggested communication with the Government of the South African Republic."

That was the instruction sent to Sir Hercules Robinson to communicate to the Transvaal Government. On the 29th of October we telegraphed to Sir Hercules Robinson saying that Sir Charles Warren had been selected as Special Commissioner of Bechuanaland, and giving directions as to what steps should be taken. Therefore, I am at a loss to follow what the hon. and learned Gentleman means by saying that Her Majesty's Government have made no announcement or declaration of their intention to use force if necessary. The hon. and learned Member, when the next Blue Book comes out, which I expect will be very shortly, will see all that we have done; but I can assure him that there has been no delay in sending out information as to the intentions of Her Majesty's Government. With regard to the delay which the hon. and learned Member has mentioned between the first receipt of the news of the action of the Transvaal Government and the final telegram of the 7th of October, in which Her Majesty's Government called upon the South African Republic to withdraw from the position they had assumed, I may shortly say that the question was a very delicate and a very critical one. Her Majesty's Government were making up their minds to a step which might lead to very serious consequences in South Africa, and which required to be very deliberately considered, and, first of all, they were anxious to ascertain from the High Commissioner what the circumstances of the Cape Government were. Considering the gravity of the step which Her Majesty's Government have taken, nobody can fairly say that three or four weeks was a long time to take in the settlement of a matter of this kind. It is now quite clear what steps Her Majesty's Government intend to take. The hon. and learned Gentleman must remember that this is not a Departmental matter, but a matter which must be settled and considered by the Ministry as a Cabinet. I do not think it necessary to detain the House any longer on these questions. As to the first part, we say that we did all we could be expected to do; and as to the second part, we say that there has been no greater delay than was necessary under the gravity of the circumstances.

Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) has, I think, notwithstanding the debate which took place the other day, done good service in calling the attention of the House and the country to the new light thrown upon this question by the Blue Book recently published. I cannot agree with the defence which the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down has made—namely, that a great deal of the speech of my hon. and learned Friend was a matter of past narrative, and that it is easy to be wise after the event. We have heard that before in reference to South African affairs; and although we do not wish to renew the debate of Wednesday last, or to repeat the arguments I and many others addressed to the House in support of the view which has again been presented this evening on fuller information by my hon. and learned Friend, yet I think the opinion of the country, after reading the debate of to-night, in addition to the debate which took place last Wednesday, will be diametrically opposed to that expressed by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government. We do complain, not only on this side, but on all sides of the House, that during the last few months the sufferings of Montsioa have been mainly due to the delay of Her Majesty's Government in making the Protectorate a reality. Her Majesty's Government are absolutely responsible for the failure to make it a reality, because they cannot throw upon Sir Hercules Robinson, or Mr. Mackenzie, the responsibility of the delay in the organization of the police force which the hon. Gentleman has alluded to again this evening. They cannot, by casting the responsibility of this delay upon their subordinates, relieve themselves from the charge of having failed to carry out their own promises to Parliament. My object in addressing the House this evening is rather to call attention to the future than to the past. I do not know whether my hon. and learned Friend intends to divide the House upon his Amendment; but I apprehend that he has proposed it with the idea of calling attention to the subject rather than with any wish to divide. It does seem to me that the Papers contained in the Blue Book last presented justify us in viewing the future in a graver light than before, because they appear to hold out much less hope of a peaceful settlement than that put forward by the Earl of Derby speaking on behalf of the Government. Now, I think my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) very properly remarked that every day which passes makes the settlement of this question more and more difficult. This delay, which is not the delay of one month, as the hon. Gentleman has just stated, but of something like two months, in taking active measures, has already enabled these freebooters practically to possess themselves of the territory of this unfortunate Chief. Every day makes that possession more secure, and gives time for them to be strengthened by the addition of other persons of the same character. Sir Hercules Robinson has stated what in his opinion is necessary for their removal by force—namely, 1,200 troops; but it is highly probable that if there is further delay that force will have to be materially increased. We have not yet received any definite statement from Her Majesty's Government as to the precise measures that are to be taken. I thought just now that the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies was going to tell us. He alluded to a telegram which had been sent on the 29th of October, informing Sir Hercules Robinson of the appointment of Sir Charles Warren as Special Commissioner to Bechuanaland, and giving directions as to what steps should be taken. He did not read that telegram, or we might have been informed what steps were to be taken. So far, the only step before us is that Her Majesty's Government have decided on giving permission to the Cape Government to attempt to settle the matter by peaceful negotiations, and we have seen in the newspapers this morning a statement that two of the most prominent Ministers of the Cape Ministry are about to set out for Bechuanaland in order to make that attempt. What I am anxious to call the attention of the House to particularly is the opinion which has been expressed in these Papers by Sir Hercules Robinson, whose authority everyone will admit, on the probable success or failure of such an attempt as this. First of all, let us remember what the view of Her Majesty's Government is as to the result which should be aimed at. I take it that I shall be justified in saying, from the opinions they have expressed on this matter, that they have made up their minds—first, that those persons among the freebooters who can be found guilty of such crimes as are detailed in the Blue Books shall be duly punished; and, in the second place, that the freebooters shall be removed from the lands they have improperly taken possession of, and Montsioa and his tribe shall be restored in full possession of those lands of which they were in possession at the time the British Protectorate was proclaimed. That, however, is not at all the view of the Cape Ministry, so far as I can judge of their view by this Correspondence, as to what should be effected by these peaceful negotiations. Their idea is the possibility of the annexation of this territory of Bechuanaland to the Cape Colony. I find them, on the 13th of October, proposing that one of them should proceed to Bechuanaland for the purpose of communicating with its inhabitants, and endeavouring to restore order and effect a peaceful settlement without the intervention of armed force. And then, again, on the 17th of October, they say—

"They thought the expulsion of the marauders by force from Montsioa's country would entail great responsibility on Her Majesty's Government, and render annexation difficult, if not impossible."

They further stated their opinion—

"That the consent of the Goshenites is absolutely necessary to render the proposed annexation possible."

How is it likely that those people who are to be removed will consent to their removal from the very territory which they have wrongly appropriated in defiance of Her Majesty's Government? What does Sir Hercules Robinson say upon this point? I think his observations are well worthy the consideration of the House, and that they deserve greater attention than they appear to have received from Her Majesty's Government. Sir Hercules Robinson says—

"It appears to me this (the proposal of the Cape Government) is, in effect, that Her Majesty's Government should suspend all operations and withdraw the Imperial authority from the Protectorate while the Cape Ministers proceed without any responsibility on a tour of inspection and inquiry. I do not think, in the absence of any evidence of force, Ministers would have the slightest chance of effecting an arrangement which, as regards Montsioa's country, would be satisfactory to Her Majesty's Government. The result would be that three valuable months would be lost, the Goshenites would become settled in the possession of Montsioa's country, and the Protectorate would revert to Her Majesty's Government in a worse position than it is at present."

He goes on to say—

"Again, it appears to me necessary for the vindication of British honour and authority that the marauders be removed from the lands which were in possession of Montsioa when he was formally taken under British protection. This, I feel convinced, can now only be effected by force."

Well, Sir, that is the opinion of Sir Hercules Robinson; but, Sir, the Earl of Derby appears to have declined to accept that opinion, and to have preferred that of the Cape Government. I think that the Earl of Derby must have sent some telegram to the Cape Government requesting their mediation in the matter. [MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No.] Well, but wait a moment. On the first day of the meeting of Parliament, the Earl of Derby said—

"The Cape has offered to negotiate with the Boers, and believe that they can obtain a peaceable departure from that country. We have telegraphed that they are free to carry out their negotiations."

That telegram does not appear in these Papers, and I should very much like to know the terms of that telegram and the precise instructions the Earl of Derby gave on the point. Sir Hercules Robinson suggested—

"That the Cape Ministers should be told that no arrangements will be satisfactory which do not secure for Montsioa and his tribe the lands which were in their use and occupation in May last when they were formally taken under British protection."

That is the view which I understand to be accepted, and which I am convinced will be the opinion of Parliament and of the whole country. But do the Cape Ministry understand that this is the arrangement they are to endeavour to secure, and that Her Majesty's Government will be satisfied with nothing less? Because, if they do, I confess I am surprised at the views they have themselves expressed in regard to the undertaking of these negotiations. The Cape Ministry can hardly expect to be able to remove the freebooters from Bechuana-land without force after what they have stated on the subject. If, on the other hand, the Cape Government are under the impression that they can make some kind of arrangement for the annexation of this territory which should not safeguard the interests of those Natives who have been directly taken under the British Protectorate, and who are, therefore, in an exceptional position, then they must intend to make some arrangement which will not secure that the views stated in this House by Her Majesty's Government shall be carried out. If this is in contemplation, it would be a surrender of the whole Protectorate, and the most fatal act that the Government could be guilty of towards the Natives of South Africa. I hope we shall have some statement on this point from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade which will assure us whether the intentions of Her Majesty's Government are thoroughly accepted and understood by the Cape Ministry, and whether it is the resolution of Her Majesty's Government to carry out the punishment of the criminals, to remove the freebooters, and not to lose a moment in making the necessary military preparations for the use of such force as may be required. I am convinced that if this is not clearly laid down, the time is much nearer than we think, when, notwithstanding the words of the Earl of Derby, we shall have to encounter a most serious struggle in South Africa, if we are to maintain British authority in that country.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, in the remarks which the right hon. Gentleman has just addressed to the House he stated that he was unable to acquit Her Majesty's Government of blame in this matter, and that the House had a right to complain that during the past three months there had been great delay on their part in coming to the rescue of Monteioa. But if I may venture to make a complaint, it would be that the Gentlemen who have addressed the House on this question—the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) and the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down—have seemed to ignore the real difficulties of the situation. Now, the right hon. Gentleman has had so great experience in reference to South African questions, that I am sure he knows it is not the easy business which it would appear to the House to be, if we had to take account of nothing else than has been referred to by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham. If it were merely a question of punishing a few hundreds of marauders and border ruffians who had committed grave outrages, even in a distant territory, then there would have been, I admit, no excuse for the delay which has taken place, and the matter would have been one which the power of the Government ought long ago to have set right. But I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman—he knows that behind this difficulty of the marauders there are great and serious Imperial questions which even a great Power like this cannot contemplate raising without the gravest deliberation. Behind these border ruffians there may be, unless the greatest caution is exhibited in dealing with them, the whole feeling and power of the Transvaal State and the Free State, and behind them the whole power of the Dutch population of South Africa. If we were to be set face to face with these, although I do not say we might not come victoriously out of the tremendous struggle that might result in that distant and difficult country, yet we should have embroiled the two races in South Africa, and disordered for an indefinite period the prosperity and welfare of that Colony. Well, Sir, these are serious questions which each Government in their turn have had to keep in mind. The late Government went with rather a light heart into South Africa, and they came out of it, I think, sadder and wiser men; and they ought not to blame us if, in the view of possible events, we are deliberately long-suffering and patient, and do all in our power to prevent the contingencies I have alluded to. Now, the policy of the Government is this—that we are determined, at all hazards, to use our whole strength if necessary to maintain the obligations we have entered into. In doing that we are determined, if we can, to proceed with the assent of our Colonial fellow-subjects generally—not of the British population of South Africa alone, but with the majority of the Dutch population also. We have endeavoured by all possible and reasonable means to conciliate the Dutch population, and to carry them with us in the extreme measures which it may be necessary for us to take. Well, Sir, that is my justification of this delay. When I was speaking on this subject a few days ago, I had only a few minutes in which to explain myself, and it was then impossible for me to make my meaning as clear to the House as I wished it to be. But I repeat that, step by step, we have endeavoured to carry with us the Dutch population, and up to this time I am able to say that we have been to a large extent successful. But the right hon. Gentleman opposite says that the views of the British Government and the Cape Government are diametrically opposed. [Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: No, no.] Well, then, as that is putting it too strongly, I will say that even now there are differences between the British Government and the Cape Government. The Cape Government is at the present time a Dutch Government; it represents principally Dutch opinion in the Colony; and, no doubt, they are prepared to make larger concessions to those who are of the same race as themselves, than we might be inclined to do. But we have so far secured their assent to our proceedings, that they have agreed to take over this territory as part of the Cape Colony as soon as the freebooters have been removed from the land which they have invaded, and to make such arrangements as will in future preserve order in the territory; and in the meantime they do not resist the measures which the Imperial Government may think it necessary to take. We have been asked as to the details of the mission intrusted to Sir Charles Warren. That it is a Military Mission I will say, and it will be for the War Office to state what details can be published; but I am sure that it will not be for the interest of the State to make public the details of the orders given to Sir Charles Warren. The Government having announced their intention of sending Sir Charles Warren with a military force to maintain our obligations generally, in the first instance, the Cape Government made an offer to endeavour to negotiate and arrange, if possible, for an amicable settlement. That proposal related only to the time during which the military preparations are going on, and, of course, some period would elapse before Sir Charles Warren, with the force at his disposal, would be ready to act. Her Majesty's Government have, therefore, accepted the proposal of the Cape Government, subject to these conditions—that the military preparations shall go on; that active military operations shall not be delayed by the action of the Cape Government; that any arrangements which the Cape Government may be able to make shall be subject to the approval of Her Majesty's Government, and those arrangements shall of necessity comprise such conditions as will practically restore Montsioa to the position which he occupied when the British Protectorate was announced. These are the conditions under which alone the Cape Government will negotiate, and under which alone Her Majesty's Government have given their approval to the proposal of the Cape Government. If the Cape Government should be unsuccessful—and I am bound to say that I rather share the fears of hon. Gentlemen opposite, that not very much will come from these peaceful negotiations—then Sir Charles Warren has distinct instructions to remove the freebooters from the land which they have unlawfully occupied, and replace Montsioa in the position in which he was when the British Protectorate was announced. Sir, I hope I have made perfectly clear what is the position taken up by Her Majesty's Government. Although we are aware of the difficulty and the danger that will have to be faced, Her Majesty's Government feel that the obligations they have undertaken are so sacred that there is no alternative but to carry them out with all the force which the country may place at their disposal.

Mr. GORST: I should like, if the House will allow me, to withdraw my Amendment after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, which is quite satisfactory.

MOTION.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise, Sir, to move the Motion which stands in my name—

“That the several stages of any Bill relating to the Representation of the People have precedence of all Orders of the Day, except any further proceedings on the Address and Notices of Motion, on every day for which they may be set down by the Government.”

I think it might be a matter of convenience if it were disposed of now; but, at the same time, I should not wish to press it if there were objections taken to it; but I observe that the two Gentlemen who have given Notice of Amendments to my Motion are both in their places; and I observe, also, that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition is now present. With respect to the Motion itself, I think that it will be regarded by the House in general as almost involved, certainly implied, in the announcement made—namely, that we have advised Her Majesty to summon the House together, in order that the House should give its consideration without any avoidable loss of time to the question of the Representation of the People—the Franchise Bill. The loss of time would be enormous to the House if that were only to be done upon the days at the disposal of the Government. I desire, therefore, to propose that, whenever the Franchise Bill, or anything relating to the representation of the people, is set down by the Government, it should take precedence. The method pursued in 1831 and 1832, I am bound to say, was not this method. At that time there was no pressure of Public Business upon the House, and the formal Motions were allowed to pass formally, and the method then pursued was to postpone the Orders of the Day from day to day. Practically the result was the same as it would be in this case. But, as a general rule, the Reform Bill, and nothing but the Reform Bill, was taken. It would not have been possible then to have adopted a Motion of this kind, because the transactions relating to the Reform Bill were such that it was known that their discussion, with its enormous details, would last over a long, a very long, period. I am far from saying that if, through any unhappy combination of circumstances, the discussion of this subject should be greatly prolonged, a Motion of this kind should still remain in force. Then, I think, it would undoubtedly be necessary to modify it. What I am thinking of as the purpose of this Motion is really, in the main, the passing of the Franchise Bill. It is greatly for the convenience of all persons concerned, and so greatly for the convenience, I think, of the other House of Parliament, that no time should be lost in again bringing that Bill under their notice. If that be so, Sir, I do not think that the first Amendment on the Paper, for example, is an Amendment that should be adopted. I do not see any reason why the work of Wednesdays should receive preferential favour at the present time, because the Wednesdays in the autumn are not days on which private Members could count. The House is not called together for the purpose of transacting Business of that kind; and, at any rate, until we make a certain progress with the subject of Parliamentary Reform, I should strongly deprecate making such an exception as the Amendment proposes. If I may presume to represent to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir John Hay) and to the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warton), who have given Notice of Amendments, I should say that, in all probability, the sort of exception more likely to arise would be that which might be deemed urgent by a large portion of the House—something, perhaps, relating to foreign affairs, and in that case a desire being expressed that the Bill should not be set down for any day—that, of course, would be a matter for consideration. But I do not see any other way for giving the requisite despatch to the stages of the Franchise Bill than that suggested in the terms of this Motion. It is evident that to make the Motion from day to day would be practically inviting the waste of a great deal of the time of the House. Then, Sir, with respect to the second Amendment, I can hardly think that any practical necessity is likely to arise on a matter of that kind. But if it should arise, I can assure the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Warton) that if any important case should occur in which any legal difficulty were to arise in regard to the operation of an Act of Parliament, that would be undoubtedly a matter which ought to be considered when the time arrived. That is the general ground on which I think that the House will feel that a Motion of this kind is reasonable. But I beg that it may be fully understood that I am not at present too sanguine in expressing any confident hope that these proceedings may be likely to be the beginning of a long-continued consideration of parts of the question of Reform other than the Franchise Bill. If that were done, I fully admit it would be quite impossible for us to ask the House to pass over the whole Business of the House, as is implied in this Motion. I hope that these intimations may be considered satisfactory. The subject is one which we should desire to have considered in an impartial spirit, and entirely with a view to the convenience of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the several stages of any Bill relating to the Representation of the People have precedence of all Orders of the Day, except any further proceedings on the Address, and Notices of Motions, on every day for which they may be set down by the Government."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SIR JOHN HAY, who had on the Notice Paper the following Amendment:—Line 2, after "precedence," insert "except on Wednesdays," said, that he had to ask the House kindly to consider his Amendment in the light of the statement which had just been made by the Prime Minister, and with reference to the Motion itself. On that day week it had been his good fortune to be able to set down for discussion a Bill for the Redistribution of Seats—a Bill of the nature and character for the consideration of which Parliament had been assembled at that time of the year. He might state that the Wednesday Sittings were usually devoted to private Members' Bills, and discussions took place upon them without a Division being necessarily taken. On account of the early closing Rule, Business of an urgent nature was not usually set down for discussion, because it might lead to no practical result. The Bill in which he was interested, and which stood for that day week, was on a subject which related to the representation of the people, for the consideration of which Parliament had been assembled, and he would have been glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that they could have had an opportunity of having a discussion upon the Bill on a Wednesday afternoon, without giving the House the trouble of going to a Division on the question. It was a fair question—the redistribution of seats—to introduce to the House; it was a question which interested the country generally, and was one which he hoped the House would give him an opportunity of discussing at the right time. Under these circumstances, he felt himself compelled to move his Amendment.

MR. STORER, in seconding the Amendment, said, that having on the Paper a Bill in which great interest was felt in the country, he thought it was hardly fair that the Government should monopolize the whole time of the House.

Mr. Gladstone

They were brought together in the autumn, at great inconvenience to themselves; and it was but reasonable that one day in the week, at least, should be set aside for the consideration of those matters in which the people took a deep interest. The country, from one end to the other, was sensible of the necessity of something being done with reference to the present state of trade and agriculture. He assured the Prime Minister that, though he might think there was only one subject which was agitating the country, amongst the classes whom he (Mr. Storer) was well acquainted, and who were supposed to be most benefited by the passing of the measure, there was not the slightest feeling on the question. Those classes, however, did consider it of the greatest importance that questions which greatly affected their social welfare should be occasionally discussed in the House. They were, for instance, deeply interested in the questions relating to trade and agriculture, which were in a fearful state, and those questions would be shelved, and hon. Members would have no opportunity of bringing them before the House, if the Motion of the Prime Minister should be agreed to.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I quite understand that there is great force in the arguments of my right hon. and gallant Friend behind me (Sir John Hay), that the Government should not ask the House for the whole of its time; but I am bound to say that I do not think that Wednesday is, of all others, the day which should be considered as a private Members' day. Friday has much more of that character, having always been the day on which questions might be raised on going into Committee of Supply. At the same time, I quite recognize the desire of the Government—and I think, also, it will be for the convenience of the House—that we should proceed rapidly with the Franchise Bill. But if we pass the Resolution in the form which the Prime Minister now proposes, it may give the Government unlimited power over the Business of the House, and for a very considerable time. Assuming—I only take it as a possibility—that the House should not be prorogued, but should adjourn before Christmas, and should proceed with Business again in February, this Resolution standing before us would give the Government power with regard to any Bill relating to the Representation of the People—

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, will you allow me? I feel the force of that objection. The Motion has been drawn with the object of meeting the exigencies of a particular time; and I should not in the least oppose the insertion of a limitation of the time of its operation—say “before Christmas.” That, indeed, would be the best way.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I was going myself to suggest that there should be a limitation of time; but when the right hon. Gentleman says “before Christmas,” he is still making a large demand. We must consider that there are matters of great importance which the House may very reasonably desire to discuss; and if the Government should obtain priority up to Christmas there will be no opportunity of bringing forward these subjects. I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman and others who complain of the amount of time spent in discussing the Address, that many things have been brought forward on the Address because there would have been no other opportunity; and the best way to obviate such a difficulty is to treat the House with reasonable indulgence and fairness, and to give us opportunities of bringing forward questions of importance. I do not know whether there is any truth in the report which I heard yesterday; but I was told that, with regard to the question of the Royal Commission on Merchant Shipping, it was likely there would be a debate. I see the subject stands for discussion on the Report of the Address. If the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman passes, hon. Members anxious to raise a debate on the composition of the Commission will be obliged to do so on the Report of the Address, or abandon the hope of having such an opportunity before Christmas, without the consent of the Government. I suggest, therefore, that the priority asked for should be given for a fortnight.

MR. GLADSTONE: Say a month; the end of November.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: That I consider a fair compromise. I fully admit with my right hon. and gallant Friend that the question is one of importance; but, under the circumstances, I hope he will not proceed with his Amendment.

SIR JOHN HAY: I propose to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, after the word “precedence,” to insert the words “during the month of November.”—(Mr. Gladstone.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. STORER expressed a hope that the Prime Minister would afford hon. Members, whose Notices of Motion were shelved by this Resolution, an early opportunity of discussing the various questions to which they related.

SIR JOHN HAY: I understand that the right hon. Gentleman would state to-day on what day the promised statement would be made with regard to the Navy.

MR. GLADSTONE: No; I said I could not be in a condition to make any arrangement until we saw our way through the stages of the Franchise Bill.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he was thankful to see that the attention of the Government had at last been awakened with respect to the condition of the first arm of our defence. The Prime Minister would, perhaps, pardon him for touching upon the matter, as there was a very strong feeling in the country at the present moment that something should be done, and done at once, to put their Navy and their coaling stations into a proper state of defence. He trusted that, under these circumstances, the Government would not allow the matter to pass from their minds, or to be entirely swamped and swallowed up by the discussions on the Franchise Bill. It was true that when the subject was last discussed on the Navy Estimates there were only nine Members present. That, however, was all changed now. Many journals of great importance had taken up the matter very warmly, and only last night he had noted the conversion of the hon. Members for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) and Perthshire (Sir Donald Currie). That had been very gratifying to him, as it showed that the efforts he had made for the last seven or eight years were at last beginning to bear fruit in the House of Commons.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. WARTON moved the following Amendment to the Motion:—

Line 3, after "Motions," insert "except Notices of Motion relating to schemes under the provisions of 'The Endowed Schools Act, 1869,' and amending Acts."

The hon. and learned Gentleman pointed out that this question was one of great general interest, and had found supporters in the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) and the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings), with whom he rarely agreed on any subject. The Charity Commissioners often acted in a most arbitrary manner; and although their proposed schemes were laid upon the Table of the House, very great delay occurred in printing them, and, as no formal Notice of them was given in the House, it was only by great trouble and diligence that hon. Members were enabled to ascertain their existence at all. These schemes were often of a very arbitrary character, and quite opposed to the intention of the founder; and therefore he trusted the Prime Minister would give him some facilities for noticing them as they were framed.

Amendment proposed,

After the word "Motions," to insert the words "except Notices of Motion relating to schemes under the provisions of 'The Endowed Schools Act, 1869,' and amending Acts."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, the request of the hon. and learned Member would break up the regularity of their proceedings. But the fact was, there would be no impediment whatever, if he wished to bring forward Motions on the subject to which he alluded, to his doing so on any day he pleased.

Mr. J. LOWTHER: After 3 o'clock in the morning?

Mr. GLADSTONE said, he did not think they were likely to adopt a rule to sit until 3 o'clock in the morning on the Franchise Bill. What he meant was that as the Half-past 12 Rule did not apply to Motions of this kind, the hon. and learned Gentleman would have the opportunity of bringing them forward. Almost everything that came before the House was of importance, including the subject of patent medicines; and he did not think they should make a special rule with respect to Motions, which could be discussed on any night in the week.

Mr. J. LOWTHER said, he was glad to hear the comforting assurance that their labours were not likely to be protracted until the small hours of the morning. He should like that some steps should be taken, either by a short unopposed Act or some measure, to prevent those who were interested in schemes of the kind alluded to by his hon. and learned Friend being prejudiced by the concession of time which the House was now invited to give to the Government; because he thought the Prime Minister would admit that the end of a long day's Sitting was hardly a legitimate opportunity of discussion under the Rules of the House. He was in hopes that the right hon. Gentleman would avail himself of this opportunity to state what was the intention of the draughtsman of his Motion in inserting the words—"any Bill for the Representation of the People." The right hon. Gentleman, in his observations that day, only dealt with one Bill.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Ordered, That the several stages of any Bill relating to the Representation of the People have precedence, during the month of November, of all Orders of the Day, except any further proceedings on the Address, and Notices of Motions, on every day on which they may be set down by the Government.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

THE ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.—REPORT.

Further Proceeding on Report of Address resumed.

GOVERNMENT AT KHARTOUM.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, in rising to move the following Amendment:—

"Humbly to pray Her Majesty to direct Her Ministers, in the interests of freedom and commerce, and for the security of Egypt, to efficiently support General Gordon in establishing a stable and civilized Government at Khartoum."

said: The debate on the Address has already occupied 10 days, and of this time not two clear days have been given to the consideration of Imperial questions. Five and a-half have been taken up with debate on the administration of Criminal Law in Ireland, against which consumption of time the Government have made no serious protest. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Oh!] It was only the night before last, on the fifth evening, that the Prime Minister objected to the prolongation of the debate; but that objection was a very perfunctory one. The fact is, the Government are too fearful of the Irish Party to oppose any serious resistance to them. One night has been given to the consideration of the all-important subject of trade, and this the President of the Board of Trade actually described as "a waste of time." One night was taken up by a debate upon the revolutionary incitements of the same Minister. Moreover, the Government now propose to monopolize every day, and thus render it necessary to debate Imperial questions upon the Address. With this explanation I hope no Radical organ will have the audacity or the unfairness to blame me for bringing forward the subject of this Amendment. The House was considerably surprised, and not a little amused, at the references of the Prime Minister on the first night of the Session to the Egyptian policy of the Government. Had our information been limited to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, we might well have concluded that little or nothing unsatisfactory had taken place in that country; that General Gordon and the Ministry were lost in admiration of each other; and that the costly Expedition of Relief which is now toiling its weary way towards Khartoum had been despatched at the right moment, with the utmost forethought, and without a day's hesitation or delay. What are the facts with regard to Her Majesty's present Ministers in Egypt? Their conduct of affairs in two years and a-quarter has cost Egypt and England 50,000 human lives. It has caused an expenditure to Egypt and to the British Empire of close on £10,000,000 a-piece. That enormous sum of £20,000,000 might just as well have been thrown into the deep sea for any benefit that any people, creature, or interest has derived from it. Neither England, nor Egypt, nor Europe, neither Fellaheen, nor Soudanese, nor British are any the better for this deplorable waste of resources and of human life. General Gordon has been cruelly deserted and left to the chance of fate during six perilous months. Our old ally of Constantinople has been alienated by the injustice and persecution of the present Government. Germany and Austria have been driven from us by the affronts and blunders of our Ministry. France, their boasted friend, for whom they sacrificed everything, has been turned into bitter hostility towards us. And, most remarkable Nemesis of all, the inventor of the Concert of Europe, now sees the nearest approach to that European combination directed against himself. Continental Europe has united in an act of vigorous protest against the financial repudiation which the advice of the British Cabinet has lately forced upon the Khedive. That protest has right on its side. For the first time in English history the name of this country has been associated with an act of public dishonesty. The Khedive has, by the advice of the Ministers of England, violated a solemn and International Treaty. The puppet of the British Cabinet has broken its formal and binding engagements with the Bondholders and with the States of Europe in order to find the means to meet the liabilities in which the blind and blundering policy of the same British Cabinet has involved Egypt. The £8,000,000 or more of extra Debt, which that country has incurred since July, 1882, are due to the mistakes of Her Majesty's present Ministers, and to them alone. £4,000,000 are owing to the Alexandria indemnities. That liability was incurred because the British Government neglected the dictates of common sense, and the warnings of those who knew Egypt, and refused to provide a landing force when Alexandria was bombarded. A little foresight and courage would have preserved the city, and ended the war then and there. The remaining £4,000,000 are due to the half-hearted and ever-shifting policy our Ministers have pursued with regard to the Soudan. The horrible sacrifice of human life, the 40,000 and 50,000 human souls that have been there untimely slain, the millions that have been sunk in that abyss might, for the greater part, have been saved, had the Indian Brigade been, as Sir Charles Wilson advised, sent to Khartoum after Tel-el-Kebir. All Europe knows these facts. Every Government, every organ of public opinion among the nations, has been crying shame upon the British Cabinet for the black scene of carnage and ruin that has overwhelmed Egyptian territory since their blasting touch fell upon that unfortunate country. When, in addition to the disastrous mismanagement in Egypt and the Soudan, the Khedive was directed to break his pledges, and violate the International compacts to which England also was a party, in order to pay for the losses that British policy had inflicted upon Egypt, there came a general and unanimous protest. Other Governments still deem the pledge of nations as sacred as the word of a gentleman, though Her Majesty's present Ministers hold the pledges of England at a very different estimate. But the details of the Prime Minister's statement are even more extraordinary than its general purport. The Government were long "silent with regard to General Gordon, because they had nothing to say." They had nothing to say because they were willing to do nothing; because, from the beginning of March to the end of August, they had not the courage to make up their minds to take any step in support or to relieve their gallant agent. According to the right hon. Gentleman, General Gordon is deeply grateful to the Cabinet for the aid they have given him. Was there ever such an astonishing perversion of the facts? Not on April 8, as the Prime Minister said, but on March 11, or barely three weeks after his arrival at Khartoum, before he had received an answer to his suggestions and advice, it was that General Gordon sent a formal message of thanks to Sir Evelyn Baring and Her Majesty's Ministers. There his gratitude abruptly stopped. Nor did he after that message of March 11, change his policy and recommend Zebehr, as the Prime Minister asserts. Seven weeks before April 8, the right hon. Gentleman's date, and three weeks before March 11, had General Gordon advised the despatch of Zebehr. From the 11th of March to this day the Prime Minister and his Colleagues have received from General Gordon nothing but indignant contempt and most richly-deserved reproaches for their shuffling, their desertion, and their unworthy suggestions that he should meanly abandon those whom he was sent out to save. On the 16th of April, General Gordon told the Government that henceforth he would act for himself—

"I leave to you," he added, "the indelible disgrace of abandoning the garrisons, with the certainty that you will eventually be forced to smash up the Mahdi under greater difficulties."

That certainly every man of sense has long foreseen; and it is now at hand. In August once more, the veil that for five months concealed from our knowledge those most heroic struggles and the perils and sufferings of that terrible siege was lifted. For a moment the story of the terrible dangers, the daily assaults, the marvellous resources of that great spirit was unshrouded. Another message from Khartoum reached the Government. Again the biting words of truth come from the Christian hero, whom you have sent out unprotected to cope with—

"The tremendous dangers that affected the whole of Egypt, and countries beyond," and whose every warning you have treated with contempt.

"You are the cause of all the evils that have befallen Egypt;"

"If the rebels kill the Egyptians their blood will be upon your heads."

The Conservative Party maintained, during the debates in April and May, that General Gordon was shut in by the Mahdi's hordes, and unable to leave Khartoum. It was, indeed, clear from all the intelligence that came from the Soudan, and especially from Mr. Power, that, owing to the neglect of the Ministry to notice any of General Gordon's warnings, the storm he predicted on March 1 had burst upon him, and that he was completely beleaguered in Khartoum. The Prime Minister deliberately took a contrary view in face of the clearest evidence. Thus he stated on April 3—

"General Gordon is under no constraint and under no order to remain in the Soudan. Neither is he under any inability to leave the Soudan at this moment."

A British officer sent out to rescue 60,000

human beings, under no constraint of honour or duty not to stand by those he went out to save! Now, we have in the latest Blue Books the fullest evidence that the Prime Minister was absolutely wrong, and that he had no evidence whatever in support of his statements. Thus, on July 31, Gordon writes emphatically—

"Reading over your telegram of the 5th May, 1884, you ask me to state cause and intention in staying at Khartoum, knowing Government means to abandon Soudan, and in answer I say I stay at Khartoum because Arabs have shut us up and will not let us out. I also add that even if the road were opened the people would not let me go unless I gave them some Government or took them with me, which I could not do. No one would leave more willingly than I would if it were possible."

With reference to the incredibly mean suggestion of the Government, that he should desert those whom he was sent out to save, repeatedly made by Ministers in April and May, he says—

"I shall not leave Khartoum till I can put someone in. I will not leave these people after all they have gone through."

And to stamp his sense of the shabby parsimony of the Government which denied him all the support he asked for, though it is now involving the expenditure of millions in a Relief Expedition, Gordon says—

"The only reinforcements the Soudan has received since the 27th November, 1883, date when Hicks' defeat was known at Cairo, is seven persons, including myself, and we have sent down over 600 soldiers and 2,000 people. The people here and Arabs laugh over it. Not one pound of money you gave me got here. It was captured at Berber."

And, after telling the Government that he is making some decorations to distribute among his faithful soldiers in honour of the defence of Khartoum, he adds these stinging words—

"You will not be asked to pay for them."

The House will remember the efforts that were made by some Members on this side to induce Her Majesty's Ministers to send relief to Berber before it was too late. The appealing telegrams that came from the Governor and the residents of that unfortunate place during April last are well known. I will only quote one out of a dozen. Sir Evelyn Baring telegraphed a message on April 23 from Berber—

"We are in great danger. . . . We have only 60 cases of ammunition. Pray send ammunition and troops. If Berber falls there is no longer any hope for Soudan."

The Prime Minister was then able, in face of the strongest evidence to the contrary, to state that there was no risk of Berber sharing the fate of Sinkat, and, moreover, that—

"The fall of Berber would make no essential change in the position of Khartoum."

All help was cruelly refused, and within six weeks Berber fell. General Gordon tells the result in these words—

"According to all accounts, 5,000 were massacred at Berber;"

and he says—

"Had not Berber fallen the route from Wady Halfa along the Nile would have been a picnic."

Thousands of women and children were carried off into slavery by the Arabs. What have the Government done to rescue these helpless victims of their laches and delay? Like the wives and families of the brave garrison of Sinkat, they have been abandoned to a most atrocious servitude. At last the decision was taken, late in August, to make tardy preparations to do that which should have been done in March and April. How Ministers were able to make up their minds, even in August, Heaven only knows! But I shrewdly suspect that pressure from Foreign States had much to do with it. Other Governments did not regard the devastating invasions of the barbarous fanatics and slave-hunters from the Soudan as the efforts of "peoples rightly struggling to be free." What has this delay cost England? Last March, Gordon asked for the mere prestige of 200 British soldiers at Wady Halfa. Then the fate of great districts was trembling in the balance. With his vast and intimate knowledge of the Soudanese, Gordon said the prestige of those 200 men at Wady Halfa, and five officers, would cause the swelling revolt to collapse. This request, and every other suggestion General Gordon made, was treated with indifference and scorn. The five officers were not sent, the 200 bayonets at Wady Halfa were refused him. His urgent representations, those of Colonel Stewart and of Sir Evelyn Baring, as to Zebehr, were rejected. The £200,000 and the 2,000 Turkish troops, with which he offered to restore order in the Soudan, were also denied him. No Indian troops were sent to Berber. General Graham's gallant Army was not allowed to open the Berber road in March. That bloody and wanton Expedition was hurried back from Suakin to Cairo without any results except the fruitless slaughter of 6,000 Arabs. For six months Gordon was deserted, abandoned, and betrayed. Alone in that remote and desolate region—left to face treachery within and the furious hordes without, with no resources but those of his own heroic soul, and his sublime confidence in the Almighty. And now, at the twelfth hour, not 200 British soldiers, but 6,000 bayonets, are on their way to Khartoum. Not the £200,000, for which Gordon asked in March, are being spent, but over £2,000,000 are the outcome of five months of shirking and delay. The Prime Minister stated that no disparaging or questioning word as to General Gordon had passed from the mouth of any Member of the Government. I remember how that cruel and heartless despatch of April 23, which conveyed from the Cabinet their message of abandonment to General Gordon, imparted to him a change of purpose, and a deliberate perversion of his mission—

"Tell Gordon we do not propose to supply him with Turkish or other forces for the purpose of undertaking military expeditions, such being at variance with the pacific policy which was the object of his mission."

That was the message sent to a man who the Ministry knew to be in deadly peril, who was surrounded by savage foes, who had nothing but worthless and beaten troops at his back, whose chief lieutenants had proved faithless to him, who was cut off from all communications with the outside world, who had warned Ministers repeatedly and in vain of the coming storm, whose advice and requests they had constantly rejected. Gordon's last message in March through a faithful and trusted companion was—

"We are daily expecting British troops; we cannot bring ourselves to believe that we are abandoned by the British Government. Our existence depends upon England."

Notwithstanding this, and the full knowledge of his dire peril, the Cabinet sarcastically asked for more information, and told him that no support would be sent to enable him to meet "the tremendous danger that affected Egypt." There has been no change, no inconsistency on Gordon's part. You sent him out on a definite mission. That included the withdrawal of the 22,000 Egyptian soldiers and the 40,000 civilians in the Soudan. Besides, he was to establish an organized Government if possible. He exhausted pacific means. He even told you it was necessary to recognize slavery. He sent a message to the Mahdi. His overtures were repulsed with insult. Then he warned you of what was coming—not once, but 20 times. On February 29, General Gordon said—

"There is not much chance of improving, and every chance of getting worse."

He told you that the

"Peaceful two-thirds of the population were terrorized over by the Communist, one-third incited by the Mahdi."

And he asked for the prestige of 200 British troops at Wady Halfa. Sir Evelyn Baring strongly emphasized this on the 16th and 24th of March—that is, just after Graham's victories at Teb and Tamasi had made it easy to open the Berber road. I have given these hurried quotations—and many more could be given—to show how consistent Gordon was; how constantly and sensibly he warned you of his position, and how, after refusing to do one single thing that he advised, you left him alone to face the storm which burst as he predicted, and which has been surging and raging around him and his gallant companions ever since. The most cruel and reckless act of all was the withdrawal of General Graham's force just when it might have been of use. That was done in defiance of the direct advice of Gordon, of General Graham, and, I believe, of the highest military authorities at home. Yet with all this information as to Gordon's perils, need, and request for help, and with his last indignant message of indelible reproach in his pocket, the Prime Minister was able to tell Parliament on the 24th of April that there was "no military or other danger threatening Khartoum." He is still, with light heart, able to forget all that has happened since March 11—the long betrayal, the indignant reproaches of Gordon; and he dwelt upon the fact that Gordon, with premature gratitude, thanked the Ministry eight months ago for support they never gave him. Ask General Gordon now his deliberate opinion of your conduct, and then publish it if you dare. Further, the Prime Minister affirms that the policy of the Government has not changed with regard to Khartoum. If that means anything, it means that Khartoum is to be abandoned to a fanatical and aggressive barbarian. It means that a great commercial emporium and military position of the first importance for Egypt and the countries beyond, is to be given up to the Mahdi's hordes and to ruin. It means that the great trading interests of Egypt in the Soudan, the prospect of opening up and civilizing the vast regions between the Red Sea and the Nyanza Lakes, is to be abandoned. It means that for the first time in our history, under the blighting influence of a craven English Ministry, civilization and order are to recede before anarchy and barbarism; that millions of suffering people are to be given over to black superstition, and to the cruellest form of slavery. Give up Khartoum to the False Prophet and to anarchy, and you will be forced to send expeditions up the Nile every few years in order to defend Egypt. Early in this Session I ventured to submit to this House a Resolution protesting against this cowardly and disastrous abandonment of so commanding and valuable a position. The policy of the Government has directly encouraged slavery, for the abandonment of the Soudan means the development of slavery. General Gordon warned the Ministry last February of what must happen, when he said, on February 21—

"I answered (questions regarding the liberation of slaves) that the Treaty of 1877 would not be enforced in 1889 by me, which, considering the determination of Her Majesty's Government respecting the Soudan, was a self-evident fact."

Sir Evelyn Baring also writes on the same date to Earl Granville—

"It was obvious from the first that a revival of slavery in the Soudan would result from the policy of abandonment. Knowing that he is powerless to stop slavery in the future, General Gordon evidently intends using it as a concession to the people, which will strengthen his position in other ways."

So that in addition to all the other human misery which the Government policy has caused, "a revival of slavery" is its clear and proclaimed result. What could be more distinct than these statements. As in South Africa so in Egyptian territory you have developed slavery. Have the Ministry ever considered that it is in the ability of a Power established at Khartoum to absolutely ruin Egypt? I have it on the authority of Sir Samuel Baker, who knows the country better than anyone else, except General Gordon. Sir Samuel Baker states that any Government could dam the Nile at Khartoum, divert its channel, and thereby make Egypt absolutely sterile. Egypt is the Nile. All its fertility and its resources depend upon that great river. What could be done if the course of the Nile was diverted for six months, and its fertilizing flood turned away? Khartoum is a great commercial position. The trade with the Soudan amounts to many millions. A deputation of Egyptian merchants waited on the British and French Consuls not long ago, and this is what they said—

"Is there any example in history of a civilized nation retiring before savage tribes? . . . To abandon the Soudan would be to give it up to barbarism. . . . Importation in the Soudan Provinces, represents a value of nearly £2,000,000. There are in the Soudan more than 3,000 Egyptian commercial establishments, and more than 1,000 Europeans. There is at present in Cairo £500,000 worth of goods destined for the Soudan. Is all this to be lost?"

A civilized Government at Khartoum could really maintain order and repress slavery in the vast regions east of the White and Blue Niles, and between Abyssinia and Khartoum. Armed steamers on the Niles would effectually prevent any large force from crossing from Kordofan, and could cut off the slave caravans. If the traffic with the North and East is destroyed, the Slave Trade must die out. If you abandon Khartoum to these marauding hordes, whom the Prime Minister exalted into the character of "peoples rightly struggling to be free," slavery must prevail throughout the Soudan. There never was such a figment of the imagination as the idea that this fanatical slave-dealer, who kills and enslaves his prisoners and who offers his victims the choice of the Koran and the Sword, is the leader of "peoples rightly struggling to be free." We were told on the first day of this debate by the Prime Minister that General Gordon's heroic struggles against the Mahdi had averted—

"Tremendous danger from Egypt and the neighbouring countries."

A very different story were we given all last Session. Then the Mahdi was an innocent patriot. "This movement was overrated," the danger was slight. Now, the Prime Minister had forgotten all his old statements. Naturally, even his marvellous memory cannot carry itself through all the evolutions and variations of his policy. He now affirms that the Mahdi is and has been a "Tremendous danger to Egypt and the neighbouring countries."

What a commentary this confession is upon the long inaction of the Government and their six months' desertion of General Gordon. As to the starting of the Expedition, the Prime Minister would have us believe that there has been no delay, and that a delicate consideration for the health of the troops has prevented them from moving earlier. Would he venture to call the Commander-in-Chief in support of such an assertion? Is it not a fact that the preparations were undertaken six weeks, if not two months, later than they ought to have been; that the most precious season of the year for ascending the Nile was lost owing to this decision of the Ministry, and that the Nile transport alone has cost an extra £100,000 in consequence of the delay? Had we not information that Khartoum was only provisioned up to the end of September, and that but for a miracle its gallant defenders must have been starved out months before the arrival of this costly Expedition? So much for the Egyptian policy of the Government. Once more I ask, whom has it benefited? No one knows when this bloody and costly farce will be ended. I say "farce," for what has it accomplished? What benefit has the action of the British Government in Egypt been to any people, interest, or creature in this wide world? Are we more respected among the nations? Are our interests more secure? Has our trade been increased? Is our military, administrative, or political repute higher. Are the British people better off? Are the Fellaheen of Egypt more prosperous or contented? Have the divers races of the Soudan derived any advantage from the policy of the British Ministry? Will even the Mahdi in the long run be the better for it? I trow not. The British Cabinet, their policy and their blunders, are by turns the laughing-stock and the cause of bitter indignation throughout Europe. Every Government is protesting against the act of financial dishonesty that the English Government has forced upon the Khedive, and is crying shame upon the black scene of carnage and ruin that marks our occupation of Egyptian territory. So far from preserving the precious waterway to the East for our trade and forces—the Canal in which our interests are greater than those of all the rest of the world together—the Prime Minister has actually offered it to any and every Power that would accept the gift. He has proposed to neutralize Egypt and the Suez Canal in favour of our rivals and our foes, and has put it in the power of any hostile and unscrupulous enemies to block or to destroy the shortest route by which our ships and our reinforcements go to India. We have lost the trade with the Soudan, and our traffic with Egypt has been injuriously affected by the disturbance and disaster of the last two years. Is Egypt better off? Egypt owes at least £8,000,000 more than it owed in 1882, and has just committed, under the Northbrook-Tewfik Decree, an act of financial repudiation. The resources of the country have been diminished. The valuable trade with the Soudan has been cut off. The Fellaheen are burdened with debts, and the so-called reforms in the administration have, owing to their half-and-half and hesitating character, been more vexatious than beneficial. A thorough British supervision of the whole Administration might have been easily established in 1882, directly after Tel-el-Kebir. Had this been done, Egypt long since would have had a truly beneficent Government, and we should have now the blessings, instead of the curses, of her long-suffering people. But the British Cabinet had not the courage or statesmanship to accept the responsibility which their own acts threw upon them. The result is now evident in the waste of millions of treasure and the slaughter of scores of thousands. As for the pandemonium in the Soudan, the cruel and needless butchery, the vacillating and imbecile incapacity to grasp or to let alone, the cowardly desertion, the chances thrown away, the tardy and costly Expedition of Relief, the perils, the heroism, the indelible reproaches of the chivalrous Gordon—who could think of all this hideous congeries of pusillanimity and woe without indignant disgust? It is like a horrid nightmare; yet it is all too real for the wretched victims of British ineptitude, and for the same of this ancient land. Arabi was turned into a national hero because the Ministry shut their ears to the warnings of all who knew Egypt. Alexandria was ruined, and £4,000,000 of indemnities incurred, and Tel-el-Kebir rendered necessary, because the British Cabinet would not, in July, 1882, send 2,000 bayonets to act with the Fleet. The Soudan was given over to the Mahdi, and 40,000 lives sacrificed, because the Ministry shirked responsibility, and would not despatch the Indian Brigade to Khartoum in October, 1882. General Hicks and his 13,000 men were sent to their doom, because the British Government, that had smashed the Egyptian Army to pieces, had too little courage to telegraph six words of direction, or even advice, to Cairo. Baker's 2,500 conscripts were hurried to a like butchery for the self-same reason. Tewfik Bey and his brave garrison were left to perish within gun-sound of the British Squadron, because the same shuffling Ministers could not make up their minds a fortnight sooner to send out General Graham. That brave officer and his efficient little Army were allowed to slay 6,000 Arabs without rhyme or reason, or result, and then recalled in hot haste back to Cairo, just when their bloody victories promised good fruit. The Berber road might have easily been opened by General Graham in March, and Khartoum then relieved. But the chance, like a hundred others was thrown away, in deference to a feeble little splutter of Radical agitation at home. Berber itself was left to fall, and 3,500 human souls allowed to perish, because the Government could not in April last decide to risk one-tenth of what they are now, at the twelfth hour, doing. That delay is costing the country Lord Wolseley's costly Expedition. For the Government now to throw away all the results and fruits of the efforts of our soldiers and the heroic struggles of General Gordon would be an act of impolicy, of surrender, of moral cowardice so pernicious and so discreditable to this country that it is impossible for Parliament and the country to protest against it sufficiently.

Mr. GORST seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the seventh paragraph, after the word "provision," to insert the words

"Humbly to pray Her Majesty to direct Her Ministers, in the interests of freedom and commerce, and for the security of Egypt, to efficiently support General Gordon in establishing a stable and civilised Government at Khartoum."—(Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) had thought it necessary to explain why he interrupted the course of Business on the present occasion with a speech on Egyptian affairs. That explanation was due not so much to Members on the Liberal side as to Members on the opposite side, because it was a matter which was notorious to everybody that the general feeling of the House, quite irrespective of Party, had been and still was that whatever discussion might take place on Egyptian affairs had very much better take place at a later stage when the House had those proposals before it for the grant of money alluded to in the Queen's Speech. Hon. Members had, therefore, cause to complain of the course pursued by the hon. Member for Eye, who had thought fit to interpose between the House and very important Business. In the few observations which he should make in reply to the hon. Member he should not follow him over the extensive ground, which more suo, he had covered. The hon. Member had alluded to almost every subject under the sun—for example, to the evacuation of Candahar, the Bulgarian atrocities, and the war in the Transvaal, and to many other subjects not connected with the Question before the House. In fact, the hon. Member had made a speech which was really only distantly connected with the Amendment before the House. The Amendment contained a clear proposal, and why the hon. Member should have considered it necessary to introduce other matters, some of them of detail with which the House was frequently occupied last Session, rather puzzled him. He regretted that the hon. Member had not followed the example set by the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott), who had placed an Amendment upon the Paper, but had refrained from proceeding with it out of deference to the feelings of Members on both sides of the House. The hon. Member for

Brighton during the Recess travelled from Brighton to Alexandria and back again, and embodied the results of his observations in a pamphlet, copies of which he had sent to all the Members of that House. He regretted that the hon. Member for Eye had not followed that example, and embodied the result of his study of the Egyptian Question in a pamphlet, and distributed it amongst Members, so as to allow the House to proceed to the consideration of the Franchise Bill. But, though he had gone over a great deal of ground, the hon. Member had not taken the trouble to quote the most recent information which had been before the House. If he had read the last Blue Book he would have seen that there was important information upon the subject in the instructions to Lord Wolseley. One might imagine, from the hon. Member's speech, that the Government had never intended to try to establish, either in communication with General Gordon or without such communication, a stable and civilized Government in Khartoum and the Eastern Soudan. Now, it was notorious that in the original instructions to General Gordon the desirability of establishing some form of stable Government at Khartoum was strongly pressed upon him. The hon. Member would recollect that in the Blue Book, Egypt, No. 2, there were instructions to General Gordon, and in a subsequent Blue Book, No. 7, there was a memorandum of General Gordon, a portion of which partially reproduced those instructions in which the desirability of not leaving those countries in a condition of anarchy was pressed upon him by the Government. And in the instructions to Lord Wolseley a most striking and important passage at page 113 appeared to have escaped the hon. Member's attention. [Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: No.] If it had not escaped his attention, why did not the hon. Member allude to it? He supposed it was because such an allusion would not have chimed in with the indictment the hon. Member had made against the Government. He was, however, astonished that the hon. Member, knowing those Papers were in the hands of everyone, should have passed the matter by altogether. The passage in question was this—esty's Government would be glad to see a Government at Khartoum, which, so far as all matters connected with the internal administration of the country are concerned, would be wholly independent of Egypt. The Egyptian Government would be prepared to pay a reasonable subsidy to any Chief or number of Chiefs who would be sufficiently powerful to maintain order along the Valley of the Nile from Wady Halfa to Khartoum, and who would agree to the following conditions:—1. To remain at peace with Egypt, and to repress any raids on Egyptian territory. 2. To encourage trade with Egypt. 3. To prevent and discourage by all possible means any expeditions for the sale of and capture of slaves. You are authorized to conclude any arrangements which fulfil these general conditions. The main difficulty will consist in the selection of an individual or of a number of individuals having sufficient authority to maintain order."

"As regards the future government of the Soudan, and especially of Khartoum, Her Ma-

With regard to the details of the plan, Her Majesty's Government relied very much upon the information they might receive from Lord Wolseley, who was on the spot; and he was in a position to say, from recent letters received from Lord Wolseley, that this matter was occupying his attention. Beyond that he was not at present disposed to go, and the House would feel that to give premature information on the subject was not desirable. But he must protest against the fundamental error which ran through the hon. Member's speech that Her Majesty's Government, neither at this nor at any other time, attached any importance to establishing a stable and efficient Government at Khartoum, but simply desired to withdraw as rapidly as possible, regardless of consequences. One word more upon a certain portion of the hon. Member's speech. The hon. Member alluded to the Slave Trade, and one would imagine from what he said that Her Majesty's Government did not at all realize the importance of that matter. It would be easy for him (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), if he choose to dive into Blue Books, to weary the House with one quotation after another, showing that this question of Slavery and the Slave Trade had never been absent from the mind of Her Majesty's Government. But those very instructions to Lord Wolseley contained a prominent mention of the Slave Trade. He had just read one of them, which was—

"To prevent and discourage by all possible means any expeditions for the sale of and capture of slaves."

He was quite aware that the questions of domestic slavery and the Slave Trade, though closely connected, were in some respects distinct. It struck more at the roots of the habits and customs of the people to do away with domestic slavery than if any number of Firmans were issued to-morrow abolishing the Slave Trade. He was sure the House would recognize that Her Majesty's Government had not neglected these questions, and that they would believe that everything possible would be done, though the Government had not attempted to deceive the House as to the real difficulties of the task they had undertaken. He had thought it right to address these few observations to the House; but he did not believe it was the desire of hon. Members opposite themselves that he should attempt to follow the hon. Member for Eye over all the ground which he had travelled. The hon. Member had argued in every direction; and if he were to attempt to follow the hon. Member, he should have to detain the House at very great length. The condition of the Benches opposite was a proof that he was right in believing that it was not the intention of the House to-day to enter upon a debate on Egyptian affairs. He had, nevertheless, thought it his duty to protest against the attack of the hon. Member; and he had now only to thank the House for the attention with which they had listened to him, especially as he was labouring under a physical difficulty in addressing the House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I do not think it necessary to detain the House at any great length; but, after the observations of the noble Lord, it may be desirable to say a few words in justification of the course taken by my hon. Friend. The noble Lord has made it a matter of complaint that my hon. Friend has, in the course of his speech, dealt with a considerable number of topics, and taken a wide view of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government not only in Egypt, but in South Africa, Afghanistan, and the Soudan, and the noble Lord implied that that was rather wandering from the subject. But the case, as it presents itself to the mind of my hon. Friend and of a large number of persons in this House, and in the country, is that the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in these matters must be taken as a whole, and as throwing light upon each portion of their action; and when the question is raised as to whether any steps ought to be taken for facilitating the establishment of a stable and civilized Government at Khartoum, it is reasonable for anyone raising the question to point to the conclusion that, from the experience we have had of the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government, we have no reason to think that they have any intention to do anything at all. Therefore, my hon. Friend is right, and is perfectly consistent with himself, in drawing attention to these matters. The noble Lord said just now, with regard to the establishment of stable government at Khartoum and in the neighbourhood, that if my hon. Friend had quoted the despatches in the last Blue Book, it would be seen that instructions to do so had been issued. But these instructions were of the loosest character, and we require something more in order to see whether there is substance or consistency in them. There is one portion of the despatch which impresses on the Commander of the Expedition that he is not to go to Khartoum if he could possibly avoid it, and another in which permission is given him to assist, or to give encouragement, in the establishment of any Government, whatever it may turn out to be, which will present some appearance of stability, and will enter into some agreements with regard to the Slave Trade and other matters. That is really, after all, very little more than that pretence of doing a thing which has been so severely commented upon in the Scriptures—"Go in peace; be ye warmed, be ye filled," without doing anything to assist the needy. My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, as the noble Lord truly remarked, put down a Notice of Amendment which raises in a broader and larger form the question of our Egyptian policy as a whole, and has not thought it expedient to bring it forward. My hon. Friend thought it would be better that a serious debate of that character should take place when we have full information, which we shall get when the Government bring forward their Estimates, and explain what the cost of their policy may be. But we do not know when that may be done. We know, as we have just heard, that the Franchise Bill is to have precedence of everything; and we do not know when we shall have an opportunity of discussing those Egyptian matters. In the meantime, my hon. Friend observes that since the first night of the Session, when there was some conversation on the subject, new Papers have been laid before us; and very naturally, considering the amount of information he possesses on the subject, he has claimed the right of calling attention to the matter, and has expressed very clearly and with great ability his views of what has been done with regard to Khartoum. I agree with the noble Lord that for a full discussion of the subject the time will come best when we have before us the Vote which the Government are going to propose, and which must be accompanied by a full explanation of their policy. Looking at the fact that every day is of importance in these matters, and that the Government may from day to day commit the country to something which we should be sorry to see it committed to, I do not think it all unnatural or to be regretted that my hon. Friend should, before parting with the Address, have taken the opportunity of making some observations upon this very important subject.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he agreed that this was not a fitting occasion on which to debate the Egyptian Question. The greater part of the speech of the hon. Member for Eye was devoted to a glorification of General Gordon at the expense of Her Majesty's Government. Against General Gordon's motives and intentions he (Sir George Campbell) had not a word to say; but he thought it was patent on the face of the Blue Book that General Gordon's conduct was a mass of contradictions and inconsistencies, and the Government were quite justified in taking notice of these inconsistencies and contradictions when General Gordon urged upon them particular courses, and reproached them for not complying with his wishes. He was thoroughly convinced that the garrison of Khartoum would have been very much better without Gordon, and that they might have made their own terms with the rebels. There was no reason to suppose they would have been massacred, as there was no instance of the massacre of those who submitted to the Mahdi. General Gordon said he dare not leave Khartoum, because he was afraid the garrison would follow their natural bent and join the Mahdi. If that were their natural bent, there was no reason why they should not follow it. His belief was that it had been an unmitigated misfortune that General Gordon was ever sent to Khartoum at all; but being there, the Government were bound to do their best to get him away. He principally rose to declare his individual opinion that the instructions issued to Lord Wolseley were the best that could have been issued under the circumstances. The Government accepted the obligation to get General Gordon out of the scrape he had got into, and incidentally to do the best they could to enable the Egyptians shut up at Khartoum to get away. Looking to the career of Lord Wolseley, we might have confidence that he would not, for the sake of any glory to be got by fighting, carry the Expedition one step further than was necessary, and that he would bring it back as quickly and cheaply as he could, and with as little loss of blood as possible. The question of the administration of Khartoum was one of the impossibilities of the situation that we had brought upon ourselves by going to Egypt at all. We were not bound to spend blood and treasure for the purpose of holding territory which did not belong to it. If we could set up a decent Government there, we might do it; but, if we could not do that, we could not help it. The tone in which the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice) spoke of slavery indicated a sense of the difficulty of doing anything to diminish it, rather than a zeal for the mitigation of slavery. By the Law of August, 1884, slavery was made illegal in Egypt Proper, and severe penalties were attached to the infraction of the law. It might surely have been said that something had been done to give effect to the law, and to insure that it did not remain a dead letter.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he considered the instructions given to Lord Wolseley were such as had never been given to a General before. It was a most extraordinary thing that Lord Wolseley's instructions should have been, in part, drafted by himself. The form in which they were drawn up implied that General Gordon would retire from Khartoum to meet Lord Wolseley, and leave his garrison behind to be butchered by the Mahdi. That was an imputation which ought not to be cast upon General Gordon, and ought not to have appeared in the instructions. We knew that Gordon would not come away and leave those who had stood by him to be butchered. He knew from the character of General Gordon that he would remain at Khartoum to the bitter end. It was said that further instructions were to be sent through the Consul General at Cairo, and if such instructions had been sent, he desired to know how they had been worded? He felt convinced that Wolseley must go to Khartoum, because Gordon would not leave the garrison. If steps were to be taken to insure the safe retreat of the soldiers, the civil employés, and the women and children, who had been estimated to number from 8,000 to 15,000, had the Government thoroughly weighed all that was implied in such a retreat? That of Moses and the Israelites would be nothing to it, surrounded as the fugitives would be by the forces of the Mahdi. They could advance only at the rate of five or six miles a-day, and the furnishing of water and supplies would be a great difficulty. General Gordon could succeed only by remaining at Khartoum; by facing the Mahdi, beating him off, and scouring the country for miles round. Therefore, the orders that were given to Lord Wolseley required him to do a thing that was almost impossible. It was quite possible that General Gordon might be sent down to the Equator as a prisoner, unless the Government looked ahead. Unless a definite course was adopted and carried out by the Government, he much feared that before long we should hear of a great catastrophe.

MR. FINCH-HATTON said, he had no inclination to protract the debate unnecessarily; but the subject introduced by the Amendment had such urgent, pressing claims on the attention of the nation, that it must be considered of a most important character. If anything were wanted to justify the Motion made by the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), it would be found in the speech from the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice); and, listening to that speech, a curious effect must have been produced on the minds of hon. Members who remembered an answer given by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) last Session. The only two Members of the Government present during the speech of the hon. Member for Eye distinctly contradicted each other on a simple matter of fact—namely, the instructions to General Gordon to establish a settled Government at Khartoum. The words used by the noble Marquess opposite, on the 5th of August, were—

“It is probable that General Gordon, before retiring from Khartoum, might desire to establish a settled form of Government. That, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, would be exceeding his instructions. His mission, and his primary object, were to evacuate the Soudan. Certainly, no instructions were ever given to General Gordon to establish a settled form of Government.”—(3 Hansard, [29:] 1787.)

Then what said the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in his speech, in which he disclaimed any intention to reply to the hon. Member for Eye? He said the fundamental error of the hon. Member was that he ignored the fact that Her Majesty's Government had said they would establish a Government in Khartoum. Diametrically opposed to this was the statement of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, which was that no such instructions had been given.

MR. FINCH-HATTON said, he would accept the explanation, or admission, of the noble Lord. The hon. Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry de Worms), when the noble Marquess made the statement in August last, quoted the following from the instructions given to General Gordon—

“We trust Your Excellency will take most effective measures to establish an organized Government in the different Provinces of the Soudan, for the maintenance of order, and the suppression of the incitement to revolt.”

On the face of it, therefore, he (Mr. Finch-Hatton) was rather inclined to the opinion of the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; but the fact that there was this very divergence of opinion between two Members of the Government, amply justified the Amendment which had been brought forward. The noble Lord had accused the hon. Member for Travelling over a very wide field of discussion; and, no doubt, he did so, and it must become more wide as they considered the manner in which the Government had dealt with difficulties in different parts of the world. He (Mr. Finch-Hatton) would not attempt to follow the hon. Member; because, so far as he was aware, no apologist had successfully defended the course pursued by the Government, and, until that was done, it was not worth while to attack where there was no defence. There was no necessity to slay the slain. But it should be noted that the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State diverged equally wide of the Amendment, when he brought in the inevitable question of the Franchise Bill again as a block to proceeding further in this matter. Now, he (Mr. Finch-Hatton) failed to see what the Franchise Bill had to do with the policy of the Government at Khartoum, or the establishment of one in the Soudan. The noble Lord had, however, followed an illustrious example when he interposed this screen of the Franchise Bill. The Prime Minister in that speech, which would long remain memorable, when he spoke of the obstruction of the Opposition, reminded the House that there had been 17 nights of Egyptian debate, and expressed his astonishment, saying the question of Egypt was not one of pressing vital importance, but that one would have thought from the protraction of the debates that "Khartoum was in Yorkshire, and the Soudan in Caithness." Well, if that were the case, perhaps General Gordon might come within the sympathies of the right hon. Gentleman under the new centrifugal theory—"bringing people at a distance within the range of your sympathies;" or, perhaps, that theory was not for general application, but only to be applied when it was required to secure a disloyal Irish vote; but he considered this was a question of instant importance, for there was no knowing when it would have to be decided—perhaps, by telegraphic instructions—and there was no knowing, especially after the suppression of the debate promised towards the close of the Session, when the House might have the opportunity of discussing it. Therefore, there should be placed before the country the opinion of the House; and, if it could be obtained from Her Majesty's Government, a statement of their views whether or not, on leaving Khartoum, they intended to establish a stable, settled Government there. With regard to leaving Khartoum, so far as its continued occupation by British troops was concerned, hon. Members on both sides had made up their minds; but if General Gordon was not remaining there in order to provide for the establishment of such a Government, then what, in Heaven's name, was he waiting there for, and why did he go to Khartoum at all? The Government might reply, in the words of General Gordon, that he was waiting to get out; but if that was the case, why did he ever get in? Would it not have been much better to have kept him in this country than to have sent him to Khartoum, in order that after a certain time he might be got out again? If that was the case, we had wasted money with no object. Should it be said, in a couplet similar to that used about a King of France—

"The British Chief, with many thousand men, Went up the Nile and then came down again?"

It was surprising that the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State did not accept the Amendment, if the facts were as he stated them. The noble Lord laid stress upon the instructions given to Lord Wolseley; but, summed up in a word, they were all you "may" and not you "must." There were no instructions for the settlement of a Government in Khartoum. Her Majesty's Government, it was said, would be glad to see a settled Government there; and, no doubt, it would be a relief from several embarrassing questions. They were told that the main difficulty would consist in the selection of an individual, or a number of individuals, having sufficient authority to maintain order. What did the abandonment of Khartoum without the establishment of a settled Government there mean? It meant the loss of the whole of the money and lives which had been sacrificed ever since General Gordon set out from these shores. It meant the loss of millions of money to this country without a single counterbalancing result of any kind whatever; and, further, it meant the undoing of the work of the last 30 years carried out by such men as General Gordon in the interest of freedom and civilization. The only people who would benefit by the abandonment would be the slave-dealers, who would be free to follow their infamous trade. There must be many Egyptians, and perhaps Europeans, in the different garrisons to the south of Khartoum who were looking to England for help, but who, if Khartoum were abandoned, would be the first to be sacrificed. Let not the House or the country forget that if Khartoum and the Soudan were abandoned without a stable Government, they would abandon a country which had been for some years under a civilized form of government. He would ask whether history recalled a single instance of anything of the kind being done by a Power which claimed to be in the position of England; and whether, if it did recall such an instance, the perpetrators ranked among the benefactors of mankind? But there was another aspect of the case well worthy of the serious consideration of the House. Egypt at that moment was indebted to the amount of £8,000,000, and we should be expected either to find the money or the security. If we abandoned Khartoum without a settled form of Government, any Power which chose to take possession of it would be absolutely master of the Nile, able to divert its waters into the surrounding desert, and by so doing to turn the fruitful fields of Egypt into a barren wilderness in less than a month. If that were done, what would become of the security for our money? From a military point of view, Khartoum must always exercise very great effect upon the destinies of Egypt; and from a commercial point of view, it was the great emporium of the trade between Egypt and the Soudan; in fact, no one could go through the bazaars of Cairo without finding that the name of Khartoum was in every mouth. He wished that the House would give very careful attention to this Amendment, and that all hon. Members would think it their duty, on that occasion at least, to prefer the interests of their country and Empire to those of their Party. He trusted the House would think, with the hon. Member for Eye—to whom he (Mr. Finch-Hatton) thought the thanks of the House were due for having brought the subject forward—and many others, that, at any rate, the country ought to have a decided and definite statement from the Government whether or not

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Address to be presented to Her Majesty."

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE BALLYFORAN MURDER.

STATEMENT.

MR. SEXTON said, that before the Report of the Address was passed, he would call attention to a very remarkable statement of facts which had just come into his possession. The statement was made by a young Irishman—who, with his father, had been arrested on suspicion of being accessory to the murder known as the Ballyforan murder—and who had been deprived of his means of living by certain agents of the Crown in Ireland. It was the statement of Thomas Nolan, late prisoner in the Ballyforan murder case, and made in Boston, U.S.A., and was as follows:—

"I was arrested in connection with the Ballyforan murder case 24th February, 1884, one month after my father was arrested as an accessory to the same murder. I was arrested as I was leaving the Courthouse after the investigation on the evidence of a young man named M'Donnell, who swore he saw me on the road about a half-mile from the supposed scene of the murder. That evidence was false, and the young man who swore it could have no motive for so doing unless he was prompted and paid for it by the Crown. He further swore he saw my father, John Nolan, on the night of the murder speak to Michael Tansey, another prisoner. My father is still in prison on this false evidence. Neither my father nor myself could have any motive for being accessories to that unfortunate man's murder. We were always on the most friendly terms with him. But on account of our house being next to the supposed scene of the murder the police said we must know something about it, and for that reason procured false evidence against us in order to drive us to swear falsely against the other prisoners. On the night I was arrested I was visited by the Governor of the prison, Captain Mason, who asked me how I got into the hobble; he also asked me, if I knew anything, to turn round on the others and liberate myself and my father. I told him I knew nothing at all about it. Three weeks after I was arrested Sergeant O'Brien, of Ballyforan, asked me to give evidence against the others, and told me I should have the support of the Government. I told him I could give no evidence unless it was perjured evidence. This was in the grand jury room of County Courthouse, Galway. Four weeks after I was arrested (22nd March), the four other prisoners—namely, Tansy, Kennedy, Hannon, and my father, John Nolan, were brought out into the office of the gaol, and Mr. Bolton told them I had turned approver, and Sergeant O'Brien said he expected to get evidence from me. He had no reason whatever for saying it, unless it be to frighten Thomas Kennedy to turn round and swear against all, as they promised to save him if he turned approver. On this day (22nd March) I was taken out by my warder (Simcox) after the other prisoners. He was not in the plot. Just as I was going in on the office door, Sub-Inspector Joyce and the Deputy Governor ran out, and Joyce said 'For God's sake take him back, or the whole thing will be spoiled.' I knew then how the ground lay. Mr. Bolton was at work, others on the inside, telling them I was an approver. I was taken in and locked in my cell. I asked to be allowed to see Mr. Bowler, the solicitor for the defence; but I was denied the privilege, though he was in the prison office at the time. They told me he was gone. My mother called to see me that day and the next and was denied admission. After Mr. Bowler was gone I was taken out alone, and Mr. Paul, R.M., addressing me, said, 'Consequent on what Sergeant O'Brien has sworn you are remanded for further evidence.' I did not know what he swore; they did not tell me. I did not know what they told the other prisoners. I was hurried away again into the prison without being given time to ask a question. This was the fourth time I was remanded without any evidence being given against me. On the following day (Saturday, 23rd March), Sergeant O'Brien came into the prison, and himself and the Deputy Governor asked me would I not do something for the Crown that was paying me, saying I must know something about the murder. I told him I should have his conduct and that of the Deputy Governor Evans brought before the notice of Parliament in not allowing me to see Mr. Bowler, the solicitor who was employed for me, and making it appear that I turned an approver. Sergeant O'Brien again visited me in the prison on Sunday, 24th March. I asked him would he be satisfied if I swore to the truth. He said I would not be sworn unless I made a statement criminating the prisoners. I then handed him a written statement as follows:—

"I told him to keep that, and that it was the truth, and that I should swear to no other statement. I asked them several times to put the book in my hand, and that I would tell the truth, but they wanted me to give evidence against the other prisoners, and swearing the truth would be only contradicting the witness Thomas McDonnell. I was brought up by myself on the 6th day (Friday) of my incarceration, about 7 o'clock in the evening, and Mr. Paul, R.M., read a long piece of swearing done by Sergeant O'Brien against me in order to frighten me, and told me he must again remand me. Mr. Bolton, Crown Solicitor, said I must be sent for trial along with the others, and that I would not be discharged till both myself and my father should go before the judge and jury. During that week and the following I was kept in a cell separate from the other prisoners; though I requested to be allowed to go to exercise with the other prisoners I was denied leave to do so. I was several days without exercise. Now I always told the Crown I had neither hand, act, part, or knowledge in that murder. One of the warders (M'Ardle) used frequently to tell me that he was instructed by Sergeant O'Brien to tell me that I would be kept there until I would be either sent for trial or made a statement criminating the other prisoners. He also told me that it was no harm to swear false, that it was done every day, and the Crown did not care right or wrong. On the 4th of April I was taken out of the prison to the County Courthouse. Sergeant O'Brien came to me and said, 'I suppose you have heard that your school is gone?' 'Yes' said I. 'Well,' said he, 'the best thing you can do now is to turn round with the Crown. You have no business home.' He was sent to make offers to me by Bolton and Joyce. I repeatedly told him I knew nothing about it. 'Well,' said the magistrate, 'we are now going to send you for trial.' I was discharged shortly afterwards when they saw all their badgering was of no avail.

"After coming home from prison the children were being kept at home from school by their parents till I would be reinstated. My mind was disturbed both while I was in prison and after getting out, and the inspector and manager agreed to reinstate me when I should get better. I was so bad at this time that it was deemed necessary either to send me to the asylum or somewhere; so I resolved to come to America, as I was told the Crown were prompting Kennedy, one of the men in prison, to turn round and swear against me. Shortly before I left a report was circulated that I was going to swear against 100 men in the country for committing outrages and belonging to secret societies. Four young men secretly left the country at the time. One of them was none other than a Government spy, and never belonged to a secret society, and I believe he was paid by the Crown for running away, and making it appear that it was from me he was running away. I met two of the young men here. They told me they were told by the parish priest to run away. He told them he was informed of all through the Crown. The plot was got up by the Crown in order to prevent me from being reinstated in the school, in order, as Sergeant O'Brien said, of leaving no resource to fall back on but to turn round and become a perjured informer."

After the debates which had recently taken place in that House, he should not delay the House by offering a single word of comment on this statement. He left it to the judgment of the public, and he asked the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker), whether, considering the additional light thrown by this statement on the character and practices of the person lately restored to the office of Crown Solicitor of Ireland, and considering the inferences it enabled them to draw as to the methods by which convictions were obtained in certain cases in Ireland—whether the Government would at once cause an independent inquiry to be held into the truth of the statement he had read?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, as far as he could follow it, the statement read by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was the statement of the son of a man who was in gaol charged with murder. The statement charged four or five officials with attempting to procure this man's evidence. He had no information as to this statement. The man appeared to have gone to America, where in his safety he had written a statement which, under the circumstances, would be received with a considerable amount of distrust and suspicion.

Mr. SEXTON: After he had been released by the Crown in Ireland.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER), continuing, said, it was quite open to the hon. Member to send in the statement to the authorities, who would consider the matter.

Mr. BIGGAR said, the reply of the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland seemed to him to be an exceedingly lame one. The hon. and learned Gentleman said if the statement was sent in to the Government, they would make an inquiry into the case; but his hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) had read charges of a very severe nature, which only corroborated what had been said before with regard to the administration of justice in Ireland. It had been proved, on the most complete evidence, that what passed for administration of justice in Ireland was nothing but a farce, and the Government seemed to be heartily ashamed of it; but, at the same time, did not wish at present to confess their guilt, because they thought it would injure them in the eyes of the English electors, who would shortly have an opportunity of declaring on their character and conduct. His hon. Friend had very clearly pointed out the state of the case—namely, the system of trying to force men to swear falsely. He held very firmly the opinion that the Government were responsible, morally speaking.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) that it is not regular at this stage to bring on an ordinary debate. The principle of relevancy applies. The Question I have to put to the House is, "That this House do agree with the Committee in the said Address to be presented to Her Majesty;" and it would be contrary to the general principles of relevancy to allow a debate on the administration of justice in Ireland to arise on that Question.

Mr. BIGGAR: I will not pursue the subject further; but on the question of relevancy to the Address, I am of opinion that the Address does not—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have ruled that to be the case, and I must put the Question.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND said, he regretted very much that the Government was not in a position to make any more definite declaration than that made by the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland with reference to the very serious statement read by his hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton). He must say that he heard that statement with feelings of astonishment.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Redmond) is now repeating what I have ruled to be out of Order in the case of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar). I shall put the Question to the House, "That this House do agree with the Committee in the said Address to be presented to Her Majesty."

The House divided:—Ayes 134; Noes 18: Majority 116.—(Div. List, No. 6.)

Address agreed to.

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

POOR LAW GUARDIANS (IRELAND)

BILL.—[BILL 9.]

(Mr. John Redmond, Mr. O'Brien, Mr. Gray, Mr. Barry.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that this duty would not impose upon him the necessity of delivering anything in the shape of a long speech. He would begin by saying frankly that he and his hon. Friends laboured under a disadvantage in presenting the Bill to the House, inasmuch as it was not at present in the hands of hon. Members. He would admit that, in the case of an ordinary Bill, that might be a fatal objection to proceeding with the second reading; but he submitted to hon. Members that, in regard to this Bill, such an objection was not a fatal one. What was the history of the Bill? Time after time it had been introduced in the House, and over and over again its principle had been admitted. Last year, when it was introduced, it was greeted with the well-nigh universal approval of the House, and it commanded the support of Irish Members of nearly every section. The hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) had criticized several parts of the Bill; but it was finally, upon second reading, carried unanimously. It was amended in that House in Committee, and Amendments were made in accordance with the wishes of the Government, so that, finally, the Bill was moulded in such a manner as to meet with the unanimous approval of that Assembly. He would now appeal to the Government not to press a technical objection against the present Bill, because it was not in the hands of Members. In the eyes of the Government it should not be considered a fatal objection, because they themselves last year expressed, in an emphatic manner, their urgent desire to get this Bill as it stood passed into law. The people of Ireland would regard that declaration on their part with great scepticism if they now opposed the second reading on the merely technical ground that the Bill had not been printed and placed in the hands of Members. The Bill was identical in every particular with the measure which left the House of Commons last year with the approval of all sections of the House. He therefore did not think it necessary to dwell upon its principle, which had been explained over and over again. It introduced into the election of Poor Law Guardians the system of election by ballot, to which there could be no valid objection, as the system had been already adopted in Parliamentary elections. It also provided for the abolition of proxy voting, and the diminution of the relative number of ex-officio Guardians on the Poor Law Boards. The system, as it had existed up to the present time in Ireland, had been worked in such a way that the landed interest in the country were able to exercise an influence which was neither right nor just. First of all, by the system of open voting, the landed interest of the country was able to exercise an undue influence on elections; secondly, by the system of proxy voting, a number of absentee landlords were enabled to hand over their proxies in a bundle to their agents, who were allowed to fill them up as they choose, and in this way to exercise a baleful and unjust influence in elections. By the system which prevailed in Ireland the ex officio Guardians formed at least one-half of the Boards of Guardians throughout the country; while, by the system which prevailed in England, the proportion of ex officio Guardians was only one-third. He could assign no reason why the proportion should be larger in Ireland than it was at present in England. He ventured to appeal to the Government, especially after the action which they had been obliged to take—he presumed in the interests of their Party—in regard to Irish affairs, not to press a mere technical objection to the Bill; but having declared their warm approval of its principle, and their indignation because it was defeated in “another place,” to assent to the second reading of the measure. He had felt the great disadvantage under which the right hon. Gentleman the new Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had laboured in being obliged to remain mute for the last few days. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman’s first speech, in which he stated that an odious official for Ireland had been reinstated, was calculated to make a bad impression. He (Mr. J. Redmond) would, therefore, be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would take the opportunity of mitigating this bad impression by allowing this Bill to be read a second time, and he would now move that it be so read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. John Redmond.)

MR. ELTON said, that if the Bill was in the House, he would be the last to propose any technical objection to it, seeing that it was discussed upon a former occasion when introduced into the House by the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. John Redmond). It was, however, quite obvious that there were a number of important matters to be considered in connection with the Bill which were not before the House; and he would, therefore, move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. WARTON said, he rose for the purpose of seconding the Motion. He had called the attention of the House last Session to the practice of bringing in a Bill without its being printed, which, he thought, most dangerous and objectionable. He was ready to take the word of the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. John Redmond), that this Bill was identical with the Bill of last Session; but, as a matter of principle, measures ought not be read without the House knowing what they were reading, and they ought to be careful not to establish dangerous precedents. Moreover, the House was put in a false and even ridiculous position by being asked to read what they had not actually before them.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Elton.)

COLONEL NOLAN, in supporting the Motion for the second reading, said, that by the happy accident of the early close of the discussion on the Address, the Irish Members had obtained a chance of bringing on the Bill that day, and he hoped that the Government would show itself in earnest by supporting them upon so extremely important a measure, which had been passed almost unanimously by that House, and thrown out by the House of Lords last Session in company with the Franchise Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) urged that they ought not to read the Bill until it had been printed; but he (Colonel Nolan) presumed that as soon as it was in print the hon. and learned Member would, as usual, immediately put a block on it. After the second reading, Irish Members would undertake not to press the Committee stage until the measure had been printed. If it was absurd to read a Bill before it was printed, it was an absurdity which was committed every day, for Bills were always read a first time before they were in the hands of Members.

MR. GIBSON said, that the hon. and gallant Member for Galway County (Colonel Nolan) had called on the Government and the House to show the people of Ireland that they were in earnest about that Bill; but the hon. Members who were in charge of it had not shown that they were themselves particularly in earnest about it, inasmuch as though that was the 14th day of the Session, the Bill was not in print. If they had been they would have had it printed before this. It was impossible to ask the House to proceed with legislation when they had not a single line of the Bill before them, and having merely to rely on what occurred in debate last Session at 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning. It was not quite correct to say that the Bill last Session left that House having the unanimous approval of all sections of the House. No doubt, some of its important provisions were not then objected to; but there were many other provisions contained in it, some introduced on Amendments, which were seriously and strongly opposed, and they would probably be as strongly opposed again. It was unreasonable to expect the House to proceed with the discussion of a Bill with which they were not acquainted; and it was nothing to the purpose to tell them that before its next stage they would have the Bill before them. They could not now proceed gravely to its second reading without setting a most serious and lamentable precedent. He did not disparage the importance of the measure, or the way in which it had been presented by the hon. Member for New Ross; and he should himself be ready to discuss it with perfect fairness whenever it came properly before the House; but he was not in a position to do that now, and he presumed that those who were responsible for the conduct of the Business in the House would join him in supporting the Motion for Adjournment.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that, when a similar Bill was brought forward last Session, they were told that it was identical with a measure which had been proposed in the previous year. Nevertheless, there were several rather serious differences between those two Bills, and the opponents of the second reading were then able to point those differences out. But they were not in a position to do the same now, the present Bill not being in print. It was all very well to take things on trust; but that was not the way to do business either in the House or out of it. In a matter of this importance it was necessary that they should have the Bill before them. He supported the adjournment, contending that the Prime Minister had stated that no Business would be taken between the conclusion of the Address and the second reading of the Franchise Bill. Had he (Mr. Macartney) been present when the Bill was before the House last Session, he would have opposed it tooth and nail. There were hardly any Members of the Conservative Party present to discuss the question; because, on asking at the Vote Office, they had learnt that the Bill was not printed. Seeing, therefore, that they had gone away with the conviction that it would not come on that evening, it would be most unfair to proceed with the discussion now.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, it was useless for any hon. Member to pretend that he was unacquainted with the provisions of the Bill, for he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) held in his hand a copy which had been taken from the file which contained the Bill as it was sent up to the House of Lords last Session. He, therefore, hoped it would be permitted to proceed.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that he sincerely and deeply regretted the circumstances under which the second reading of the Bill had been moved, nor could he well see why they had been allowed to arise. The Bill had been introduced some days ago, and if it was an exact reproduction of the Bill before the House of Lords last Session, it would have been all the easier on that account to have had it printed. In spite of this, not only was it not in the hands of hon. Members, but it was not yet in the hands of the printer; at least, it was not when he last made inquiries. This was a Bill which the Government regarded with not only a great, but with a benevolent, interest. They were in favour of the main principles of the Bill; they had supported them last Session, and were prepared to do so again; and it would have given him personally and the Government the most sincere pleasure to have supported it at this and at every other stage, so far as they found the Bill of this Session carrying out the provisions of the Bill of last Session. But, as far as his experience went in that House, and it went back a good many years, he believed it to be the invariable practice of the House to refuse its assent to the second reading of Bills which it had not seen, and which had not been printed. There might, possibly, be one or two exceptions to that rule; but, if there were, it would be found that they were in the case of small Bills of one or two clauses, and not in the case of a measure of such a large and comprehensive character as this. He must confess that, in his opinion, that rule was a salutary and proper one; and, as a general principle, he thought that the House would agree that they should not be called upon to pass the second reading of this Bill, which they had not seen. He was sincerely anxious that this Bill should pass, as his Predecessor had been, and the Government were themselves so disposed to meet the views of the hon. Gentleman who proposed it, that they would not themselves have thought of raising this objection. It had, however, been raised, and it was in accordance with the almost invariable rule of the House. In these circumstances, he had to consider what was the invariable practice of the House with regard to Bills of this importance, and he must most reluctantly say that he could not support the Motion for the immediate second reading of the Bill. The blame was on the shoulders of those who were in charge of the Bill. It was a Bill that would have been very easy to get printed, and at the time there was no pressure on the printers.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) had used a childish argument. It was perfectly apparent to anybody who looked at the Votes that morning, that the Poor Law Guardians (Ireland) Bill would be reached, and therefore there was no excuse for the absence of the Tory Party. He (Mr. Sexton) had noticed that fewer Tories were present on more important occasions. There was a certain convenience apparent now for the second time in the recent changes in the Office of

Chief Secretary for Ireland. It would have been very difficult for the right hon. Gentleman who last held that Office (Mr. Trevelyan) to have made the speech which had just been delivered. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) seemed to be ignorant of the fact that the Government accepted last Session not merely the main principle on the second reading, but in Committee, and on the stage of Report, the Government went much further, and assented to every clause, every word, every letter, and every comma in the Bill. There were several copies of the Bill of last Session which could have been seen, and that Bill was identical with the present one, and it had the full support of Irish Members, irrespective of the side of the House they sat upon. The fact of its not being printed was a matter of the purest inadvertence, and he was sorry to see the Government taking advantage of it. He also regretted, for the sake of the reputation of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that he had been so ungenerous as to shift the blame for its rejection from the shoulders of the Government to the shoulders of the Irish Party. The Irish Party could not possibly have foreseen a few days ago that the Bill would come on that evening. This was rather an unpromising beginning for the right hon. Gentleman. It was very unfortunate that, on the second or third day of the appearance of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he should take the course which he had adopted. He first opened his official career by restoring to official employment a most obnoxious person; and, in the second place, he endeavoured to shift on to the Irish Members the blame of causing the rejection of a Bill, the value of which was admitted by the Government with which he was connected. The right hon. Gentleman stated in effect that he was in a dilemma; and, indeed, he was to be commiserated with, for he accepted a most difficult Office, and yet, on the second day of his appearance, he confessed that he was in a dilemma. That being so, he (Mr. Sexton) believed that the day was not far postponed when he would be in a position of disaster.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY, in supporting the Motion for the adjournment, said, he had never heard a more unfair speech than the one just delivered, and he must, therefore, take the opportunity of stating his opinion that the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) deserved to receive at least a little consideration and fair play. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) would just refer to one point that had been alluded to on the other side of the House. Mention had been made of the re-appointment of Mr. George Bolton, an incident which he, for one—

MR. SPEAKER: The Question before the House is the adjournment of the debate, and not the appointment of Mr. George Bolton. I must ask the hon. Member to adhere to the Question.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he should not have alluded to that subject except in reference to what fell from the hon. Gentleman opposite, and all he wished to say about it was that he did not support all the acts of the Government, or of the right hon. Gentleman who lately assumed the Office. He had frequently stated elsewhere and in the House of Commons that, when the Irish Members endeavoured to get legislation through, they should conform to the requirements and Rules of the House. The requirements of the House must be adhered to. That was not the first time that Irish Members had failed to get their Bills printed; and it was their own fault if they could not proceed with this measure, owing to their not having complied with the Forms of the House. Last year, in the case of the Labourers' (Ireland) Bill, a similar thing took place, and, whilst not saying a word against the measure now in question, he desired to express the opinion generally to which he had now given utterance.

MR. R. POWER said, he could not congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) on the championship which he had just won. He (Mr. R. Power) was disappointed with the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and he regretted that instead of taking, as he had, a technical objection, he had not frankly and generously allowed the second reading. It was nothing less than absurd that hon. Gentleman should get up and say that they were perfectly ignorant of the provisions of the Bill. It was the same Bill as was before the House last year, and everybody knew what its principles were. They had a limited number of copies of the Bill. They could explain the principles and the provisions of the Bill in a short space of time, and he would, therefore, appeal to the Government to yield the point, and permit the Bill to be read a second time.

ORDER IN DEBATE—SUSPENSION OF A MEMBER (NEW RULES OF PRO-CEDURE—RULE 2).

MR. O'DONNELL said, the House had, at that moment, an opportunity of doing a piece of useful legislation. That was a Bill supported by Her Majesty's Government, and it was most extraordinary, he ventured to submit, to find Her Majesty's Government taking advantage of and seizing on this technical point and plea, to put off the second reading of the Bill, in face of their loudly-advertised zeal for "practical legislation" in that House. He would hope that the Prime Minister would maintain the dignity and independence of his character, and say a word now in favour of practical legislation, by allowing the Bill to pass the second reading. The House had been informed, in no ambiguous terms, that very drastic measures would be taken, if necessary, to further practical legislation, and enable the House—

MR. SPEAKER: The Question before the House is, "That the Debate be adjourned;" and the hon. Member has no right to travel into other subjects.

MR. O'DONNELL: The Business before the House, I submit, is the proposal to adjourn the debate, and thus adjourn the consideration of this important piece of practical legislation; and I appeal to the Prime Minister, who says that practical legislation is the chief object of Parliament, to give us an example and proof of his sincerity on that point, and of his well-advertised zeal on that subject, to throw over his subordinate, and support the just claim of the Irish Members to have this most important reform proceeded with on the present opportunity. I would on that question, as an additional argument for proceeding with the Bill, remind Her Majesty's Government that, in this Session already, a most important Irish Bill was swept away, owing to their having taken away from the Irish Members their last Wednesday.

MR. SPEAKER: Again I must remind the hon. Gentleman that he is travelling from the Question before the House, which is the adjournment of the debate. I beg that he will not repeat it.

MR. O'DONNELL: I wish, then, to consult you on the question of Order. What I am endeavouring to bring forward, as a reason why the Government should not adjourn this Bill, is that the Government have already taken an important day from the Irish Members. Am I not allowed to use that argument in support of the views which the Irish Members put forward on this question? Surely, Mr. Speaker—

MR. SPEAKER: It is not the Question. The hon. Gentleman has again travelled from the Question. I am to judge as to whether the hon. Member is, or is not, confining his remarks to the Question, and if the hon. Gentleman deviates, in my opinion, from the Question, it is my duty to tell him so. I have already twice told him that he is diverging from the Question.

MR. O'DONNELL: I am absolutely convinced that I was bringing forward arguments in support of the plea that this Bill be not adjourned, and I respectfully protest—[Cries of "Order!"] I respectfully protest—

MR. SPEAKER: Order!

MR. O'DONNELL: Sir, I respectfully protest against your interference with the legitimate course of the discussion. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must call upon you to resume your seat, on account of the irrelevancy of your observations to the Question before the House.

MR. O'DONNELL: Mr. Speaker, Sir, I protest—I would say—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Again I must call upon you to resume your seat.

MR. O'DONNELL: Sir, I wish to protest against this use of the power of calling on Members to sit down when using legitimate arguments, and thus stop their observations—["Hear, hear!" and "Order!"—and as you have taken that step, I wish you to—[Cries of "Name him!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I have twice—three times—called the hon. Member's attention to the fact that his observations were not relevant, and that he was wandering from the subject of the debate.

MR. O'DONNELL: I was not. I was not.

MR. SPEAKER: I did so in terms which are before the House. You have not thought proper to pay any attention to my ruling — [Ministerial cheers]— and I now Name you, Mr. O'Donnell, as disregarding the authority of the Chair.

MR. GLADSTONE: You, Mr. Speaker, having Named the hon. Member, I consider it my duty, upon that Naming, to move that Mr. O'Donnell be suspended from the service of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. O'Donnell be suspended from the service of the House."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. SPEAKER: The Question is, "That Mr. O'Donnell be suspended from the service of the House." As many as are of that opinion say "Aye;" the contrary, "No." I think the "Ayes" have it. ["No, no!"]

MR. O'DONNELL: You have played your expected part, Monsieur le President.

The hon. Member then withdrew.

The House divided:—Ayes 163; Noes 28: Majority 135.—(Div. List, No. 7.)

Question again proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The following is the Entry in the Votes:—

MR. SPEAKER called the attention of the House to continued irrelevance on the part of Mr. O'Donnell, Member for Dungarvan, and directed the honourable Member to discontinue his Speech:—

The honourable Member, nevertheless, having persisted in speaking:—

MR. SPEAKER named him as disregarding the authority of the Chair.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. O'Donnell be suspended from the service of the House."—(Mr. Gladstone.)—

The House divided; Ayes 163, Noes 28.

MR. PARNELL: I wish, Sir, to point out to the House that the Bill, the adjournment of which is now sought by a coalition of the Front Government Bench and Front Opposition Bench, was read a second time last Session in this House, and passed through all its stages without any practical opposition whatever, and was sent to the House of Lords, and then thrown out on second reading. In the Session before last also, this Bill received the second reading; so that it cannot possibly be contended, in support of the Motion for Adjournment, that the House is unacquainted with its contents. A pledge has been given by my hon. Friend who brought in the Bill (Mr. John Redmond) that it would be, and is, the identical Bill which last Session left this House and was thrown out by the House of Lords. I ask, under these circumstances, what can the Government be in doubt about? If they have agreed to the principle of the Bill, why should they support a Motion for Adjournment, on the ground that they do not know what the Bill is? [An hon. MEMBER: The new Chief Secretary for Ireland.] If they believe that the Bill is the Bill of last Session, and has been stated distinctly, the tenability of the position taken by the Front Government Bench and some of their followers entirely disappears. If the Bill is not considered to-day, and if the adjournment is granted, all chances of its passing this Session will have gone by. I addressed an appeal towards the close of last Session to the Prime Minister with reference to the Bill. After it was thrown out, I asked him, would he include this measure in the list of subjects to be brought forward during the Autumn Session? The right hon. Gentleman stated that he desired to see the measure passed, when asked, at the close of last Session, to bring it forward as well as the Representation of the People Bill. He could not, however, see his way to including the measure in the Government programme. We do not, however, ask the Government to take up the Bill and make it portion of their programme—we simply ask that the opportunity which we have obtained by chance should be given to us of obtaining another stage for the Bill. I do not believe that we have been met by the Government in a candid way from first to last. I cannot see why they should assist the hon. Gentleman who has moved the adjournment of the debate (Mr. Elton). The Chief Secretary for Ireland said that he would not have moved the adjournment of the debate; but, its having been moved by a Member upon the Conservative side of the House, he felt bound to support it. I cannot see the force of that argument; for, if it was right that the adjournment of the debate should be moved, he should have been prepared to move it; but, if it was not right that the adjournment should be moved, I do not see how he can escape the odium of having obstructed the measure by leaving to others the adoption of that course. The action of the right hon. Gentleman in supporting the adjournment gives colour to the suspicions entertained in Irish circles last Session, that the Government would be glad to see the Bill opposed and thrown out, although they did not wish to incur the odium of opposing it themselves. Hon. Members on these Benches are most anxious to see the measure passed into law.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he deeply regretted that the adjournment of the debate should have been moved, though he did not believe in the aspersions which had been cast upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). If ever there was a case in which the Rules of the House should be departed from, this was one; and he therefore trusted that the Government would see their way to allow the second reading of the Bill, although it had not been printed, and, therefore, not presented to hon. Members. The Government should remember that the opposition was made from the opposite side of the House. He hoped sincerely that even still the Government would see their way to allow the Bill to be read a second time. It was argued that the Bill was not printed; but still they should remember that it stood in peculiar circumstances, for it was exactly the same Bill as had been so thoroughly discussed and passed last year. There was, moreover, a general consensus of opinion in Ireland that the main features of the Bill should be passed into law.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that after what the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had said, that the Government were liable to incur the responsibility of joining in the negative on the Motion now before the House—that was, supporting the Motion for the adjournment of the debate—he felt it impossible to leave his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) under that responsibility. The hon. Member for the City of Cork had done what he (Mr. Gladstone) thought it was always a pity to do—that was to say, he had given a painful and odious colour to the act of his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. He accused the Government of a secret desire to oppose the Bill, which they were unwilling to display openly. He (Mr. Gladstone) might say, however, that it appeared to him that the whole matter was one which concerned the Forms and Rules of the House, respecting which it seemed that there were a great number of questions in which hon. Gentlemen might exercise their own discretion as to standing or not standing on a point of Form or Rule. The hon. Member had laid down the doctrine that it was impossible to be right in acceding to a demand from another quarter to do what one would not do himself. But he (Mr. Gladstone) could not assent to that doctrine, for he had sometimes acceded to demands from the hon. Member for the City of Cork himself. He should be very glad, he might tell the hon. Member for the City of Cork, if, under the circumstances, that objection were not taken—namely, that the Bill was not printed. At the same time, he must say that he thought hon. Gentlemen who were interested in the Bill, and especially hon. Gentlemen who desired to oppose the Bill, and who read that morning on the list of Orders of the Day—"Poor Law Guardians (Ireland) Bill"—knowing the Bill had not been printed, were perfectly justified in the assumption that it would not come on. That was a point of Form with regard to which he must, in all fairness and equity, say that all those hon. Gentlemen who took an interest, and especially those who took a hostile interest, in the Bill, were justified in the assumption that it would not come on at all, because it was not printed, and they had, therefore, absented themselves from the House. Under those circumstances, it was a point of equity to acquiesce in the objection so taken. He was very sorry that the hon. Member for the City of Cork also laid upon him (Mr. Gladstone) the disagreeable imputation that he was a concealed enemy of the Bill, and dared not avow his hostility to it. He must bear the ill-will and odium of that imputation, such as it was, trusting to his general character that he might be able to survive it. If hon. Gentlemen should think it necessary to insist upon the objection that the Bill had not been printed, he could not vote against them, although he should have been glad if the objection had not been raised.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he could not see the ground for the objection on the point of equity. All the opponents of the measure were present and had spoken; and it was, in addition, the identical measure which had been passed through the House last year. It could not be urged that in this case any person had been taken by surprise. He was unable to see the slightest equity in the objections of the Prime Minister, who, in the course he was taking, was simply doing what he yesterday complained that others were doing—putting obstacles in the way of practical legislation.

MR. BARRY said, he regretted extremely that the Bill was not printed for second reading. It had, however, been brought forward unexpectedly, and they had been unprepared; but the objections which had been raised on that account were both flimsy and technical, for he could assure hon. Members there was not the slightest variation in any details of the Bill from that of last year.

MR. GRAY said, he had come to the conclusion that the positions taken up by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) and the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. Gladstone), in supporting the Motion for an adjournment, were purely personal ones. The Prime Minister had stated that he had reluctantly come to the conclusion to support the Motion for Adjournment. By that, the right hon. Gentleman, he (Mr. Gray) presumed, intended to convey that he could not see his way to vote against the adjournment, for he could understand the Prime Minister not wishing to put himself in direct opposition to the point raised. He believed that the common sense of the House, especially of hon. Members below the Gangway who advocated Radical principles, would see that, upon this occasion, they were free to vote according to their consciences. He could quite understand the position of the Prime Minister, who did not wish to oppose the Motion on a point of equity. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman and the Members of the Treasury Bench to allow the Members of the Radical Party to vote on this question according to the dictates of their consciences. If the permission were given, the obstructive Motion, which had been brought forward by a Member whose constituency were not interested in the subject-matter of the Bill, would be defeated. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland

(Mr. Walker), who had expressed himself in favour of the Bill, was free now to vote as he desired. He thought even the hon. Member for Dublin City (Dr. Lyons) might, under the circumstances, see his way to vote with the Irish Members.

MR. M'COAN said, that, no doubt, a keen sense of the iron discipline under which the hon. Member for Carlow himself spoke and voted, explained his sneer as to the freedom of Members on that side of the House to vote as they liked. But he (Mr. M'Coan) assured the hon. Member that, for one, he required no such permission, but intended to vote against the adjournment without asking the leave of anyone, and notwithstanding anything the Prime Minister might have said. Having in two successive Sessions supported the Bill, he would now do so again, as his opinion of the measure remained unchanged.

DR. LYONS said, he would ask what they were to vote upon, as there was not even a Bill in manuscript before the House? He would suggest that hon. Members should take the Bill which passed that House by a large majority last Session, and endorse it with the names of the Mover and Seconder; the House, then, would have something to proceed upon. But to call upon them to vote for an imaginary Bill was only trifling with the House.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he rose to a point of Order. A copy of the Bill as it was when sent to the House of Lords had been placed in the hands of the Government.

MR. SPEAKER: That is not a point of Order.

The House divided:—Ayes 130; Noes 97: Majority 33.—(Div. List, No. 8.)

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND)—REAPPOINTMENT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

QUESTION.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Can the noble Lord the Member for Flintshire (Lord Richard Grosvenor) say when he intends to move the reappointment of the Labourers' (Ireland) Committee?

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR: I will confer with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, and it will be his duty, I believe, to move it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Can the hon. and learned Gentleman answer now?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I will move it to-morrow.

SUPPLY.

Resolved, That this House will, upon Friday, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolved, That this House will, upon Friday, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Earl Cowley, after the death of his father.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ADJOURNMENT.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, seeing my noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) in his place, I have a request to make to him on behalf of my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty (the Earl of Northbrook). I am sure he will regret, and will not be surprised, that after the hard work and the long journey of my noble Friend, he has been attacked by a malady not altogether unknown to some of your Lordships; and although it is not of a very serious description, it makes it exceedingly difficult for him to come down to the House. If it is equally convenient to my noble Friend, I would ask him to postpone his Motion as to the Colonial Possessions and Garrisons Abroad until to-morrow.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I am very sorry to hear the cause of the absence of my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty. Of course, I will postpone my Motion. Perhaps the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) will allow me to fix a day for its discussion after consultation with some of my Friends—probably, some day next week.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: In consequence of the statement as to the indisposition of the First Lord of the Admiralty (the Earl of Northbrook), I beg to give Notice that I will postpone my Question as to an inquiry into the strength and condition of the Naval Forces.

Subsequently,

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in consequence of the postponement of the Notices for to-morrow, there will be no Business done; and, therefore, I propose, in the manner I did the other day, to move the adjournment of the House from this evening until Monday.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN, in rising to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to join with a Committee of the Commons to inquire into the condition of the trade and commerce of the country," said, that he should have to ask the House to give him a little time and attention while he attempted to deal as shortly as he could with a very difficult subject, because, in asking for a Parliamentary inquiry into the condition of trade, it was necessary for him to show that the circumstances of the case were very grave; that the country was suffering from something more serious than one of those ordinary and transitory fluctuations to which trading communities were liable; and that the time of Parliament was not to be taken up in an unnecessary inquiry. He did not know how far the existence of serious depression would be admitted, for until quite recently it was denied by some of the highest authorities. The period of prosperity came to a close in 1873. In 1874 a period of depression set in which, notwithstanding occasional slight reactions, had lasted to the present date. Yet for a long time statements relative to the depression of trade were met with flat denial. Thus, as late as August 1, 1881, The Times said that—

"The depressed talk which is current is most unfounded, and the real prosperity of our national industries and the real well-being of our people at the present time ought to be generally recognized."

In the following month the same journal stated that there was hardly a trade or a manufacturing district "which was not doing well." Mr. Giffen, of the Board of Trade, constantly denied the existence of depression. Speaking at the Mansion House in October, 1882, the President of the Board of Trade said that "this country was on the eve of a period of great prosperity," and as late as last January he said at Newcastle that "trade was now fairly good." It was to be hoped that the knowledge of the President of the Board of Trade as to the causes of depression was more accurate than his estimate as to its extent. Yet, while these attempts were being made to lull the nation into false security, evidence was not wanting to justify the fears of those who were most alarmed at the signs of the times—evidence which had accumulated until it was now impossible any longer to deny that the depression was of a most serious nature. Let their Lordships look at the enormous and increasing excess of imports over exports. He was aware that by a certain school of economists the fact that imports exceeded exports in value was looked upon as a sign of prosperity. It was so to the same extent as the prosperity of an individual who succeeded to an estate known to produce £10,000 a-year, was proved by the fact that he spent £15,000 a-year. The excess might come out of profits derived from some unknown source, or it might come out of capital, or partly from capital and partly from profits. If it came out of capital, it was entirely bad. If it came out of profits on capital invested abroad, which had been or might be invested at home, it was partially bad—bad as far as the working classes were concerned. It was good only if the profits were derived from investments abroad which could not possibly, under any circumstances, be profitably made at home. The excess of value of imports over exports was, to a large extent, accounted for by the profits of the carrying trade, which was formerly in a flourishing condition. But, unfortunately, the carrying trade, and all the numerous industries connected with it, had now followed the sad example of other trades, and showed itself smitten with the same disease. Let them consider the condition of our other great trades. The cotton industry was stagnant. The output was still large, but the rate of increase had been most seriously checked. Stagnation had succeeded healthy growth, and stagnation was bound to intervene between growth and actual decay. Messrs. Ellison & Co., unimpeachable authorities, stated that the consumption of raw cotton had increased since the year 1872-3 only 2.72 per cent. In other words, the great cotton trade had almost ceased to grow. And that was not all, for we knew from many sources that the profit of the trade, such as it was, had fallen almost to the vanishing point. The iron trade was no better off. In 1882 there were 566 furnaces in blast in England. In 1883 the number was reduced to 543, so that 23 furnaces were extinguished in one year. We had not far to look for the cause. Sir John Brown, the head of a very eminent firm in Sheffield, put the case clearly. He said—

"Our former customers have become our competitors, and not only sell against us, but undersell us, not merely in neutral markets, but under our very noses at home."

The noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville), speaking at a meeting of the Iron and Steel Institute, in October, 1881, stated that in four years—from 1874 to 1879—there had been a reduction in the quantity of steel and iron we exported of 25 to 30 per cent, and in the value of 50 per cent. He said—

"That reduction in value represents to the iron trade of this country a net value of something like £40,000,000 a-year, so that during those four years no less a sum than £160,000,000 was lost to the iron trade."

Since that time, the trade had gone from bad to worse. The woollen trade had also suffered. At present that industry was enjoying a revival, but that revival was due to causes which could not last. The coal trade, which, owing to very natural causes, held out stoutly, was weakening, and so were the great industries connected with shipbuilding. The same tale of depression might be told of every industry in the land. The position was well and accurately defined by The Economist in its review of the trade of 1883. The Economist confessed that the year was "one of disappointment." It said—

"With a few exceptions, which may almost be counted on the fingers of one hand, there runs through the long series of trade reports the same unvarying complaint of lessened returns to those by whom the trade of the country is conducted."

Well, the state of trade had not changed for the better during the present year. Distress had penetrated below the class of capitalists, and was making itself felt with terrible severity among the great mass of people engaged in trade. At Sunderland there were, it was said, 11,000 men out of work; at Glasgow, over 4,000; on the Tyne and Wear, about 25,000; at Jarrow, hundreds of families were on the point of starvation; and in Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire trade was bad, and it was feared that in a very short time 10,000 men would be out of work in that district. About 60,000 men were employed, on an average, in the London Docks; of that number one-third were out of work, and one-third working four days a-week only. The wages of those at work had been generally reduced. The instances which he had given showed that some 200,000 or 250,000 human beings depending upon our main industries for employment were deprived of the means of subsistence. That was serious enough; but it must not be forgotten that even if he could furnish the total number of men out of work, statistics of the unemployed did not reveal the true state of trade. Masters preferred putting all their hands on short time to discharging any portion of them. That was the case in Staffordshire, Lancashire, and other great industrial centres. So much for what he might term the great trades, the industries upon which, putting aside agriculture, we depended mainly, not only for national well-being, but for national existence. In the case of these great industries the roots were deeply struck into the soil, the capital invested was enormous, the wealth at the back of them gigantic. Their power of resistance was great, and yet they had yielded slowly to the enervating lassitude of disease. It was only natural to expect that industries of comparatively minor importance should more rapidly succumb. The sugar trade was in great straits, and many other industries—such, for example, as were connected with the sale of silk, gloves, musical instruments, &c.—were either dead or in a dying condition. He had touched upon the conditions of these various trades, not because he meant to say that the decline or even extinction of any one of them must of necessity prove a national calamity, but because he wished to impress upon the House that the whole commercial, trading, mining, manufacturing community was suffering. The decline of any particular trade might mean merely the transference of capital and labour from an unprofitable to a profitable undertaking, an operation which, although it might cause temporary distress, might eventually be beneficial to the nation. But if all industries were languishing, and if in each case the decline was owing to the fact that in that particular trade capital could no longer be profitably employed, the inference was very different. Such a state of things proved that the capital invested was becoming unprofitable, which meant national ruin. This question of the value of a trade, the question whether it was profitable or unprofitable, was one of the most profound and vital importance. It was impossible to form a sound opinion concerning it by the study of statistics and the perusal of Board of Trade Returns. We might estimate the output in a large industry; we might ascertain correctly the volume of the trade, but we had no means of proving whether the capital in money and labour employed in it was profitably employed. The prosperity of a trade depended not upon the bulk of the articles produced in it, but upon the exchangeable value of those articles. Statistics could help us little in this matter, and it was to a great extent on that account that he demanded an inquiry. But there were other proofs of depression besides those which he had mentioned which ought not to be passed over. The Revenue derived from Excise Duties was falling off, and the consumption of an article of such universal consumption as tea was diminishing. There was a great desire on the part of capitalists to reduce their personal risk by turning their private businesses into Limited Companies, and there was a tendency on their part to withdraw capital from industries in the United Kingdom and invest it in the same industries on the Continent. He might be told that, on the other hand, the Income Tax kept up, that the deposits in savings banks were increasing, and that pauperism was declining. These, however, were delusive tests of a nation's prosperity. If the savings banks deposits increased, it only showed that such deposits were not made by what were commonly called the working class. As a matter of fact, artizans and working men usually invested their savings either in Trades Unions or Friendly Societies. The Income Tax was a poor criterion. It did not affect the class he had alluded to, and it was no indication of the state of trade. It was calculated on past profits, and was often paid on imaginary profits. To reduce the amount it was necessary for a business man to submit his affairs to the closest scrutiny, and practically to the public eye. In course of time it would serve to show the state of trade to a certain extent, but not for some years, and it would not be affected in the least by a transfer of capital from the United Kingdom to foreign countries. The Income Tax revenue might remain but little changed, while the working classes here were starving. As to pauperism, it took a good deal to pauperize this country, thanks to the high qualities of the people and the accumulation of wealth. We were often accused of being an improvident and thriftless people. He dared say we were not nearly as thrifty and prudent as we ought to be. But the people did accumulate something, either privately or in the fund of Trades Unions and Provident and Friendly Societies. That reserve had been drawn upon. It had carried them over a long time, but it must become exhausted soon. In a letter to The Times of the 30th of last month, a Trades Unionist paid a tribute to the good work the Trades Unions had done. He mentioned one—the Boilermakers' and Iron Shipbuilders' Association at Newcastle—which paid out the huge sum of £37,000 in relief to members out of work in the last financial quarter only. It was impossible to collect much information on this point, because the accounts of Trades Unions were not published. But we might safely assume that very large sums were being paid to men out of work. He had had put into his hands letters from the secretaries of Trade Societies at Aberdeen, Glasgow, Birmingham, Darlington, Hull, Leeds, Edinburgh, Bristol, Cleveland, Liverpool, all testifying to deep distress and destitution, and expressing grave fears for the winter. Let them not forget that the test for relief was now very severe, and that the idea of parish relief was intolerable to the English artizan and working man. Nothing but the direst distress would drive them to it. Their savings in Trades Unions, their private savings, their furniture, their comforts, their necessities, everything must go first. They would suffer and suffer greatly in silence. If they complained their Lordships might be sure the complaint was wrung from them by the bitterest distress. They would undergo anything sooner than admit they could not support themselves, sooner than forfeit their independence and submit to the degradation of relief. The people were very patient, very brave, had most honourable instincts; and now the possession of the very qualities we honoured and respected most in men were turned against them, and they were told that because they were not paupers they did not suffer. Were we to wait until the whole accumulated property of the working classes was exhausted before making even an inquiry into the circumstances that were making their labour unprofitable? Were we to wait until vast multitudes were pauperized to think what could be done to avert such a fate? Delay was a cruel and a dangerous thing. He thought he had said enough to show that serious depression existed among us. The silk trade and some of our minor industries were dead or dying, and who could calculate the suffering that those words implied? The unavailing efforts, the despair of honest men, the breaking up of homes, and all the long train of misery that lead from independence to absolute want. In the cotton trade we saw looms idle and factories closed. In the iron trade furnaces were blown out, capital was withdrawn, and labour could not find employment. In our great ship-building districts silence reigned in yards which not long ago re-echoed the busy sounds of industry. Our dock-gates were besieged with men eager for work which they could not get. Everywhere the same most pitiable spectacle—able-bodied, honest, skilful men clamouring vainly for work to support themselves and their wives and children. Was there any reason to expect an improvement? He feared not. The depression had lasted long, and had gradually increased. It was totally different in extent and nature from ordinary bad times, consequent upon some financial crisis or temporary excess of production over demand. Now a few words as to the causes of depression. We were generally told that the depression of trade we laboured under was due to bad harvests and over-production, and that the people were suffering from their own bad habits. He was very far from undervaluing the disastrous reaction upon our manufacturing industries produced by the depression in the great industry of agriculture; but it would not account for it all. And what was more important, we must dismiss the view that agricultural depression was due entirely to lack of sunshine. The loss in agriculture had been estimated by the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) at £130,000,000 or £150,000,000, by the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) at £200,000,000, and such a gigantic dead loss must, of course, have acted very unfavourably upon our home markets. We had been passing through a long series of bad seasons. But the harvest of this year was good, and our flocks and herds were free from disease. But as far as could be gathered, the profitable nature of agriculture in the present year, the value of the produce of the earth's surface in food, was not such as to justify us in supposing that renewed sunshine would restore the industry of agriculture to its former position. Though we were perfectly right, therefore, in putting forward agricultural depression as one of the causes of trade depression, we should be totally wrong, and be merely deluding ourselves, if we assumed that agricultural depression would be remedied by sunshine, and that, in consequence, good harvests would produce good trade. Now, as to the other reason generally advanced, to account for the universal depression said to exist all over the world owing to universal over-production. The world was said to have become too industrious, and to make more than it could consume. He would not go into that abstract question; but he would compare, as well as he could, the condition of other countries with that of the United Kingdom, and would prove that the depression from which we suffered was out of all proportion heavier than that affecting other nations. When they spoke of a declining trade they were usually struck in the face by a violent discharge of statistics to prove that it was expanding. That might be true. Our trade had expanded in volume. But let their Lordships compare it with the expansion of trade among our neighbours. Since 1870 the United States had increased their total commerce by 75 per cent, Russia by 70 per cent, France by 51 per cent, Germany by 40 per cent, Great Britain by only 26 per cent. Let them take one industry alone—the greatest of our industries—the cotton trade. The United States had increased their consumption of cotton since 1873 by nearly 84 per cent, the Continent generally by nearly 64 per cent, and Great Britain by not quite 3 per cent. He did not wish to weary the House with many figures. He thought he had proved by these few that England, instead of increasing more rapidly than any other nation, was not holding her own; that she was not even holding her own, but had fallen back utterly, and that she was become last, instead of first, in the race. And in the face of such facts we were told we were only sharing in a universal depression. But there were special circumstances affecting our neighbours which must not be lost sight of. And, besides, he denied that there was any evidence on the Continent of such suffering or of such a decline of trade as was only too clear with us. He saw nothing of it in Germany, and yet Germany had to bear the burden of an enormous Military Establishment. What, he wondered, would become of this country under those circumstances? France might be suffering slightly. Granting for argument that she was, look at what she had gone through. Only 14 years ago her whole social and commercial economy was upset. She suffered an invasion. Nearly her whole territory was occupied by the enemy. She had to pay £371,500,000 sterling war expenses, and she lost two Provinces. Since then she had lost enormously by the ravages of the phylloxera. Where should we have been had such calamities occurred to us? In the United States there was considerable depression, but it was merely transitory and traceable to distinct causes. The commercial system of the United States was not conducted in the most healthy manner. It was too much affected

throughout by Stock Exchange operations. It was infected by the spirit of gambling. The depression in the States was due to over-speculation in Stocks and to a slight excess in the development of the country. The nation was suffering a little headache, the result of excess, and a slight growing-pain incidental to youth. It was of no consequence and would soon pass. We could not, therefore, even console ourselves with the poor consolation that we were no worse off than others. But if we could, if we were only sharing a universal distress, was that any reason why we should sit down idly and do nothing? He thought it a more worthy part that we should bestir ourselves and see if we could not do something to help ourselves. He, at least, was not content that England should suffer because other nations were suffering also. It was a cowardly and illogical argument. If an outbreak of typhoid occurred in Westminster, should we neglect to inquire into our sanitary arrangements because they had cholera at Naples? Our duty was to our own people. Whatever might be happening to foreigners it was the first duty of the English Parliament to see that Englishmen did not starve, or, at any rate, to know the reason why they did. Then as to the causes. He had seen some remarkable reasons given for the existing distress in this country. Mr. Giffen, of the Board of Trade, in writing in 1877 about a depression, the existence of which he afterwards denied, gave vent to a kind of Gladstonian utterance, and said that it had "its roots in human nature which lends itself to an ebb and flow, an action and reaction in affairs." No doubt, commerce, like most actions of men, had its roots in human nature; but it was difficult to know exactly what Mr. Giffen meant, and he did not see that commerce having its roots in human nature was any great comfort to men who were starving for want of work. Afterwards Mr. Giffen became more practical, and informed us that—

"What mankind require for the greater efficiency of their labour is that the proportion of people employed in agriculture and mining should diminish, and foreign manufactures should increase."

Foreign manufactures had increased largely, and the population engaged in mining and agriculture had largely decreased. He hoped Mr. Giffen was satisfied with the result. But the depression continued, and it was now infinitely worse. No doubt, commerce still had its roots in human nature, and the ebb flowed on with increased velocity. The President of the Board of Trade spoke in 1881 of—

"Weak industries, such as those of Coventry and Bethnal Green, in which energy was engaged which was capable of much better direction."

That meant, he supposed, that the money and labour in those industries should be more profitably employed elsewhere. That was very sound sense under certain circumstances. But surely now when, as he maintained, all industries were suffering, it would be only common charity on the part of the Board of Trade to point out where the energy, the capital, and the population were to go to. The capital might go to Saxony, France or Belgium; but how about the people and the energy? The depression could not be traced to purely natural causes or improvident reckless habits. No great dislocation of trade centres or trade routes had occurred; our coal was not exhausted; we had abundance of capital. There was no evidence that as a people we had lost our skill, energy, or courage. We might be suffering to a certain extent from universal over-production, but not to an extent sufficient to account for the depression. We were affected by over-production, not because the supply throughout the whole world was greater than the demand, but because we were no longer allowed to supply our fair share of that demand because foreign markets were forcibly closed to us, and because our own markets were unfairly interfered with. Our industries were suffering from bounties and foreign tariffs. He could not go at length into controversial topics. The bounty question was probably well known to their Lordships by the prominence which had been given to its effects upon the sugar trade. It was a simple question. The object of bounties was to create or foster an industry that could not compete with the same industry existing elsewhere under more favourable circumstances. It could be combated only by countervailing duties. This was admitted by the Committee of the House of Commons that inquired into the condition of the sugar trade. No one would deny that it was allowable for the Government to persuade foreign countries to take off bounties. If persuasion failed they might equally counteract the effect of the bounty. The only argument against doing so was that it was advantageous to the whole community to purchase an article of so universal consumption as sugar as cheaply as possible, even below cost price. The argument was specious but false. The value to the community of the cheapening of the article would have to be compared with the loss to the community of the value of the industry. The value of the sugar trade was very great. A very large amount of capital was invested in it and in industries dependent upon it in this country, and it employed a large number of people at home, 51,000 of whom, it was estimated, had been thrown out of employment through the effect of bounties. The capital invested in the Colonies was estimated at £30,000,000, supporting a population of 500,000 at least. That loss would have to be deducted from the gain of unnaturally cheap sugar. It would be a dead loss; the capital could not be reinvested. There was no opening for it in any other industry. If, after competition was destroyed, the price of sugar rose again our trade could not be recreated. It was as easy to destroy a trade as it was to cut down a tree. It took generations to build up one and grow the other. But the main argument was that consumers would not ultimately benefit. Bounties destroyed competition. Anything that destroyed fair competition and restricted the area of production was prejudicial to the consumer. As soon as the competition of our Colonial produce and Home manufactures was got rid of the price of sugar would rise to an unprecedented price. It was admitted that our export trade was crippled by hostile tariffs. That import duties could possibly do any harm except to the people who were rash enough to impose them on themselves was at one time stoutly maintained by economists of the Cobden Club school.

EARL GRANVILLE asked the noble Earl whether he could substantiate that assertion?

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, he could not do so at once; but he would

undertake to do so on a future occasion. But some glimmering of common sense had penetrated even into the sacred precincts of that sanctuary of theory. The evils to us of hostile tariffs were allowed. Our whole system of Commercial Treaties proved it. The very idea of such a Treaty, the importance we attached to a Most Favoured Nation Clause, the very employment of the word "favoured" proved that hostile tariffs were injurious to us. The conflict of opinion was as to the best method of combating hostile tariffs. Free imposts, an attempt to bargain when we had nothing to offer in return for the benefits we asked, and a liberal distribution of Cobden Club tracts were the methods we had hitherto employed, with the result that tariffs had been raised and our export trade had rapidly declined. It was high time to try some other plan. We should be much more successful by altering our fiscal system in such a way as to raise revenue by the imposition of a uniform low duty on all foreign imported manufactured goods. In many cases the pressure of such duties would compel foreigners to relieve our goods of excessive duties, and we should obtain better prices for them; and even if it did not have that desirable effect, revenue would be raised and applied to relieve the taxation, and the cost of production would be lessened. The quantity of foreign manufactured goods was far larger than was generally supposed, and a low duty on articles chiefly luxuries would raise a sufficient revenue to give us considerable relief. In the case of import duties, the exporter paid a proportion of the duties, large or small, according to the relative necessity to sell or to buy. At present their industries were heavily taxed at home, and, in addition, contributed largely to the revenues of foreign countries. The foreigner should contribute to our revenue, and give proportionate relief to our taxation. The effect of protective tariffs was two-fold. Those high duties wholly or partially excluded their goods from foreign markets. But that was not all. They enabled foreign manufacturers to compete with them unfairly in the home and the neutral markets. Being secured, wisely or unwisely, mattered not, from our competition in their home markets, they were enabled to throw their surplus stock upon our markets at very low rates. The quantities might be small, but they were increasing, and they were sufficient to bear down our home market prices to an unwholesome extent. Every argument that could be used against foreign bounties was applicable against foreign protective tariffs, and, even admitting that there was not a word to be said in favour of Retaliation, the imposition of low import duties on our part was necessary to neutralize the effects of high protective duties abroad upon our home market. He might be called a Protectionist. After all, Protection was the political creed of the United States, with 50,000,000 English-speaking people, and of all the British subjects in Canada and the Australasian Colonies. The United States had progressed most marvellously under a fiscal system based on pure Protection. They began the present century with a commerce worth £20,000,000 a-year. By the year 1870 it had increased to £116,000,000, and by 1883 it had reached £300,000,000. Under it they had also paid off £180,000,000 of their Debt, and they had brought an enormous area of land under cultivation. Protection could not have been very detrimental to them. But he did not believe in Protection for us. He wanted no advantage; he asked only for equality. Free Trade was the free exchange of various products of the world, and he believed in that principle. The object of Free Trade was that every locality and every person should be able to produce that which it could naturally produce to the greatest advantage. But our system acted in an exactly opposite direction. If, for instance, sugar could be grown and manufactured at Magdeburg as cheaply and of better quality, or of equal quality and cheaper, than it could be grown and manufactured in Demerara and England, then, on Free Trade principles, the trade should be prosecuted in Germany, and the imposition of a duty in favour of Colonial, and against German, sugar would be Protection. That would be Protection. But if the contrary was the case, if the locality best suited to the trade was the West Indies and England, then anything that tended to transfer the trade to Germany was in direct violation of the principles and objects of Free Trade, and if they passively permitted such a transference of trade to take place when it was in their power to prevent it, they were guilty of acting contrary to Free Trade. Political economy was not an exact science. There was no absolutely perfect fiscal system suitable for every country under all circumstances. The theory of Free Trade was perfectly correct, and it must be good in its effects, provided it had fair play. But it was necessary that it should be exercised over a sufficiently large area. Trade was exchange, and if they had not got free exchange, they had not got Free Trade. They might have a very excellent system, but it was not Free Trade; it was absurd and ridiculous to call it by that name. Our commercial system might be good, but its advocates were guilty of a most unwarrantable act of piracy in calling it Free Trade. And this unjustifiable misapplication of term had most unfortunate results, for, in spite of the authority of Shakespeare, there was a good deal in a name. The bulk of the people of these Islands believed in the doctrines of Free Trade, and they were right. They further believed they had got it. In that they were wrong. And the fact that they falsely thought they were in the enjoyment of Free Trade induced them to tolerate a system which, if pursued, would eventually work their ruin. They were trading under circumstances never anticipated by the advocates of Free Trade. They expected the whole world to join with them. Mr. Cobden said in the House of Commons—

“Adopt Free Trade, and there will not be a tariff in Europe that will not be changed in less than five years to follow your example.”

Nearly 40 years had passed, and the prophecy remained unfulfilled. Sir Robert Peel also argued on the supposition that our example would be followed. He said—

“In spite of the desire of Governments and Boards of Trade to raise revenue by restrictive duties, reason and common sense will induce relaxation of high duties. The sense of the people will prevail.”

And he added—

Yet they still heard of “indications” from the United States; but they remained “indications,” and nothing more. The country where the people were supposed to rule, where, therefore, the “common sense” of the people, if they had any, must prevail, was the most Protectionist nation on the face of the earth. The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) was constantly telling them that America was on the point of adopting Free Trade. The noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Earl Derby) held out the same hope in a speech at the Cobden Club dinner, full of many most interesting fallacies. They would reduce their tariff, no doubt, because they must do so, or invent some way of spending their surplus revenue. But they would never reduce it lower than they were compelled, by the strange difficulty they laboured under of reducing their income to the limits of their expenditure. The question, therefore, of the truth or falsehood of Free Trade was in no way involved in a consideration of the depression of trade or the causes of it; but the question was whether our present system was suited to our present circumstances? It was suitable when we could sell freely. It was unsuitable now that we were not allowed freedom of sale. Our trade suffered from perturbations owing to sudden calls from abroad, especially from the United States. England, instead of doing a good, steady business, was in the position of a journeyman waiting for a job. Full of work occasionally, and then relapsing into comparative idleness, our resources in capital and population flowed largely to the United States. When demand overran supply for a brief period in that country, orders came to us, and we had a brief spurt of prosperity, followed by a corresponding reaction when supply in the United States had overtaken demand. Nothing could be more unwholesome than such a state of things. The remedy lay in the direction of looking less to foreigners, as consumers, and more to our Colonies and Dependencies. Every legitimate effort should be made to turn British capital and British emigration to India and the Colonies, for the very simple reason that upon India our principal industry—cotton—depended, and our Colonies were the only customers we could rely upon. With the one exception of the Cape Colony, they bought largely from us in proportion to their population. It was at least worthy of notice that the only exception was in the case of that Colony in which the Imperial tie was weakest, and where our duties had been most neglected. A continuance in our present commercial and Colonial policy would bring about the ruin of England. But by a policy directed to developing the Empire and increasing the purchasing power of British subjects across the seas, and by a commercial system aiming at neutralizing the evil effects of bounties and hostile tariffs, and a revenue system on which revenue should be raised on foreign manufactured articles and applied to the relief of taxation, prosperity would be secured to England in the future. It was not his business to formulate a system or define a scheme. It was impossible to do so without the information that a full and exhaustive inquiry into the condition of trade alone could give. He wanted to know, also, what the practical men thought—the master manufacturers and shipowners, the great agents and shippers and dealers, the artisans and operatives and labourers. If a change was necessary it was of the utmost importance that the change should be made deliberately, and after the most careful and serious consideration. The commercial revolution which swept away most of our import duties was forced upon us by a national calamity. It was undertaken hurriedly, and it had resulted in evils which might have been averted by more mature consideration leading to riper judgment. We ought to profit by experience, and not wait until another, and, perhaps, a far more serious, calamity forced a too violent reaction upon us. An inquiry into the conditions of trade ought to have been undertaken by Her Majesty's Government long ago; but Her Majesty's Government were not famous for forestalling evil or anticipating events. The Government were, to his mind, neglecting their first duty. They showed no signs of moving in the matter. At least, he expected them to accede to the request of a private Member of the House, not only to sanction an inquiry, which, after all, committed them to nothing, but also to use their best endeavours to assist the inquiry in every way.

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to join with a Committee of the Commons to inquire into the condition of the trade and commerce of the country."—(The Earl of Dunraven.)

by a very old and noble Friend of mine who usually sits opposite; and I remember one passage where he described his own difficulties as one of the principal Conservative Leaders at the time when Protection was considered to be dead by the Conservative Party, and the difficulty which he had in making a speech on this subject, the difficulty consisting in this—that he was not to discourage the Protectionists and yet not to commit his friends. The Head of the Party entirely approved of the line he had taken. I entirely acquit my noble Friend (Earl Dunraven) of any wish to ride on so narrow a stile as that, although his moving from the Cross Benches to a more prominent place, seems to imply that he thought it fairer not to commit the Cross Benches to some of the theories and facts which he has stated this evening. My noble Friend has laid great stress upon his not being a Protectionist. He says he is a Free Trader, and the only thing he objected to was that he did not like “sham Free Trade.” He has been good enough to admit that, on the whole, foreign trade was an advantage to the country. I should have thought that as a real Free Trader he was aware what foreign trade consisted in; that it is a sort of barter; that you cannot get foreign goods without paying for them in goods. It is a perfect illusion that you pay for foreign goods in gold. Gold must, like water, find its level. You cannot keep more gold in the country than you want, because it lowers its value, and it immediately flows into places where its value is high. This is proved in the most clear way, because for nearly 40 years this country has been importing much more than it exported to the whole world, and yet concurrently with that, instead of our sending gold out of the country, the balance of import gold over export has been continually greater. The noble Earl objects extremely to this state of things. His object is to increase our exports and to diminish our imports. I believe it is perfectly impossible to do that.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN: I do not wish to limit our imports.

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble Earl says he does not wish to limit our imports—he only wishes this country to pay more for them. There are some elementary principles of Free Trade which I should like to know whether my noble

Friend agrees with or not. Does he think that it is no advantage that Free Trade leaves people to follow the most natural and profitable course for the employment of their capital and labour? Does he not think that the division of labour is an important thing, and that Free Trade adds to the power of a division of labour more than anything else; whereas Protection, which he really advocated although he repudiated it, would destroy that division of labour? The noble Earl has given us his views. Five years ago, I remember—and I dare say a good many of your Lordships remember—a remarkable speech of Lord Beaconsfield on the subject. He gave an historical account of what had happened 30 or 40 years ago. It was a most interesting account, although in some particulars I ventured at the time to question its perfect accuracy. Lord Beaconsfield then contrasted the speeches of two noble Lords who had spoken in favour of an inquiry much like that asked for to-night. He showed that they entirely differed in their views, very much as the Fair Traders do at the present moment. Then he goes on to say that, putting aside altogether the question whether the policy of Reciprocity and Retaliation is good in itself, and whether Free Trade was well applied by Sir Robert Peel and his Friends at a time when our tariffs were burdened with duties, and almost every article came into this country subject to duties, it was impossible to pursue this policy now when only 22 articles were left in our tariff. I really do not think that Lord Beaconsfield contemplated the possibility which the noble Earl suggests of recurring to that cumbrous method of putting duties on every small article that came into this country. Lord Beaconsfield ended by a complete denunciation of an inquiry without any defined object and without any likelihood of the promoters bringing it to a practical end. I really think I might sit down and say that speech entirely disposes of the Motion of the noble Earl. But the noble Earl has brought forward so many questions that I should like to go into them. Now, the noble Earl has assumed that there is a great depression of trade. I must say that, in a statement like his, I have hardly ever heard so little evidence brought forward to support it. The noble Earl has travelled himself, and has been told by secretaries who have not published their accounts what happens. But he seems to have neglected all the official documents which we have on this subject. Now, I do not deny that there is great suffering, both commercially and agriculturally. I believe exactly what Lord Beaconsfield said five years ago. I believe, as Lord Beaconsfield said on that occasion, "there is neither ruin nor despair to the bulk of the people." The noble Earl has made so many statements that perhaps he will allow me to make some observations with regard to the present state of the country. I quite agree that our profits, although they are not disappearing, are smaller than we should like them to be. The principle point in connection with the present depression would appear to be that it is, to a large extent, only nominal, the volume of trade being larger than ever it was before, and the appearance of depression arising from the lower prices. This is conspicuously the case as regards the foreign trade. The imports and exports for the last few years have been in millions of pounds:—Imports.—1870, 363; 1880, 411; 1881, 397; 1882, 413; 1883, 427. Exports.—1879—British, 191; Foreign and Colonial, 57; total, 248. 1880—British, 223; Foreign and Colonial, 63; total, 286. 1881—British, 234; Foreign and Colonial, 63; total, 297. 1882—British, 241; Foreign and Colonial, 65; total, 306. 1883—British, 239; Foreign and Colonial, 66; total, 305. Thus, the foreign trade was larger in 1883 than it had been for several years before, although prices were lower than in any of the other years in the table. The nominal figures have not been higher in any previous year, except as regards the exports of British produce in 1872 and 1873, when the large totals of £256,000,000 and £255,000,000 were reached; but in 1872 and 1873 prices were abnormally high, and they were in 1883, on the average, 20 to 30 per cent lower than in 1873. If the exports and imports were now to be valued at the prices of 1873 the volume of foreign trade would appear much larger than it has ever done. The magnitude of the volume of trade down to 1883 is also apparent from other figures. The production of pig iron in 1880, 1881, 1882, and 1883 was the largest on record—namely, in 1880 it was 7,749,000 tons, in 1881 it was

8,144,000 tons, in 1882 it was 8,580,000 tons, and in 1883 it was 8,490,000 tons. The annual average of 1869-74 was only 6,223,000 tons, and of 1875-80, 6,609,000 tons. This, surely, is a most extraordinary condition for a trade which, as the noble Earl represents it, has been entirely destroyed. The noble Earl has drawn attention to coal. Similarly, the production of coal has progressed as follows:—The annual average in 1869-74 was 118,000,000 tons, in 1875-80 it was 135,500,000 tons, in 1880 it was 147,000,000 tons, in 1881 it was 154,000,000 tons, in 1882 it was 156,500,000 tons, and in 1883 it showed the enormous increase of 164,000,000 tons. Now, take the raw cotton. The amount of raw cotton used in manufacturing has likewise increased. The annual average in 1869-74 was 1,150,000,000 lbs., in 1875-80 it was 1,245,000,000 lbs., in 1880 it was 1,373,000,000 lbs., in 1881 it was 1,439,000,000 lbs., in 1882 it was 1,461,000,000 lbs., and in 1883 it rose to 1,511,000,000 lbs. In the present year—1884—there are signs of some falling off from the large totals of 1882-3—a decrease of £24,000,000 in the imports, or  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and of £3,000,000 in the exports, or  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, during the nine months ending with September. But these decreases are more than accounted for by the low prices. The Gazette average of wheat last week was only 32s. 3d., as compared with 40s. 3d. at the same time in 1883, and other prices have fallen similarly. In sugar, raw cotton, wool, jute, iron, copper, tin, and lead, a great reduction of price is shown at the present time as compared with the same time last year. Apart from reduction of price, therefore, it would appear that the volume of foreign trade is larger at the present time than ever it was known before. The noble Earl had quoted the condition of the people, and had actually cut the ground from under my feet by saying—"Do not talk to me about Income Tax, pauperism, or deposits in savings banks." The noble Earl relied in preference on Benefit Societies, whose accounts were not published, and which he (Earl Granville) did not know. But these considerations were most essential to the case. The fact was that the Income Tax of 1d. in the pound, which once meant £1,000,000, now meant £2,000,000. The following are the material figures as to Income Tax, consumption of certain articles per head, pauperism, and savings banks deposits, all indicating the condition of the people:—The annual average of the Income Tax assessments was, in 1869-74, £204,000,000 on Schedule D, and the total was £487,000,000; in 1882, it was £267,000,000 on Schedule D, and the total was £601,000,000. Surely that proves something; but the noble Earl entirely rejects it, because, he said, the Income Tax does not touch the poor. But certainly it has some effect on the depression or the prosperity of the whole country. Again, the noble Earl says that pauperism is no test, as there is more difficulty about out-door relief. I am very glad there is, because I think it is an excellent thing, not only for the ratepayers and the farmers, but for the persons themselves who are the recipients of the relief. But I think it cannot be denied that the figures relating to pauperism have an important bearing on this subject. In the years 1869-74, the number of paupers per 1,000 of the population was 42½; whereas in the year 1883 it was only 29. Take, again, the savings banks deposits. In 1869, they were £51,000,000; and in 1883 they rose to £87,000,000. Then the consumption of articles in the country shows a state of prosperity or depression. I find, in regard to sugar, tea, coffee, tobacco, and spirits, that the consumption of coffee has rather fallen off, though not very largely. With regard to spirits, I was rather in hopes that there would be a diminution in the consumption owing to the much greater temperance of the people; but this is not the case. In 1840 the consumption of spirits was 0·97, and in 1883 it was 1·06 gallon per head. I think figures like these must have some sort of importance. There is much discussion among economists as to the causes of the low prices. Mr. Goschen, in the House of Commons, and in a lecture to the Bankers' Institute last year, attributed them to the scarcity of gold. Mr. Hubbard and others have contended that it is the great multiplication of commodities, due to such influences as extension of telegraphy, great rapidity of communication, and low freights, &c. The two assertions are not in reality contradictory. If there had been more gold produced, prices would undoubtedly have risen, or not have fallen, notwithstanding the real abundance of commodities. The relation between gold and commodities generally has changed. For the present purpose, however, it is only necessary to point out that the present depression of trade is to a large extent only apparent. Production and consumption are large, and people are well off. As wages have not yet fallen in proportion, the profits of wholesale merchants and manufacturers are curtailed, and hence the complaints. If it is argued that it is possible by appointing a Commission or Committee of the House to examine how the production of gold is certain suddenly to increase trade, that is an argument which will hardly be valid with your Lordships. The noble Earl laid great stress upon the comparison between ourselves and foreign countries as to the depression in trade. He, first of all, said that the depression is not at all the same in foreign countries as it is with us; and then he said it had no bearing at all on the argument. But I think it has very great bearing on the argument; for if the countries protected are in a much more flourishing condition than we are in, then, I think, there is at least a prima facie case against Free Trade; but if you find that this depression is common to all countries, then it is extremely absurd to refer it to legislation which occurred 40 years ago, and had been followed by singularly prosperity in all the countries affected by it. My Lords, the fact is that in Germany and Austria the depression is quite as great as our own. The following figures show the foreign trade of the United States and France in recent years. It will be seen that the present depression in each of these countries is greater than in our own. In the United States the maximum year for imports in recent years was 1881-2, in which they amounted to £147,000,000. In 1883-4 the amount was £139,000,000; and in the two months July and August this year there is a further decline of 10 per cent compared with last year. As regards exports, the maximum year in the United States was 1880-1, in which the amount was £184,000,000; in 1882-3 the amount was £151,000,000—a decline of one-sixth. In the two months July and August there is a further decline from £23,814,000 to £22,660,000, or about 5 per cent. In France the maximum year of imports was 1880, the total being

£201,000,000; in 1883 the total was £192,000,000. In the nine months ended September 30 this year, as compared with the same period last year, there is a further decline from £140,000,000 to £134,000,000. The maximum year of exports in France was 1875, when the total was £154,000,000; but not going so far back, and taking only 1882, which was the highest year lately, with a total of £143,000,000, it appears that in 1883 there was a decline to £138,000,000. In the nine months ended September, 1884, there is a further decline as compared with the same period of 1883, from £100,000,000 to £94,000,000, or 6 per cent. The following is a comparison with the United Kingdom:—Imports—United Kingdom—Maximum year, 1883, £427,000,000. In nine months of 1884 a decline of 8 per cent compared with 1883. United States—Maximum year, 1881-2, £147,000,000; 1883, £139,000,000. In two months of 1884 a decline of 10 per cent compared with 1883. France—Maximum year, 1880, £201,000,000; 1883, £192,000,000. In nine months of 1884 a decline of 5 per cent. Exports—United Kingdom (British produce)—Maximum year, 1882, £241,000,000; 1883, £240,000,000. In nine months of 1884 a decline of 1½ per cent. United States—Maximum year, 1880-1, £184,000,000; 1883, £151,000,000. In two months of 1884 a decline of 5 per cent. France—Maximum year, 1882, £143,000,000; 1883, £138,000,000. In nine months of 1884 a decline of 6 per cent. In the face of those figures, showing how much greater in two protected countries—two countries with the greatest natural wealth in the world—the depression has been than with us, I really think that any hearsay evidence brought forward by the noble Earl must fall to the ground. The noble Earl also gave us figures about sugar, and he seemed to believe that the bounties which other Governments put upon refined sugar was one of the three causes which have reduced this country to the miserable state he has described. But the sugar bounties affect only a very small portion of the sugar industry. From figures I have before me, it appears that in 1840 the consumption of sugar in this country was 15½ lbs. per person; whereas at this moment, when the sugar trade has entirely disappeared from the country, it has risen to the enormous amount of 71½ lbs. per head. In 1840 the consumption of tea was 1½ lbs. per person, while last year it was 4½ lbs. And in the same way the consumption of tobacco in 1840 was only ¾ lb. per head, while last year it was 1½ lbs. I do not believe that noble Lords opposite will support the noble Earl in his suggestion that a remedy for a matter affecting only an infinitesimal portion of the trade would be found in putting a countervailing duty against the bounty given by other countries. But the noble Earl makes three suggestions. He suggests that a low fixed duty should be put upon every manufactured article introduced. That is, in short, a proposal to return to that old, condemned, and obsolete tariff of duties which was formerly levied on large quantities of articles, to the great obstacle and detriment of trade, and also to the great injury of fiscal arrangements, the cost of collection being enormously increased. The noble Earl proposed to fix a duty on manufactured articles, and at the same time expressed sympathy with the farmers, and did not propose to tax them. He protected the farmers, and he does not propose to tax food or the raw material for our manufacturers, but proposes to put the duty entirely on manufactured articles. That will certainly not help the farmer. On the other hand, by his plan he raises the value of every single article which his wife, his family, or he himself use. The general scope of the noble Earl's plan is to take away trade and emigration from foreign countries and force them into the Colonies. I am quite sure nearly all the Colonies have raised their tariffs since 1869 in a higher proportion than any foreign country has done since that time, with the great exception of the United States; and I must say here, when the noble Earl entirely repudiates the idea of our example having been of any use whatever to foreign countries, I must remind him that foreign countries have to a certain degree followed our example. There does not at this moment exist a single prohibitive tariff in the world—a great advance since we introduced Free Trade. The noble Earl follows the example of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) in saying that Sir Robert Peel, in establishing Free Trade, was guided by the conviction that all other countries would follow our example.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: When did I say that, and where?

EARL GRANVILLE: I do not recollect the locality or the date.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I never said so.

EARL GRANVILLE: The noble Marquess has certainly laid great stress upon the gigantic blunder which, according to him, Free Traders made 40 years ago in believing that foreign countries would follow their example. I would, however, point out to the noble Marquess that the Free Traders of those days did not merely advocate their policy with the object of our being imitated by foreign countries, but they put that policy forward because they were convinced that simply and by itself Free Trade was best for this country. The object of the noble Marquess is not quite the same as that of the noble Earl on the Cross Benches. He does not propose to establish permanently a fixed duty upon all manufactured articles; but he would threaten to do so, and use the threat as an instrument of warfare with which to frighten all foreign countries into reducing their tariffs and becoming Free Traders like ourselves. If the noble Marquess could satisfy me that by our using that threat or putting it into execution for one year we should cause all the Protective walls in every part of the world to fall down, it might be well to make the experiment. But I do not believe in our power to achieve that result by using such a threat. The plan was tried for 20 years, and we went on trying to force other countries to fall in with our views by clapping 20 per cent on to the price of their goods; but without result. If we were to say—"We are going to use our tariffs as a means of forcing you to do that which you do not think advantageous to do," we should be using an argument like that which a missionary would use were he to say—"Heathens, your religion is unsuitable. Ours is the only true, pure, and inspired religion. If you do not follow our example and become Christians, we shall be forced to become heathens ourselves." If the views of noble Lords opposite are to prevail, how are you to deal with the Most Favoured Nation Clause which exists in almost every Treaty which we have made?

This demand for Fair Trade appears to me to be as theoretical and fallacious as anything can possibly be. I must say that I shall be extremely surprised if your Lordships, simply on the statement of the noble Earl (the Earl of Dunraven) as to the existing state of things, which, I think, I have proved is not a correct statement, and after his suggestions as to the reforms he would carry out, should agree to grant the inquiry which he desires.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he had heard with perfect amazement the assertion of the noble Earl that there was no very serious depression in this country.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that at the beginning of his speech he stated that there was very great suffering and distress among certain classes of the community.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, it was something to have got that acknowledgment from the Government. He asked their Lordships to consider whether the arguments of the noble Earl who had just sat down (Earl Granville) did not afford the strongest reasons for the holding of such an inquiry as was asked for? The noble Earl had pointed out that the present volume of the trade of this country had never been exceeded, and had also acknowledged that large classes of the community were in a very depressed and suffering condition. What was the meaning of such an extraordinary state of things? The volume of trade was greater than it had ever been, and yet very large masses of the people were in the greatest straits. Surely this mystery ought to be inquired into. The whole burden rested on Her Majesty's Government to tell the House why there should not be an inquiry. The noble Earl had given no reason why there should not be an inquiry, and had rested himself mainly upon what Lord Beaconsfield said five years ago. But when Lord Beaconsfield made that speech he had no idea that the depression would go on increasing at the terrible rate which had been the case, and it was perfectly absurd, therefore, to quote that speech now. Another argument in favour of permitting the inquiry was the fact that the noble Earl on the Cross Benches (the Earl of Dunraven), who, on that occasion, represented a large mass of the industrial population, and the noble Earl who represented the Government

(Earl Granville) were at complete variance in regard to matters of fact. He held that the real facts ought to be ascertained. In the manufacturing districts, in the iron and coal districts, the depression of trade was only too manifest. He (the Earl of Harrowby) had been in the manufacturing districts this autumn, in the great Port of Liverpool, and in the iron and coal districts, and unless his eyes deceived him there was one uniform testimony as to the suffering in every branch of trade. The Liberal Member for Liverpool (Mr. S. Smith), in "another place," said the other day—

"The fact has to be faced, that this great commercial country, which for years made such rapid progress by leaps and bounds . . . has for some years past shown a tendency towards retrogression."

That came from a Gentleman who was well versed in commerce, and it was testimony worth a good deal more than the statistics of the noble Earl opposite. As to the statistics quoted by the noble Earl opposite, he would remind the House that nothing could be more deceptive than a mass of figures, which could be handled in a variety of ways. He should, therefore, decline to give his assent to the statistical statement of the noble Earl until it had been fully sifted by people of opposite views. He did not entirely agree with the noble Earl who brought the subject forward as to the reasons for the existing depression. In his opinion there were greater reasons. Trade and commerce were very shy of instability and uncertainty, which were fatal to enterprise, and one of the chief reasons why depression now prevailed was that the acts of the Government, and the speeches of some of its Members, had succeeded in creating a feeling of uncertainty and instability at home, and of great insecurity abroad. Enterprise was in consequence shy, commerce was frightened, and everybody seemed to be afraid to launch out. There was nothing extraordinary in this when they remembered the legislation of the Government in regard to land; their proposed shipping and attempted railway legislation; their attempted tampering with the coinage of the country; their bankruptcy legislation, which was evidently breaking down; and the threats which they had levelled at their Lordships' House. When they remembered these things, they would no longer be astonished that trade and enterprise were less prominent than formerly, and that labour was not receiving its just reward. Surely it would not be denied that our commerce was suffering from the instability of our policy and the state of uncertainty with regard to foreign affairs. The Government had neglected our commercial interests—that would be seen in many instances. Did we not see in every part of the world a state of things which made commercial men anxious? Were we not told by Sir Donald Currie and by Mr. Stanley that commerce was flying from West Africa in consequence of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government? What about their treatment of the Congo? They were allowing stringent tariffs to be established against our commerce on the Congo. Was their support of commerce in China encouraging? And what had been done in Madagascar? Everywhere we found the same feeling—that traders were afraid to launch out boldly into commercial enterprise, because the British flag was not likely to protect them, and the Government was not fairly supporting them. The uncertainty of trade, and feeling of want of stability and uncertainty at home, were, in his opinion, potent factors in the present trade depression. It was the opinion of a large mass of people who agreed with the noble Earl who had made this Motion that an inquiry ought to be held, and no reason had been given by Her Majesty's Government why it should not. But Her Majesty's Government were only following a fatal precedent. Their answer always was "No inquiry." When their Lordships wished to inquire into the operation of the Irish Land Act, the answer was "No inquiry." The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) asked for an inquiry as to the condition of the sugar industry, and the answer was "No inquiry." The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) urged for an inquiry into the state of our finances; but "No inquiry" was still the answer. And so again, with regard to our merchant shipping, a Select Committee was refused last year. And with respect to that most important matter, the Conference on Egypt, the Government made use of their majority to prevent inquiry. He owned he did not expect that the inquiry now moved for would be granted, as he had watched the conduct of the Government on former occasions. But the country would not rest until there was a full and searching inquiry, nor would any sensible man be afraid of demanding it lest he should be called a Protectionist. This inquiry would come in time; what the result of it would be it was not for him to say, but the country had a right to have this matter thoroughly investigated.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that neither the beginning nor the end of the noble Earl's (the Earl of Harrowby's) speech was consistent with the middle of it. In the beginning of his speech the noble Earl gave reasons for inquiry, and at the end of his speech he adduced what he deemed very strong reasons for it; but in the middle of his speech he cut away the ground for inquiry altogether, because he had found out that the way in which Her Majesty's Government had conducted foreign affairs was the cause of all the mischief. What the noble Earl really wanted was, not inquiry, but the removal of Her Majesty's Government. He (the Earl of Kimberley) was not going to follow the noble Earl in his long and unconnected statement with regard to every possible subject, from foreign affairs to Irish land, but would direct his remarks to what had fallen from the noble Earl on the Cross Benches (the Earl of Dunraven). Her Majesty's Government were asked, Why not grant an inquiry? The answer was, because nothing could be worse unless they had made up their minds that the evils complained of were of such a nature that they could be remedied by the action of the Government and by legislation. Her Majesty's Government had made up their minds that the evil from which we suffered could not be so remedied by them, or by legislative measures. They ought to have some notion of a remedy before encouraging people to hope for one. The noble Earl on the Cross Benches (the Earl of Dunraven) had a remedy—the application of the principles of Reciprocity. The principles of Reciprocity were held in some countries; but what he would ask was, were we prepared to look forward to the establishment of a system of Reciprocity with other nations? This was a practical question, not a question of theory. Unless we obtained Reciprocity Treaties from all the nations of the world we must introduce differential duties in favour of countries from whom we obtained Reciprocity. And suppose we did so; the question was, would that produce any effect upon the other countries? Taking the United States, for example, suppose we were to endeavour to drive them into a more liberal policy by a system of differential duties, were we going to put a duty upon corn, or upon raw cotton, or upon the raw materials imported from the United States and used in the most important trades in this country? The attempt to force foreign countries to change their commercial policy by putting on differential duties would be the most Quixotic enterprise it was possible to enter upon. If they on that (the Ministerial) side of the House did not consider the introduction of a system of Reciprocity and Retaliation a practical measure it could not form to them the ground for any inquiry. Then if we were not going to introduce such a system, what possible scheme could be suggested for meeting the evil? The noble Earl said he would not deal with one of the principal interests of the country—namely, the agricultural interest. It might be all very well for noble Lords to put that out of their view; but the agricultural interest was a very important interest, and if they were going to leave food untaxed and to tax other things which the producer of food in this country used, they would be doing a great injustice. This was a thing he had often begged farmers to consider. If by any chance the people of this country were to be persuaded to put duties on foreign manufactures, the large mass of our population would never consent to have duties imposed on food, and therefore the agricultural classes would be placed in this position—that they would not have high prices for their produce, while they would have to pay high prices for all they had to consume. The noble Earl referred to theories which he said were held by members of the Cobden Club—for instance, that foreign tariffs were not an evil to this country. Anything that injured the trade of this country was an evil; that nobody could deny; but whether it would be wise in us to put duties upon foreign imports in order to break down the system of foreign tariffs was quite another thing. This was perfectly certain, that if goods were imported from foreign countries, they must be paid for by the produce of the labour of this country, and the produce of the labour of this country was the riches of this country, and the larger our imports—he did not say in any one year, but for a series of years—the greater our prosperity. He did not believe that this was a matter which would be regarded with disfavour. The noble Earl made a comparison between the advance of trade in certain countries and the advance of trade in this country over a given series of years; but that comparison was not a fair one. If they took the case of New South Wales and looked at the imports and exports of that Colony for the past 30 years, he had not the smallest doubt that it would be seen that the advance made there was greater than had been made by France in the same period. The reason was that the advance was much greater in a new country than in a country which had a greater volume of trade. The noble Earl quoted the wonderful progress in America in support of his argument. It would be a remarkable thing if the United States had not made a wonderful advance; but to compare the progress of America during the last 40 years with the progress of Great Britain of late years, was not a fair comparison. It had been said that he stated the other night that there was no depression in agriculture. He made no such statement. What he said was that there was no such depression as to induce them to mention it in the Queen's Speech. At the same time, he added that he was painfully aware, from his own experience, that there were parts of the country in which there was very serious depression, but that there were other places where depression did not exist, or where it was not so serious. He hoped it would not be supposed that he denied the existence of distress among many classes. He did say, however, that nothing could be less advantageous to the country and in the long run to these suffering classes themselves than an inquiry such as that now asked for. It would not be to the advantage of the people to make them lean upon such measures as the Government could supply. They ought rather to trust to the vigour and energy of the population.

DEATH OF THE RIGHT HON. HENRY FAWCETT, POSTMASTER GENERAL.

OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I may be permitted to interrupt the debate for one moment to communicate a very sad piece of intelligence, which I received with very deep regret, which I am sure will be shared by every Member of this House. Two or three hours ago the death of the Postmaster General, Mr. Fawcett, occurred. I did not know any man whose intellectual qualities and high character more entitled him to the respect of every one who knew him. He was one of the bravest of men under a great physical disability.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I will only add one word to what the noble Earl has said, and that is to join with him in expressing the belief that there are few public men whose loss at this moment would be received with so much regret. Mr. Fawcett was a man who, while holding strong political opinions, excited the liveliest sympathy and admiration alike among his opponents and friends.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he heartily concurred in the expression of regret at the loss sustained by the death of Mr. Fawcett, whom he had had the good fortune to know. The noble Earl said, that in considering the subject before their Lordships, there were two things they should bear in mind. First, they had to consider whether there had been a case made out worthy of inquiry; and then, in the next place, whether the mode suggested was the best way of dealing with the matter? The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) deprecated any inquiry, because it would mean a preconceived opinion as to the measures to be adopted. With regard to the condition of the trade and commerce of the country, he was not prepared to agree with the argument that, in accepting the Motion, the question would practically be Free Trade or Protection. He denied that Free Trade ought to be made a sort of idol or fetish, before which everything should be judged. It seemed to him that nothing could be more unreasonable or absurd than to say that, because they took off the duty on corn 40 years ago, they should not now have an inquiry into commercial and agricultural distress. That depression existed no one could doubt. It was depression in some cases, but in others it was misery and almost ruin; and it affected not one, but many classes. There had been none of that recuperative vigour and force which they had seen on former occasions. The depression which now existed had continued over a period of eight or 10 years, and there was no sign of recovery. On the contrary, every sign there was pointed to a still further downward course. It was true there was abundance in the exports of manufactured articles, just as there had been in the harvest; but, on the other hand, there was a diminution of profits. One might attribute that state of things to one reason, and another to another reason; but they ought, in his opinion, to try and ascertain what this phenomenon, which was new to them, really meant. It had been stated that the cause of the depression was the removal of British capital to foreign countries. In such a case as that no sign could be more alarming; but was it so? The answer was, inquire. By instituting an inquiry, the truth of such statements might be ascertained. Then there was the enormous competition which existed at this moment in many trades. That competition existed in large as well as in small trades. It was only the other day that he heard that the whole of the ironwork of an enormous railway station in the Midlands had been imported into this country from Belgium, and he knew from his own knowledge that iron for railway bridges had been brought over from abroad. It was precisely the same in smaller industries. When all these matters were put together, they produced an alarming result; and when he looked to the terribly severe winter which was in prospect, he, for one, could not contemplate the future without apprehension. He greatly regretted that the Government had opposed the investigation asked for. Scarcely anything had been said about agricultural distress, a subject which would require a long discussion to itself. During the last few years a vast amount of land had been thrown out of cultivation. No doubt, no blessing could be more greater than that which we had derived from cheap bread, which had carried us through many seasons of distress during the last 30 years. Still we ought to recognize what the throwing of land out of cultivation really meant. During the last 10 years 1,000,000 acres had been changed from arable to grass; 1,000,000 acres of grain would be about one-fourth of the total grain production of the country. All conversion of arable into pasture involved two consequences, one social and the other political. It meant the displacement of so many families and individuals, who were driven either to emigrate, or to contribute to the overcrowding of the large towns. He was not one of those who objected to emigration, for he had seen its advantages; but he did say that the driving of agriculturists and their families into the towns was in itself an unmitigated curse, which increased populations for whom the means of industrial employment were already too limited, and increased the struggle for life, and the general distress. Then it meant another very serious matter; it practically reduced the area of land devoted to the food supply of this country. We already depended for two-thirds of our food supply upon foreign countries, and it was a very great risk for the country to live on the sufferance of foreign nations. It had been said by the Prime Minister that farmers should recover their losses by growing fruit and rearing poultry. He could not understand anyone who knew anything of agricultural matters speaking of such small and petty agricultural pursuits as the substitute for growing corn; and, although these industries might be developed, we could not depend upon them as a means of subsistence, and the bulk of the land in England must always be farmed upon different principles. It was a mere fraction of the land of the country that could be applied to these purposes. Little had been said about our commercial relations with our Colonies; but for many years our Colonies had been our best customers, and a merchant or tradesman generally desired to meet the wants of a customer. Why had not we done anything of the sort? Our Colonial Empire was one of such extent, fertility, and variety of production, that we could get everything we wanted from them. Canada could supply us with all the wheat we wanted at 30s. a-quarter, and in time of war we could hold the lines of communication, which would be a much more simple matter than living upon the sufferance of others. One of the best things we could do would be to see if we could not devise some form of commercial connection between the Colonies and the Mother Country. He believed that the case made out by the noble Earl (the Earl of Dunraven) was one worthy of inquiry, and that it was wise to ask for a Joint Committee of both Houses, because the weakness of this House in its knowledge of commercial subjects could be made up by the abundant knowledge in the other House. It would save public discussion and public time if the inquiry were granted, and in proportion as Free Traders were confident of the soundness of their principles, they ought to be willing and eager to submit them to the test of an inquiry. The Government were making a mistake in refusing an investigation on which the heart of the country was more set than it was on any other matter, and public feeling would be intensified by the distress of the coming winter.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had called special attention to the arguments that arable land had been turned into pasture. Did he suggest that inquiry might lead to legislation to prevent farmers and landlords cultivating land in the way they thought most profitable, or that this should be done by adopting the obvious course of putting such a duty on pasture as to bring land under the plough when wheat ought never to be sown, as was done by the Corn Laws?

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that the inquiry of the noble Earl showed the supreme inattention with which he had listened to his remarks. What he had contended was that the large acreage of land which had gone out of cultivation had partly caused a distress which should be fully inquired into.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I should be sorry that this debate should close without my saying one word, which is to express the hope that my noble Friend will not push his Motion to a Division. Although I deeply regret that Her Majesty's Government have not granted the inquiry, yet the very structure of the Motion would have made it obviously inconvenient for us to resolve upon inquiry when we know that Her Majesty's Government are determined to arrest it. I am sorry that the Government have come to that conclusion. But I am more sorry that they have done so on arguments which I am sure will seem to the country to imply considerable scepticism as to the existence of this general depression. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) gave us statistics; he poured upon us all the columns of the Statistical Abstract. But I am sure, that if he had done that in the other House to anything like the same extent, he would have been told by a great authority that he was dealing with this country as though he were dealing with Jupiter or Saturn. He was treating us with scientific formulas, and elaborate quotations of statistics, in order to traverse the existence of a thing which anybody, who moves about in England at all, knows to exist as well as he knows that the sun shines in summer. The noble Earl admits the existence of this distress, at all events among certain classes. He admits its extreme severity. I do not know how much of human misery is necessary, in his mind, in order to call the attention of Parliament to its existence, and the powers of Parliament to inquire into its cause. But the Government, in this debate, have given us a reason against inquiry which certainly cannot be applied to any other department of life. The noble Earl almost angrily corrected my noble Friend for not having asked for this inquiry with a foregone conclusion as to its results. I have heard the advice not to prophesy unless you know. But this is the first time I have ever heard the doctrine propounded that you ought not to inquire unless you know what the result of the inquiry will be. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) used to-day a favourite argument with the Government—a quotation from a speech of Lord Beaconsfield delivered five years ago, which appears now to impress them with a reverence which it did not produce at the time. Lord Beaconsfield spoke in 1879, and although he was a man of marvellous powers, he could not have foreseen what would be the state of things in 1884. At all events, whatever may have been in Lord Beaconsfield's mind on that subject, I can prove that he did not go on the doctrine of "Never inquire unless you know what the result will be." When the late Government assented to the Royal Commission on Agriculture, he never required that the Duke of Richmond should write down his ideas of the conclusions to which the Commission would come.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: What have been the results?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Recommendations which I very much wish you would carry out.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Upon what?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Upon local taxation. I regret this view of Her Majesty's Government, and I shall remember it when they bring forward any Departmental Inquiry, and I shall bear in mind that it would not have been undertaken unless the result had been known beforehand. But, my Lords, I do not take that view. The objects of inquiry are to ascertain facts and to form conclusions—to ascertain whether legislation is required, and, if so, to lay the basis on which that legislation should rest. But inquiry has another important function—namely, to inform the minds of the people of the country. We are governed by public opinion, and it is our highest interest that that public opinion should be rightly stored with facts and rightly guided. Therefore, it is of great importance that the matters of fact in dispute should, as far as possible, be ascertained, and that the materials for the judgment of the country should be placed before it in a form in which they can be dealt with. The noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) cannot ignore the fact that this notion of Fair Trade is gaining force in every quarter—that there is a mass of public opinion forming which, if his view is correct, is most pernicious in its aims, and which ought for that reason to receive the attention of Parliament. I think I am at one with the noble Earl as to the point of Reciprocity, and that the use of countervailing duties would be legitimate as weapons of offence if there were fair grounds to believe that that species of warfare would be successful. The noble Earl's opposition is based upon scepticism as to the success of that kind of warfare. Surely in that he forgets the experience of his own official career—he forgets the Reciprocity Treaties which he himself has had a hand in negotiating. It was by an offer of reduction of tariffs that the French agreed to a relaxation of their prohibitory and protective system. Therefore, I think that the experience of the noble Earl himself should have warned him that this kind of threat is not so entirely without its influence with Foreign Powers as he is disposed to think. But, on the other hand, I agree with him, as Lord Beaconsfield said five years ago, that the difficulties surrounding any such undertaking are very great and enormously enhanced by the excessive and somewhat imprudent facility with which we have allowed our own free action to be bound. But, at all events, is it not wise that these difficulties should be faced by inquiry, and that it should be shown whether or not they are insuperable? I cannot understand that from any point of view more light would be an evil. We have strange and new phenomena to deal with. We wish the mysteries which attach to our present difficulties should be dissipated. We wish the misery, whose existence is more or less freely admitted, to be explained as far as possible, and I cannot see that any evil whatever could arise from exposing to the free light of inquiry the fiscal policy of the last 40 years, which, if it be sound, will only emerge the stronger from any inquiry which may be held.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, that after the debate that had taken place, he was willing to withdraw his Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

MARRIAGES LEGALIZATION BILL.

QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that the Marriages Legalization Bill was an excellent and a comprehensive Bill, as it would probably have obviated the necessity for those Acts to legalize marriages which were passed almost every Session, and of which two—for Stopsley, Bedfordshire, and Wood Green Church—had been passed last year. This Bill had been sent down to the other House on the 23rd May, and had been withdrawn on the 24th July. How was it that it had not passed in those two months? Complaints had been made by the Government whenever they had been asked to initiate legislation in this House of the difficulty of passing their Bills; but it seemed there was something wrong in the other House, or in the management of it by the Government, for the year before, also, a Government Bill—the Indian Marine Bill—the principle of which had been unopposed, had failed to pass the House of Commons, and had come up again last Session. He would ask the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack whether he intended to reintroduce it?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply, said, that the reason why the Bill had not become law was because the House of Commons had not passed it. Their Lordships were aware of the circumstances under which the last Session terminated. No Bills except those which were absolutely uncontested were passed. Some hon. Members of the House of Commons thought that this particular measure had not been skilfully prepared, and the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) found he would not have an opportunity of passing it. In these circumstances, the Bill, like many other measures, fell to the ground. He hoped that he should be able to reintroduce it next Session, and that the objections to it would then disappear. He certainly intended to persevere with it.

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

THE GLASGOW CALAMITY—PUBLIC BUILDINGS (DOORS) BILL.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE (for Mr. COLERIDGE KENNARD) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can inform the House if the exit doors of the public building in Glasgow, in which a terrible catastrophe has just occurred, were hung so as to open inwards; and, if so, whether he will withdraw the opposition he offered during the last Session of Parliament to the Bill entitled "Public Buildings (Doors) Bill," if again introduced?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have not yet received the official Report on this matter, and therefore I cannot judge, of course, of its bearings. But even if it were the case, as suggested in the Question of the hon. Member, that the doors of the theatre opened inwards, I do not think that would materially affect the grounds on which the Bill of last Session was opposed.

MR. MACFARLANE: May I ask whether it is in the recollection of the right hon. and learned Gentleman that Captain Shaw made a Report in regard to places of exit at public entertainments in the Metropolis; and, whether the recommendations of Captain Shaw have been fairly and efficiently carried out?

DR. CAMERON: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman lay the Report on the Table?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have not yet received the Report; but I have no objection to do so.

MR. MACFARLANE: I shall move for the production of the Report of Captain Shaw.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: As to the Report of Captain Shaw, the hon. Gentleman is, no doubt, aware that the authority in these matters is the Metropolitan Board of Works. I have done all in my power to induce the Board to carry out the recommendations, and I believe they are willing to carry them out. Indeed, I understand the works recommended have been carried out; but I should not like to say off-hand

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE LANARK MILITIA.

DR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is a fact that Thomas Scofield, arrested in Ayr on October 13th on a charge of absenting himself from the annual training of the Lanark Militia, was kept in custody at a county constabulary station for five days without being brought before a magistrate for remand or committal; and, if he would explain how the delay originated, and how the case was ultimately disposed of?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I believe the facts are correctly stated in the Question. Questions have arisen from time to time as to whether minor offences against the Army Acts should be prosecuted by the Civil or Military Authorities. During last Session a definite arrangement was agreed to between the Departments concerned, which was to come into force on the 1st of October. It appears that this arrangement was not sufficiently known or understood by the Local Authorities on the 13th of October, and a misunderstanding between them on the point was the cause of the delay. The consequence was that the man was liberated without being brought to trial. The occurrence is certainly to be regretted; but I do not think that such a case will happen again.

INLAND REVENUE—DUTY ON GOLD AND SILVER PLATE.

MR. SLAGG asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any steps with the view of ascertaining the amount necessary to provide a reasonable drawback of duty upon gold and silver plate, new and unused, in the hands of manufacturers and dealers; and, whether such information could not best be obtained by means of the assistance of the Goldsmiths' Company of London and the other Assay Offices throughout the Country?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): In reply to my hon. Friend I have to say that if it should be decided to make any payment in the nature of drawback of duty on plate in the hands of manufacturers and dealers, the fullest consideration will be given to the question of the scale and principle on which such drawback should be calculated. We should, no doubt, avail ourselves of the assistance of the Assay officers in considering on what articles such drawback should be allowed; but I cannot say that their advice as to the amount to be considered reasonable would necessarily be taken.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS OFFICE (IRELAND).

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any steps have yet been taken to remove the grievances admitted last Session to exist in the Registry of Deeds Office, Ireland?

MR. COURTNEY: I must demur to the implication that any grievance was admitted; the only admission is that some men in this Office are too good for their work. Special inquiries have been made into the condition of the Office, and I expect to receive very shortly a Report from the Treasury Remembrancer upon it.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS—DELAY IN PRINTING.

MR. BROADHURST asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he is aware that the delay in the production of Reports and Despatches is largely due to the fact that the Queen's Printers carry on their business with low-priced labour, therefore the best class of workmen do not accept employment in that firm; and, whether, having regard to the inconvenience caused to this House by the length of time which elapses between the laying of the Papers upon the Table and the delivery of them to Members, he will either make the printing contract an open competition in fact, or transfer the orders to the firm which now does the work of the Foreign and War Offices, and who have a complete command of the skilled labour market of the Country, so far as it relates to the printing trade?

MR. COURTNEY: I have no knowledge as to the class of labour employed by the different Government printers, and it is not the fact that delays have been greater in work done by Eyre and Spottiswoode than others; I am, indeed, aware that they protest that there has been no delay attributable to them. Irrespective of the present complaint, it has long been settled that when the present printing contracts expire the work will be thrown open to public competition on an improved system.

ARMY (INDIA)—EAST INDIAN MEDICAL SERVICE.

MR. GIBSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any, and, if so, what, steps have been taken by the Indian Government to lessen or remove the grievances of the Indian Medical Service?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The measures taken for reducing the number of unemployed medical officers in India have been efficacious. The Government of India have telegraphed that there are now only two unemployed officers in Bengal, and they have promised to communicate the number still unemployed in Madras and Bombay. It has been decided to place all surgeons of the Indian Service, not holding Executive charge, on precisely the same footing in respect of pay as surgeons of the Army or British Medical Department similarly situated. The lower rate of pay hitherto called unemployed pay will, for the future, be called grade pay, and will only be given when the officer is in receipt of staff salary in addition to his pay.

RAILWAYS (INDIA)—BHOPAL,
GWALIOR, AND NAGPORE RAILWAYS.

MR. SLAGG asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he can give any information to the House as to the proposals or contracts, if any, which have been made with regard to railway extension in India under the recommendations of the Select Committee on Indian Railway Communication?

MR. J. K. CROSS: In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, I can only say that negotiations are proceeding respecting the proposed Bhopal, Gwalior, and the Nagpore Railways; but I regret that they have not yet resulted in any contract.

(THAMES CROSSINGS)—SUBWAY
AT SHADWELL.

MR. RITCHIE asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether the attention of the Metropolitan Board has been directed to the Special Report from the Select Committee on Metropolitan Board of Works (Thames Crossings) Bill, in which the Committee report that "two crossings are immediately required, and should be sanctioned by Parliament," the one a low level bridge, with openings at Little Tower Hill, and the other a subway at or near Shadwell; and express a hope that the Metropolitan Board of Works would undertake the construction of the subway contemporaneously with the construction of a bridge at Little Tower Hill by the Corporation of London; whether the Engineer to the Board reported, in 1882, recommending the construction of a tunnel at Shadwell; and, whether the Board propose to apply to Parliament in the ensuing Session for the necessary powers to construct the subway as suggested by the Select Committee, and recommended by their Engineer?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: In reply to my hon. Friend, I beg to inform him that the attention of the Metropolitan Board has been directed to the Report of the Select Committee on the Thames Crossings Bill, and that Report is now before a Committee of the Board. As regards the second part of my hon. Friend's Question, the Engineer of the Board did, in 1882, suggest the construction of a tunnel at Shadwell as part of a general scheme of communications, and that scheme would, no doubt, have been submitted to Parliament had the Board been able to obtain from the Government an assurance of the continuance of the Coal and Wine Dues. As regards the last part of the Question, I regret that I am not at present in a position to afford the information asked, as the whole question of Thames communications is still under the consideration of a Committee of the Board.

MR. RITCHIE asked the Lord Mayor of London, Whether the attention of the Corporation of London has been directed to the Special Report from the Select Committee of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Thames Crossings) Bill, in which the Committee report that "two crossings are immediately required and should be sanctioned by Parliament," the one a low level bridge with openings at Little Tower Hill, and the other a subway at or near Shadwell, and express a hope that the Corporation of London may be induced to undertake the great and useful work of constructing the bridge contemporaneously with the construction of a subway at Shadwell by the Metropolitan Board of Works; and, whether the Corporation of London propose to apply to Parliament in the ensuing Session for the necessary powers to construct such a bridge?

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that as soon as the Report of the Select Committee on Thames Crossings appeared the Corporation immediately took steps to ascertain how far its recommendations could be complied with. They decided to construct a low-level bridge at Tower Hill, and the notices required before we can obtain the necessary powers will be given in a day or two.

ARMY (INDIA)—NUMBERS.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the English troops in India are below the established number; and, if so, by what number of men in each branch of the Service, and also by what number they fell short of the establishment on the 31st December 1883?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is very difficult during the trooping season, when detachments of men are on their way to and from India, to state the exact strength of a given arm in that country; but if the hon. and gallant Member will be content with the Returns for the 1st of September in the present and the past years, which may be taken as dates immediately preceding the trooping season, it will be seen that in the present season the Cavalry was 141; the Artillery 67; and the Infantry 4,224 below their establishment. It should be observed that a deficiency of from 800 to 900 was to be expected as arising from casualties since the close of the previous trooping season; and there is a further reason for deficiency in that two battalions from the Indian Establishment have been lent for service in Egypt. The corresponding figures for the 1st of September, 1883, showed the Cavalry as 419; the Artillery as 88; and the Infantry as 5,123 below establishment. I may add that the Authorities in India anticipate that by the close of the present trooping season their deficiency will be reduced to 650 men.

ARMY—ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT —SURGEONS MAJOR—EXAMINATIONS FOR PROMOTION.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER asked the Secretary of State for War, with reference to the Regulations in regard to the examination of Surgeons Major for promotion to the rank of Brigade Surgeon, as laid down in Army Circular, dated 1st November, 1884, Is there any precedent for examining officers ranking as Lieut.-Colonels of six years' standing, and is it proposed to extend these examinations to the other scientific branches of the Army, and examine Lieut.-Colonels of Royal Engineers and Royal Artillery before promotion to the rank of Colonel; is it the fact that several of the senior Surgeons Major are over fifty years of age, and is it the case that H.R.H. the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief, when giving evidence before Lord Morley's Committee, expressed an opinion against subjecting such old officers for examination; and, by whose recommendation were these examinations instituted?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: There are several Surgeons Major over 60 years of age, who, before being promoted to the rank of Brigade Surgeon, will be required to undergo examination. It is the case that His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief, in his evidence before Lord Morley's Committee, expressed an opinion adverse to the examinations of officers so advanced in life; but after full consideration of the difficulty of selecting officers for the rank of Brigade Surgeon the examinations were determined on at the suggestion of the Director General. There is probably no precedence for the examination of officers of similar rank in the service; but then there is probably no case in which the grounds of selection for promotion are so difficult to arrive at. There is no intention to propose the extension of the system of examination to the corresponding combatant ranks.

SOUTH AFRICA—ZULULAND—THE NATIVE RESERVE.

SIR WILLIAM M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether there is any foundation for the report published in The Natal Witness of the 27th September, to the effect that the Native Reserve in Zululand has been, or is about to be, given to John Dunn and Zibebu; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Government contemplate any other change in their relation to the Reserve?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in reply, said, there was no foundation for the report in question, and the Government did not contemplate any other change in their relation to the Reserve.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES —REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT asked the President of the Local Government Board, When the Report of the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes is likely to be issued; and, whether evidence has been taken, showing generally, and not in exceptional cases: the nature of the house accommodation provided for the working classes in the agricultural districts as compared with the towns; the rent charged in the agricultural districts as against that charged in the towns; the return of interest in the shape of rent on the capital invested in this class of houses in the towns as compared with the agricultural districts?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The first Report of the Royal Commissioners on the Housing of the Working Classes—namely, that which relates to England and Wales, is now under consideration; but I am unable to say when it will be issued. It is unusual for Royal Commissioners to make public statements as to the nature of the evidence taken before them; but I may say, in general terms, that the subjects mentioned by the hon. and gallant Member have received attention.

SCOTLAND—APPOINTMENTS TO THE LOCAL MARINE BOARD, GREENOCK.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked Mr. Solicitor General, Whether the appointment, on the 23rd February, by the Board of Trade to the Greenock Local Marine Board of Mr. George T. Swanson and Mr. H. A. Dobson, employés of the Board of Trade, and resident in London, was legal under Section 110 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854; whether the appointment on the 4th of March last, by the Board of Trade of Mr. Abram Lyle and Mr. Edward

Wilson (Provost of Greenock and, as such, already a member ex officio) to the Local Board was competent, having regard to the question of the lapse of the power of appointment prior to their nomination; whether the nomination by the Board of Trade of a gentleman to the Local Board, already an ex officio member, was within the provisions of the Act; and, if, in the case of the misconduct of an officer of a vessel belonging to Greenock, it is competent for the Board of Trade to direct the trial of such case (as recently took place) before the Local Marine Board of Glasgow instead of that of Greenock?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR FARRER HERSCHELL): With regard to the first part of the Question, I have to say that under the Merchant Shipping Act, in addition to the elected members of Local Marine Boards, four members are to be nominated within a month of the election by the Board of Trade. In some cases it has been found difficult within a month to find suitable persons to take the office; and the practice has prevailed now for a great number of years of appointing certain officials of the Board of Trade temporarily, and then, afterwards, on their resignation, of appointing other persons, whose fitness has been, in the meantime, ascertained. This is no new practice. I confess, however, that, having looked into the matter, I question whether it is within the letter of the law. I think it is not; and although it was no doubt done with the best intentions, I think it will probably not be repeated. With regard to the second part of the Question, I think the appointment of those two gentlemen, apart from the matter referred to in the third part of the Question, was a legal appointment. I think that, whatever question there might have been as to the fitness of the persons originally appointed, their resignation caused a vacancy which was properly filled up with suitable persons. With regard to the third part of the Question, I think it is certainly open to question whether the appointment was an effectual one at all; because if effectual it could only take effect at the termination of his year of office. I would rather not pass a positive opinion on that point, because it is not so clear as the others. As regards the fourth part of the Question, I think there is a misapprehension on the part of those who have suggested it. It is not obligatory on the part of the President of the Board of Trade to direct that the trial should take place at the port to which the officer belongs; but it is in the Act that it is to be held at the nearest and most convenient place for the attendance of witnesses. In this particular case I am not aware that there was any inconvenience to the witnesses in selecting Glasgow instead of Greenock; but the reason was that owing to the questions which had arisen, such as the noble Lord has called attention to, some members of the Marine Board stated that they would not attend; and, consequently, it was found that if the trial were directed to be held at Greenock the great inconvenience might be felt of there not being a quorum when the witnesses were summoned to attend.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION (SUB-COMMISSIONERS)—MR. WALPOLE.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Justice O'Hagan, when replying to the Memorial for the removal of Sub-Commissioner Walpole from the Cork Sub-Commission, had inquired into the specific charges of partiality set forth in the Memorial when he wrote that—

"The Commissioners do not believe that any valid reason does exist in the case of any of their Sub-Commissioners;"

and, if so, what was the nature of his inquiries?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I thought it right to communicate the terms of this Question to the Office of the Land Commissioners. I understand that the Commissioners are at present on Circuit in the West of Ireland. Perhaps the hon. Member will repeat this Question a few days later on.

WESTERN HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS (SCOTLAND)—THE LAND AGITATION.

MR. SEXTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the grave intelligence received from the Western Isles of Scotland, concerning the excited state of feeling among the crofters, and the occurrence of collisions between the crofters and the police, the Government have taken any steps, or will take any steps, before permitting the employment of Military force, to inform themselves whether the existing state of affairs is due to any difficulties unjustly thrown in the way of the crofters in their efforts to secure by their labour the means of subsistence for their families and themselves; whether the Government, before sanctioning a resort to extreme measures, will apply their good offices to endeavour to induce the landlords to come to friendly terms with their tenants; and, whether the Government, with a view to allay the excitement now prevailing in the Western Isles, will hold the prospect of introducing in the coming Session of Parliament, for the benefit of poor tenants in the Highlands, a Bill on the lines of the Irish Land Act of 1881, or some such measure of practical remedial legislation? He also asked whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman had any information that a deputation representing 26,000 men of the Island of Lewis was at Stornoway awaiting for the answer to that Question?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had no such information as was referred to in the last part of the Question; but it only showed the seriousness of the answer he had to give on that matter. He was not aware that there was any further information on the subject than was contained in the voluminous Report of the Royal Commission. He had already stated that the Government had under their consideration what should be done in consequence of that Report; but he should act improperly if he for one moment countenanced the idea that anything was to be conceded to the violation of law and order. The first and unconditional duty of the Government was to see that order was maintained, and the law observed. It was impossible at this moment to set forth what legislation the Government might think fit to propose; and certainly no such announcement could be made as a condition on which the maintenance of order could depend.

MR. MACFARLANE asked whether, after the Franchise Bill had been disposed of, legislation on this subject would be taken up? He did not ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman to tell them what legislation would be proposed; but would there be any legislation, and when? He thought if the Government would make a statement to that effect the agitation would subside at once.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am very glad to hear that from the hon. Member; because I have already stated last Session, and I have no objection again to state, that the Government having appointed a Commission, and they having made an important Report, they will feel themselves bound to take action upon that Report.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1883—THE DOMINION OF CANADA.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, If he will lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence with the Canadian Government relative to the operation of Clause 3 of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act of last Session?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, that there would be no objection to produce the Correspondence in question.

NATIONAL DEBT (CONVERSION OF STOCK)—OPERATION OF THE ACT.

MR. SALT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a Statement exhibiting the amount of Three per Cents. converted into Two and three-quarter per Cents.; the amount converted into Two and a-half per Cents.; the particular Stocks with respect to which the conversion has been made, Consols, Reduced Three per Cents., or New Three per Cents.; the amount of Stock, in each case, that belongs to private and to public funds, and the amount added to the capital amount of the public debt by the process of conversion; the amount of interest saved; the present capital sum of Three and three-quarter per Cents. and of New Three per Cents.; and, whether he proposes to take any further steps to accelerate the process of conversion?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that the final account of these conversions is not yet made up; but that as soon as it is complete I propose to lay on the Table a Paper giving full details of the transaction. As to the second Question, Parliament has given the Treasury discretionary powers within certain limits for two years; and at this moment I have no communication to make on the subject. If further powers should become, in my opinion, necessary, Parliament will be informed.

FRANCE AND CHINA—THE HOSTILITIES.

MR. M'COAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government recognise the existence of a state of war between France and China; and, if so, whether our duties of neutrality will be strictly observed towards both belligerents, including the closure of British ports and coaling stations in the Eastern Seas to their respective transports and men-of-war?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: It is not in my power to make, at present, any addition to my statement on this subject of the 28th ultimo, as the reply to the communication, which I informed the House had been addressed to the French Government, was only received yesterday, and is being considered. Meanwhile, the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act are being strictly enforced against both France and China.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS ACT, 1879—INTEREST ON HARBOUR LOANS.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been directed to a speech delivered at Stonehaven on the 17th October, by Mr. R. W. Duff, M.P., one of the Lords of the Treasury, on the subject of the rate of interest charged upon Harbour Loans, and to his statement that the rate of interest on those loans was raised one per cent. by "The Public Works Loans Act, 1879;" whether he confirms that statement; whether there is anything in the Act of 1879 which restrains the Public Works Loan Commissioners from advancing money for Harbour Loans at any rate of interest which does not involve loss to the Exchequer; whether advances are now made at a rate unnecessarily high for the security of the Exchequer; whether it is not in the power of the Treasury to make regulations whereby that rate shall be reduced; and, whether he intends to make such regulations?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): I will first answer the third Question of the right hon. Baronet, and I am afraid that I must, in doing so, enter into some detail. When the Bill of 1879 was originally introduced by the right hon. Baronet it contained a clause fixing the rates of interest on harbour loans, among others. They were to be according to a scale which required  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent interest to be paid on loans for more than 40 years, and less rates for shorter terms. But this clause met with great opposition, and the right hon. Baronet omitted it and took power to the Treasury to fix these rates. He said, however, that he assented to this modification with the distinct understanding—I am using the words of the Minute which he passed at the Treasury—that the Treasury would discharge the responsibility imposed upon them by at once adopting the rates which the Bill originally contained. My hon. Friend the Member for Banffshire (Mr. R. W. Duff) was therefore right in saying that the practical effect of the right hon. Baronet's Act was to raise the rate of interest on harbour loans by 1 per cent—the former rate for long loans under the Act of 1861 having been  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent—and this increased rate has been actually enforced since the passing of the Act. But it is also true that by the Act of 1879 the Treasury have power to reduce this rate of interest; and if the right hon. Baronet had been in the House on the 25th of July last he would have heard me say that before the Session of 1885 the Treasury would take into consideration and deal with all the rates of interest on loans made by the Public Works Loan Commissioners, having regard to two circumstances—one, the lower rate at which the Government can now borrow; and the other, the possibility of obtaining collateral security, such as local or county rates. We shall carry out that promise.

POST OFFICE (CONTRACTS)—THE IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Postmaster General, What additional amount was offered by the Government to the Midland Great Western Railway Company of Ireland in the course of the recent negotiations for an improved Mail Service between Dublin and the West of Ireland, and what improvement in the Service was stipulated for by the Government; also what additional sum the Company asked for a Mail Service of forty miles an hour; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the correspondence between his Department and the Midland Railway Company, and of any memorials and resolutions submitted to him with regard to the necessity for an improved Mail Service between Dublin and the West of Ireland?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I am sure the House will regret to learn that my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General is suffering from a severe attack of pleurisy, which will, I fear, prevent his transacting business for some little time. He has asked me to act again as his deputy, and in that capacity I will answer this Question. No specific sum was offered to the Railway Company for accelerating the existing trains, because at the outset of the negotiations the Railway Company assured the Post Office that it was not practicable to secure an acceleration by making the existing trains start earlier and run at a faster speed. As my right hon. Friend recently explained, the question whether the circumstances would justify the running of the additional train is now being carefully considered. He is of opinion that no useful end would be served by laying copies of the Correspondence and Memorials to which the hon. Member refers on the Table, especially so as he fully recognizes how much importance is attributed throughout the locality to an acceleration of the mails.

CITY OF LONDON LIVERY COMPANIES' COMMISSION—LETTER OF THE SECRETARY.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will have any objection to lay upon the Table a copy of a letter written by Mr. H. D. Warr, Secretary to the City of London Livery Companies' Commission, by the direction of the Commissioners, and addressed to the editors of certain Liberal newspapers with a view to "educate the opinions of the Liberal electors of the Provinces" upon the recommendations of the Commissioners in their Report?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that since the right hon. Gentleman had put that Question on the Paper he had communicated with Mr. Warr, Secretary to the Commission, and also with its Chairman. On seeing the Secretary, that gentleman frankly admitted to him that substantially what was stated in the Question was true; but he also stated that he had no authority from the Chairman of the Commission, or from anyone upon it, to write such a letter. He had also communicated with the Chairman, who wrote that he never directed Mr. Warr to write letters to the newspapers, or to call their attention in any way to the subject of the Report of the Commissioners; nor did he know that Mr. Warr had done so; and Mr. Warr certainly had no right to use the name of the Commission in connection with any correspondence of that kind. He himself had told Mr. Warr that it was a most indiscreet and improper proceeding on the part of the Secretary of a Commission, who ought to be absolutely impartial in the matter, and ought to obey their directions in what he wrote and did. Mr. Warr, he thought, recognized that that statement on his part was well-founded. He thought, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would see that it was impossible to lay any Papers on the Table. He had not seen the letter in question; but Mr. Warr admitted that he wrote it without any authority from the Commission or the Chairman. Consequently, it would not be an official document at all, and it was written after the Commission was functus officio, and its Report had been made. Mr. Warr could only allege a slight communication from one of the Commissioners at all relating to communications with the newspapers.

MEXICO—RENEWAL OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN—BRITISH CLAIMS.

MR. SALT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the preliminary Agreement for the renewal of relations between Great Britain and Mexico has been ratified by the Mexican Congress; and, whether any steps have been taken for the settlement of British claims?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The preliminary Agreement for the renewal of relations between Great Britain and Mexico has been passed by the Mexican Senate, and the ratifications were exchanged at Mexico on the 28th ultimo. Her Majesty's Government have no reason to doubt that the Mexican Government will now proceed with the investigation into the British claims provided for in the 1st Article of the Agreement, a copy of which has been laid before Parliament in the Paper, Mexico, No. 1, 1884.

SCOTLAND—SEA AND COAST FISHERIES—FISHING GRANTS.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will cause to be prepared, and lay upon the Table, a Return of all persons to whom the Crown has at various times granted an exclusive right of angling in estuaries and on the coast of Scotland, the Return to specify the date of such grant, the service for which it was granted, and the revenue, if any, formerly and now paid for such monopoly?

MR. COURTNEY: The Question of the hon. Member is not thoroughly understood in the Department. The Crown originally owned all the salmon fishings in Scotland, whether in rivers, estuaries, or sea coast; and, apart from grants made long since, what remains is treated as part of the land revenue, and the dealings with it are reported year by year in the Report of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, to which the hon. Member may refer; but these Reports do not in any way relate, as I understand it, to rod fishing, to which the Question of the hon. Member appears to refer.

MR. MACFARLANE: The hon. Gentleman says that grants were given a long time ago, and all that remains is now vested in the Crown. What I want to know is the equivalents that were given for these grants, for if the grants are not in existence, the tenants have no right to the fishings.

MR. COURTNEY: I said they were grants of general rights of fishing, and the rights of fishing are treated as part of the revenues of the Crown; but there are no grants of angling, as I understand it. That is the point of the Question.

MR. MACFARLANE: The grants I refer to are exclusive grants. I wish to ask if there are any exclusive grants of fishing by reason of which certain persons exclude the public from these waters?

MR. COURTNEY: Certainly; there are exclusive grants of fishing; but I pointed out to the hon. Member that that is not the Question on the Paper. It refers to exclusive grants of angling. With respect to the fishing, as I said before, there were ancient grants made long since for considerations with which we are now very little acquainted. The rest of the fishing is treated as part of the land revenue. Large part of it is let on 10 years' leases to persons who choose to rent it from the Crown; but a good deal has recently been sold to landowners—fishings ex adverso—that being the best means, we think, both in the interest of the Crown and of the public, of treating that revenue; and in these cases the owners have, by grant, the right to the exclusive fishing off their lands. All these sales are reported from year to year in the Report of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. It would take a very long time to make out a complete list of the grants sold for Scotland.

CITY OF LONDON LIVERY COMPANIES' COMMISSION.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government contemplate any legislation to give effect to the recommendation of the City Liveries Companies Commission?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: My answer to that is that this matter is under consideration. I cannot say more at present.

NAVY—ACCOUNTANTS AND ENGINEERS—REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Report of the Committee, appointed to inquire into the existing rules for counting junior time in the Accountant and Engineering Branches of the Royal Navy, will be considered in time to enable any recommendations that may be adopted by Her Majesty's Government to take effect in the forthcoming financial year?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The Report of the Committee will be submitted shortly, and the recommendations will be carefully considered before the commencement of the forthcoming financial year.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) — BELFAST WORKHOUSE—IRREGULARITIES OF THE MASTER.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to The Northern Whig newspaper report of the proceedings of the Belfast Board of Guardians of the previous day, in which it is alleged by Mr. Jackson, a large ratepayer in the Union, that an irregular, if not fraudulent, system of book-keeping has prevailed in the Belfast Workhouse for a long time past; if it be true that the master of this workhouse effected sales of farm produce, and other workhouse property, for one whole year and more, and made no entry, nor kept any record, of said sales in the books set apart by the Local Government Board for that purpose; if it be true that he has disregarded a resolution of the Board of Guardians requiring him to keep an inventory of the furniture and movable effects of the workhouse; if it be correct that forty paupers more were on the books of the workhouse, on the 29th September 1884, than were in the house; is it a fact that the present numbers in the house do not agree with those on the books; is it true that Major Stoddart, Government Auditor, and Inspector Hamilton, promised to conceal the master's misconduct, and did keep it concealed from the public, until Mr. Jackson's letter disclosed their conduct; have the Local Government Board condoned these offences; and, will an inquiry on oath be instituted into the whole question, or what steps will be taken?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This Question having only appeared on the Notice Paper yesterday, there has not been time for the receipt of the necessary Report, which could only be made after detailed inquiry in Belfast. Perhaps the hon. Member will be good enough to repeat the Question on Monday.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) —THE ARRAN ISLANDS.

MR. O'BRIEN (for Mr. HEALY) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Has his attention been called to complaints that the agent in the Arran Islands for many years has made the tenants under £4 valuation pay rates contrary to Law under threat of eviction, make roads without wages, and support a Protestant minister who, along with his congregation, had been imported by him into the island, and for whose benefit two tenants were evicted; if he would inquire if the tenants collected seaweed and made kelp from it without any charge for doing so for many years, but were first charged a royalty on this kelp when the agent became a director and shareholder of a kelp manufacturing company; has the Land Court of Appeal at Galway adjourned, at great inconvenience to the tenants, the decision of their cases at the request of the agent, in order to consider a demand he makes for royalty on seaweed for kelp, although there is no question about the abstract right of the tenants freely to collect seaweed for manure or otherwise; and, did the Court allow only £3 as expenses to seventy-eight tenants for the delay and the hazard of their lives in coming across the sea to Galway; and, will arrangements be made to have the points complained of speedily investigated?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): My attention has been called to complaints of the tenants of Arran Island and counter-statements of the landlord's agent. The tenants valued under £4 have, I am informed, paid poor rate up to last year; but this was not done under threat of eviction. The agent states he took on himself and paid all rates at the tenants' request, and charged them one rate equal to the county cess alone. I am informed that the tenants, up to a few years ago, did make roads without wages, and were threatened with eviction if they refused. The agent states they were bound by the terms of their tenancies to provide labour for the purpose. The Protestant clergyman is paid exclusively by the Sea Coast Mission Society. No Protestants have been imported into the Island. The clergyman has resided in the present house for 30 years. One tenant was evicted in 1877 for non-payment of rent. The farm was given to the clergyman, who held it only for a short time. It is now on the agent's hands. The tenants were not charged for kelp until recently. I believe it is a fact that a royalty was first charged at a time when the agent was Director and shareholder of a Kelp Manufacturing Company. The Company has since failed. I am informed that the Sub-Commissioners only adjourned the cases till the claims to take seaweed, which was disputed before them, were settled. I have no information as to the circumstances under which the Sub-

Commissioners, in the exercise of their discretion, measured this sum for expenses.

THE WESTERN HIGHLANDS OF SCOTLAND (LEWIS)—MR. ROSS.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Lord Advocate, If the Mr. Ross, who was recently deputed to investigate some alleged disturbances at Uig in Lewis, in his capacity of Procurator Fiscal, is the same Mr. Ross who is the Law Agent of the proprietor?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): The position of Mr. Ross has already been explained to the House on, I think, not fewer than four or five occasions during the present year. He is the Procurator Fiscal, and he is also a member of a firm who do any local law business which may be required by the proprietrix of the Island. That lady's principal law agents are in Edinburgh. Mr. Ross's firm are not factors or managers of the estate.

PUBLIC MEETINGS (IRELAND)—THE RIOT AT PORTADOWN.

MR. T. A. DICKSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Government will direct an inquiry into the police arrangements in connection with the recent riots in Portadown; and, if explanations have been demanded from the Resident Magistrate, Captain Whelan, and District Inspector Smith, as to the absence from duty upon the night of the riot, and to whom, in their absence, the direction of the police force was entrusted?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I can assure my hon. Friend that the subject is engaging the most careful attention of the Government, and especially the matter in the second paragraph of the Question. As soon as possible the result of the inquiry will be made known.

FREEMASONRY (IRELAND)—OPENING OF A NEW LODGE AT BANTRY.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that, on the 16th ultimo, a new Masonic Lodge was opened in Bantry, county Cork, at which the leading "brethren" were Mr. E. B. Warburton, Resident Magistrate, Mr. W. H. Fizzle, District Inspector Royal Irish Constabulary, Bantry, and Mr. J. S. Hume, District Inspector Royal Irish Constabulary, Skibbereen; and, whether, in view of the sentiments of the Catholic inhabitants of the neighbourhood, he will consider the advisability of modifying the police arrangements of the district?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Beyond what is indicated by reports published in the local Press, the Government has no knowledge of the circumstances referred to as to the alleged establishment of a Masonic Lodge. With regard to the suggested modification of the police arrangements of the Bantry district, the Inspector General informs me that, if any representation is made to him on the subject, he will be prepared to consider whether any necessity for such modification exists.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether there were any inquiries made by the Government of any of the gentlemen present at the opening of the Lodge?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: No, Sir; we have not inquired into what appears to be a private matter entirely.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Is it not a matter of some concern that the whole administration of the Police Force should be in the hands of Freemasons?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I understand that in Ireland, as in England, it has never yet been considered that being a Mason precludes in any way individuals from the discharge of official duties.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882 (WARRANTS) — EXTRA POLICE AT TIMAHOE, QUEEN'S CO.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary, Whether it is a fact that four additional police have been put upon the district of Timahoe, in the Queen's County; whether the district in question is one of the most peaceful in Ireland; what are the representations which have induced the Government to take this step; and, from what responsible authorities did the representations come?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Four additional police have been placed in the district on account of the prevalence of intimidation and "Boycotting" and apprehension of outrage. It was because reports to this effect were made to the Divisional Magistrate and responsible Constabulary authorities of the district that the charge has been made.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether a single outrage of any kind or description has occurred for many months in the district?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I did not say there had been outrages; I said it was because there was intimidation and apprehension of outrage.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked, whether the Government proposed to throw any extra charge upon his constituents on account of extra police placed in Queen's County only upon the surmise of the Resident Magistrate and in the absence of outrage?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN replied, that if this Question were anything more than appeared on the Paper, he must ask for Notice. If the hon. Member desired to know whether any extra charge would be placed on the county, perhaps he would give Notice.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he would repeat the Question on Monday.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—OVER- PRESSURE IN BOARD SCHOOLS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether, in view of the statements contained in a Report made at his request by Dr. Crichton Browne, F.R.S., one of the Lord Chancellor's Visitors in Lunacy, and printed by order of this House, and of the published opinions of Sir William Jenner, President of the Royal College of Physicians, that the report, if acted upon, "will save much suffering and some lives," he will take steps to procure the appointment of a Commission of medical men unconnected officially with the Education Department, to inquire whether the present method of applying the Elementary Education Acts injuriously affects the health of the children and teachers? He would add to what stood on the Paper in his name the following Question—namely, Whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the Metropolitan Association of School Board Teachers, representing more than 2,000 masters of board schools, had passed a Resolution supporting the contention of Dr. Crichton Browne?

MR. MUNDELLA: I may say that I have also received many representations from Metropolitan teachers to the contrary effect. I have reason to believe that the London School Board will to-day order an inquiry into the allegations in Dr. Crichton Browne's Report, and into the whole question of the alleged over-pressure of London board schools. If an efficient inquiry is instituted, and if, as I hope, it is assisted by impartial and thoroughly qualified medical experts, it would seem to be undesirable and unnecessary to conduct a second inquiry at the same time, and for the same objects. But, as I have already stated to the House, the most careful precautions have been taken in the Code of this year to guard against the evils complained of. The power of classifying children, either as infants or children, subject to individual examination, the provisions for the withdrawal and exemption of dull and delicate children are now universally applied, and there is a general sense of responsibility on the part of school boards, school managers, and Her Majesty's Inspectors as to the discharge of their duties in these respects. In addition to this, and, perhaps, more important than anything I have stated, the public discussion of this question is leading to the establishment of voluntary associations for supplying assistance, in the shape of cheap and, in some instances, gratuitous food and clothing, to starving and neglected children. In London a Committee of representative Managers are actively engaged in investigating the requirements of the various districts of the Metropolis, and by their aid 13 centres are in course of establishment for supplying dinners for poor children. I have been able myself, through the munificent generosity of some Members of this House, to offer considerable pecuniary help to this Committee, and I anticipate the most useful results from these efforts. Meantime, I can assure the House that I am watching carefully the general administration of the Code and Education Acts, and the effects of the recent relaxations of its provisions. I have also inquired into every alleged case of over-pressure that has been brought to my notice, and I shall shortly lay the result of these inquiries before the House.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I should like to ask, whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that its own administration and that of the London School Board are different matters? The London School Board has only authority to inquire into the proceedings of school boards, and not those of the voluntary schools. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to maintain that any inquiry by the London School Board would relieve him from responsibility?

MR. MUNDELLA said, he could only refer to the Report of Dr. Crichton Browne itself, in which he stated that if the provisions of the Code were only carefully carried out it would be all that was required. He had also the testimony of medical men, school boards, and others, to the effect that where the Code was properly applied, no over-pressure would arise from it. He had also received an admirable letter from Mr. Birley, of Manchester, who had had great experience on the subject, and who stated distinctly that the Code, if properly administered, would not produce over-pressure.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS—SCARBOROUGH ELECTION.

MR. CAINE asked Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been called to the following handbill, which was largely distributed by Sir George Sitwell's Committee on Sunday last in Scarborough:—

"More Disgrace for England.—Terrible News
"from Egypt.—Fall of Khartoum.—Cap"ture of General Gordon by the Mahdi.

"The following telegram, which was received in Scarborough this (Sunday) night, will be read with Shame and Indignation by every patriotic Englishman:—

"From To
"Sir T. Bateson, Sir Geo. Sitwell, Bart.,
"Strand, London. Scarborough.

"Gordon's Capture by the Mahdi is confirmed by information received by Government. Seven thousand of his troops deserted. Fate of Gordon unknown.

"Hold the Government responsible for this Indelible Disgrace;"

if he is aware that no printer's or publisher's name was attached to it; and, if he will institute proceedings against the person or persons responsible for its publication, under the eighteenth section of "The Corrupt Practices Act, 1883?"

SIR THOMAS BATESON: Before the Attorney General answers the Question, and in consequence of my name having appeared, I venture to trespass on the indulgence of the House for a few minutes in a matter of personal explanation. I was, Sir, informed by what I regarded as a reliable authority—[Cries of "Name!" and "Order!"] If hon. Gentlemen will allow me to conclude, then I will answer any question they put to me. I was informed late on Sunday afternoon that the rumours of the few previous days with reference to the capture of General Gordon by the Mahdi had been confirmed, and that intelligence—I did not say official—had been received by the Government to that effect. The Observer newspaper, at a later period of the evening, felt this intelligence to be of so much importance that the proprietors of that journal actually printed and published a special edition, giving most minute and circumstantial details with reference to this supposed disaster; and I am quite sure the noble Lord the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Richard Grosvenor) will not deny that The Observer newspaper is one of those general supporters of the Government which receive favours from him.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Baronet is entitled to give a personal explanation, but he is not warranted in travelling outside that limit.

SIR THOMAS BATESON: I will speak of myself. I fully believed this information to be true on the Sunday evening, and half London also believed it to be true. The Times newspaper evidently believed it the next morning, for it published an article upon it. On the faith of the information I received, I did telegraph to Sir George Sitwell a message somewhat in the terms quoted by the hon. Member, which are substantially correct. I think I said "8,000," and not "7,000." I can only add that nobody will rejoice more than I shall if this information is totally devoid of foundation. I only hope that the Expedition which proved too late to save the life of the gallant Colonel Stewart, has not been too late to rescue his heroic Chief. ["Order!"]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): I have received a copy of this document, and it certainly bears no printer's or publisher's name; but as the fact of that publication may be made the subject of proceedings for the recovery of a penalty, I shall not express any positive opinion as to whether an offence has been committed or not. But I understand that the pith of my hon.

Friend's Question is whether, as representing the Crown, I should institute proceedings against the publisher and printer for having committed this alleged offence if his name were furnished to me? Well, apart from the consideration that the power of procedure is in the hands of any person—and certainly in relation to questions arising out of political and electoral contests it is not advisable for the Government unnecessarily to take part in proceedings—I can only in this case apply the rule that I have very frequently to apply to the more general law where the printer's and publisher's name is not affixed to any placard, apart from political considerations. The principle that I apply is to consider what was the object of the suppression of the name, and what is the effect that has been produced by the name not being published. Well, as to the suppression of the publisher's name here, I, of course, will receive any information my hon. Friend is good enough to communicate to me on the subject; but, looking into the document, I cannot suppose there was any intention in the suppression of the name, because I feel even now, after the explanation of the hon. Baronet, although we may feel some curiosity to discover the source of the information which caused him to say that the Government had received information of the capture of General Gordon, I think those who received this intelligence from a Gentleman in his position would not have any reason to doubt the truth of the statement as it was communicated to them. As to the result which was produced by the publication, I do not believe my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Caine) will feel that the result has been a very disastrous one. The more immediate result of the publication has been inconvenience, because it caused the hon. Member to spend the greater part of the "polling" day in a waggonette, explaining to the electors that the information was entirely unfounded; and I believed that he announced to their great satisfaction that General Gordon not only was, but for a number of years would be, in a state of perfect security at Khartoum. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Gentleman is now travelling beyond the limits of an answer to the Question. [Cries of "Name!"]

MR. LABOUCHERE: As the hon. Baronet has intimated his readiness to answer any Question that may be put to him, I should like to ask him whether he will give the House the source of his information?

MR. SPEAKER: I must appeal to the House not to allow the matter to go further. The course taken by the hon. Baronet was not taken in his capacity of a Member of this House, nor had it any relation to any of the proceedings of this House.

NAVY—BREECH-LOADING GUNS.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, If he could state how many 18 and 43-ton guns of the new pattern breechloader have been applied for by the Admiralty to re-arm the Navy; and, how many such guns have been already delivered by the War Office, or by contract?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Twenty-two 18-ton guns have been taken in the Estimates. Three have been delivered to the Navy for experimental purposes. Fifteen are ready at Woolwich, except that the sighting is not complete, pending a decision as to the brand of powder to be used. The remaining four are incomplete, but will be ready in time for the Impérieuse, for which ship they are intended. Of the 43-ton guns, 15 were taken in the Estimates. Ten have been actually delivered. Four are being proceeded with for the Collingwood, and will be ready in time. The remaining gun is a spare gun, and is well advanced.

NAVY—H.M.S. "AGAMEMNON" AND "AJAX."

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, If the distance between the two screw shafts of the Agamemnon and Ajax, respectively, is 18 feet from centre to centre; if the screws are 17 feet 4 inches in diameter; if this leaves eight inches of space between the rudder and the twin screws on either side; whether this defect in construction fully accounts for the powerlessness of the rudder at rates of speed exceeding nine knots; and, whether any enlargement of the rudder is likely to remedy this evil?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The distance between the two screw shafts of the two vessels is 28 feet. The diameter of the screws is 17 feet. These corrections will show that the remaining Questions are based on a misconception of the facts.

ALKALI WORKS REGULATION ACT, 1881—DEATHS AT RUNCORN.

MR. WARBURTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the death of two children from suffocation by chlorine gas at the Soap and Alkali Works near Runcorn; whether he is aware that noxious vapours, destructive to vegetation and life, are constantly allowed to escape from these works; and, whether he will take steps to compel the owners of these works to adopt measures for the prevention of this danger in the neighbourhood in future?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: We have made inquiry respecting the deaths of the two children referred to by the hon. Gentleman, and have to-day received a copy of the depositions made at the inquest and of the verdict of the jury. I regret to say that it is true that the deaths of two children were caused by an emission of chlorine gas from the bleaching powder plant of the Runcorn Soap and Alkali Company's works at Runcorn. This emission, the jury state in their verdict—

"Was due to an error of judgment, and to misadventure on the part of the man in charge in opening the door of a chamber at the works."

The Reports received from the Inspector under the Alkali, &c. Works Regulation Act, 1881, as to the works in question have been satisfactory. So far from the Board being aware that noxious vapours destructive to vegetation and life are constantly allowed to escape from these works, they believe from the Report of their Chief Inspector under the Act that the escape of gas on the occasion referred to was altogether exceptional, and that the rule is that the requirements of the Act are fulfilled. The depositions which have been received to-day will be considered, with a view to determining whether the case is one for a prosecution under the Act.

BELGIUM—ANTWERP INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in view of the importance to British trade of the forthcoming International Exhibition at Antwerp, Her Majesty's Government will appoint a Commissioner to act in concert with the Commission appointed by the Belgian Government, and to give attention to British interests at the Exhibition?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The question of the appointment of a Commissioner is at present under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—THE CONSULAR REPORTS—WAGES IN GERMANY.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has observed that a Report by Consul General Oppenheimer as to wages in machine factories in Germany, just published by the Foreign Office, is rendered almost valueless for comparison by the total omission of all reference to the number of hours in the working day; and, if he will take steps to have this omission rectified?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Mr. Oppenheimer will be instructed to forward a supplementary Report containing the information asked for by the hon. Member.

WESTERN HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS (SCOTLAND)—THE CROFTERS OF SKYE.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true, as announced in The Inverness Courier newspaper of 4th November, 1884, that armed policemen, specially drilled, have been sent to the Island of Skye, and a steamer chartered to lie off the Island; and, whether he will at once lay upon the Table of the House Copies of the communication or communications from the local or police authority to the Government on the subject, also of the reply or replies made, sanctioning this step?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: We are in communication with the Local Authorities in the county of Inverness as to what measures are necessary in order to protect the police from any attacks made upon them in the execution of their duty. These communications are not yet complete. When they are so, I shall have no objection to lay them on the Table of the House.

PERSONAL ESTATES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. COCHRAN-PATRICK asked the Lord Advocate, referring to what was said when the Personal Estates (Scotland) Bill passed the Second Reading last Session, If he is in a position to make any statement on the subject to the House?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Communications have been passing, which I hope may result in a satisfactory basis for legislation being arrived at.

SOUTH AFRICA—BECHUANALAND—THE MURDER OF MR. BETHELL.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he is aware that full and complete details of the murder of Mr. Christopher Bethell appeared in The Kimberley Independent of 9th August; if he is able to explain how it happened that these details were not received at the Colonial Office before 23rd October; whether, on receipt of Commander Bethell's letter of 22nd August, asking for the particulars of the murder of his brother, the Colonial Office cabled to Sir Hercules Robinson, or if they only wrote by post; whether the Government have instructed Sir Hercules Robinson to cable back the steps he thinks necessary to take for the arrest of the murderers of Mr. Bethell, and when we may expect to hear what has been decided on; and, if he can explain how it was that the letter from Mr. Assistant Commissioner Wright (No. 98), written to Mr. William Bethell, of Rise, and which was received at the Colonial Office on 23rd October, was not delivered to Mr. Bethell till 29th October, the day on which the South African Debate took place, notwithstanding the fact that the particulars contained in that letter must necessarily have been of great service to those who were introducing the case of Mr. Bethell?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: In reply to the first Question, I have to say there is no mention in the newspaper referred to of the names of the murderers, or any evidence to prove their identity, two points which I have already several times said are obviously necessary elements on which to base any steps for their punishment. The first and only communication which gave those details was, as I have already said, Mr. Wright's despatch. In reply to the third Question, the Colonial Office did not cable—only sent a despatch. In reply to the fourth Question, we have received a telegram from Sir Hercules Robinson, who had consulted his Attorney General, and we are submitting the question to our own Law Officers to see if we can meet the legal difficulties which the High Commissioner brings before us. I shall be glad to show that telegram to the hon. Member privately; but I think he will understand that to make it public until we are able to say what course we have decided on would be very inconvenient. As to the last Question, I find, on inquiry at the Department, that the explanation of the delay of four days, one of which was a Sunday, in sending to Mr. William Bethell the letter referred to is the oversight of a clerk in the Department, caused by the pressure of getting the Papers prepared for Parliament, including this one, which was the very last received. I must be allowed very strongly to repudiate the insinuation contained in the latter part of the Question.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)— SPECIAL RESIDENT MAGISTRATES.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any new arrangements are to be made with respect to the offices of the Special Resident Magistrates in Ireland; and, if so, whether the House will be afforded an opportunity of discussing these arrangements before they come into force?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No new arrangements regarding Divisional Resident Magistrates in Ireland are intended.

RAILWAYS (INDIA)—NEW RAILWAYS.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is a fact that sanction has been given to the construction of a Railway between Umballa and Kalka, and of another towards Ootacamund; and, whether it is intended to proceed with these two Railways at a time when the traffic returns of Indian Railways are showing a considerable falling off, and when the policy of the emigration of Government Departments to the hill stations is being reconsidered?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The line from Umballa to Kalka is one of those which have been surveyed; but no intimation of sanction to its construction has reached the India Office. The line towards Ootacamund is not one which Government has contemplated constructing. Promoters of a Company for making such a line have been in negotiation with the Government of Madras and the Secretary of State; but no terms have yet been arrived at.

EDUCATION, SCIENCE, AND ART DEPARTMENT (ADMINISTRATION).

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is the intention of the Government to give effect at an early date to the recommendations embodied in the Report of the Select Committee on Education, Science, and Art Administration?

MR. GLADSTONE: We propose on an early day—I cannot name the day exactly—to adopt measures founded upon the Report of the Select Committee.

INDIA—UPPER BURMAH.

MAJOR GENERAL ALEXANDER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the atrocities recently committed in Upper Burmah; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any action in the matter?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Perhaps I may answer this Question. The Secretary of State has seen with regret the report in the newspapers of the horrible atrocities said to have been perpetrated at Mandalay; but he is not aware that the Government of India contemplate interference in the internal affairs of Burmah, which is an independent State.

PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION —BOROUGH OF SLIGO.

MR. SEXTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he has received a Copy of the following Resolution, unanimously adopted at the last meeting of the Sligo Board of Guardians:—

"That this Board urge on the Government the necessity and justice of returning to Sligo its representation in the Imperial Parliament, of which it was deprived many years ago; and that we respectfully request the Government to take the matter into consideration in any scheme of Redistribution which they may introduce this Session of Parliament, particularly so as the population, the trade, and general importance of Sligo has vastly increased since the Borough was disfranchised, Sligo being now the most important town in the West of Ireland;"

whether he is aware that a Resolution, identical in import, has been adopted by the Corporation of Sligo; and, whether, in view of the lapse of time, nearly twenty years, since the disfranchisement of Sligo, the growth of a new constituency there, the increasing population and importance of the town, and the almost total lack of urban representation in the province of Connaught, he will include in his forthcoming Redistribution Bill a proposal to re-enfranchise the Borough of Sligo?

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not complain of the hon. Member, or challenge the propriety of his asking this Question; but I think he will see that I cannot say more than that the case of Sligo shall be fairly considered. If I did say more, it is quite obvious it would be regarded by every community in the country as premature.

EGYPT (EXPEDITIONARY FORCE UP THE NILE) — INSTRUCTIONS TO GENERAL LORD WOLSELEY.

MR. ONSLOW asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If, before a further Vote of Credit is asked for in connection with the operations in the Soudan, he will lay upon the Table a Copy of the instructions sent to Lord Wolseley, defining the relative position between himself and General Gordon, in the event of the relief of the latter?

MR. GLADSTONE: In replying to this Question I must refer the hon. Member to an answer given by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War, who stated that he did not consider it desirable that the instructions to Lord Wolseley should be made public until he was in a position to act upon them. We still adhere to that—that it is not desirable to publish those instructions.

MR. ONSLOW asked what was to prevent the publishing of instructions as to whether Lord Wolseley was to supersede General Gordon when they met?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is not in my power to indicate whether Lord Wolseley will think proper to act on these instructions. If we find it to the public convenience we shall be ready to publish the instructions.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK'S REPORT.

MR. BOURKE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to state what they propose to recommend to the Khedive in pursuance of the inquiry and advice of Lord Northbrook?

MR. GLADSTONE: My noble Friend, by great activity and exertion, has completed a most onerous and laborious inquiry in a very short time; but Her Majesty's Government have not yet been put in possession of his Report. My Colleagues have only to-day received the first preliminary intimation of any recommendation that he is to make; and, therefore, all I can say is what I have stated before—that we shall lose no time, as soon as we have had an opportunity of considering the recommendation, in announcing to the House our decision.

EGYPT (THE EXPEDITION UP THE NILE)—THE VOTE OF CREDIT.

MR. O'KELLY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When he will be in a position to make a statement to the House as to the estimated cost of the Soudan Expedition?

MR. GLADSTONE: The time for making in detail any statement in relation to the Soudan Expedition will be when the Vote is proposed. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman rather intends to ask what course we propose to take in regard to that proposal; and I have to say that as soon as we are clear of the Franchise Bill we shall choose the earliest day that is in our power for proceeding with it, consistently with giving full information to the House.

THE NATIONAL LIBERAL CLUB — OPENING CEREMONY — THE ADDRESS TO THE PRIME MINISTER — PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. BROADHURST: I should like to ask the indulgence of the House for a moment, while I make a personal explanation, affecting my official work. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) is reported to have said last night that I had, in connection with some other persons, been working up an address to the Prime Minister. I beg to say that there is not the slightest foundation for any of the statements so made, neither as to the connection of myself, nor as to any of the other facts which the noble Lord mentioned in his speech last night.

LIGHTHOUSE ILLUMINANTS' COMMITTEE.

Mr. GRAY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to an article in The Financial News of October 17th, to the effect that "The Improved Gas and Oil Burner's Company" is about to be voluntarily wound up; that the capital of this Company consisted of £50,000, in 10,000 shares of £5 each, of which £30,000—£25,000 in shares, and £5,000 in cash—was to have been paid to Sir James N. Douglas for certain patent rights for improved burners, &c.; that £17,500 in shares was to have been given to Messrs. Hopcroft and Co. for their services in constituting the Company, and procuring the subscription of the remaining 1,500 shares; that if on these 1,500 shares £1 10s. per share only has been paid up; whether this is the same Sir James N. Douglas who is Engineer to the Trinity House; whether Sir James N. Douglas has received any portion of the £5,000 he was to have been paid in cash; whether, at the time he was negotiating the sale of his patents for a very large sum to the Company above-named, it was proposed to place him on the Illuminants Committee, which was to judge of the respective merits of his and rival patents for the improved illumination of lighthouses; whether this led to the resignation of Professor Tyndall; and, whether the Board of Trade contemplate instituting any inquiries with regard to the transactions between the engineer of the Trinity House and the Improved Gas and Oil Burner's Company?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I have seen the article to which the hon. Member alludes, and which refers to, among others, the Engineer to the Trinity House, who has informed the Elder Brethren that he has received in cash £500 out of the £5,000 which he was to have been paid in cash. He further states that the sum so received is about one-fourth of the money expended by him out of his own pocket in perfecting the invention. The two Parliamentary Papers which were laid on the Table of the House last Session will show the whole history of the Illuminants' Committee, and contain all the information in my possession as to the resignation of Professor Tyndall. Before the formation of the Committee, the positions of Sir James Douglas—who had given the free use of his patents to the Lighthouse Boards—and of Mr. Wigham, the well-known gas engineer, of Dublin, who, being a manufacturer and contractor, held patents of which he retained the benefit, were much considered. It was originally proposed that both should assist the Committee, but that neither of them should be a member of the Committee. This was found inconvenient, and the Committee was enlarged so as to include, among other members, both Sir James Douglas and Mr. Wigham. The facts will be found fully stated in the Letter of the Board of Trade of the 11th of May, 1883. The Trinity House are acquainted with all the facts, and are satisfied of the perfect integrity of their engineer. It is not, therefore, my intention to institute any further inquiry.

Mr. GRAY said, he would take an opportunity of calling attention to the subject, and perhaps the right hon. Gentleman could say whether the administration of the Trinity Board would form portion of the subject for inquiry by the Royal Commission on Shipping?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: No, Sir; it will not.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—THE TRIAL OF MR. FITZGERALD.

Mr. O'BRIEN: I wish to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland a Question as to which I do not think he will require Notice. It is, Whether, at the trial of Mr. Fitzgerald yesterday, 19 Catholic jurors were ordered by the Crown to stand by; and, whether, at the trial of Messrs. Cornwall and Kirwan the other day in Dublin, no juror was ordered to stand by; and, whether he can offer any explanation of the difference in the mode of procedure?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): I am informed that 19 persons were challenged by the prisoner, and 18 were ordered to stand back by the Crown, and that there were three Roman Catholics on the jury. Beyond that I know nothing.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—[BILL 1.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Trevelyan, The Lord Advocate.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GLADSTONE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: Sir, there is an opinion more or less widely prevalent that when a measure of great importance has to be proposed to the House of Commons the speech in which it is submitted to the House ought to be of proportionate length. Upon this occasion I think an exception may be fairly made to that rule. This is a question which has been thoroughly discussed. It is a question immediately connected with the provisions of the Franchise Bill. I do not even know in what position we stand with regard to any hostile Motion on the subject. The Notice Paper of to-day contains no such hostile Motion. It may be that there will be a revival of the Notice which appeared on that Paper some days ago; but even if there is, I should think it would be an abuse of the time and the patience of the House to discuss it in detail. In truth, my great desire on this occasion is to avoid everything that could partake of a controversial or polemical character, and that for this reason—that the declarations and intentions of Her Majesty's Government have been so fully placed before the House on former occasions that it will probably be enough to merely refer to them now without repenting them. It is known from those former declarations how entirely impossible it must be for us to consent either to the union of the two subjects of the Franchise and Redistribution in a single Bill, or to their simultaneous treatment in two Bills; and this simply for the reason that in our view the paramount interest concerned in this great question, which casts every other into the shade, is that of the franchise, and that we can do nothing which, in our opinion, tends in any way to place in jeopardy the passing of a measure which has for its object the extension of the franchise. In our view, if we were to consent to either the union of the two subjects in a single Bill, or to their simultaneous treatment in separate Bills, we should sacrifice not only our power as an Executive Government representing the Crown—although that would be no light matter; but we should sacrifice what is far greater and more important—namely, the title of the majority of this House to retain an effective control over the Business of this House, and to bring to an issue within a reasonable time within the walls of this House any measure which they may deem it necessary to pass. I do not wish to debate the question; but it is because we know and we conceive that the majority of this House would lose that control entirely were we to consent to either of the courses to which I have just referred—it is on that ground, and that ground alone, that we have found it necessary to make our opinions and intentions so clear to the House upon former occasions, that I think I may, as I have already said, be content merely to refer to them without repeating them. There is one other subject upon which I wish to say a few words. It is a subject which has been referred to from time to time in the course of these debates; it is the possibility and the justice of drawing a distinction between warning and menace. It has been to us a matter of absolute obligation not to keep back in absolute silence the apprehensions we feel in connection with the prolongation and exasperation of the present controversy. Apart from the use of disrespectful language, and apart from entering into invidious details, any attempt, however cautious and limited, to refer to that subject, has been treated with evident sincerity by persons of great distinction in this House as an undisguised resort to menace. If that be so, then it follows that no person, in pointing out to the person whom he loves, or to a body of persons whose privilege he wishes, on the whole, to preserve, can, even with the most friendly intentions, impress upon him or them the danger of pursuing a certain course. Surely it is an extravagant proposition to say that on that subject he must be altogether silent. It would be a course most unnatural to pursue in the incidence of private life. If my house is on fire, and my friend is sleeping in one of the chambers within reach of the conflagration, am I, in awakening him and endeavouring to persuade him to rise, to conceal from him the motive that leads me to do so, and exhort him to get up and go out into the cold without informing him of my reasons for doing so? The argument is just as strong in what I admit to be a case not corresponding with the one I have suggested in every respect. It is the question of an Institution, and of those who guide and direct the fortunes of that Institution. It is not insolent, it is not wantonness to utter such a warning. It is a sense of duty—nay, it is a friendly duty, which requires, with a due regard to the proprieties of the case, and to the respect which every person ought to pay to an established great power in the State, that some indication, careful in its form, and respectful in its language—[“Hear, hear!”]—should be conveyed to those concerned of the consequences which may seem to come within the range of anticipation. I said respectful in its language, and I admit the justice of that limitation; but I have not yet heard it said that any language used by me on this subject was disrespectful. I am only seriously saying this—that we cannot admit the justice of those who denounce as menace even the most careful and limited intimation of danger. We cannot subscribe to such a proposition, and we must protest against the handing over to imagination and feeling the work that ought to be done drily and cautiously with a practical understanding by practical men in a great political and national crisis. Although, as I have said, the immediate question relating to the reasons for passing a Bill to extend household suffrage to counties may be held to be exhausted, there are certain continuous questions on which it may be useful that I should address a few words to the House, and the more especially on that nearest of all continuous questions, of which we have heard so much in the course of this discussion—namely, that relating to the redistribution of seats. This is a question of great interest, historically and politically; and I am the more glad to approach it, because in what I have to say I shall not find it necessary to use either offensive, or, I hope, even controversial language. This question in 1831-2 constituted the bulk of the controversy which was then before the country—I mean the bulk in a Parliamentary sense; and if we are to divide into two great portions the Reform Act of 1832, we may, perhaps, say with truth that, at that time and under the circumstances of that epoch, the part which related to disfranchisement and the redistribution of seats was even more important than the enfranchisement of the middle classes by means of the £10 suffrage. At that time the great and Constitutional principle which was at issue, and which was conscientiously brought forward by the Tory Party and gallantly fought and maintained by them, not without much countenance from high Constitutional authorities, was that it was necessary to retain within the walls of the Representative Chamber a large non-representative element. That was a subject which no doubt separated, by an almost immeasurable chasm, the two Parties in the State upon that great occasion. Happily, there is no such principle now at issue—there is no such chasm now to fill up. I am able, I may almost say, to compliment the Party opposite upon the readiness which many of them have shown—and which it is not beyond hope all may show—to deal fairly with the question of redistribution, if they can only get over those phantom fears which some of them are still possessed of in respect of the extension of the franchise. I rejoice to know that there is now no such difference between us in principle upon the subject-matter of redistribution as separated Parties in 1831-2. Nor do we approach the question of redistribution as we approach the question of the franchise, nor is one to be regarded from the same point of view as the other. The question of the franchise was one of extreme simplicity, especially as we invited the House to handle it; but the question of redistribution, quite apart from Party tactics, is not necessarily of extreme complexity. The question of the franchise was, in our point of view, the paramount question that would not admit of compromise or delay. We were reproached with a severe and rigid adherence to the provisions of our Bill when it was passing through Committee. I admit that, having reduced it to that simple outline, it was a case in which we were compelled, as far as we were concerned, to invite the House to adhere substantially to the main provisions of the Bill. But this question of redistribution, however, from its complexity, is necessarily more open to variety; and fortunately, as it is much less a subject of vital differences between the respective Parties, we desire, and we not only desire, but we feel that we should endeavour if possible—and I cannot say yet whether it will be possible—to make the measure of redistribution what, unfortunately, we could not make the measure with regard to the franchise, the work, not merely of the majority of the House, but one which should receive the approval of the House at large. I do not say it will be possible to attain that aim; but I do say it is our duty to strive to attain it, and not only our duty, but it will be our satisfaction to strive for it; and if we are able to carry the great mass of opinion in this House without reference to Party differences, I can only say that it will heighten the satisfaction with which we shall regard the consummation of a great work. No doubt it is true that Gentlemen opposite differ entirely from most of us, and certainly from myself, in the relative importance which they give to these two great subjects. I believe I am not overstating the case—in fact, if possible, I am understating it—when I say that while they admit the extension of the franchise to be a good, they regard it only as a conditional good; and if the condition of attendant redistribution does not accompany the franchise, then the franchise is in their view not a good, but an evil. That is to me unintelligible. I do not think the country has been able at all to enter into that proposition so as to see that it has a serious meaning. I quite grant that within the limits of the Party it has been largely accepted and echoed. But I never can depart from the proposition that in our view the franchise is the main matter, and that though the extension of the franchise is a much greater good accompanied with redistribution, yet that it is a good in itself whether redistribution accompany it or not. Though I have alluded to that difference of opinion I have not done so for the purpose of pressing it, but for the purpose of illustrating what I have said with regard to redistribution. We hail every symptom that we can detect of any possible approximation with regard to the bases of a measure of that kind, and it will not be our fault if indications of that kind shall be unhappily frustrated. There are certain main principles of redistribution in respect to which I think the House will agree with me that we must look upon them as beyond question or dispute. Any measure of redistribution which is to meet the exigencies of the case at the present date, and which may give a reasonable hope of something like permanence in the settlement of them, must be a large one. The second proposition is that evidently it must be a measure which shall give very considerable satisfaction to the principle of population or numbers, as compared with the present regulations or the present system of the electoral areas. In the third place, I think that all will probably admit—though there may be some difference in the interpretation—it ought not to be of needless complexity. Very simple it cannot be. Its propositions and provisions cannot be reduced to a very limited number; but needless complexity ought not to be introduced into any part of our electoral system. Further—and to this I attach immense importance—it must be equitable and liberal as between the great divisions of the country—and in speaking of these great divisions I have avoided the term “the three countries” known to the Constitution, because it is not unnatural to substitute the number four for the number three, and speak of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. Further, the measure ought to be just between the different classes of the community, and the different pursuits to which those classes belong. These are the leading propositions from which, in their essence and principle, there ought to be no deviation; but in the application of them there is much ground for temperate consideration, and for some sacrifice of opinion and of prepossessions with a view to unity and concord. For example, I have spoken of the principle of population, and of the large scope that it will be necessary, in any satisfactory measure of redistribution, to allow to that principle; but, of course, the question arises—Shall that principle be the only one taken into view, or shall it be, to some extent, restrained and limited by other qualifying considerations? Shall anything be allowed to prescription and possession—to privilege which has been long enjoyed, and which has not been abused, as compared with privilege which is about for the first time to be conferred? Shall we have regard in any degree, and, if so, in what degree, to the principle of the community as distinct from the individual—the historical existence of certain communities—or shall those communities be reckoned as so many individuals, according to the figure of their population, and thrown into hotch-potch to take their chance with the rest? Shall the most concentrated populations—and especially, of course, the great concentrated population of and about the Metropolis—be treated upon exactly the same principle as was recommended with great ability by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) in the last Session of Parliament—that is to say, treated upon the same principle and basis as the more dispersed and remote populations? Shall any distinction be drawn, and to what extent, between urban and rural pursuits? Because it must be observed that the distinction between urban and rural pursuits, and so applied as to introduce complex forms of districts and geographical divisions, is of itself a distinct deviation from the pure principle of population. Now, these are points upon which undoubtedly the ultimate character of the measure of redistribution will greatly, and, perhaps, principally depend. They are points upon which probably all of us have, in one sense or another, a prejudice and a prepossession. I have my own prepossession, to some extent, in regard to the whole of them; but I feel, at the same time, that there are points in regard to which prepossession does not amount to principle, and having respect to the great good of a vast enfranchisement being accomplished—if it be accomplished—I think that upon points of that kind regard ought to be had to the prospects of harmony and peace, and the immense advantage of carrying in a great legislative change the largest possible body of friendly and contented opinion. That is language which I hope will not be thought to deviate in any manner from the propositions and professions with which I set out. I am bound to say that I proceed upon this principle and basis—that it is absolutely impossible to construct any large measure of redistribution, in my opinion, which shall not be a measure favourable

on the whole to popular liberty. I am sorry that in a great and august Assembly ingenuity has been exercised to import from across the Atlantic words which belong to the vocabulary of slang. I shall not recite any of these words; but I do think that the standard of Parliamentary language is not unimportant, and that there is an increasing necessity for paying attention to it. I frankly own I can conceive making a small measure of redistribution which shall be a surreptitious and dishonest measure; but if the measure be a large one—I do not know what human ingenuity can accomplish—I am sure that no ingenuity which I can command, or which my Colleagues can command, could by any possibility enable us to produce such a measure other than favourable to the general liberties of the people. Therefore, it is our desire to approach the subject in a large and comprehensive spirit. I will not inquire from what circumstances, or through whose agency, we have been compelled to see this question down to the present date handled to a very great extent, perhaps almost entirely, in association with those ideas which belong to our Party contests; but there are reasons why we may entertain some hope of a change. As to redistribution, we have no reason to abandon as yet the hope that there is not the amount of difference of opinion which prevails on the subject of the franchise. As to the franchise, every observer must have been led to the belief that the opinion is spreading—not in circles of Liberal politics alone—that the time is nearly exhausted, and that the franchise cannot be safely withheld, and that all efforts from all quarters ought to be directed to a safe and fair adjustment of redistribution. If it be true that there is a generally diffused, and, perhaps, almost unanimous desire for a large measure of redistribution on the opposite side of the House, far be it from us to say that such a desire proceeding from that quarter is to be treated with less respect, or is entitled to less sympathy, than if it appeared simply as our own opinion originating within our own camp. Well, Sir, if that be so, I am inclined to regret that we are obliged again to have a contest—if we are to have a contest—on the question of the union of the two Bills. So far as we are concerned, it is a fight which has been fought out already, and belonging to the past. So far as argument and reason are concerned, we are content with what we have said; we believe, rightly or wrongly, that the nation is of our mind. On those propositions we cannot go back; short of those propositions we have every disposition to join hands. If we have in any manner postponed, or if we are still holding over our official and collective decisions on any of the points of this great question, it is not because we have been slack and neglectful in preparing ourselves to decide them, but it is because we know that from the moment an official decision is taken there is a danger that considerations of Party may come to group themselves around it, and because we are anxious as long as we can, and to the utmost degree, to keep the important points of this question out of that dangerous association. It is on these principles, and animated by these views, that we desire to go forward. If Her Majesty's Government do not, beyond what necessity and propriety require, enter upon the details of any old conflict now to be renewed, it is mainly from the fear that the renewal of that conflict will not tend to the objects we ought all to have in view, and that, our work having been done, the attempt to do it over again might rekindle fires scarcely yet extinguished. I have no doubt there will be a disposition in the House generally to conduct, in a dispassionate and tranquil spirit, any debates that may arise. We have contributed, I think—at least, I have endeavoured to contribute by the assurances I have given—to a practical and to a speedy progress. I believe that the more speedy our progress may be in the stages of this measure, the better it will be for the vast issues that are involved in its passing, and the more unmixed will be the satisfaction with which, when the Royal Assent is given, it will be entered upon the Statute Book, as it will also be enshrined in the memories of the people.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. E. STANHOPE, in rising to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, any measure purporting to provide for the better Representation of the People in Parliament

said: In the absence of my noble Friend the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill)—["Hear, hear!" and a laugh.]—who, I am sorry to say, is suffering from severe domestic affliction—a fact that might have averted that somewhat deplorable cheer—I rise to move the Amendment which stands in his name. I am sure the House generally will not only feel sympathy with the noble Lord in his bereavement, but may also regret the unworthy substitute that has been provided for the very able and incisive speech which the House has undoubtedly expected. We have heard a speech from the Prime Minister couched in terms of moderation, and I desire to imitate him so far as I am able. I will go further, and say that amongst those vague generalities which form so large a portion of the right hon. Gentleman's speech there are some propositions in which I am happy to be able to concur with him. We desire just as much as the right hon. Gentleman that a settlement of the question should be arrived at favourable to the general liberties of the people. We desire equally with the Government to make every effort to secure a safe and fair adjustment of this question; and I am only sorry that, as on a former occasion, we have not had a corresponding effort on the part of the Prime Minister to enable us to come to such a settlement. For my own part, I should have wished that it had been absolutely unnecessary, in consequence of some statements that might have fallen from the Prime Minister, for me to move this Amendment. I had hoped, even against hope, that at the eleventh hour we might have had some assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that the most reasonable proposition we have always put forward would in some way be met by the Government. That proposition was so reasonable that it was actually put forward a year ago by most of the principal Leaders of the Party opposite, and there are a good many who at this moment cordially agree with it. If there had been a will I do not think there would have been any difficulty in finding a way. The difficulties might have been got over, and this controversy might have ended in a manner honourable to both Parties, and advantageous to the country. I have, therefore, been very much disappointed by what has fallen from the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman laid down some general principles, about which I will say a word or two later; but I am unable to detect in his speech any symptom of a desire to meet the views we have consistently put forward, or any solid guarantee to secure what we have at heart. This disappointment is undoubtedly intensified, inasmuch as every principal argument hitherto put forward in support of the proposition that we ought to separate franchise from redistribution has been enormously weakened, if not altogether disposed of, during the last six months. Take one of these arguments which has done good service during the Recess—the argument of time. It was said by hon. Gentlemen opposite that it was not possible, within the limits of a single Session, to pass both a Franchise and a Redistribution Bill. How does the matter now stand? We are here, in the midst of an Autumn Session, with a prospect of adjourning to the full Session in the year to come. The principle of the Franchise Bill is now accepted by both sides. And more than that, the details of that Bill have been discussed and decided upon in this House. Therefore, the main argument upon which hon. Gentlemen have hitherto relied, that it is impossible to deal simultaneously with the two Bills, is invalid. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for War, speaking in March, gave his views upon this subject. He dwelt upon the enormous importance of dealing with all branches of this question as consecutively as possible. He said that it would be much to the advantage of the country that both branches of the subject should be dealt with in one Parliament, in one Session, and, if possible, in a single Bill. The noble Lord laid down certain conditions which must be fulfilled before the advantage of dealing in that manner with both branches of the subject could be secured. He said—

“But there is only one way, in which such a thing can be accomplished, and that would have been by the existence of some general agreement upon the subject, some admission on the part of the House generally, that the time had now come when the measure which had been granted in 1867 to the boroughs must be extended to the counties, and by an equally general admission that the most grave and glaring anomalies which still exist in the distribution of political power must also be redressed.”—(3 Hansard, [286] 700. 1.)

Mr. E. Stanhope

Those conditions, I maintain, have been fulfilled; and I therefore claim the vote of the noble Lord in favour of my proposal. In introducing the Bill at the beginning of last Session, the Prime Minister further urged that there was a political objection of a very grave kind to the simultaneous passage of the two Bills—

“Where the two measures are mixed together, those who think their local interests are touched by the measures, oppose the extension of the franchise for fear of the redistribution which is to follow.”—(Ibid., [285] 128.)

At the time that argument was used I thought there was a good deal of force in it; but it must be perfectly obvious that there is now no fear of that kind. The principle of the Franchise Bill is now accepted generally; and the conduct of anyone who attempts, directly or indirectly, to oppose the franchise, for fear of after consequences, will be detected and resented by the country. There is, also, the leverage argument that is put forward. It is said that without the leverage—I might call it coercion—that will be brought to bear by the previous passage of the Franchise Bill, it will be impossible to pass a redistribution scheme. I venture to say that exactly the opposite is the fact. Supposing the Franchise Bill were passed, can anybody doubt that it is extremely probable that the zeal of hon. Members opposite for this great measure of Reform will be considerably damped, and that they would immediately discover that although the Redistribution Bill was of great importance, there were numerous other questions which could not brook an hour's delay? The only true lever, in my opinion, for the passing of that most difficult Redistribution Bill through the House, is to have the Franchise Bill in reserve. The true propelling power is that the Franchise Bill should not yet be passed. One of the contentions of hon. Gentlemen opposite is that the country is most keenly alive to the necessity of extending this household franchise to the counties. I will add something to that. I will admit that in consequence of the agitation during the Recess there are persons in the country previously indifferent to this subject who have, at any rate, been led to expect this privilege. Will anyone suppose that they will brook delay in this matter? If they have a Franchise Bill accompanying or following the Redistribution Bill they will take care, because their immediate interests are concerned, that no undue delay shall take place in this matter. I trust, then, that I have been able to show that the force of arguments that were put forward in support of separating franchise from redistribution has been diminished by what has taken place during the past few months. After all, those arguments dealt only with a question of procedure. The hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who, with a brutal frankness, often knocks the right nail on the head, has said boldly—

"Irrespective of Party tactics, it is unquestionable that the production of the Franchise Bill and Redistribution should go together."

But if we turn now for a moment from the arguments that have been alleged in favour of separating franchise from redistribution to those we have endeavoured persistently to put forward on behalf of their being simultaneously pressed on the attention of the House, the House will see that our contention has never been based on procedure or tactical considerations, but based entirely and solely on principle. They will see, further, that nothing whatever has occurred during the Recess to modify in any way the conclusions at which we arrived, or the grounds on which we support them. We have desired, and we have always put forward our desire in the plainest terms, a complete measure. We desire it because we think it would be fair and just to all parties and to all classes. We desire it in the interests of peace and order, and of the early settlement of this question; and we desire it because we believe it is the only settlement which would provide a permanent strengthening of the foundations of the Constitution. We know hon. Gentlemen opposite say—"Oh, but your contention has been put to the country, and the country has decided against you." How? and when? and where? [An hon. MEMBER: Hyde Park.] We have not yet been taught it is any part of the Constitution of this country that questions of great political importance should be decided by a show of hands, or even by manhood suffrage. When a deadlock upon a political issue arises in this country we believe the only way to decide it is by a reference to the constituencies. But that is just what you want to avoid. Certainly, so far as we have been able to form any judgment from the proceedings of the Recess, there has been nothing to make us in any way hesitate in the belief that the country thoroughly understands and appreciates the position we have put forward. [Ironical Ministerial cheers.] I am glad to hear hon. Gentlemen opposite cheer. Let us take a test case. There are many hon. and learned Gentlemen sitting on that side of the House who belong to the Profession of Law, to which I once had the honour to belong. Many of them are possessed of the greatest and highest attainments, and are well qualified for a seat on the Judicial Bench. How is it that with these Gentlemen of great merit and with that wide area of choice almost every vacancy on the Judicial Bench is filled from the outside? I suspect the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Richard Grosvenor) could supply an answer to the question. Then, a more effective and less logical attempt to answer our case is in the form of an attack on the House of Lords, ranging from the vulgar and coarse attack of the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers) to what I may call the deprecatory style of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister deprecates the attack on the House of Lords. That reminds me very much of what we used to observe when we visited the Righi Hotel. There is a notice at the hotel to the effect that visitors desiring to see the sun rise must not wrap themselves up in their blankets. So the noble Lord the Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury told his constituents in Wales that it was the greatest mistake to suppose that the Liberal Party was in favour of the abolition of the House of Lords. That remark was taken up by the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), who commented upon it in this way—

"I do not think the noble Lord meant what he said. I take his words in the non-natural sense. What he meant was—'Do not nail his ears to the pump.' Taking it in that sense, I think Lord Richard Grosvenor really intended to encourage us to go on with great meetings like this."

And the meeting at which he spoke thus was one for the abolition of the House of Lords. But this is beside the question. When the time comes it will be perfectly easy to show—indeed, it cannot be denied—that the House of Lords has acted in a thoroughly Constitutional manner in the course it has followed, and that, in the words of the Duke of Argyll, written not very long ago—

“There is no conceivable constitution of a Second Chamber which would not include the power of withholding its assent from particular measures where there is any real doubt of public opinion until after an appeal to the constituencies.”

But, as I have said, this is altogether beside the question. Grant that the House of Lords is wrong, unconstitutional, and foolish, yet that does not affect our position in this House; and we, the elected Chamber, representing public opinion, are entitled to protect popular rights, and are bound to insist on the fullest information and the amplest guarantees before we allow this great scheme of Reform to become law. What information and what guarantees have we received? Shortly before this Session began there was a rumour that the Government intended to produce a Bill dealing with redistribution, and that as soon as the Franchise Bill passed this House the Redistribution Bill would be introduced. I confess that I never credited that rumour. It did not seem to me at all possible. If it were so, I should, indeed, congratulate the House of Lords that it had escaped the servile condition to which this House is apparently to be reduced. But even if a Bill had been introduced, I think it would have been easy to show that it would have afforded no real security either to us or to the House of Lords. The essence of redistribution, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, is in the details of the measure. It would be impossible for the Government to pledge itself that any Bill which they laid on the Table and which went to a second reading would be anything like the Bill which would emerge from the House; and even if they desired to pledge themselves to it, I question very much if they would have the power to fulfil it. We have had a statement to-night from the Prime Minister, who has again discussed the general principles on which he thinks the Redistribution Bill ought to be framed. I presume that on this occasion the right hon. Gentleman speaks, not only his own individual opinion, but also the sentiments of his Colleagues, because there was great inconvenience in the course he adopted on the former occasion. I hope we are no longer to be put in a position of having a statement made by the Prime Minister which expresses his own individual opinion only. But we want much more than that. We want not only the statement of opinion on the part of the right hon. Gentleman and on the part of his Colleagues, but we want that statement to be put in such a form, on the authority of the Government as a whole, that we shall be able to deal with it and to consider it. I note a very remarkable omission in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He has told us nothing on the subject of boundaries. Can anyone doubt, if you are going to pass an adequate Redistribution Bill, that we must have some inquiry into boundaries? If such Redistribution Bill is, as has been said, to be passed within measurable time, some steps ought to be taken to inquire into the boundaries of boroughs. But the fact is, the Government are still fencing with this question of redistribution; and I cannot help thinking the country is beginning to ask—“Why, if you have all these fine general principles, do you not produce your Bill?” If it is such a fair Bill that even the Tory Party will not specially quarrel with it, why should you be afraid of the country seeing it? I am of opinion that, with one or two exceptions, the right hon. Gentleman has thrown very little additional light on the subject by what he has said to-day. Amid a good deal of vague statement, he has enunciated one principle which we have heard with satisfaction—namely, that he wished to make the Bill just between different classes and different pursuits. That is going further than the principles he advocated when he introduced the Bill last Session, and we are glad to welcome that advance. But, in estimating any suggestions made by the Prime Minister for the drafting of a Redistribution Bill, we are obliged to reduce them to this test—namely, that we must always keep steadily in view the principle on which we have been throughout acting. Bearing this in mind, have the suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman done anything to meet and assist us in dealing with the question? Our principle always has been that this measure must be considered as a whole. But we have not had the smallest assistance or suggestion from the right hon. Gentleman that he will move one single step to help us in that matter. It is said that we upon this side of the House have been accustomed to look upon this question with a view to the interest of our own Party. We should be more than human if we did not consider that to a reasonable extent; we should be untrue to our constituents if we did not consider very carefully any scheme in its bearing upon the prospects of the Constitutional Party. But I want to consider the matter from a higher point of view. Let us, free from the glamour of Party prejudice, ask ourselves this simple question—What do we desire when we set to work to reform our Constitution—what object of national importance do we set before us? I assume that, in the first place, we desire to make the House more perfectly representative. The right hon. Gentleman said the other day that he wanted a House better calculated to understand the wants of the country. That, I think, is a most inadequate description. What we want is a House of Commons not only better calculated to understand, but to represent the wants of the country. We require for that a system of representation varied according to the requirements of the different parts of the Three Kingdoms, and so adjusted to its needs as to afford an opportunity for the expression not of all opinions, for that would be ridiculous, but of all substantial bodies of public opinion. Is there anything in this Bill that gives such an assurance? There is nothing of this sort either in the Bill or in the speech of the Prime Minister with the exception of a single sentence, which I was glad to hear, and there is no guarantee that one class will not be wholly swamped by others. Important interests and important classes are altogether effaced by this Bill. One class—the agricultural labourers—are, I know, likely to be better represented. That is very desirable and very reasonable. Not that I admit that their interests have been neglected. I do not think many hon. Members will agree with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade when he spoke of the wholesale robbery of the agricultural labourers—an evil, by-the-bye, which, since he has been a Member of the House, the right hon. Gentleman himself has never lifted even his little finger to prevent. I may call as a witness the Colleague of the right hon. Gentleman—namely, the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who, in his annual speeches delivered in the last Parliament on the enfranchisement of the agricultural labourer, used to bring forward special grievances and wrongs of that class, and to tell the House that they required to be redressed. It is a remarkable fact, however, that, after about three or four years, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster withdrew that contention, acknowledging frankly that the particular grievances to which he had been wont to point had all been dealt with by the House, and, he might also have added, by a Conservative Government. But, even assuming it was true that the interests of the agricultural labourer were neglected, it only strengthens my case. The more we have allowed his interest to be overlooked amid the pressure of other matters, the more important is it that we should now take every security when we enfranchise the peasant that his votes shall not be swamped by the artisans who are already fully represented. Again, I presume that we wished to make the House a more efficient engine for doing the work of government. None of us, I suppose, hold that the legislation of 1867 has been particularly fortunate in that respect. But let us put the saddle on the right horse. Everybody knows that it is not the constituencies who tell their Members to be silent. Many of the constituencies, so far from thinking that their Representatives stated their grievances or expressed their views too much, consider rather that they fall short in that respect. If I might venture to say what are the chief dangers ahead they are these. First of all there is a danger of this House becoming too sensitive to public opinion. That is a danger already in existence, and I could quote cases in point. Even at the present time safeguards, which most of us believe to be desirable in the true interests of the country, are lightly abandoned because of the pressure of outside opinion, mainly uninstructed and influenced by vague clamour. There is a possibility that that danger will be indefinitely increased. Then there is a considerable danger that political convulsions will become more severe, and that the swing of the pendulum of public opinion from side to side will be dangerous to the true interests of the Empire both at home and abroad. But if we desire to moderate the swing of the pendulum—if we desire to check by wholesome restraints the violent oscillations of public opinion, is there any other way that we can do this than by taking care that minorities are fairly represented? If we desire to enable this House to resist unreasoning and unreasonable clamour, we must take care to protect the independence of individual opinion, and provide adequate guarantees that, in the adjustment of political power which we propose, it shall not all fall into the hands of the wire-pullers. These are very grave questions; and in my humble opinion not only the true interests and liberty of the people, but even the existence of the Empire, depend upon our looking facts fairly in the face, and upon our not allowing ourselves to be led into deliberately accepting an incomplete scheme of electoral reform blindfolded, and in the dark. First, we want more information, and then we want some substantial guarantees, that this great question of electoral reform shall not be put before us piecemeal, but that we shall have an opportunity of considering and dealing with it as a whole, and providing that it shall come into operation as a whole. It is because we have been unable to detect in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, or in the Bill, any guarantee of a substantial character for securing these important results that it is my duty now to move—

Mr. ECROYD, in seconding the Amendment, said, he rose under a feeling of sadness at the unexpected intelligence of the loss of a public servant whose high character, great ability, eminent courtesy, and temperateness in the examination of all public questions had been, he was sure, appreciated in every part of the country, and not the least by those who sat on the Opposition Benches. He was sure that, under the circumstances, every man must feel less disposed to say one word upon that discussion which would add to the bitterness of Party controversy. He sincerely hoped that in discharging the duty which had fallen upon him he might, at least, avoid saying anything which would be likely to raise any additional obstacles in the way of a fair settlement of the question. He believed that there was no serious difference of opinion between any part of the House in regard to the main lines of a fair and equitable settlement of the great questions of Reform; but he could not help regretting that they were puzzled and nonplussed by the ill-judged separation of that question into two portions, neither of which could be completely examined unless the House was in possession of the other. All that the Conservative Party had to fear in connection with that was an unfair arrangement of the question of redistribution—an arrangement which, while it might in some respects appear to be just and impartial, would yet reduce to an absolute political nullity the voice of important interests in this country. He would not go over the ground of the relative claims of different portions of the country, as that was a question which did not touch the argument he wished to take. The Prime Minister had held out to them no solution whatever of the difficulty. His speeches held out no offer of accommodation. They were merely repetitions, in moderate and courteous terms, of a demand for absolute surrender. They were asked now to give up, under the mere name of a compromise, all that they considered vital to the interest of the constituencies. The experience of the last four months had been alluded to both to-day and on previous occasions; but he claimed that in that experience the Conservative Party had found no reason to doubt the wisdom of the position they had taken up. Although the country had been stirred up by Party managers from one end of it to the other, hon. Members opposite could not point to one single convert from the Conservative ranks. In the ranks of the working men who supported the Conservative cause they found most energetic supporters of the stand which had been made on the subject. They had learnt the result of an election in a constituency which already possessed household suffrage; and, in his opinion, that election could not be pointed to as any evidence of a change of opinion

favourable to the Government. He would rather, however, ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to consider how absolutely useless and impossible, from the Conservative point of view, must be the means taken on the platform and in the Press to make them recede from the position they had taken up. What would be their position in the eyes of their constituents if they were to do so? They would never again be able to face them. No; they might be fairly beaten at the General Election, or by some other means they might be overruled; in that case they would be able to know how to take it; but, at least, they were bound to prove themselves faithful to the trust committed to them by their constituencies, and to maintain that to alter the franchise in the way proposed would tend to political injustice which it was impossible to exaggerate. To pass the present measure without redistribution would aggravate the existing inequalities of the franchise five-fold. They were told that the effect of the Franchise Bill was simply to place householders in counties in exactly the same position politically as in boroughs. As a matter of fact it did no such thing. Let them take the case of a large population which had been made the subject of remark and discussion during the last few months—the case of Accrington. There were many householders there who were also holders of rateable property, and who were anxiously looking for a reform which should place them on a par with the property-owning householders at Blackburn and Burnley. What he wanted to point out was that if Accrington was made a borough under a Redistribution Bill, the provident men there would enjoy twice as much political power as their less thrifty neighbours who were not property-owners. But if Accrington was left in the constituency of North-East Lancashire these men would enjoy the glorious distinction of being made householders in the same hour in which they would be disqualified as owners of rateable property. That would show the absolute necessity of taking the two questions of Reform and Redistribution together. Then the Prime Minister had warned them lest, in separating the two questions, they should bring forward another question besides that of the franchise. But they were not left to choose whether an attack was to be made on a part of the Constitution or not; all that they had to choose was whether that attack should be an open and declared one, or veiled and disguised in some other form. For his own part, he infinitely preferred an open attack; and if the House of Lords was to be deprived of its real place and power in the Constitution, he hoped it would be by open attack and by fair discussion in the country, and not by a side wind. Not by the adoption of measures which would reduce the House of Lords to a mere nullity—to the shadow of a name—and which would for ever eliminate it from a real place in the Constitution of the country. They had been reminded of the danger of raising a great Constitutional question; he thought that it was evident that the very method of bringing forward the Franchise Question, and the action which had provoked hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House to opposition, was in itself raising a Constitutional question of the first order. They considered that Constitutional questions had been raised not only by the manner in which the Franchise Bill had been treated, but still more by the way in which it had been introduced; and on that point he would like to ask the attention of the House to the peculiar circumstances under which the Franchise Bill was examined by that House last Session. It had been brought into that House cut and dried by the Prime Minister, and it had been understood that no alteration of that Bill was to be permitted in its passage through the House. They all knew that, whatever might be the opinions of many hon. Members opposite as to its details, the expression of those opinions, to a large extent, by speech, was limited, and by vote almost entirely forbidden. They all knew that under the pressure of the Party system very important matters, which ought to have been the subject of considerable discussion, had been passed over; and the only reply to remonstrances was that it was necessary, for the enfranchisement purposes of the Government, that the Bill should pass substantially as it stood. Were they to have questions of the first Constitutional magnitude brought solemnly before that House, and then practically withdrawn from discussion? Was not that a curtailment of the duties and the swing of the pendulum of public opinion from side to side will be dangerous to the true interests of the Empire both at home and abroad. But if we desire to moderate the swing of the pendulum—if we desire to check by wholesome restraints the violent oscillations of public opinion, is there any other way that we can do this than by taking care that minorities are fairly represented? Were they to have questions of the first Constitutional magnitude brought solemnly before that House, and then practically withdrawn from discussion? Was not that a curtailment of the duties and privileges of the House? That was a matter more important than the mere passing of a Bill; and he said, with the most positive knowledge, that in any large constituency such as he represented, where there were great bodies of working men attached to the Constitution, this symptom was regarded as a most serious one. It was not merely that the Privileges of the House of Lords were in danger, but those of the House of Commons. If this Bill were to be passed through the House with little real examination or discussion on important questions of detail, as in last Session, a most important diminution in the powers and privileges of that House would have been silently accomplished. The Franchise Bill was not a simple measure; and the point to which he had drawn attention, the exclusion of the property vote, was of the gravest importance both in its social and political aspects. As the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. S. Smith), stated the other day, the working classes of this country were divided into two classes, one not unprosperous, who protected themselves to a considerable extent by their own organizations, and thus maintained their position with great and increasing ability, but outside these there were the incapable and incompetent classes, who could not readily obtain employment. If they were to give no predominance to the provident over the improvident class of working men, they would be taking from the hands of the class most capable of influencing them for good one of the fittest instruments for that purpose. The only reply he could obtain from the Prime Minister on this important subject was a brief speech of two minutes' duration; and in the same way many other points were, upon the slightest pretext, withdrawn from the consideration of the House in such a manner that they might well ask whether this was the Bill of the House of Commons or the Bill of the Executive. This question was the question to be considered, and was considered by the masses of intelligent working men in this country, and was of such importance as to overshadow the importance of any Franchise Bill whatever. The anxiety of those who had long been associated with the great masses of population in this country, who knew their habits, their wants, and their feelings, their great and prevailing anxiety was that the better part should prevail. That was the way to insure peace and social order among that portion of the working classes who at present were so difficult to raise. If they were to take away such an instrument as this for the exercise of political influence, for the solution of great social questions, and the advancement of the lower orders of the people, those who could best exercise it would not be able to do so; and they would then be striking a fatal blow at the future political safety of this country. In the name of those for whom he spoke, owners of property—men entitled to be heard—men who knew how to raise themselves, he must express an earnest hope that the House would not, in important matters like these, sacrifice the highest interests of the country to any circumstances, however pressing, or however important, in the eyes of the Executive. He would only add, in conclusion, with regard to the whole matter, that, in his opinion, the real differences between the two Parties were so small that half-a-dozen thoughtful men drawn from each side could have framed a solution that would have been generally accepted; and he hoped they would still, every one of them, use their influence to bring about a peaceful settlement of the question. But he could not say, after the speech of the Prime Minister that night, that he saw much prospect of a compromise. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman was in tone and temper a most moderate and courteous speech; but in its essence was there one single note of accommodation? Was there anything that could be offered to them as a solution of the difficulties that pressed upon them? The Conservative Party throughout had been absolutely prepared to join in a reasonable and fair settlement of the question; but the doubt on the Conservative side was with regard to the question of Redistribution. They could not submit to a settlement of the question which might put them in this position—that the scheme of Redistribution would be so arranged that certain populations would be thrown into the mass of the county population for the sake of putting them into an area that properly should have no influence at all. The Government must either trust their political opponents and disclose their intentions, or, if they refused to do that, they could not call upon the Conservative Party to place that confidence in them which they themselves refused to extend to their opponents.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, any measure purporting to provide for the better Representation of the People in Parliament must be accompanied by provisions for a proper arrangement of electoral areas,"—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

—instead thereof.

MR. GORST said, he was disposed to think that the differences between the two sides of the House were now so small that half-a-dozen sensible men might easily settle all that was between them in a few minutes. He could not agree with his hon. Friend (Mr. Eeroyd) that this was a question on which there was no possibility of compromise. From the appearance of the House, it was very evident that the House in general, and the Conservative Party in particular, took very little interest in the discussion of this Amendment; and that was not surprising, because it was only the old question which had been brought forward by the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners), and it had been discussed ad nauseam. He, therefore, defied anybody to say anything new on the subject. He was in favour of the Amendment as an abstract Motion; and if he could support it without impeding the progress of the Franchise Bill, he should be perfectly ready to follow the hon. Gentleman into the Lobby. He wished, however, to point out that since this question was discussed last Session a great many things had happened. In the first place, they were defeated in the House of Commons by a very large majority. If Parliamentary government was to be carried on at all, there must be some questions upon which the minority must yield to the majority; and if there was any question upon which the minority should yield to the majority, he should say it was on a question of procedure. He had taken no part in the agitation of the autumn; but, as a looker on, he could discover no very clear evidence on the part of the country that it desired to disassociate itself from the vote of the House of Commons. The Leaders of the Conservative Party were just as anxious as the Government to agree to the extension of the franchise, and that had always been their position in times past. [A laugh.] Well, for 10 years he had found himself in perfect harmony with his Leaders on this question, and he was always in favour of extending household suffrage to the counties. But not only was the Conservative Party anxious to extend the franchise; the Government and their supporters were equally anxious to pass a Redistribution Bill. That was the situation between them. What guarantee had they that the Government would carry their promises out? He was as suspicious as most people of the pledges of the Government; but he confessed that, on this particular matter of redistribution, the Government were as solemnly pledged and bound as they could possibly be, and that they could not go back from the pledges they had given to the country without laying themselves open to a charge of gross breach of faith. If they had a security that some Bill would be brought in by the Government, what security had they that the Bill would be a fair Bill? Well, in the first place, he did not see any radical difference between the two Parties as regarded redistribution and the principles which should be applied to it. They were all agreed that the change must be in the direction of representation in accordance with numbers, without rigid mathematical apportionment. There must, of course, be anomalies, unless they had equal electoral districts. When the Prime Minister enunciated the principles of his redistribution scheme, he observed that they met with the general assent of Members on the Conservative side. Therefore, he supposed that in these principles enunciated by the Prime Minister there were no points of difference that ought to create a great crisis. There was one point, however, on which the Prime Minister did not touch, and that was the representation of minorities; but that was not a Party question. Then, as to the charge that the Government might manipulate the redistribution of seats so as to gain an advantage for their own Party, he said boldly that that was a task they could not perform. He did not say it was impossible to manipulate a scheme of representation with regard to small boroughs, for which men could be returned at the will of some nobleman. If there was any talk of retaining boroughs of the kind, he did not deny that there would be room for some manipulation; but if they were going to construct large and important constituencies, with an adequate number of electors, he defied the cleverest election agent in the world to manipulate a scheme of the kind. This, however, was a point with regard to which there was much nervous timidity on his side of the House; but he did not see it in that light. Both Parties were often mistaken as to the effect a particular provision would have upon their respective interests. Two instances would show this. In 1867 there was a great Party struggle as to whether the urban element should be drawn within the boroughs by an extension of boundaries, or left in the counties. Both Parties believed the new voters would be Liberal, and the Conservatives feared they would swamp the existing county voters. The Liberals had their way; but the result had been that the new voters had proved one of the most Conservative elements in the State, and the Metropolitan counties, which consisted almost wholly of that class, had returned Conservative Members from that time to the present. Again, in the case of the minority vote, which was inserted by the House of Lords on the Motion of Lord Cairns, and which affected seven counties and five boroughs returning 36 Members, according to the majorities these places should return 21 Conservatives and 15 Liberals, whereas the actual representation was 18 Conservatives and 18 Liberals. But the most powerful security against an improper manipulation of the seats, even if that were possible, was the dread of the Government of public opinion, which assuredly would resent any attempt on the part of the Government to break its pledges. If there was one thing which had been made more clear than another by the agitation of the present autumn it was that the majority of the people desired a complete measure of Reform to be passed in the present Parliament; and he believed that public opinion would punish whichever of the two Parties in that House tried to defeat their wishes. He had heard it said that the Government wanted to pass the Franchise Bill and then to dissolve; but if they carried out that intention it would be a most disastrous thing for themselves. If they were to carry out such an intention, they could not take the opinion of the country under more unfavourable circumstances. They would be appealing to boroughs which were condemned by anticipation, and to counties which their laches had deprived of their just share of representation, and they would be appealing to people who were indignant at their breach of faith. All these securities for the passing of a Bill for the redistribution of seats being in existence, what was the position of the two political Parties at the present moment? The Tory Party were no longer in the position of having to dissimulate their love for the extension of household suffrage to the counties, while the Liberal Party were pledged up to the hilt to the introduction of a fair measure for the redistribution of seats. The difference between the two Parties, therefore, was very small—it having been reduced to a mere question of procedure. In such circumstances it would be most discreditable to our Parliamentary system if the two Parties could not agree upon some mode of procedure by which their mutual objects would be attained. But, unfortunately, there were obstacles to that agreement. The first of those obstacles was furnished by the speeches delivered on platforms in the country, and, he was sorry to say, even in that House, by hon. Members who had no desire to come to an agreement, who wished to keep the wound open, and who had motives which went far beyond the passing of the Franchise and the Redistribution Bills, and who desired to stir up dissension in the constituencies. These were the men who rubbed the sore when they should bring the plaster. He hoped, however, that the House would discourage all such persons, and all such speeches. The next obstacle to a satisfactory settlement of the question was that the Leaders of both sides of the House were unwilling to trust Parliament to legislate with freedom. They wanted to have a rope round the neck of Parliament. The Leaders on his own side of the House were, he was sorry to say, using the 2,000,000 of capable citizens, whose right to enfranchisement they had admitted, as a sort of lever, to force from the Government a Redistribution Bill, when no compulsion was necessary to attain that object. He had rather a strong opinion with regard to the wisdom of using the rights of those 2,000,000 of persons for that purpose. In his humble judgment, the Conservative Party had got hold of a very ugly and dangerous edged tool in this matter. It was not impossible that the 2,000,000 of capable citizens might resent their rights being made use of in this way for the purpose of putting a screw upon the Government; and he thought that they would probably look to the votes of hon. Members on the second reading of the Franchise Bill rather than to their speeches. If he were a county Member he should be sorry to have to face the newly-enfranchised electors whom they had deprived of their privileges until they had got concessions from the Government on the mere question of procedure. He did not acquit the Prime Minister in this matter, because he had been attempting to use the Franchise Act, when passed, as a lever to force the passage of a Redistribution Bill by a Parliament quite willing to pass it without force. He thought that the solid sense of the country would repudiate any attempt to coerce Parliament, or to induce them to act otherwise than with perfect freedom. He hoped that the determination to repudiate all kinds of coercion would find an echo on both sides of the House. Holding those views, his desire would be to pass the Franchise Bill nem. con. through the House of Commons. Why should any Party in that House desire to make enemies of the new voters? They could not keep them out if they would, and they would not keep them out if they could. As he had said, the people would look more to their votes than to the speeches of hon. Members; and he believed that Members on the Opposition side who might hereafter become candidates for populous constituencies would find it very hard to explain their conduct in voting against the second reading of the Franchise Bill. They might profess a desire for the enfranchisement of the county householder; but they would find a great number of people, both in boroughs and counties, who would say—"If they voted against the franchise they do but flatter with their lips and dissemble in their double hearts." Why should the Conservative Party run their heads against a stone wall upon a mere question of procedure? If there was to be a Tory Party in the future they must rely upon that solid Conservative sentiment which history had proved existed among the masses of the people of this country. The days of privilege and of exclusiveness had gone by for ever. The Opposition had a great case to bring against the Government before the constituencies. They had a case of disaster in our foreign relations, and of indifference to our Imperial interests. If they were so ready to impeach the Government, why not impeach them before the country at large—why should they make a futile attempt to pack the jury and make enemies by alienating those whom they could not get rid of by any chance? Supposing that the screw was put on the Government, and violent measures were used for the purpose of inducing them to proceed with their Redistribution Bill, he believed that the passing the Franchise Bill, in the way he had suggested, unanimously through the House of Commons would give the Opposition an enormous lever with the constituencies. A great number of the Members on the Government side of the House, he believed, would very cordially approve of that course. Whatever might be the fate of the Bill in the other House, he, for one, hoped the Government would give hon. Members every opportunity of doing their duty. That duty, he understood, was to make the most rapid progress they possibly could according to the procedure indicated by the Government with a complete measure of Reform which the country desired to see passed. He regretted very much that the Prime Minister in his speech did not announce any definite intention of introducing and proceeding with the Redistribution Bill as soon as the Franchise Bill had passed that House; and he hoped that Her Majesty's Government would take into consideration the possibility and the propriety of adopting such a course. If the Government did adopt that course, he would promise to give them the most cordial and candid assistance. He believed that on both sides of the House there were a large number of Members who were sincerely desirous of seeing this question settled; and he hoped that both a Franchise and a Redistribution

Bill would become law during the present Session.

Mr. FIRTH observed, that it was a most interesting question how far the admirable speech which had just been addressed to the House by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) was inspired, and how many followers he had in the House. It was to be regretted that, so far as was at present known, the hon. and learned Gentleman had not yet persuaded his Leaders to adopt his views on the subject under consideration. Those views were only new as entertained by a Conservative, for the Liberals had been placing them continuously before the country during the last three or four months. The anxiety of the Conservative Party to pass the Franchise Bill was one of the most remarkable features of the present situation. It was now said that the question at issue should be left for the decision of the constituencies. He did not know why they should not be satisfied with the reference to the constituencies in 1880. There was one point in the tactics of the Conservatives which led him to doubt the reality of their anxiety for the Franchise Bill. He could not understand their tactics, because if the Franchise Bill were passed and redistribution were brought forward, a great number of difficulties would arise which would give their opponents the opportunity of dividing the Liberal Party. It might be asked why the Government did not introduce a Redistribution Bill at once. The answer was—and it seemed to him an excellent one—that the difficulties attending redistribution were such that many Members might take advantage of them for the purpose of throwing the Franchise Question over altogether. It was perfectly evident that if the Government were to introduce any Redistribution Bill whatever until the Franchise Bill was passed there would be such opposition directed against it from various points as to enable the franchise scheme altogether to be destroyed. Redistribution took a much longer time for discussion in 1832 than the Franchise Bill; and he ventured to say that if a Redistribution Bill proposed only to disfranchise Bridport, Eye, and Woodstock, the whole time of Parliament, having regard to the capacity for discussion of the Representatives of those consti-ties, would be taken up by those Members alone. Having regard to their experience of the time occupied by the Franchise Bill last Session, it was very surprising to find the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon stating at Newcastle that the Redistribution Bill could easily have been passed together with the Franchise Bill last Session. It was said that if the Franchise Bill was passed without redistribution it would create a number of anomalies; but those anomalies would not be greater than the present ones. He was glad to find that the Prime Minister had adopted so firm a tone; and he hoped that, having taken up their present attitude, the Government would maintain it, and would not introduce a measure of redistribution until the Franchise Bill was safe through the House of Lords.

Mr. DALRYMPLE said, he gathered that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down thought the present Parliament could not deal with the question of redistribution; and he further contended that no measure of redistribution ought to be introduced until the Franchise Bill had passed through the House of Lords. He (Mr. Dalrymple) inferred from that, that if the Government then found themselves face to face with the inherent difficulties of redistribution, which had been so graphically described, they would decide not to deal with that question, but to go to the country on the Franchise Bill alone. He was not disposed to complain of the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), who had a perfect right to his independent opinion, which he always expressed in the House. But if he were inclined to complain of it at all, he thought the hon. and learned Member had been sufficiently punished by the effusive and laboured eulogium of the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth). He (Mr. Dalrymple) could not help thinking, when the hon. Member for Chelsea denied the possibility of dealing with the complete question of Reform in one Session, that it would not have been so very impossible if only the Government, in the Session in which they intended to deal with the question before, had not brought forward a great mass of other legislation with which they did not seriously intend to deal. He referred, of course, to such measures as the Bill for the Government of London, which certainly was a question not suitable to be introduced in a Session in which Parliament was to be asked to deal with the question of Reform. Unlike the hon. and learned Member for Chatham—with many of whose remarks he found himself in considerable agreement—he intended to support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope). He was always sorry, in reference to the Franchise Bill, if a construction were put on a vote in favour of such an Amendment that it was a vote against the Bill, and there was none who felt that more keenly than he did, for it so happened that he enjoyed the singular privilege of being the only surviving Conservative Member who voted in 1874 with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan). It was true, as he explained in a subsequent year, that he did not think it wise, year after year, to press the question on a then reluctant Parliament, and he gave effect to that opinion by a vote in, he thought, 1876. At all events, having always considered that an extension of the franchise was a necessary corollary of the legislation of 1867, he had no difficulty in resuming in the present year the attitude which he formerly took up when the question was not quite so popular as it was now. He could not help noticing, in passing, when reference was made to the conversion of Members of the Conservative Party on this question, the number of conversions that had taken place on the other side of the House. When they heard the Conservative Party charged with being secretly opposed to the extension of the franchise and with distrust of the people, he could not help remembering that, in some of those years when the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster brought forward this question, his right hon. Friend complained that he had three great opponents to contend against—the Prime Minister of that day, The Times newspaper, and what he then described as the late Solicitor General. The late Solicitor General to whom he referred was the present Home Secretary. So that if there had been conversions on the Conservative side of the House, conversions on the other side had been equally notorious, and not of so very remote a date. But passing from that, he agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Chatham in what he said as to the approximation which had taken place between the opinions on both sides of the House with reference to this question. It was admitted that the principle of the extension of the franchise was now accepted by both sides; but he presumed still to hold that the question which they had urged both in and out of Parliament was also of paramount importance—that they should have the whole measure of the Government scheme of Reform before them. He saw two maps the other day in an able evening journal, which professed to give an account of the number of meetings held in the country on the one side or the other during the Recess. He did not know that he attached special importance to the number of meetings, or to the number who attended the meetings, on one side or the other. He should think from the nature of the case it was highly probable that a greater number of meetings was held in favour of the Franchise Bill, because if they asked people to believe the Franchise Bill was in danger, undoubtedly they could get numerous and largely attended meetings in support of the Bill. Many of those who got up the meetings knew perfectly well the Franchise Bill was not really in danger, and that what was contended for on the Conservative side was not that the Franchise Bill should not pass, but that they should have the whole scheme of Reform before them. He had heard with satisfaction much of the speech of the Prime Minister to-night. He recognized not only the conciliatory spirit of that speech, but he regarded with satisfaction the sketch of the scheme of Redistribution which the right hon. Gentleman had put before them. He recognized in that sketch something of the sketch which the right hon. Gentleman put before the House last Session. But why, if the right hon. Gentleman was anxious to advance his scheme of Reform, as he believed the right hon. Gentleman was, did he not go one step further, and having shadowed forth the scheme of Redistribution, undertake to lay it on the Table of the House after the Franchise Bill had passed this House? If he had done that it would not only have been conciliatory, it would have been much more; it would have shown the House and the country that he was anxious to meet the fair demand which the Conservative Party had made—a demand which was according to precedent—and by so doing he would have found he would have greatly facilitated the passing of the measure of Reform. He sometimes wondered if hon. Gentlemen opposite seriously disputed the contention which the Conservatives made. It was difficult for him to believe that they did not feel the force of that contention, especially as it was well known that they only contended for what had been granted in former times—namely, the exhibition of the full scheme of Reform—a contention which, when the last measure of Reform was before Parliament, was advocated by two men who were now Members of Her Majesty's Government at the present time. They had heard a good deal about a crisis at the present time. He had sometimes been inclined to question what the nature of the crisis was. It was not seriously stated, he thought, that it was a crisis of the country; but was it really a crisis of the Franchise Bill? Could that, for one moment, be said to be true? If it had been said hitherto, it could not be said after what had passed to-night. He believed, if crisis there were, it was a crisis of the Government. The difference of opinion which existed was not a difference of opinion between the House of Parliament and the country. It was a difference between the majority of the other House and the Minister of the day. As he had said, he believed if the Minister of the day—a phrase he used in preference to the Ministry of the day—had gone one step further than he did to-night, and had promised to lay on the Table of the House a scheme of Redistribution on something like the lines which he had described, he believed the right hon. Gentleman would have found that much of the difficulty with which he had to contend would disappear. He agreed entirely with the spirit of part of the remarks of the Prime Minister when he spoke of dealing with this question, not in a partizan or Party spirit, but in a wider and more generous spirit. He (Mr. Dalrymple) did not envy the man who had hoped, out of this present excitement with reference to the Reform Question, to catch the passing breeze of partizan support. He did believe, as had been said more than once, that there was nothing in the issue between them which could not easily be settled if only there was a disposition to settle it. But, as the hon. and learned Member for Chatham pointed out, there was an element which rendered the settlement of the question a difficult one, and that was, that there was a number of Gentlemen in the House, and a certain number of persons outside the House, who were looking beyond the present controversy, and were endeavouring to import into it notions of a more extended change than had anything to do with it. He had a doubt whether, in the event of the passing of this measure, those persons would easily be disposed to part with their cry against the House of Lords. But, be that as it might, he could only say that while he supported the Amendment of his hon. Friend with the utmost heartiness, believing that the Conservatives were contending, as they were in the early part of the year, for what was absolutely just—namely, that they should see the complete scheme of the Government—he did sincerely desire, as there was a considerable approximation of opinion between the two sides of the House on this question, that there might still be found a means of reconciling the differences which remained; and he believed it was quite within the power of Her Majesty's Government, if they were so disposed, to introduce a scheme of Redistribution which would strengthen the representative institutions of the country, and which would give satisfaction to both Parties in the State.

Mr. GREGORY said, that, while recognizing the conciliatory speech of the Prime Minister as one worthy of himself and of the occasion, the real question was whether the right hon. Gentleman could not go one step further than he had done. He could not help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman spoke, not from an abstract idea of the question, but from a concrete one—that he had, in fact, a complete scheme in his own mind, and if it was not actually framed, yet it was in such a position as would shortly enable it to be laid on the Table. He (Mr. Gregory) was as anxious as any hon. Member to pursue a conciliatory course on this occasion; and he would, therefore, seriously entreat the Prime Minister, if he had such a scheme as that suggested, to lay it at once on the Table. They were very much in the position of litigants who approximated closely to each other on material points at issue, and who only needed the interposition of one or two judicious friends to arrive at a complete settlement. If the Prime Minister would communicate the details of his Bill to some hon. Gentlemen of moderate opinions, whose weight and authority were recognized by the Conservative Party, and if its details were discussed on both sides, some settlement might be arrived at, and a measure might be produced acceptable generally to the country. The Prime Minister was bound to lay before the House the details of the measure which he had shadowed forth, and to do so before he called upon it for a final vote in regard to the measure now before it.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, that in the speeches to which the House had already listened it was manifest that what was in the mind of every speaker was really the subject of Redistribution, and not that of Franchise. He thought no stronger evidence could be adduced of the wisdom which dictated the policy of the Government in separating these two questions. If they had the two subjects before them, Members would have passed from one subject to the other, and it would have been almost impossible to maintain an orderly debate. He thought that, if they might judge from the speeches that had been already made, the Conservative Party had become reconciled to the passage of the Franchise Bill. That being so, he could only wonder that this measure should be again delayed, and that the Conservative Party did not co-operate in getting it out of the way so as to make progress with the serious question of Redistribution. He had had many opportunities of judging public opinion as shown at large meetings in various parts of the country; and he did not hesitate to say that no issue could be so destructive to the power of the Conservative Party as a repetition of the action of the House of Lords with regard to this Bill. If it were again rejected, it would be almost impossible for the Conservative Party to stand up against the odium which would be generated throughout the country during the winter. He maintained that the Bill which they were now discussing was in itself a compromise. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had expressed a wish that the Prime Minister had gone a step further, and given them some assurances as to the Redistribution Scheme, and had said that under those circumstances the Bill would have had an easy passage through that House. But even if the Liberal Party were disposed to bring in a one-sided Redistribution Bill they would be powerless to carry it. If they were to attempt anything like jerry-mandering, they would lose all their popularity and power in the country. He hoped the Conservative Party would do all that was necessary in influencing a noble Lord who exercised such an influence in "another place." He was satisfied the longer the settlement of this question was put off the more drastic would its nature be. For his own part, he should prefer that there should be a general understanding come to, by means of which the present measure should be allowed to pass through both Houses, and by which a Redistribution Bill might be placed on the Statute Book as soon as possible. As to the Redistribution Scheme which the Government would propose, he feared it was not such a scheme as would be acceptable to the Advanced Liberal Party. The words of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) should be well weighed. He believed the Liberal Party had done with compromise, and he trusted the Government would not move one step further in that direction, and he did not hesitate to say the country would ratify the course they had taken.

MR. BIDDELL: Sir, when I came into the House, I, as an independent Member, did not know on which side I was going to vote, for I felt convinced that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) would have suggested some practical course satisfactory to both Parties; but though he has spoken with great suavity and gentleness—to use his own term—yet he has done nothing of the sort; the Bill, therefore, is no forwarder than it was months back. In the Recess the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) made a most statesmanlike, conciliatory speech, which I was delighted to read; but I much regret that nothing has come of it. After all, what do the Lords require? Simply that they should have a general knowledge of Part 2 before they pass Part 1 of this great Reform Bill. I think, seeing how the two Parts so intimately affect one another, their request a reasonable one. But for the sake of argument let us assume that it is a whim or prejudice of the Lords; it would then be well for the Government to humour it, for the purpose of speedily passing the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman would then show that his anxiety to pass the Bill was greater than his apparent dislike to the Lords. The Government has argued against such a course; but, under the force of circumstances, they could most honourably pursue it. We are told that the Redistribution Bill is now ready; but the Government practically tells its supporters that if it lets them know what it contained, they would not pass the Franchise Bill. A more unjust reflection could not be cast upon them, for more faithful followers no Government ever had; for, indeed, hardly one faithless Member can be found amongst them. The Government views could easily be made public, without formally placing them on the Table, either of this or the other House. I cannot appreciate the secrecy of the Government, for, if I mistake not, our countrymen hate secrecy, but will fully value openness and candour. Statesmanship is shown in devising good measures, and proclaiming them to the country. The Premier has indicated that he would give more information respecting the Seats Bill, but it has not been asked for. I would now ask, are boroughs of less than 10,000 inhabitants to lose their Members? Are those of 40,000 to be winged by losing one Member? Is grouping of large towns to be carried out, thus preventing the counties being swamped by town population? And is the anomaly to be continued of county residents being unable to vote for their property in the boroughs, while the residents in the latter are still to vote in respect of their freeholds in the counties? Even now, if the Government would pursue this course and treat the House with confidence and adopt a conciliatory course, my vote shall not be found in opposition to them.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH said, he warned hon. Members opposite not to be misled by the quiet tone within the House into thinking a similar state of feeling prevailed without. In the country the agitation had reached a point which might be described as alarming. It was no satisfaction to him to see such a growth of sentiment out-of-doors, as he desired to see great Constitutional questions settled in a Constitutional manner, and not by a wild demagogic agitation. Out-of-doors this question was coming almost exclusively to be regarded as a struggle between the two Houses, and the issue was which should prevail—the elective or the hereditary? Was that the state of things which Conservatives could regard with much satisfaction? He had no desire to see the agitation assume a revolutionary character, which it would certainly assume if it continued much longer. He could foresee during the coming winter a state of things which they would all deplore if the Franchise Bill were thrown out a second time. There was great distress prevailing, and serious questions as to the soundness of our social system. If the Peers invited this agitation, it would not only be directed against the Upper House, but against the aristocracy and the holders of property generally. He felt deeply afraid that there would merge out of the strife a new Party like the Social Democrats of Germany, and that the guidance of Parties would pass from the hands of wise statesmen into that of extreme and violent men who were watching their opportunity. It was considerations of that kind which made him, as a moderate man, desire to see a speedy settlement arrived at. True Conservatism would best be shown in the effecting of a speedy settlement of this question. If the irritation which existed led to the wrecking of this measure, history taught them that in a few years a much stronger one would have to be assented to, and that either the Tories or Liberals would have to pass a Bill for manhood suffrage and equal electoral districts. All men must see that was the goal to which they were drifting. There were many hon. Members on that side of the House who had no desire to swamp Conservative feeling, and who would not be parties to any unfair scheme of Redistribution, if such were proposed, which he was certain the present Government would not do. He could not conceive that any lines of redistribution could be drawn more fair or more just than those shadowed forth by the Prime Minister in his opening speech. It would be a hopeless task to try and pass the two measures combined. The Government possessed no means of driving this complicated measure through the House, except the certainty that the Franchise Bill would pass into law at a given time. That being the fact, he could not conceive the excessive unwillingness there was to permit the Franchise Bill to pass. The statesmanlike speech of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) gave great comfort to him (Mr. Samuel Smith) and to others, and it held out some hope that this great controversy might be brought to a close without a violent dislocation in the country. Terrible times were in store for them if this question was kept open for a year or two. He hoped the two Houses of Parliament would soon join in passing this Bill, which preserved the ancient character of our Constitution.

Mr. A. F. EGERTON said, he thought a rather one-sided view had been taken of the agitation which had raged throughout the country during the Recess. He did not wish to minimize the importance of the agitation. It had doubtless intensified Radical feeling; but he doubted whether the Conservative working men had been affected in the slightest degree by the agitation. He spoke with some knowledge of working men, as he employed 5,000 of them in Lancashire, and he represented a constituency the great mass of which consisted of colliers and other working men. As far as his own experience went, he found no diminution of the Conservative feeling which undoubtedly did exist before the autumn agitation. He would appeal to his right hon. Friend's (Sir R. Assheton Cross's) testimony with regard to the meeting held at Wigan a short time ago. The colliers in South Lancashire were, to a very great extent, Conservatives, and the colliers were a very fair representative class of the working men throughout that county. He did not know what the agitation might be worth in other parts of the country. There had been a great deal of sound and fury in it, and large meetings had been held both by Liberals and Conservatives. The real question before them was, whether the Conservatives were justified in their contention that redistribution ought to be considered in connection with the extension of the franchise? The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) might be quoted in support of that contention; but when the right hon. Gentleman was quoted he generally retorted that the quotation was a lie, or used words to that effect. When, however, his contradiction was analyzed, it simply amounted to this—that a quotation which applied to a state of things when the Conservatives were in Office was totally inapplicable to a state of things existing when the Liberals were in Office. He might also quote in support of the Conservative contention the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) and the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fawcett) whose loss they had now to deplore. However, he would not go into that question, because he thought it had been debated sufficiently. He believed that the Conservatives had made out their case, not only in the House and in "another place," but also in the country; and the more the country examined the justice of their contention the more, he was convinced, would it be convinced of the justice of their arguments.

Mr. ELTON said, he thought that on his side of the House sentiments had been expressed with which the other side perfectly agreed. It afforded him great pleasure to recognize the spirit of conciliation and good feeling which the Prime Minister had shown in his speech. Throughout the excitement of the autumn he (Mr. Elton) had been one among the small minority who had always thought the question in dispute was a thing that ought to be settled; and as we belonged to a nation remarkable for its common sense, he had always believed that it would be settled, and he could not give up that belief. The Prime Minister laid down certain principles which would animate him in dealing with redistribution, and though they differed from the principles which the right hon. Gentleman personally laid down on a previous occasion, he thought the differences were in some respects for the better. What had frightened the Conservative Party on a former occasion was the idea that there was to be one rule to apply to Ireland by which the same number of Members were to be given to her as she had now, and another to apply to Scotland by which she was to have more, the result of which two rules would be that England would suffer. He thought, however, from what had been said, that the different portions of the United Kingdom would be regarded from the same point of view. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had asked on a former occasion, "What is it you Conservative Gentlemen fear?" The fear was two-fold; one was that there would be a General Election on the present constituencies without redistribution, so that the agricultural interest would be swamped; and the other was that there would be a Redistribution Scheme, as to which, though they could not exactly define the fear, they had distinct warning that it would be one which they would never pass except under pressure of time. But those two fears had been somewhat allayed by the conciliatory tone of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He thought they should know a little more about the rules of redistribution, something that would not consist in mere generalities. Those rules could be drawn up by any three sensible men on either side of the House, and when they were drafted the victory of the Conservative Party would have been won. They wanted to come to business, and they wanted to come to figures, and he was quite sure that if they did so their unanimity would be wonderful.

Mr. THOROLD ROGERS said, that after the observations of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), who stated that he had "made a vulgar and coarse speech about the House of Lords," he felt bound to say a few words. These words if used by ordinary men or newspapers would not affect him at all. He had never made any attack upon individuals, and had always referred to classes and Parties. If he had cared to have done so, he could have amused his audiences over and over again with what he knew about individual Members of the House of Lords. He could even have told of an ancestor of the hon. Member himself who was known as "Jacobin Stanhope" and "Citizen Stanhope," the friend of Horne Tooke and Hardy, and who probably, if he had not been a Peer, would have been put into the dock beside them. He had never called the Leader of the Opposition the "Moloch of Mid Lothian," nor called a Member of the Opposition a "pinchbeck Robespierre," nor talked about "snivel and drivel." He had known many Members of the House of Lords who were ornaments of the Order to which they belonged. But what he said was that, collectively, they had not only been of no use, but had been unmitigated mischiefs. For 250 years, and for 250 years only, the House of Lords had been a political power in England, and he challenged anybody to find that during that time they had ever done a single just act or expressed a single generous sentiment. Some one had attempted to defend the House of Lords, on the ground that they interposed between Fox's India Bill and the King, but, in his opinion, so far from that being an action to be applauded, it was one of the basest acts in their base history.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is referring to the other branch of the Legislature, and I am bound to remind him that he must speak with respect of the House of Lords.

Mr. THOROLD ROGERS said, he would withdraw the expression at once. He would simply refer to the facts of the case, and he would say now, what he would probably say again, that a great many Members of the House of Lords ought not to be in any House of Assembly at all. Might he not remind hon. Members that Bills were constantly being brought into that House to settle the estates of noble prodigates?

Mr. FINCH-HATTON: I rise to Order, Sir. I wish to call your attention to the words just used by the hon. Member, after he has already been re-proved for similar expressions.

Mr. SPEAKER: The remarks of the hon. Member are, I think, regrettable, and I do not see that they are relevant to the Question now before the House—namely, the Franchise Bill.

Mr. E. STANHOPE: As the hon. Member has referred to observations of my own, I must direct his attention to the particular point that was in my mind. I was alluding in particular to the speech of the hon. Member wherein he compared the House of Lords to Sodom and Gomorrah, and to the collective abominations of an Egyptian temple.

Mr. THOROLD ROGERS repeated, that what he said then he said now, that during the whole period of the existence of the House of Lords he could discover no righteous act and no generous sentiment that had ever been advocated by them. In order to make plain what he meant to his audience of working men—who probably knew their New Testament better than hon. Gentlemen opposite—he had said that of such a record as that of the House of Lords he thought he could say, in the words of the New Testament—"It will be more tolerable for Sodom and Gomorrah in the Day of Judgment than for the House of Lords." He was bound to say that he was not at all inclined to retract anything he had said. He did not intend to allege the identity of the House of Lords with the cities of the Plain; he simply said that collective misconduct was to be interpreted under the principles of collective judgment. Having explained the expression he had made use of, he hoped, to the satisfaction of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. E. Stanhope), he would like to say a few words on the subject before the House. He gladly recognized the fairness of the Prime Minister's desire to bring about a generous understanding, on the points at issue, between all Parties; but he could not help entertaining the opinion that the Franchise Bill would leave untouched certain institutions which called for reform. For example, it was hard that the gentlemen known as "freemen" were still to flourish. He knew a borough in which the freemen sold their votes collectively to one candidate, and they might generally be regarded as constituting the worst possible form of manhood suffrage. Then when they misconducted themselves they were never punished. He lived in a borough (Oxford) which boasted the presence of a Dean and Chapter, and all such boroughs were corrupt. The only explanation he could suggest of this was that the Deans and Chapters set up a standard of impossible virtue, and that the mass of the population rushed into the opposite extreme of degrading vice. Be that as it might, it was hard upon the ratepayers of Oxford that they should have been compelled to pay several thousands of pounds for a rotten Election Commission, which let off all the real culprits, and that not one single shilling should have come out of the pockets of the freemen. In 1832 the freemen were disfranchised by that House, but were restored to their position by that august and noble Assembly which met in an adjacent Chamber, just as that Assembly would always restore any mischievous and scandalous institution.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must remind the hon. Member that his remarks are contrary to the principles of amenity which should guide the conduct of Members of this House in speaking of the other House.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, that he did not mean to say anything uncivil of the other House; but there were occasions when one's feelings got the better of one's judgment. He objected to the enjoyment by one man of a plurality of votes. He (Mr. Thorold Rogers) possessed that most mischievous and noxious franchise known as the University franchise, and he had other votes besides. Why should he have more than one? He should be quite content with only one. A great many hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House were disinclined to swallow many of the things which the Prime Minister had placed in the Franchise Bill, in a spirit of conciliation, but for the sake of peace and compromise they had elected to accept them. It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that these things would be permanently settled on the lines which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had laid down. He felt sure that public opinion would oppose the system of the plural vote, and all fancy franchises. Neither would it be made to believe that any reason existed why members of a University should have votes, when members of the Inns of Court, of the Apothecaries' Company, and of the City Companies had none. It was idle to suppose that the people, whose minds had been stirred to their very depths by the facts that had been brought before them during the last three months, would remain quiet for ever after the passing of the Bill. They would, he felt sure, keep on agitating in order to bring about a really fair representation of the English people in Parliament.

MR. GUY DAWNAY said, that he did not think it necessary to reply to the extraordinary and painful speech which the House had just heard. The mere fact that the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers) rose professing his habit of using gentle and generous language, and had then made so ill-conditioned a speech that he had been called to Order three times for speaking disrespectfully of another Chamber, was sufficient comment upon it. After the speech of the hon. Member they would be curious to hear whether Billingsgate was to be made a separate constituency under the new scheme of Redistribution.

He had no desire to detain the House long on a subject so monotonously one-sided, or on a point so thoroughly threshed out, and, on their side, so amply proved, as the necessity of combining the operation of a Redistribution Act with the present measure for the extension of the suffrage. He could understand easily enough, of course, that, for the satisfaction, and with the applause, of an uneducated or prejudiced audience, the subject was capable of being distorted by a skilful use of the suppressio veri, and by a reckless employment of the suggestio falsi; and that, at least, they had seen demonstrated with all the weekly regularity of Saturday afternoon agitation. He could understand the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) amusing himself by playing with the intelligence of a Welsh audience, and smiling as they swallowed fallacy after fallacy amidst gulping cheers; but he could not understand how, amongst hon. Gentlemen occupying seats in that House, after the manner with which the measure had been turned inside out during the many heavy months that the discussion had endured, there should be any disposition still to deny the necessity of a Redistribution Bill being brought in contemporaneously with the Franchise Bill. One of the most notable features of the discussion had been the disposition of hon. Gentlemen on this particular point to swallow their own words—to repudiate them without mercy and without apparent memory either. In saying this, he had no wish to refer to all those bygone accusing pages of Hansard or of the daily Press that bore witness to the political acrobacy of various right hon. Gentlemen. It was to a very recent exemplification of this reversibility of reasoning he wished to allude, and he would like the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) to give the House some explanation with respect to the chief argument he had used the other day, when he went to sound his Ministerial war-whoop in Wales. He (Mr. Guy Dawnay) might, however, be wrong in using the word “war-whoop,” because the right hon. Gentleman had explained that he expressly deprecated on the part of his audience any of that violence which, he reminded them, had been so useful on former occasions. He did that merely from his natural love of historical reminiscence; and, after that, any subsequent rioting could not, of course, be laid to the charge of the speaker, any more than, in the well-known instance, already alluded to that evening, of nailing a certain person's ears to the pump, that brutality was perpetrated in spite of the impassioned protest of another maligned and misconstrued orator. The right hon. Gentleman commenced his speech at Denbigh, a month ago, by declaring, with more modesty than waste of accuracy, his own inability to twist and turn and change his opinions, like the Tories. He accused us of changing every full moon, elated by the proud consciousness that it had taken him some 10 revolving moons to deliver himself of a brand new and totally opposite set of opinions as to the value of redistribution. And he then proceeded—

“Now, ladies and gentlemen, this question of the franchise is one which is especially interesting for the people of Wales. You have nothing to gain in any case from redistribution, although, if Lord Salisbury had his way, you would have a good deal to lose; but with regard to the franchise, it is altogether a different matter. Will you be content that these men should be deprived of all their rights, that this unjust and unreasonable disqualification should continue?”

Now, he would ask the House to compare those words with the opinions expressed by the same right hon. Gentleman in Birmingham last year. He then said—

“But, gentlemen, there is a more important question before us than the extension of the franchise. We have to see that an equal value is given to the vote. It is no use increasing the number of voters, if you water them and minimize the political influence which the vote confers. It is no use putting 1,000,000 in the place of 100,000, if the 1,000,000 have no greater power than the 100,000.”

He would like to hear from the President of the Board of Trade how it was that an increase of voters without a corresponding increase and readjustment of the influence of their votes was condemned by him as absolutely useless last year, while this year the slightest delay in making that absolutely useless increase was denounced by him in inflammatory language as altogether unreasonable and unjust? Would the right hon. Gentleman, who so greatly deprecated inconsistency in others, condescend to explain this sudden alteration of his views between Wales and Warwickshire, between 1883 and 1884? Or was it possible that his views and logic were both somewhat warped by his eagerness to pay off that old reckoning of his with the House of Lords, and by his eagerness, by consulting a new, even if a watered, electorate, to avoid the chance of adding yet another "ejected Minister" to the records of his line? The Prime Minister made a direct statement in the House that evening which he had made also in Mid Lothian, and which had been likewise made lately by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster)—namely, that the extension of the franchise even without redistribution was in itself and by itself a good thing. Now, it appeared from the Return obtained by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) that 20,000,000 inhabitants in the counties of the United Kingdom, with nearly 3,250,000 electors, would return 283 Members, while the boroughs, with something more than 13,000,000 inhabitants and 1,920,000 electors, would return 360 Members; that was to say, that the counties, with 1,250,000 more electors and over 6,000,000 more inhabitants, would return 77 fewer Members than the boroughs. That meant that the voters in the boroughs would each possess more than double the influence, in a future Election, of the county voters, and the county Members would, in a new Parliament, have only half the influence which they ought to possess as against the borough Members, and which they would be required to exercise in maintaining the rights of the counties against those of the boroughs, either in settling a Redistribution measure, or on any other point on which the interests of borough and county might diverge. Nor was that all. The right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) had said that in 30 county constituencies out of 95 this Franchise Bill meant an entire transfer of power from the rural to the urban element. That was to say, that in nearly one-third of the county constituencies they would give the whole of the electoral power to the boroughs, on the ridiculous pretence of widening the franchise of the counties in which the boroughs were situated. Therefore, they were giving to the boroughs not only double, but treble, the power they ought to possess, and with that enormous predominance of borough-elected, or virtually borough-elected Members, they proposed to settle the Redistribution Question, in which the interests of town and county were diametrically opposed. How the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) could honestly persuade himself that the urgency of adding to the electorate, even without waiting for redistribution, had suddenly in 1884 become so great that it was worth running the risk he had foreshadowed, or how the scruples which hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House avowed as influencing them and forcing them to insist on the safeguard of a suspensory clause could be denounced as a baseless subterfuge for delay, he could not understand. Never was there a question on which the real point at issue was more deliberately disregarded, or a controversy which in itself was more easy of solution. There was no doubt in this dispute as to which of the Parties should give way—the Party which looked upon this as a mere point of procedure, or the Party which regarded it as a vital question of principle. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) had told the country that this was a mere matter of procedure. They (the Opposition) did not so consider it. They said it was a matter of principle; and that in resisting even the possibility of the extension of the franchise without, at the same time, readjustment and reapportionment of electoral power, they were loyally doing their best as a minority in that House, though—as he believed—not a minority in the country, to prevent a fatal blow being dealt at their whole representative system, and, through that, at the real liberties of the country.

Mr. RAIKES said, he was not going to follow the hon. Member for Southwark in his justification of the attack which that hon. Gentleman had made on the House of Lords, because the language used by the hon. Member was not likely to form an interesting subject of discussion either in that or the other House of Parliament. But the hon. Member was good enough to indicate a wish that in any scheme of redistribution the University franchise might be extinguished, and he went on to enforce that by saying that he had a vote for the University of Oxford. In reply to that he entreated the House not to think his constituents were to be judged by the sample they had come across to-night. But, coming to the main question, it was impossible to deny that those who sat on the Opposition Benches had listened with very mingled feelings to the speech in which the second reading of the Bill was moved. No one would dispute that that speech was very much more in accordance with their views than the last which they had heard from the same quarter. They could not forget that the third reading of the Franchise Bill in July was introduced in a speech which certainly had been considered as conveying to the other House of Parliament, if not a menace, at any rate an intimation of some terrible consequences which would follow upon their exercising their own judgment upon this measure. To-day they heard that the language then used not only by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, but his Colleagues, had been rather the language of a kind host, who, perceiving his own house to be in flames, had invited his guest upstairs to descend before the fire reached him. It appeared to him rather like the language of a man who went about brandishing a torch in his hand and exclaiming to the inmate—"If you do not come out of the room you will find the house blazing about your ears." He did not see any reason why they should take any exception to the language or the spirit of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks in his speech on this question to-night; but he was afraid when they came to analyze the view he put before the House they would find that, excepting language, they had not gained very much. He had hoped against hope that they should have heard from the Prime Minister something that would give substantial effect to his evident desire for conciliation. The right hon. Gentleman still told them that the question of the Franchise cast the question of Redistribution into the shade, and that he could not deal with the question in the same or even in simultaneous Bills, otherwise the House would lose control over its own Business. He would have gladly seen the right hon. Gentleman in his place, for he wished to call attention to a reference which he (Mr. Gladstone) had made to a speech of his own. He had no exception to take to the verbal accuracy of the quotation; but he wished to point out how entirely the Prime Minister—no doubt, through misadventure—had misrepresented what he stated. He quoted the speech as saying—

"If the Redistribution Bill was introduced next year, it was very doubtful whether it would receive the Royal Assent before the 31st of July."

He had used that argument to show how difficult it was to pass the two Bills separately, and he said it was absolutely impossible to pass a Franchise Bill and a Redistribution Bill in one Session, if you separated the one from the other, unless you came to an understanding with the Opposition. The Redistribution Bill which saw the light the other day proposed the disfranchisement of 110 seats, of which some 70 were occupied by Liberals. The Government passed the Franchise Bill by a majority of 130, as they were always telling the House, with the assistance of those 70 Gentlemen. Did hon. Members suppose that if their majority remained in other respects the same those 70 Members would vote for a Redistribution Bill which put their own seats in peril in the same way that they voted for the Franchise Bill? If they left the Redistribution Bill to take care of itself, Heaven help it among those 70 Members. The result would be that the course the Government took, while it secured the enthusiastic support of their more advanced adherents, would not please the moderate section so much. The position of the Government was not unlike that of a man who had to drive a cart heavily laden with all sorts of parcels of different sizes up a hill, and who, in order to please the spectators, cut the traces and galloped his horse up the hill as hard as he could, leaving himself to carry up his load as best he might—or, to take another illustration, suppose you wished to hit a mark you would naturally make up a cartridge for that purpose; but do you think it would be prudent or wise to expend all your powder in fireworks and feux de joie, leaving the bullet to propel itself by its momentum? He had always felt that in attempting to deal with redistribution alone, the Government had immensely increased their difficulties. Moreover, he believed that the object of a Reform Bill was to fulfil its title, and a Bill which aggravated every injustice and remedied none was not worthy of that title. They had heard some valuable statistics from his hon. Friend with regard to the enormous injustice done to the new constituencies by leaving them without redistribution. They found that the new constituencies in the counties would have something like twice the number of voters they had before, and the boroughs would thus have a double share of representation in comparison with the new county constituencies. People had talked about the question of Reform as if it was the only one which would be likely to occupy the attention of the House in the next two years. What would be the position of the country and the House if a change of Government was brought about in the course of 1886 by any other event, and they had a Minister called to power who would be entirely unable to command the majority in the existing House of Commons, but who would, under ordinary circumstances, have the Constitutional remedy of a Dissolution? Such a Minister would be debarred from exercising that Constitutional remedy, and would not be justified in going to the country without a much more certain means of forming a judgment of the position of his Government than any which he could possibly possess. That state of things meant that the present Government, if the House passed the Franchise Bill without Redistribution, was to be kept in Office for a whole year without the possibility of the Queen, or the House, or the country securing a change in the Administration. Thus they were placed in a position wholly and absolutely without precedent in this country or in any other country in the world, and one which could only be pregnant with the most serious evils and misfortunes, resulting from a state of affairs in which there was no possible way of ascertaining the real feeling of the English people. The Prime Minister, in speaking of the question of Redistribution that evening, said there were five principles which must underlie the question. The right hon. Gentleman said that the scheme must be large, that it must be framed so as to give satisfaction to those who believed that population should be represented, that it should not be complex, that it should be equitable to the different divisions of the country, and that it must be equitable between different classes and different pursuits. He thought it was hardly worth while that the Prime Minister should come there that evening and tell the House those things which were written in the very copy-book of politics. The points mentioned did not go one step further towards the root of the matter. He thought they might have heard some indication as to the limit to be fixed with regard to the return of Members, and as to whether they were to have an absolute extinction of small boroughs, or a grouping of boroughs. He also looked for some remarks with reference to the representation of minorities. No information, however, was given on any of those points; but, notwithstanding that, they no doubt would be told that the Prime Minister had displayed almost a too eager spirit of concession and conciliation in endeavouring to meet half-way a perverse and recalcitrant Opposition. No concession had really been made, though at the same time they gladly admitted the alteration in the tone of the right hon. Gentleman, and the more moderate spirit in which his remarks were made. The House might be quite prepared to give a just extension of the franchise, or even to go as far as the present Bill in swelling the existing county constituencies; but had the time not arrived when they ought to consider whether they should not retain for the future some portion of the representation which minorities had hitherto enjoyed? It had been stated that the present constituency of East Cheshire numbered 6,000 or 7,000; but that the new constituency, taken under the scheme of the Government, would be about 30,000. The existing constituency, therefore—that was to say, the persons who possessed property and who paid any appreciable amount in the shape of rates—would be absolutely submerged in the flood of the new electors. In the face of such a fact as that they ought to have regard to the right of representation put forward by minorities. He appealed to the Government not to put this question aside without some consideration and declaration. If he thought that the Government intended to accompany their Franchise Scheme with some measure that would give a just representation to the minorities in the large towns, he should regard the Bill now before the House with very much less doubt and anxiety than he did now. He entirely discountenanced

the idea of making that House a branch of the Executive and the representative of the majority only in the constituencies of the country. He hoped that the Government would, before the House passed the Bill, state their views on the pressing question of the representation of minorities. Before concluding he desired to refer to a speech made by the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), which contained the celebrated sentence, advising that any Franchise Bill which did not deal with Redistribution should be repudiated without mercy. The right hon. Gentleman, when he was asked whether this placard faithfully represented what he had said, was pleased to say that it was a lie, or used language equivalent to that. He challenged the right hon. Gentleman on that statement. In 1876 Mr. Lowe quoted this very passage in the House in the presence of the right hon. Gentleman. The passage was to be found in a speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman in 1859 at Bradford, and was to be found in the 182nd volume of Hansard, page 1,715. When Mr. Lowe cited the passage on April 19, 1866, the right hon. Gentleman was unable to deny it. Would he deny it in 1884? He ventured now to say it was a lie. That occasion ought not to pass without the right hon. Gentleman explaining in his place what he meant, or did not mean, by the letter in which he denied the quotation. Whatever might be the character of that House in other respects, nothing was more precious than the absolute veracity of its Members. He would conclude by repeating his perfect conviction that if the Government wished to endanger the progress of the Franchise Bill and to delay the enfranchisement of 2,000,000 of persons, they could not do better than separate the two measures. From a speech made at Westminster the other day by the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), it would appear that the Government were almost thirsting to receive suggestions about redistribution. But he would suggest that that was a matter for the Government, although he could assure them that any measure on the subject would be received by the Opposition with the fairest consideration.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he did not agree very much with the right

hon. Gentleman who had just spoken; but he did so in one respect—namely, in the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman that the question of redistribution of political power could never be settled in that House, unless there was a certain measure of consent between the two Parties. He did not propose to enter into any matter of detail, because he concurred in the views which had induced the Prime Minister to commend to the House a Bill which would otherwise have been thought of too Conservative a character. The hon. Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Guy Dawnay) had kindly alluded to a Return which had been ordered by the House at his (Mr. Arnold's) request. He felt it his duty to express his thanks to Her Majesty's Government for the readiness with which they had accepted the labours which it had been his privilege to devote to that Return. He did not agree with the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) in the reference they had made to the Amendment proposed to the second reading of the Bill, because he did not think any argument he or the most eminent Member of the House could adduce could be significant as compared with the overwhelming Resolution of the House itself. It had already declared its preference for dividing the subject into two separate parts; and it was idle, in the face of that overwhelming decision, for any private or official Member to argue the question. It was altogether beside the question for the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge to quote the opinions of even so eminent a Member as the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), because the question had been settled once for all by the House. They must all regret the cause which had led that evening to the absence of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill); but apart from that lamentable cause, any hon. Member who felt an interest in the political career of the noble Lord, would be disposed to congratulate him on not having been in his place that evening to move the Amendment which stood in his name. [Mr. GOSSET: Hear, hear!] He had not expected the hon. and learned Member for Chatham to cheer that sentiment; but he thought when the noble Lord read the most able, logical, and undoubtedly successful speech of the hon. and learned Member, the distress under which he was suffering would receive considerable relief. There was one other reason why the noble Lord should have been the last man on the opposite side of the House to bring forward such an Amendment. In one of his speeches, the noble Lord stated that it was absolutely impossible for any Government or political Party to present any really unfair measure of redistribution of political power. That was one great security which the House possessed; and having listened attentively to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), he could only express a hope that a Redistribution Bill would be introduced in the present Session, and be separated by as short an interval as possible from the Franchise Bill. He, for one, had always said, and was prepared to maintain, that there ought to be no needless separation between the two measures, and he would hail with pleasure the introduction of a Redistribution Bill this year. That, however, only could be done, of course, with due regard to the passing of the measure now under the consideration of the House. He had not been in the least degree surprised to hear the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) deprecate the enfranchisement of 2,000,000 of capable citizens. The deprecation of that important measure came well from the right hon. Gentleman, who had no connection whatever with the representation of the people. He was not, however, surprised that the right hon. Gentleman had dwelt with considerable emphasis on the importance of the redistribution of seats, because he hoped that the representation of the Universities would be dealt with. He (Mr. Arnold) would rejoice if circumstances permitted the Government to introduce a Redistribution Bill during the present Session, and he could only suppose that that might be possible if Her Majesty's Government could obtain assurances for the satisfactory and secure progress of the Bill now under the consideration of the House. He thought there was great truth in the observation of the hon. and learned Member for

Chatham (Mr. Gorst) in his interesting speech that evening—that the people of this country would be disposed to punish any political Party or person who obstructed the passage of this important measure. Every hon. Member must be aware that in the agitation which had taken place during the autumn the people had made very great sacrifices. He did not say the people of one Party or of the other; but it would be familiar to the minds of every hon. Member that hundreds of thousands of persons, and mostly working people whose time was of great value to themselves and families, had already made large sacrifices for what they believed to be the interests of the community. Those sacrifices had not been lightly made; and certainly he was disposed to agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that the people of this country would visit very severely upon any political Party the offence that would, to their minds, be committed by any obstruction being interposed in the way of this great question. The people of the country, no doubt, felt keenly that a class, and that the smallest, but, at the same time, endowed with political rights infinitely larger than those of any other class in the country, should set themselves in opposition to the enfranchisement of 2,000,000 of their fellow-countrymen. That fact had produced a profound impression in the minds of the people of the country, and the possible consequences had been alluded to in suitable terms by the Prime Minister, although not in terms calculated to give offence to hon. Gentlemen opposite. There could be no doubt that the progress of this Bill towards enactment ought to be speedy and secure. He had read that day in a paper published for the information of Parliament, that the House of Lords had assured Her Majesty that they would give their most careful consideration to this matter. He had read also, in Her Majesty's own words, that she had been most graciously pleased to receive that pledge on the part of the House of Lords. He hoped that that careful consideration would be given, that it would be given in a more genuine manner than last Session, and that it might lead to the speedy accomplishment of this very great and most dutiful work.

MR. R. N. FOWLER (LORD MAYOR) said, he was anxious to say a few words on this question, because he had not had the opportunity which many of his hon. Friends on that side of the House enjoyed of speaking upon it during the Recess. In consequence of the position he occupied, he had thought it better not to address any meeting outside his own constituency, and he had not, therefore, had an opportunity of expressing his feelings. No one, however, could say that, being the Representative of a great constituency, he was not fully within his right in desiring to say a few words on this most important question now before the House of Commons. He had seen it stated that there were only two persons who opposed this Bill on principle—namely, his right hon. Friend the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) and himself. The right hon. Gentleman was well able to speak for himself, and, therefore, he (Mr. R. N. Fowler) would not speak for him; but, speaking for himself, he would say that he did not believe there was any feeling existing in this country which rendered it imperative for the Government to bring in this Bill. The country was, he believed, perfectly satisfied with the state of things that now existed, and there was no necessity at the beginning of last Session for introducing the Bill. He did not mean to say that when the question had once been brought under the notice of the country its solution could be any longer delayed. Her Majesty's Government had brought in their Bill, and it now became the duty of men of all Parties to consider what the best solution of this most important question was. He wished to point out most strongly that if it was necessary to deal with the question at all, it was desirable that it should be dealt with as a whole, and that they should have the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill, without having a small portion of it brought into the House. He knew it had been alleged by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and even by the eminent authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister himself, that the whole question could not be dealt with in one Session—that time did not permit of its being brought in and disposed of by the House in one Session. He knew that the right hon. Gentleman possessed a very great power of persuading himself that any view which he, for one moment, entertained was the correct view. Therefore, he believed the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly sincere when he said so; but if it were not for the respect he felt for the right hon. Gentleman he should certainly consider that statement to be simple nonsense. Let them look back to the history of the last Session of Parliament. Parliament was called together at a period later than usual. He believed the House met some four or five days later than the usual time. It would have been quite open for Her Majesty's Government to have called Parliament together two or three weeks earlier. That would have been quite possible last year. He knew there had been great complaints of the delay which had taken place in regard to the debate on the Address, and a Notice had been given by the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Caine), the object of which was to get rid of the Address, in future, altogether. But if there had been great delays on the Address, he attributed it to the conduct of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Richard Grosvenor), for whom he entertained great personal regard, and with reference to whom he wished to speak with the greatest possible respect. Hon. Members would recollect the time when the position now occupied by the noble Lord was filled by Mr. Glyn, and Mr. Glyn invariably gave facilities to private Members for bringing on their Motions. Notwithstanding the regard he felt for the noble Lord, he felt bound to say this—and he thought private Members opposite who recollected the time he spoke of would agree with him—that they had not received the same facilities from the noble Lord as they did from Mr. Glyn. Mr. Glyn always endeavoured to keep a House on Tuesdays and Fridays; but the noble Lord had never felt himself called upon to do so. That being the case, it was not to be wondered at that private Members, finding it impossible to obtain facilities on Tuesdays and Fridays, felt that the only course open to them was to bring on their grievances upon the Address. Therefore, the delay which now arose in debating the Address was a necessary delay, and must be accepted as an accomplished fact. That being so, it would have been easy for the Government to call Parliament together at the beginning of January instead of the middle of February. But what did Her Majesty's Government do when Parliament met? Not only did they bring in this Franchise Bill, which was to be the great question of the Session; but they overburdened the Session with other measures. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) brought in a great Shipping Bill, which was so important a measure that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of it thought it necessary to make a speech of four or five hours in moving the second reading. Then, again, another right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary (Sir William Harcourt) brought in a Bill with regard to the Government of London. Now, one thing was obvious, that if these great questions—the question of the Merchant Shipping, was a most important subject, and interested many hon. Members on both sides of the House; while the question of the Government of London, it must be admitted by hon. Gentlemen opposite, was one on which a good deal might be said, especially upon its details in Committee—if those two questions were to be dragged through the House, it was quite evident that there would not be time for the consideration of a Reform Bill. If, on the contrary, Her Majesty's Government, when they called Parliament together, last year, had devoted their whole time and attention to the question of the Representation of the People in Parliament, he believed there would have been no difficulty in laying a complete Bill before the House. Every precedent was in favour of that course. References had been made by the Prime Minister, in the course of his speech, to the events which occurred in 1831 and 1832. There was no doubt that on both of those occasions the Bill which was brought in, and ultimately passed, was a Bill dealing with the whole subject. The late Earl Russell repeatedly brought Reform Bills into Parliament, and they were always complete measures. He knew that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury was at the time a Colleague of Earl Russell, who was called up to the House of Lords, and the Bill which he himself introduced, in 1866, was a Franchise Bill ultimately supplemented by a Bill for the Redistribution of Seats. The Act under which our electoral system was now constituted was brought in by Mr. Disraeli in the following year, and was also a complete Bill; and he wanted to ask what would have been the difficulty in the way of Her Majesty's Government if they had brought in a complete measure in the early part of the year, and had devoted the whole power of the Government towards getting it through? There could have been no difficulty whatever in passing a satisfactory measure through both Houses of Parliament last Session. Why, then, had they only introduced a partial measure? He believed the reason was this—Her Majesty's Government did not want a complete measure. He was of opinion that the Liberal Party wanted no full Bill. He believed the idea of those who regulated that Party behind the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury—namely, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) and his Friend Mr. Schnadhorst—was to bring in a Bill dealing with the Franchise only; to pass that Bill, and then to find excuses for dissolving Parliament before a Redistribution Bill was passed. ["Oh!"] He did not believe that that was the desire of the Prime Minister; but he believed that it was the real idea of the wire-pullers of the Liberal Party who wanted a Franchise Bill, but who did not want a Redistribution Bill. This Bill seemed to him to be a Bill to make the right hon. Gentleman a pseudo-Mayor of Paris. If the right hon. Gentleman was to be succeeded in that high position by his hon. Friend the Member for East Worcestershire, (Mr. W. H. Gladstone), as Pepin, succeeded Charles Martel, there would not be very strong objection to it; but he did not hear that his hon. Friend was mentioned in connection with that high position, and he therefore apprehended that the Successor would be found from below the Gangway. That was his idea about the Bill; and he believed the game of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway to be this—to have a Franchise Bill passed, and then to offer one excuse after another—and it was always easy to find excuses at the close of a Parliament for dissolving Parliament—which would have the effect of giving the Liberal Party another six years' lease of power. They could not hope that the right hon. Gentleman would continue to be Prime Minister many years longer, and probably the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) would be able, six years hence, to bring in a Redistribution Bill, and to make the same appeal to the country which was being made now—namely, “The majority of the House of Commons have passed the Bill, and it is very wrong and unjustifiable for noble Lords in ‘another place’ to interfere with it.” Under those circumstances, he certainly thought hon. Members on that side of the House were bound to give the Bill their most strenuous opposition. The agitation which had taken place during the Recess had not been directed so much against the Conservative Party in that House as against its Friends in “another place.” They had been told that the House of Commons was the popular House, and that noble Lords in “another place” were bound to bow to the decision of the Representatives of the people. If Her Majesty’s Government had brought in this Bill in the year 1881, he should have thought there was a good deal in that argument, although certainly, in that case, he should have been prepared to maintain that the country had not really been consulted on the questions involved in the Bill. When the country was appealed to in 1880, the Parliament had almost come naturally to its end. It could not have lasted, and right hon. Gentlemen opposite made their appeal to the country against the wicked foreign policy of the Earl of Beaconsfield’s Government. They made their appeals against the wars in Afghanistan and in South Africa, and against the European policy of the Government, and they called upon the country to dispossess the Conservatives, and place them in power. The country responded to that appeal. He was not going into the question whether the result of the change had been to strengthen their Empire in India, to bring them honour in South Africa, or to increase their position in Europe. That was not the question to consider on the present occasion. What he did maintain was, that this question of Parliamentary Reform was very casually alluded to at the time of the Dissolution. It was merely a bye-question, and hon. Gentlemen opposite were elected, as regarded the question, in the same way, as, going back some 25 years ago, they would find that hon. Gentlemen pledged themselves to support the Ballot, believing it not to be a practical question. He was of opinion that hon. Gentlemen opposite, in the same way, had pledged themselves to an extension of the Franchise, believing that it was not a practical question. [“No!”] Hon. Gentlemen said “No!” He was only giving his own opinion, but he thought there was substantial evidence in support of what he said. He believed he was correct in stating that in the Prime Minister’s Mid Lothian speeches, only two lines were taken up with this question; and when hon. Members took up the Franchise Question, although, to a certain extent, they pledged themselves to it, it was not the question upon which they fought the Election. If it had been, it would have been the bounden duty of the Government opposite to have taken the question in hand in the year 1881. Nothing of the sort was done; but, on the contrary, the question was deferred to the tail end of the Parliament. After Parliament had been sitting for four years, and then with a Dissolution impending, the Bill was brought in as a cry to go to the country upon. That was his opinion in regard to the present Bill. He maintained that if, four years after the election of the Parliament, the question was to be discussed, the time had come when this very important issue ought to be submitted to the constituencies. It was not a question to be decided by a moribund Parliament, but by the people of England. He knew they were told that the people had held meetings throughout the country in favour of the Bill. Hon. Gentlemen opposite had held many meetings, and had been supported by large demonstrations in Hyde Park and Aston Park, in Birmingham, and in other places; but it seemed to him that there was but one Constitutional appeal to the people of England—namely, an appeal to a General Election. They were told by hon. Gentlemen opposite that they did not fear that result; but it appeared to him that if they did not fear that result, they would resort to it with greater willingness than they were now displaying. If they were as confident as they professed to be in that House, they would more heartily appeal to the people of England, and welcome the result of such an appeal in giving them a new lease of life. When he found Her Majesty's Government proclaiming by their acts that they dared not face the present constituencies, the conclusion forced itself upon his mind that they were afraid of the result of an appeal to the people; and it was because they feared an appeal to the present constituencies that they were endeavouring to pass this Bill through a moribund Parliament. They had heard a great deal of abuse of the other House of Parliament. It seemed to him that when that illustrious House declined to pass a Bill until they knew what the whole scheme of Her Majesty's Government was, they were not only taking a Constitutional course which no one disputed, but they were simply doing their duty to the people of England. They had heard not only menaces, but a great many warnings held out to that illustrious Assembly, that if they did not choose to bow to the will of the House of Commons they must take the consequences. Now, he said most sincerely that if that Assembly was to fall, he should like them to fall like gentlemen. He should like them to fall fighting for a good, great, and Constitutional cause, and not simply to submit to the dictation of a Government and a subservient majority in the House of Commons. What was it that hon. Gentlemen were doing? They asked the House of Lords to pass this Bill; and what was to be the result of their refusal? They said—"If you do not pass this Bill, you will raise great Constitutional questions which may threaten the very existence of the House of Lords." If the House of Lords submitted to that degradation, and if, under that threat, they consented to pass the Bill, the result would be that they would place themselves in this position—that whatever the House of Commons sent up, no matter at what period of the Parliament it was sent up, no matter whether it was a new Parliament, a Parliament fresh from the constituencies, or a Parliament which had been sitting for many years, and no matter whether it was a question on which the constituencies had not been consulted, they would have to submit to the dictation of the House of Commons. They were also warned not to raise the question of a Second Chamber. He knew that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite were prepared to maintain that this country should be governed by one

House of the Legislature only. He saw that an eminent Member of the House—the junior Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley)—had publicly advocated that course, and that other hon. Gentlemen were prepared to follow the views of the hon. Member; but he apprehended that many of them were of opinion that a Second Chamber should be constituted of men of experience in the law and in other matters. Did hon. Gentlemen really believe that if they were to have a Second Chamber at all, if they were to get men of position and eminence in that country to sit in such a Chamber, that they would consent to be a mere Parliament of Paris, to register the decrees of a Louis Quatorze, or of the Prime Minister of the day. They might depend upon it that any alteration of the constitution of that Second Chamber would only make it a more powerful Body than it was at the present moment. He maintained that if that illustrious Assembly—[a laugh—] hon. Members opposite sneered at the idea of the House of Lords being an illustrious Assembly; but he apprehended that the eloquence of that Assembly would not be disputed if hon. Members would take the trouble to walk to the other end of the Corridor and listen to a debate. He was prepared to say they would find that the eloquence of that Assembly would vie with anything in the House of Commons, and probably, with the exception of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, there were five or six noble Lords in the other House far superior to any orators in the House of Commons. What he was going to say was that if that illustrious Assembly was simply to become a registering Body of the decrees of the House of Commons, they would much better consult their honour and their dignity by not consenting to fill such an ignominious position. They were told to avoid questions of this kind, and to avoid a great Constitutional crisis, and yet the way in which that was to be avoided was by lowering their own dignity, by consenting to degrade themselves, and by condescending to become the mere subservient tools of the Government and the majority of the day. He hoped the House of Lords would never consent to occupy such a position, and that position could not be brought about except by great Constitutional changes.

He did not see how such Constitutional changes were to be brought about without a civil war, which he was quite satisfied the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had no wish to bring about. He trusted that if ever such a dire calamity were threatened, the House of Lords would be heartily supported by the great Conservative Party which sat in that House. He would say, in conclusion, that if that illustrious Assembly could be so false to its honour and its interests as to give their consent to this Bill at the dictation of Her Majesty's Government, then good-bye to the greatness of the British Empire.

Mr. GRANTHAM said, that hon. Members must have been very much struck with the difference between the manner and the matter of the observations which had been made that night. As far as the matter was concerned, it might be supposed that they were on the eve of a Revolution, yet he was happy to say that no desire to draw the sword was evinced either on the part of his hon. Friends, or by anybody on the other side of the House. Hon. Members, not only in the House but throughout the country, had been discussing the question as if the House of Lords were placing themselves at the present time in the same position of antagonism to the wishes of the people as they did in 1831 and 1832, and that the same feeling of anger, which was undoubtedly felt against them then, was felt and experienced against the House of Lords now. Moreover, that the same feeling that would have induced 100,000 men to march from Birmingham upon London, not for the purpose of expressing their feelings, but if necessary to give effect to those feelings by blows, animated the minds of the people at the present moment. It was idle to say that the anger referred to a short time ago by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) was anything of that kind. The only anger which existed had been stirred up by the false statements which had been made at the meetings called in behalf of the Government. The hon. Member for Salford had said very truly that the only chance of carrying a Redistribution Bill in that House was by endeavouring to get the Government to take the matter in hand, and to deal with it as if they desired the benefit of the country at large, and not of a particular

Party in the State. But he wanted to know what chance there was of having the question dealt with by the Government in a friendly spirit if the Conservative Party were to be met as they had been that night, and during the whole of the Recess? Hon. Members on that side of the House were anxious that not only the question of redistribution, but that the entire question, instead of being dealt with as a Party question, should be dealt with as a whole, for the benefit of the country. Hon. Members opposite contended that the franchise portion of the scheme must be dealt with as a Party question. To use the expression of the Prime Minister, a claim was made that it should be dealt with by the majority; and the moment the majority had driven their bargain, and dictated the character of the Franchise Bill, and the Conservative Party in this House, and in the Lords, had unconditionally surrendered on that part of the question, then they would take Parliament into their confidence, and ask it to join with them in carrying a Redistribution Bill for the benefit of the country. He did not think that was the way the Opposition should be dealt with, if it were really desired by the Government that the whole question should be dealt with by the present House of Commons. He would remind the House of what took place in 1866—of what took place prior to the settlement of 1867. The propriety of extending the franchise in the boroughs had been the common topic of debate in that House, and had been considered by various Governments, from 1850 down to the time of the Bill of 1867, not the question of the franchise accompanied by redistribution, but the simple question of the reduction of the franchise. Every successive Government experienced the same difficulty in dealing with that question. They failed to settle it; they all treated it as a Party question; and it was not until 1867, when Mr. Disraeli took the question in hand, and appealed to the House to assist him, and placed the matter in the hands of the House, that the question of the franchise in the boroughs was settled in a way that was satisfactory to the country. That being so, he was entitled to appeal to the past history of the question in the House of Commons in order to ascertain whether the Government were really in earnest in their desire to settle the question by endeavouring to ride rough-shod over the minority of the House by insisting that their mechanical majority should decide one part of the question, but not the other. When the House of Commons gave way upon that branch of the subject, Her Majesty's Government would then agree to take it into their confidence in regard to the redistribution of seats. The hon. Member for Salford alleged that the people were very angry, that they had made very great sacrifices, and that they would punish those who prevented the passing of the Bill. Why were the people angry? No doubt, the constituents who returned the hon. Member for Salford might be angry. Why was that? It was because they had been misled, and had had false statements made to them by hon. Members opposite, who were the chief sinners on this head. He defied them to refer to a single speech made by the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) at Birmingham in which he had put before the people the real question at issue, and made them understand that the question was not whether they should have the franchise or not, but whether the Franchise Bill should be passed in conjunction with a Redistribution Bill or not. In every speech made by the right hon. Gentleman he had told the people that the real fight the House of Lords were making was to prevent them from having the franchise altogether, and not that all they insisted upon was in having what the Liberals had told them a very short time ago was the necessary sequence and a part and parcel of this question of the franchise—namely, a redistribution of seats. No doubt, under these circumstances, the people would be angry. He believed they would vent their resentment upon hon. Members opposite when they found out how, for Party ends, they had been deceived. If the hon. Member for Salford had been as guilty—he did not say that the hon. Member had been anything like as guilty as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain)—of misrepresenting the facts of the case, it was very likely his constituents would express their anger with him by sending him about his business. With regard to the speech of the Prime Minister, he had not been surprised at the language the right hon. Gentleman had used. Of course, that language was courteous; but the right hon. Gentleman had expressed his determination that there should be no surrender at all on the part of the Government. He had practically told them the same thing in his speech on the Address; but what had struck him (Mr. Grantham) most was the declaration that it was absolutely necessary to keep the two measures of franchise and redistribution separate, and that it would be fatal to bring them forward together. If it would be fatal, as the right hon. Gentleman argued, to the franchise and to redistribution to bring both Bills in together, why had the right hon. Gentleman sketched out and shadowed forth the principles on which the Redistribution Bill was to be framed? It was very much like a sop in the pan, or the children's game of "cherry bob," where the cherry was allowed to touch the lips, but never to enter the mouth. If, as the right hon. Gentleman said, the only question to be considered now was the question of the franchise, he had no right to tell the House anything whatever about the redistribution scheme, and to raise their hopes and fears as to the character of the measure. The right hon. Gentleman had admitted, at the beginning of last Session, that his plan was not confined simply to the franchise. If he had not made that admission, the right hon. Gentleman knew very well what would have happened. All the Press throughout the country would at once have said—"This is not dealing fairly with the people; the Government have no right to force a Franchise Bill through the House until we know what their redistribution scheme is going to be." But then the mere statement by the right hon. Gentleman of the heads of a redistribution scheme was not evidence at all that that would be the redistribution which would be ultimately carried in the House. It was known very well, from the statement made at the beginning of last Session, when this question was first introduced, that the scheme propounded by the right hon. Gentleman at that time was not the scheme of the Cabinet, but a vague sketch shadowed forth as the individual view of the right hon. Gentleman intended to tickle the ears of the country. If the right hon. Gentleman was right in withholding his scheme of redistribution, he had no right to refer to it at all, or to mislead the House and the country into supposing that they were in earnest upon that question. The only way to show their sincerity was by placing their Bill upon the Table of the House; by allowing it to be brought in as something like a tangible measure, which would enable the House to know what they were about. There was another observation he desired to make in reference to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman—namely, upon his remarks upon the question of a compromise. They knew that the question of a compromise had been discussed by all those who were anxious to avoid a collision between the two Houses of Parliament, and they had been told that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) had made various offers of compromise, both publicly and privately, to Members of the House of Lords. But how could that be so, if that night they were told by the Prime Minister that the matter was one about which there could be no compromise at all? What was the meaning of this? For weeks and weeks they had been misled by the idea that if they would only accept the suggestions made by one of the leading Members of the Government no difficulty would arise; but because the terms offered were not considered acceptable by those to whom they had been offered, the right hon. Gentleman came down now and repudiated everything that had been done with the remark that it was a matter about which there could be no compromise at all. If that were so, what prospect could there be of the Conservative Party being able to accept any compromise in future?—because it showed that, unless it was done in such a way that the right hon. Gentleman could manipulate it as he liked, he would repudiate it when the time came, and nothing would enable him to act fairly or honourably by the country, or the House of Lords. He had no wish to detain the House too long upon this question; but he thought it was a very important one for the country to consider. He believed that, as far as the people were concerned, if, as the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold) said, they felt angry on the subject, it was because they had been wilfully misled by the speeches which had been made to them by Liberal supporters of the Government. But, as far as his experience was concerned, the people of the country were not angry with what the House of Lords had done. He thought the majority of the thinking and intelligent people of the country were thoroughly satisfied with the action the House of Lords had taken in the matter. ["Oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen said "Oh!" He presumed they believed the statement of the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) the other day, when he said the Conservative Party had not held an open meeting, and that they had never dared to hold an open meeting during the Recess. He did not know where the right hon. Gentleman could have been during the Recess. He supposed the right hon. Gentleman was so devoted to himself and to his own constituency that he had paid no attention to what went on elsewhere. All he (Mr. Grantham) would say was that he had addressed open meetings where Radicals were free to come in, and that at those meetings Resolutions had been carried by enormous majorities in favour of the House of Lords. Therefore, the people of the country were not all of one way of thinking; and he believed they were, as a matter of fact, in favour of the action of the House of Lords. Reference had been made to what took place in 1831 and 1832. At that time it was true that 100,000 men could have been found to march from Birmingham to London, and he did not believe 100 men could have been got together to march on behalf of the House of Lords against the people of Birmingham; but if 100,000 men could be found now to march against the House of Lords, with the right hon. Member for Birmingham at their head, he (Mr. Grantham) would undertake to say that he would find no difficulty in getting 200,000 men from Middlesex or Surrey to march against them. That showed the difference in the feeling now. In 1831 and 1832 it was impossible to find anybody among the people prepared to support the House of Lords; but in the present agitation it would be found that one-half of the people of the country—and that the thinking half—were ready to do so. He wanted to know by what right the Liberal Party were threatening to destroy the House of Lords, when they had shown no desire to refuse political power to the people as they had in 1832; and when all that was in dispute was merely a matter of procedure, which ought to be, and might be, amicably settled? In 1832 the people were fighting for grim death because they had no representation and no political power, and unless the House of Lords gave way they had no chance of obtaining representation. That was not the question now. Therefore, it was idle to compare that time with the present, when the House of Lords was acting in the interests of a large minority of the House of Commons, and especially in the interests of a large minority of the people of the country, if not in reality of a majority of the people of the country. Under these circumstances, he had no fear of the result. Hon. Members opposite might threaten as much as they liked. They might threaten to destroy the House of Lords, and to do away with a Second Chamber altogether. One hon. Member—the junior Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley)—thought that because he had come to the conclusion that one House of Legislature was sufficient, that, therefore, the country would, of course, come to the same opinion. But those who had strongly developed the pride of intellect were not generally good statesmen; and he (Mr. Grantham) had no fear that the country would be misled by the egotism of any individual, however eminent he might be; and if the Government were determined to write on the forefront of their banner “No Surrender,” they must be prepared to accept the inevitable consequences of ultimate defeat and certain disaster to the country.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, I should not have risen but for the remarkable fact that, although the subject is of the greatest importance, not a single Member of the Government has taken part in the debate. We have been informed that their object is to curtail as much as possible the proceedings with regard to this Franchise Bill. For my own part, I can say I have never known a more extraordinary course adopted in dealing with an important question, or one more calculated to protract the debate; because if Members of Her Majesty's Government will not reply to our arguments they only produce a state of irritation on the part of those who have brought forward the arguments, which must have the effect of extending rather than of curtailing the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), in a most clear and forcible speech, has again stated the arguments which were adduced in the course of last Session, and which have never been answered by the Government either in Parliament or on the platform. All they have done has been to maintain a policy of silence in this House and of misrepresentation abroad. In the hope that some Member of Her Majesty's Government will follow me, I will re-state our cause in a shape which I hope will make it clear what it is that we maintain. The Conservative Party are not opposed to the principle of the extension of the franchise. [An hon. MEMBER: Oh!] I think I am better able to interpret the views of myself and my hon. Friends than the hon. Gentleman who interrupts me. The Conservative Party are not opposed, I say, to the principle of the extension of the franchise; but they object to the novel and unprecedented procedure which the Government has adopted—a form of procedure which would place an instrument in their hands which would be of great advantage to them during the impending Election. We say to them that they may give us whatever promises they like, but that it will not be to the interests of the Liberal Party to carry a Redistribution Bill if this Franchise Bill passes. It would be outside the competence of the Government to carry a Redistribution Bill, and the reasons which induce me to arrive at that conclusion are very simple. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) differs from hon. Members on this side of the House, and has made the astounding statement—a statement, I will undertake to say, that would not have been cheered if it had not been made by a Conservative—that if the Government were to dissolve on a large constituency without redistribution they would be at a great disadvantage. Now, if there is one thing more certain than another it is that under no scheme of redistribution will the Liberal Party be so favourably situated as they would be with an enlarged Register in the present constituencies without redistribution.

The matter does not admit of an argument. The Liberals hold at the present moment two-thirds of the boroughs, and the Conservatives hold two-thirds of the counties in England. For the first time in the history of Parliamentary Reform the franchise is proposed to be extended to one constituency alone—the county constituency—and for the first time the franchise is not to be connected with the redistribution of political power. The result will be that these county constituencies, enormously unrepresented as they now are, would be still more unrepresented. If an Election were to take place without redistribution on the existing franchise we should be in this position—that every county Member would represent over 12,000 electors, while every borough Member would represent less than 6,000 electors. What would be the position of myself and my hon. Colleague in the County of Middlesex? The County of Middlesex possesses between 40,000 and 50,000 electors, and returns two Conservatives. It is proposed by this Bill to double the constituency, and two Gentlemen are coming forward to contest the representation—one, the noble Lord the Member for Haverfordwest (Lord Kensington), a small fishing village in Wales; and another from the borough of Scarborough (Mr. Caine), which now returns two Members to Parliament with an electorate of 4,000. These two boroughs are to return three Liberals; and Middlesex, with 70,000 voters, is to return but two Conservatives. What is the object of giving a man a vote except to enable him, and those who hold the same opinions to obtain representation in this House?—and that is why almost every Liberal authority has always maintained that the redistribution of seats is more important than the reduction of the franchise. There has been a melancholy rumour in the House, which I find is unfortunately only too true, that we have been deprived by death of one of the most able and upright of our Members. I was only looking this morning at a most remarkable article on the question of Reform, written by the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, whose sudden death everyone deeply regrets. It was written at the time of the last General Election, and published after the Election had taken place. In that article the right hon. Gentleman went minutely into the redistribution of seats and the reduction of the franchise; and, being fresh from an election representing one of the largest constituencies in the Kingdom, he arrived at the conclusion that there were two questions which were so inseparably connected that they should not be kept apart—namely, a reduction of the franchise accompanied by redistribution. He stated that he was in favour of a measure that would give equal representation to every man in the Kingdom, and that redistribution in any other form would be worse than the present system. The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) has been accused of making certain statements which he has certainly declared to be untrue. I believe them to be true, for I have verified them. In 1866 he made a statement which puts our case into a nut-shell. What the right hon. Gentleman then said was this—

Well, that is exactly our case. All we ask is that the Government should give us some reasonable guarantee that a redistribution scheme should be effected before the reduction of the franchise comes into operation. Is that unreasonable? What conceivable objection can there be to it? I listened carefully to the arguments of the Prime Minister; but he never adduced one single argument in reply to that request. He indulged in high-flown language as to the majority giving up the control of their own business; but surely it would be the fault of the majority if it could not control its own business. By associating the two measures the majority would not be giving up the control of its own business, but would be absolutely expediting the question of Reform. If there be this earnest desire on the part of the people for the reduction of the franchise, of course the Government would have a tremendous lever by which to work a Redistribution Bill, if there were nothing more than to show that it was the sole impediment to the Franchise Bill coming into operation. Once, and once only, was the Prime Minister betrayed into making use of an incautious expression, and it constituted a complete reply to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). Addressing a meeting of Radicals, and thinking it probable that he would not be reported, the right hon. Gentleman gave us really to understand what the Redistribution Bill was to be. I will call attention to what the right hon. Gentleman said at the meeting at the Foreign Office. He said—

“I affirm to you positively and absolutely that you will not, and cannot, pass a Redistribution Bill unless the Opposition have some motive for allowing it to pass. The goodwill on the part of the Opposition which we want, and which we require, in order to give a Redistribution Bill a chance, cannot be had unless they knew that the extension of the franchise is to take place, and that if they will not have it with redistribution they must take it without.”

Now, what does that mean? It means this much—that the Opposition were to be placed in the position of having either to take such redistribution as was offered, or else to go to the country on the existing franchise without redistribution at all. Now, I maintain that that is an unfair and an improper position in which to place the Opposition. Supposing the Prime Minister were to meet us in the same spirit, and were to give us a guarantee that they would put a clause in the Bill to provide that the measure should not come into operation unless it is accompanied by a Redistribution Bill, what difficulty would arise? Suppose the House of Lords should throw it out, what would the position of the Liberal Party be then? During the whole of the Autumn campaign your arguments have been based on presumption and assumption; but if the Conservatives were to block and obstruct your Redistribution Bill you would no longer have to found your arguments on assumption; but you would have facts to deal with, and you would be able to go all over the country ten times stronger than you are now. Moreover, you would be justified in asserting that the Opposition were not in favour of a reduction of the franchise, because they were now taking every conceivable means to prevent this Bill from coming into operation by blocking and obstructing the Redistribution Bill. I suppose there is not a single Member who has spoken at any political gathering during the Autumn Recess who did not in his observations make some allusion to the Reform agitation of 1832, to the deep feeling evoked, to the danger there was of popular feeling coming into collision with the law, and, in fact, of a revolution occurring. What was the cause of the collision between the House of Lords and the people in 1832? Has any hon. Gentleman taken the trouble to ascertain, because it is a little curious? The history of Reform in 1831 and 1832 is simply this—Earl Grey's Government brought in a Bill in 1830, the second reading of which was carried by a majority of one; and in the unreformed Parliament General Gaseoyne carried an Amendment in Committee which was hostile to the Bill as interpreted by the Government. Earl Grey dissolved Parliament, and appealed to the country; and the next Parliament passed the Bill by a large majority, and sent it up to the House of Lords, who threw it out in 1831. In 1832 the House of Commons sent the Bill up to the House of Lords by a still larger majority, and the House of Lords then passed the second reading; but the Government subsequently resigned on account of an Amendment proposed by Lord Lyndhurst. Does any hon. Member know what that Amendment was? He proposed the very procedure for the settlement of Reform which the Government now support. He proposed to postpone the Redistribution Clauses until the Franchise Clauses had been settled; but the Government of Earl Grey declared that that Amendment was absolutely prejudicial to the settlement of Reform, and rather than accept it they resigned. Well, now, 50 years after, the Liberal Party are going about the country stirring up the people just in the same way against the House of Lords, because they are adhering to what has been the invariable practice in connection with previous Reform Bills, and are really acting on the advice of the Reformers of 1832. Let me take another point. We are told that if we persevere in the line we are taking we may raise a more organic question; and the Prime Minister has told us, in terms of warning, what that organic question is. But the unfortunate part of the controversy is that the Government have already raised this great organic question by a side wind, and in its most unpleasant form. The principle the Prime Minister is contending for is, that whenever there is a difference between this House and the House of Lords the majority of the House of Lords is to give way. That is to deprive the House of Lords of their functions as an independent Legislative Assembly. Everybody admits that the House of Lords must give way to the will of the people, when the people have decided that they are in the wrong. What is the question raised out-of-doors, and raised in a much less dangerous shape than the principles which the Government are contending for? Out-of-doors, with the single exception of the junior Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley), the demand is not for the abolition of a Second Chamber, but for getting rid of the hereditary principle which now exists in that Chamber. Now, I contend that it would be much more dangerous for the Government to ask us to consent to a course of procedure which would practically deprive the Second Chamber of its independence than to leave the Second Chamber with its functions unimpaired, attacking only its hereditary character. What the Government are practically trying to do is to deprive this country for ever of an independent Second Chamber. Once deprived of its independence of action, that independence of action can never be restored, no matter what the composition of a Second Chamber may be. Let me point out the danger of attempting, in this insidious way, to deprive the country of an independent Second Chamber. How are you to limit the power of majorities in the House of Commons if the only Party who can resist them effectually is put aside? The Prime Minister made use of strong words in laying the foundation stone of the National Liberal Club. He gave his audience clearly to understand that that which was for the advantage of the Liberal Party was for the national interest, and that everything they did to promote the interests of the Liberal Party was done to promote national interests. Then, why should not the right hon. Gentleman himself be retained in Office by a special Act of the Legislature for the next 10 years? The present Prime Minister is absolutely essential to his political Party; why, then, should the Liberal majority not save the Prime Minister the trouble of going to a General Election by extending the existence of Parliament for 10 years. They know quite well that if they do appeal to the country their majority will be largely reduced; and I may remind the House that it was in some such position as this that the Septennial Act was passed. A Parliament, which had been elected under the triennial system, found itself so unpopular that it was certain it would not be retained; and under the view that there would be certain elements of danger produced by getting rid of them, they passed an Act for the purpose of prolonging their existence. The principles for which the Prime Minister is contending are most dangerous and unreasonable. Has the agitation during the last two months been conducted in such a manner as to induce or entitle the Opposition to yield to it. What has been the weapon which has been used during the past Autumn? At the commencement of the agitation I called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the avowed object of the agitation. It was to organize the intimidation of the House of Lords. The right hon. Gentleman exercised great ingenuity in parrying my question; but he never uttered a single word against the course proposed to be pursued. What has been the course pursued during the Recess? I do not hesitate to say that the Liberal Party have done everything in their power to calumniate and malign the House of Lords, and especially the Marquess of Salisbury. Let me take one statement as a substantiation. I do not think I could refer to the speeches of any man who combines with the filling of a high official position such an amount of recklessness of language as those of the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). I will take two statements by two Members of the Cabinet—first, one by the Earl of Derby, a Colleague of the right hon. Gentleman. This is what the Earl of Derby says, and it is a description of the conduct of the House of Lords—

"No doubt, no one who has heard or read the debate here will be likely to suppose that you object to the extended franchise; but do you suppose that the classes who have power—the present electors, or those who are to be electors—read long debates? Not they. If anybody tells them that the Opposition Leaders have said they were not fit to be trusted with a vote, they will swallow it to a man.—(3 Hansard, [290] 391.)

That is what the Earl of Derby said.

He states distinctly that it was untrue to suppose the House of Lords objected to the extension of the franchise; but he implies that if unscrupulous persons make such an accusation against them the electors will swallow it. And now, what did the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) say at Birmingham?—

"The Franchise Bill has been assassinated; its murderers wear masks, and the chief conspirator shrinks from the confession of his crime, and in the presence of the assembled Thanes he cries—'Thou can'st not say I did it.'"

Then we are told that the people of the country are in a dangerous temper, and that terrible consequences may ensue if a protracted opposition be offered to the Bill. But have not some hon. Gentlemen opposite been a little too confident in their predictions of evil? One of the hon. Gentlemen who cheers me has, I think, been guilty of a little imprudence in respect of a statement which was circulated the other day circumstantially in an Irish newspaper to the effect that the working classes in Birmingham are ready to commit a gross personal outrage on my noble Friend the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). The gentleman who supplied the information has been accused of fabricating it; but it afterwards appeared that the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) was his authority.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Perhaps I may be allowed to say that I distinctly deny that statement. I gave no permission for any man to make any such statement. As far as I know, I have never spoken to the gentleman in question, and certainly do not know him. No permission was given, and the statement is absolutely untrue.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Of course, I am ready to apologize if the hon. Member says he made no such statement; but certainly I do not understand him to say that he never made the statement.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: If the noble Lord will say what the statement is, I will say whether I made it or not.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I do not wish to pursue the conversation if the hon. Member says he made no such statement, which is that if the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock goes down to Birmingham, the working men there are so incensed against him that they have made up their minds to horse-whip him.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I absolutely deny that statement.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: If the hon. Member denies it, I of course apologize. As to the violent language alluded to, it has all come from above, not from below; it has not emanated from the working people of the country, but from a number of politicians who have gone about endeavouring to stir them up to fever heat against the House of Lords. Although I have not been present at any very large meetings, I have attended and addressed a large number of smaller meetings, and I have letters from working men describing themselves as Liberals, who tell me that the position taken up by the Conservative Party with regard to this question is perfectly fair and legitimate; because, as they say, the Conservatives have not objected to the principle of the Franchise Bill, but have taken objection to the novel procedure which, for the first time in Parliamentary history, the Government are adopting. Under these circumstances, I hope that some Member of Her Majesty's Government will endeavour, in some shape or other, to answer the arguments which I have put forward. I and a number of my hon. Friends, during the last Session, stated and re-stated those arguments, and the only reply from the Treasury Bench was that we made the same speeches twice over. That, I submit, is not the proper way of dealing with the arguments of reasonable men. If Her Majesty's Government cannot meet the case, let them say so. I have always felt that whenever the proposal of the extension of the franchise to the counties comes forward it is one which cannot be opposed. ["No, no!"] An hon. Gentleman says "No;" but I assume that I know my own thoughts better than the hon. Gentleman, whose remark is an illustration of the method of mis-statement by which our opponents have throughout carried on the argument. Speaking for myself, I have always said, and I say it again, that whenever the proposal shall be made to make the county franchise similar to that in the boroughs, as established by the Earl of Beaconsfield, it will be a proposal that cannot be opposed. And for this reason—I doubt whether the working people of any country were ever subjected to a more severe test than have been the working people of this country during the last 15 years. Rarely has the transition from exceptional prosperity to exceptional adversity been greater than from 1873 to 1880, during which period there was much distress, and many were reduced to absolute privation. Side by side with that, the Education Act has come into force, and the working people are deprived of the labour of their children at a time when that labour is most valuable, and they are compelled not only to part with the value of that labour, but to pay the fees for their children's education. They have nobly responded to the calls made upon them, and the fact that during the depression of trade and commerce the deposits in the savings' banks have increased shows that the working people of the country are taking their lesson to heart. Therefore, because they have shown under these exceptional circumstances the best qualities of citizenship, and as a considerable number of the working people in the counties are unenfranchised, I feel it is impossible to oppose the extension to the counties of the franchise existing in the boroughs. I believe that the longer this controversy goes on, the more will the position of the Conservative Party towards the Bill be seen in its true light. Wherever they have been allowed to state their case, and have not had their meetings broken up, they have succeeded in satisfying their audiences. They do not pretend to be able to compete in noise and violence with their opponents, who, therefore, in that phase of the agitation, have had an advantage over them. But the great mass of the people of the country are law-abiding, and hate violence; they take note of those who incite to it, and although there may be a continuation of the inflammatory speeches which have marked their opponents' proceedings during the Autumn, I am confident that the more the Party opposite resort to violence and unfair play the greater will be the rebound in favour of the position taken by the Opposition with regard to this measure. Therefore, if Her Majesty's Government cannot answer our arguments in the House of Commons they are not likely to convince the people out-of-doors, and I am tolerably confident that in the long run the Conservative Party will gain, because whatever cause cannot stand discussion—and apparently the cause of Her Majesty's Government will not bear that test—is, in my opinion, doomed.

MR. HUGH SHIELD desired to say a very few words in answer to that part of the speech of the noble Lord in which he dealt with what was called the "leverage argument" of the Prime Minister. The noble Lord had said that the Prime Minister had candidly avowed that one of the reasons which influenced the Government in declining to combine the measure of franchise with that of redistribution was the necessity of having this leverage at their disposal. But he would point out to the noble Lord that it was not alone the Prime Minister who had avowed the necessity of having the means of putting Parliament under some pressure in order that a Redistribution Bill might be carried. The same position had been taken by the Secretary of State for War. The Marquess of Salisbury had stated that it was the deliberate purpose of the Government to establish a machine for controlling and coercing the judgment of the House of Lords, and that such an attempt had never before been made in their history, even under the most encroaching of Monarchs. He asked whether the observations of the Prime Minister which had been referred to deserved the comments which the noble Lord had made upon them? On the contrary, he maintained that so far from being the words of a cynic they were the wise utterances of a statesman, whose reasoning was that so difficult was the subject of redistribution, so numerous the questions of principle which clustered around it, and so multitudinous the wilderness of its details, that unless the opponents of any Redistribution Bill could be brought to approach it under some inducement to forego something of the obstructive power of their position it could never be passed. It was upon this reasoning that the so-called leverage argument was founded, and he asked whether it was fair to say that it out-did the encroachments of the most encroaching Monarchs? In 1831-2 they had a Reform Bill introduced by a Government thoroughly in earnest, supported by the people, who were thoroughly in earnest, and pressed forward against a reluctant Opposition; the Bill of 1832 was carried under the direst possible compulsion—almost on the verge of a civil war. Everyone knew—it was a matter of history—that the Prime Minister of the day went down to the House of Lords with the King's licence in his pocket to create as many Peers as were necessary to pass the Bill; and, therefore, with those facts in his mind, he did not think that the Marquess of Salisbury was entitled to say that never before had a Minister of the Crown assumed the right to exercise compulsion towards the House of Lords. But the Bill of 1867 was introduced in a very different state of things. Its supporters had not to press it against a reluctant Opposition; the real friends of Reform were then the Opposition. That Bill, no doubt, passed with the free assent of Parliament. But he thought he was correct in saying that it appeared from the Memoirs of the Earl of Malmesbury that even the Bill of 1867 was not passed by the free decision of the House of Lords, but under the threat that the Earl of Derby would resign Office. Therefore, he said, they might pass a Redistribution Bill or a Reform Bill with the free assent of Parliament, without compulsion, when the measure was backed by an Opposition as eager for Reform as the Government who promoted it; but that when they had to pass a measure of the kind against a reluctant Opposition, they were taught by history that it could only be passed under a pressure which brought the country almost to the verge of revolution. In lieu of such a pressure the Prime Minister sought to put Parliament under an inducement—the inducement of avoiding a consequence which they all deprecated—namely, an appeal to the old constituencies, inflated by the addition of the new voters before redistribution. Far from being the outcome of a despotic spirit, the Prime Minister's "leverage argument" was proof of his moderation and preference for peaceful methods.

DEATH OF THE RIGHT HON. HENRY FAWCETT, POSTMASTER GENERAL.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity of saying a very few words, and I am very sorry the House is so thin, for I am quite sure that what I am going to say reflects and expresses the feeling of the whole House—of both sides of the House. I wish to say one word to express the very great and strong sense we all have of the loss which the Government and this House have sustained by the melancholy event which was communicated to us earlier in the Sitting. All of us who have had the pleasure of sitting in the House for any length of time with Mr. Fawcett, and especially those who, like myself, have sat in the House the whole time that he has been a Member of it, could but have come to one conclusion—that there was no man who more thoroughly commanded and received the respect and the regard of the House than did Mr. Fawcett. From the first moment he entered the House he showed that he was determined to take a zealous and active part in its proceedings; and throughout his career he has been one who has been always ready to speak freely and boldly, and, if necessary, with vigour upon all questions that arose. But, at the same time, I do not think anybody can recall a single word that ever fell from him that gave unnecessary offence or pain to anyone. He was a man in whom, when he spoke against us—which, in regard to Members on this side, was most commonly the case—we always recognized a spirit of fairness and readiness to enter into the feelings and arguments of his opponents that gave double and treble weight to what fell from him. I could not refrain from taking this opportunity of saying just a single word to express what is the unanimous feeling, I am sure, of the whole House, and what I believe also to be the feelings of others far beyond this House—of all who knew and respected him.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I am sure I shall express the feelings of all who sit on this side of the House if I rise to say a few words to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the kindly and sympathetic terms in which he has expressed himself for the great loss which has befallen the Government, and I think I may say the whole House, in the death of Mr. Fawcett. He commanded the respect, and I think I may say the affection, of the whole House. We have admired the courage with which he has confronted a most painful and distressing infirmity which would have prostrated the energies of most men. From the very commencement of his entrance into public life he commanded the respect of all who were brought into contact with him. The independence with which, when he occupied an independent position in this House, he was in the habit invariably of expressing his opinions, whether they were in entire harmony with the opinions of those with whom he usually acted or not, secured for him an amount of respect which very few Members of this House have ever been able to obtain. The energy with which he threw his remarkable intellect into the duties of the Office which he was called on to administer, and the invariable courtesy with which he met the wishes and representations of Members on all sides of the House, added to the respect previously felt for him. Sir, I can only say that we all most deeply regret the great loss that has befallen this House, and that we are greatly indebted to the right hon. Gentleman opposite for the very sympathetic terms in which, on the part of his Friends, he has expressed his sense of that loss.

Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY: Sir, I cannot allow the Sitting to terminate without saying, on behalf of those who act with me, that we join in the expression of regret which the whole House feels at the sudden and melancholy close of so promising and great a career. We, the Irish Members, have always respected and admired Mr. Fawcett's great capacity, exerted in the face of so terrible a calamity. We have always respected and admired his transparent integrity, and the manner in which, while expressing his own convictions, he respected and had consideration for an equally earnest expression of the opinions of others. For myself, I have known Mr. Fawcett personally for more than 20 years, and have felt nothing but admiration and friendship for him. I speak now on behalf of others as well as for myself, and I desire to join most sincerely in the common expression of the regret felt by the House.

QUESTIONS.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—MOUNTJOY PRISON—VISIT OF THE POLICE TO THE CONVICT FAHERTY.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, The result of his promised inquiry with regard to Inspector Joyce and the Ballinasloe police visiting the convict Faherty in Mountjoy, and trying to get him to swear the deposition which they presented to him; if this inspector has yet returned the invoices, accounts, and letters seized by him eighteen months ago at the house of Mr. Matt Harris, Ballinasloe; and, what reply has been made to the application of Mr. Harris's solicitor at the Castle for the return of his property?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): Faherty volunteered some private information to District Inspector Joyce, in reference to the conspiracy to murder to which he pleaded guilty. He was not visited by any member of the Ballinasloe police. He was not asked to swear or sign any deposition or statement, nor was any such ever presented to him. As to the matters mentioned in the second and third paragraphs of the Question, which have no connection with the preceding one, Mr. Harris's papers were seized 18 months ago. Mr. Harris afterwards left Ballinasloe, and remained away for seven months. Quite recently his solicitor has made an application for the papers. The application is being considered, and a reply will be shortly sent.

EDUCATION (IRELAND) — NATIONAL SCHOOLS—HOURS FOR RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION, &c. — NEWTONARDS SCHOOL, CO. DOWN.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is within the knowledge of the Commissioners of National Education that a member of their Board, the Rev. Hugh Hanna, in company with a Protestant prelate, visited a National School at or near Newtonards, in the county Down, and that, during the time set down in the School Time Table for general secular instruction, the distinguished visitors caused to be sung a hymn or psalm in which they took part; whether such religious exercise at such a time was not an open violation of the fundamental principles of National Education; whether any ruling on the matter has been made by the Board; and, whether it is true that, after three years' attendance at the Board Room, the Rev. Hugh Hanna pleaded ignorance of the Board's rules on the subject of religious instruction and religious exercise, in explanation of his action on the occasion in question?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, in reply, said, that he had ascertained that the Board of National Education had no official knowledge of the transaction referred to. He had a private letter, from which it would appear that some such occurrence took place; and he had asked the Commissioners to obtain Mr. Hanna's account of the matter.

THE THAMES AND THE LONDON WATER COMPANIES.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, in view of the fact that the stream in the Thames below Teddington Lock is already not sufficient to scour the bed of the river, and to carry away the sewage which is brought up with the tide, and that each successive year it has been reduced in volume, owing to the water taken by the Water Companies above the lock, he contemplates taking any steps to hinder these Companies from withdrawing more water from the stream than they do at present?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The five London Water Companies drawing water from the Thames are limited to taking a supply from the river not exceeding 20,000,000 gallons each per day. The five Companies which are entitled to take 100,000,000 gallons daily have been drawing at the rate of from 80,000,000 to 90,000,000 per day, which is rather more than one-half of the total supplied by these Companies to London. There appears to be no doubt that the volume of water in the river has not been so low for many years past as it has recently been. In the last month or six weeks the water flowing over Teddington Weir has been, on an average, about 300,000,000 gallons daily; while the average daily flow of water over the Weir in the month of July, during a period of 30 years, after deducting certain periods of special floods, was about 500,000,000 per day. The recent diminution in the volume is the result of the long period of drought, and is not to any appreciable extent occasioned by an increased draught by the Water Companies. In the four months ended October last, the quantity taken by these Companies was about 15,000,000 gallons per day over the corresponding period of last year, and 19,000,000 gallons per day in excess of that in the same months in 1882. The Companies are not exceeding their limits of draught, and the Board are not empowered to interfere. With regard to the evils which are occasioned by the sewage brought up by the tide, as the hon. Member is aware, the subject of the sewer outfalls of the Metropolis is now under the consideration of a Royal Commission, and it is to be hoped that the Commissioners will be able to suggest some remedy.

THE CIVIL SERVICE—LOWER DIVISION CLERKS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether boy clerks are allowed to compete among themselves for vacancies in the Lower Division of the Civil Service; whether writers are employed in various offices upon the same duties as Lower Division clerks without receiving extra remuneration; whether the writers are allowed to compete among themselves for vacancies in the Lower Division; whether under Clause 12 of the Order in Council of 12th February 1876 writers, if thoroughly qualified by age and service, are not eligible for appointments to the Lower Division; and, whether, some time ago, a number of writers were discharged from the Local Government Board Office at a week's notice to make way for a number of boys who had passed the Lower Division examination?

MR. COURTNEY: Boy clerks are allowed to compete among themselves for a certain proportion of Lower Division clerkships; but copyists have no special rights in this respect. It is contrary to the expressed and repeated directions of the Treasury that copyists should be employed upon any duties except copying and routine work under direct supervision, or special work, such as shorthand, for which there are special rates of pay.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Will the Treasury make further inquiries on the points raised in my Question?

MR. COURTNEY: That will be impossible. If the hon. Gentleman indicates any particular office, inquiry will be made.

EGYPT—MILITARY AND OTHER EXPENDITURE..

MR. LABOUCHERE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will either state to the House, or present in a Return to the House, the amount of all moneys expended (inclusive of the value of stores, military or otherwise), in or on Egypt, which have been paid, or which are to be paid by this Country from January 1st 1878, until the recent arrival of Lord Wolseley in Egypt?

MR. COURTNEY: We have done our best to get such information as can be given in answer to the Question of my hon. Friend. It has been impossible to get figures for the current year, so we have stopped at the 31st of last March, and we have begun with the financial year 1878-9. With these limitations the net expenditure in and on Egypt, in the sense in which the Question is understood during the last six financial years, may be put in round figures at £4,250,000. Of this £1,877,000 has fallen on Army Votes, £1,809,000 on Navy Votes, about £64,000 on various Civil Votes, while £500,000 was contributed towards the expenditure of India on the Expedition of 1882.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked the hon. Member if he would give the figures for each year—how much in one year, and how much in another?

MR. COURTNEY said, he had not got the figures by him.

MR. CHAPLIN: With reference to the reply given by the Secretary to the Treasury, I would like to ask him if he can state to the House when he will be in a position to give further information as to the whole amount of expenditure in Egypt up to the time of Lord Wolseley's arrival? I understood the hon. Gentleman to state the amount of expenditure as only up to the 31st March, 1883.

MR. COURTNEY: The information I gave was up to the end of the last financial year—that is, up to the 31st March of this year. It is impossible to obtain later information, because the Departments are not in a position to give it.

IRELAND — MEETING OF THE NATIONAL LEAGUE AT CASHEL—INVASION OF THE TOWN HALL.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, on Sunday the 26th ultimo, a number of persons in the employment of landlords endeavoured to take possession of the Town Hall at Cashel, which had been duly granted by the Town Commissioners for that day, for the purpose of a meeting of the local branch of the Irish National League; whether the Town Officers, because they resisted the attempt to take possession of the hall by force, have been summoned before the local bench by the aggressors; whether District Inspector Jones, of the Constabulary; Mr. Hartigan, a local magistrate; and one Mr. Mark Russell visited a tailor named Edward Kendrick, and informed him they would withdraw their custom from him if he did not dismiss from his employment a journeyman named Meany, whose offence was that he had attended the meeting of the local branch of the League; and whether Meany was accordingly dismissed from his employment; and, whether the Government will cause an independent inquiry to be held, with the object (amongst others) of ascertaining if the provisions of the Crime Prevention Act should be applied?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am informed that it is not a fact that a number of persons in the employment of landlords endeavoured to take possession of the Town Hall at Cashel on the occasion referred to. A meeting had been called at which it was expected that the question of preventing hunting would be discussed, and a counter-meeting to be held at the same place, but at an earlier hour, was organized by persons interested in hunting, such as smiths, horsebreakers, grooms, and others. These persons had obtained permission from some members of the Town Council to use the Town Hall. The town sergeant and his son, however, refused admission to the counter-meeting, and summonses have been taken against them by some of the persons who felt themselves aggrieved by such refusal. With regard to the dismissal of Meany, both District Inspector Jones and Mr. Hartigan emphatically deny that they acted in the manner alleged, nor does Mr. Russell appear to have done so either. Kendrick himself repudiates the suggestion. Meany was dismissed by Kendrick of his own free will and accord. I see no ground for instituting the inquiry suggested.

AFRICA (WEST)—THE CONFERENCE.

MR. CARTWRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is the fact that the proposals of the German Government for freedom of trade, in connection with the Conference on West African affairs, are to be understood as having reference solely to the Basin of the Congo, and not extending to the Niger; and, if he can give any information to the House as to whether there is any foundation for a report that territory at Amba Bay, in close proximity to the Cameroons, has recently been brought under British authority?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The first basis laid down in the invitation to the Conference received through the German Embassy is that of liberty of commerce in the basin and mouths of the Congo; the Niger is not mentioned. The second basis is that of the application to the Congo and Niger of the principles adopted by the Congress of Vienna. The question of the trade in the basin of the Niger is, consequently, not included among the subjects to be discussed. It is true that the territory at Amba Bay has been recently brought under British authority.

NAVY—H.M.S. "AGAMEMNON."

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, If he will lay upon the Table a Return showing the original estimated cost of H.M.S. Agamemnon, of the actual cost of the vessel, and showing the amount expended in each year during her construction? His object in asking this Question was to show the loss of money that resulted to the country from the dawdling over shipbuilding.

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: There will be no objection to give the information required in the Return which is being prepared on the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox).

THE IRISH GOVERNMENT—MR. R. GOOD.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What official position is held by Mr. Richard Good, of Aherlow, Cork, which enables him to act as intermedium between the Irish Government and her suspended officials; and, what salary is attached to the position?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Mr. Good holds no official position whatever under the Irish Government, and is not in receipt of any official salary. I am not aware what ground can be alleged for supposing that he has acted as an intermediary between the Irish Government and any official of theirs; and the Irish Government repudiate any such suggestion.

IRISH REPRODUCTIVE LOAN FUND—THE ROSCOMMON TOWN COMMISSIONERS.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the cause of the delay in granting the loan of £1,500 out of the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund applied for by the Roscommon Town Commissioners on the 1st of August 1884; and, whether he is aware that the money in question belongs to the county Roscommon, and that the delay in granting the loan applied for by the Town Commissioners is inflicting a serious financial loss on the town of Roscommon, and delaying the carrying out of works of public utility to all classes of the population and of the county?

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, the reason why this loan had not yet been settled was that the Town Commissioners had not yet answered a letter written to them on September 24 last. Perhaps the hon. Member might advise them to do so at once.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—TRIAL OF JAMES ELLIS FRENCH—COLONEL BRUCE.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that Colonel Bruce, Inspector General of Constabulary, was examined on behalf of Detective French, as a witness to character, in the late trials at Dublin; whether it is the fact that Colonel Bruce held an investigation with respect to the charges against Mr. French in September 1883, and, on the strength of his inquiries, suspended Mr. French from duty a month before the appearance of the libel for which Mr. French proceeded against United Ireland; and, whether, on cross-examination by the Crown Counsel, Colonel Bruce was asked any question as to his investigation, or as to Mr. French's suspension; and, if not, for what reason?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), in reply, said, that Colonel Bruce was examined on the trial of Mr. French by Mr. French's counsel with reference to this period of Mr. French's service in the Force. Colonel Bruce did not, on the strength of any inquiry held by him, suspend French from duty a month before the appearance of the libel in United Ireland. The article which first called Colonel Bruce's attention to the matter appeared in the issue of the 25th August. Colonel Bruce at once called French's attention to it, and required him to state what steps he would take in reference to the charge. Colonel Bruce also, as Head of the Force, commenced an informal private inquiry; but learning that French was about to bring an action, took no further proceedings. Nothing transpired before Colonel Bruce to establish guilt. French had gone on sick leave on the 6th of August, and as his action was about to be brought, he was directed not to report himself till called on. He was not in any other sense suspended. Colonel Bruce was not asked on cross-examination, and could not be asked, any question as to his inquiry, which could in any way establish Mr. French's guilt.

MR. O'BRIEN: Do I understand the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that Colonel Bruce was allowed to be examined as a witness as to character in the case, and was not asked a question as to the circumstances of the suspension of French?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) was understood to say such a question could not be asked.

MR. GIBSON: Is it a fact that Colonel Bruce was summoned in the ordinary way by the prisoner, and did not appear as a volunteer?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Certainly.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE DUBLIN SCANDALS—TRIALS OF CORNWALL AND KIRWAN.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, having regard to the verdict in the case of Cornwall and Kirwan, that "the Crown did not produce sufficient evidence," and having regard to the fact that, of thirteen persons charged by the Crown with connection with the felonious conspiracy in Dublin, only three have been brought to justice, the Government will utilise the secret inquiry Clause of the Crimes Act for the discovery of evidence; and, whether any steps have been taken to follow up the evidence elicited at the investigation into Mr. French's conduct held by Colonel Hillier in September 1883?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The first paragraph in this Question suggests inferences which are by no means admitted to be correct. The Government sees no reason for applying now the 16th section of the Crimes Act to the cases referred to. All the evidence that existed was obtained and produced. The second paragraph of the Question seems to assume, that at an investigation evidence tending to establish guilt was elicited. No evidence was obtained which could establish guilt in French, or be used for that purpose.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—CONSULAR JURISDICTION.

MR. BUCHANAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Order in Council with regard to British Consular Jurisdiction on the West Coast of Africa, promised on the 24th of July last, will be laid upon the Table; and, whether the subject with which it deals, namely, the facilitating of the apprehension of criminals outside the boundaries of European settlements in that part of the world, will be brought before the West African Conference?

LOED EDMOND FITZMAURICE: There have been unavoidable delays in the preparation of the Order, but it is hoped it may be issued at an early meeting of the Privy Council. The subject with which it deals is not one of those for the consideration of which the Conference is summoned.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE BALLYFORAN MURDER—INCITEMENT TO GIVE FALSE EVIDENCE.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If the Irish Executive will cause an independent inquiry to be held into the truth of the allegations made in the statement of Thomas Nolan, read to the House on Wednesday last, charging Mr. George Bolton and other officials in Ireland with having endeavoured to incite or terrify the said

Thomas Nolan to give false evidence against the other accused persons in the Ballyforan murder case?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): There is no foundation for the suggestion that Mr. George Bolton, or any other official of the Irish Government, endeavoured to incite or terrify Thomas Nolan to give false evidence in the Ballyforan murder case. Nolan handed voluntarily a statement in his own handwriting to Constable O'Brien, and afterwards made a statement to the Resident Magistrate implicating two of the prisoners. Mr. Bolton never saw him at all. Nolan subsequently went back from those statements, and wrote that he had made the statements to fool the prosecutors. He now from America makes charges which are believed to be wholly false, and no further inquiry will be instituted.

METROPOLIS—THE LORD MAYOR'S SHOW.

MR. FIRTH asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the proposition of the Lord Mayor Elect to bring, on Monday next, a procession of camels, elephants, and other animals, past Charing Cross towards this House; whether, as Charing Cross is not on the route from the Guildhall to the Law Courts, there is any reason for this proceeding; and, whether precautions will be taken to secure the approaches to this House?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I really know very little about what the nature of this procession or demonstration is to be, but I feel quite sure that it will be of an entirely pacific character. Why the Lord Mayor is going to Charing Cross, or whether he is to take camels or elephants with him, I do not know; but the hon. Member must be aware that the Roman Emperors in their triumphs were attended by such animals. All I can say is that, of course, these processions do cause a certain amount of inconvenience; but they also cause a good deal of amusement, and the police will take care to keep the traffic as open as possible in this case.

NAVY—H.M.S. "COLLINGWOOD"—ARMAMENT.

LORD HENRY LENNOX asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether

H.M.S. Collingwood (Admiral Class) has been fitted with 43-ton breech-loading guns; and, if so, whether the intention of the Admiralty, as expressed by his two Predecessors, Mr. Trevelyan and Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, that the Admiral Class should be armed with 63-ton breech-loading guns has been altered; whether there are any, and, if so, how many 63-ton and 100-ton breech-loading guns have been manufactured and successfully tested; and, whether the 43-ton breech-loading guns now in the service are fitted with effective breech-loading arrangements; and, if not, at what date they may be supplied?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The Collingwood was designed for, and has been fitted with, 43-ton guns. The decision to fit 63-ton guns in the later ships of the Admiral class, which were the ships referred to by my right hon. and hon. Friends, has been adhered to, except in the case of the Benbow, which is to have 110-ton guns. There are five 63-ton guns and three 110-ton guns under manufacture, but not yet sufficiently advanced for trial. The 43-ton breech-loading guns now in the Service have been fitted satisfactorily with the exception of the breech screw mechanism, which, after several modifications, has now been completed. As has already been stated in reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), the 43-ton guns for the Conqueror will be ready in four months and those for the Colossus in five months from the present time.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—LONGFORD COUNTY.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following paragraph in The Freeman's Journal of Wednesday 5th November:—

"Intelligence reached Longford yesterday that a large force of police had evicted three tenants in the parish of Carrickedmond. The tenants are—Edward M'Grath, Lisnacreeva, 6 acres of land, large family, and wife bedridden; Michael Macatee, a wife and nine small children, with 7 acres of poor land in the Doory Hall estate; and the Widow Macatee, of the same place; the unfortunate tenants, we understand, have no prospect before them but to go into the workhouse;"

and, whether the Executive will undertake to see that proper steps are taken for the shelter and protection of the evicted persons?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have seen the newspaper paragraph referred to, but I cannot say how far it may be accurate, as the hon. Member has not given me sufficient time to make inquiries. With regard, however, to the suggestion contained in the last paragraph of the Question, I may point out that the law provides the manner in which relief may be given to the evicted poor, and does not place the responsibility upon the Executive.

ARMY—SENIOR MAJORS OF ARTILLERY.

MR. ARTHUR THORNHILL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the cases of the senior Majors of the Royal Artillery, promoted to that rank before the 1st of October 1877, had been on several occasions submitted by the Military authorities, with a view to an increased and special rate of pension being offered them, and having in view the fact that a corresponding number of junior Majors are now being compulsorily retired on completing seven years' service, and that an increase sufficient probably to induce such senior Majors to retire would represent in the aggregate a very small sum; and, whether the cases of these few Officers, who, as regards promotion, are much behind the Officers of the same length of service in other Regiments, will be again considered, with a view to a special and exceptional rate being offered to them?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The case of the majors of Artillery referred to in the Question has been fully considered. Only nine are left, and they have so immediate a prospect of becoming lieutenant colonels, with many collateral advantages, that it is unlikely they would accept retirement unless great inducements were offered. The majors junior to them are removed after seven years' service in the rank; but they have the option of going to half-pay as lieutenant colonels, in which case they would probably be re-employed regimentally as lieutenant colonels on vacancies arising. The same thing happens in other arms of the Service. It is true that the majors referred to have longer service than corresponding ranks in other arms.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.) ENGLISH LIABILITY.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the House of Commons will have an opportunity to express an opinion upon any pecuniary liability with respect to Egypt on the part of this Country before any assurance be given that such a liability will be assumed?

MR. GLADSTONE: I rather think that this Question is covered by the declaration which I made before the close of the last Session of Parliament, and which certainly still holds good. The hon. Member is aware of what are the general rules with respect to contracting pecuniary obligations, and that no such pecuniary obligation can be contracted by the Government except subject to the approval of this House. I do not wish to say anything now on the question whether any such obligation is likely to be contemplated at all; but either the Government will not attempt anything of the kind, or, if they make such an attempt, it will be absolutely impossible without the reservation to the discretion of this House, which, I think, will meet the object of the case.

DEATH OF THE RIGHT HON. HENRY FAWCETT, POSTMASTER GENERAL.

MR. GLADSTONE: Perhaps, by the indulgence of the House, I may now be permitted, as I was absent at the time last night, to say a few words on my own part, as well as on the part of my Colleagues, on the subject which was introduced with very great propriety and good feeling by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and answered in the same spirit by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War—I mean the grievous intelligence which reached us last night during the sitting of the House of the lamented death of Mr. Fawcett. Sir, Mr. Fawcett's name is a name which is heard I know, in all quarters of the House, with feelings of the greatest respect. We have all been accustomed to regard with admiration his inflexible integrity and independence of mind, his absolute devotion to the Public Service, the marvellous tenacity of his memory, combined with his remarkable clearness of mental vision; and, I think, even above all these, if possible, the rare courage, the unfailing, the unmeasured courage, with which he confronted and mastered all the difficulties which would have daunted and repelled an ordinary man in connection with the loss of the precious gift of sight. From these and other causes he acquired a place in the hearts and minds of his countrymen such as is undoubtedly accorded to few; and I believe that he had won a place equally high in the esteem and respect of the House of Commons. I wish, Sir, in these few words to place on record, in the name of myself and of my Colleagues, our deep sense of the loss of a most distinguished public servant.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, having had the honour of filling for some years the Office now so unhappily vacated by Mr. Fawcett's unexpected and lamented death, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say two sentences in the same sense as those which the right hon. Gentleman has just spoken. Mr. Fawcett possessed not only those high qualities which must have struck everybody, and to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, but I think I may venture to say that from those personal communications which I necessarily have had with him, it was impossible for any man to exceed in courtesy and fairness the eminent statesman whose loss we all deplore. Sir, I speak from the bottom of my heart when I say that I feel the death of Mr. Fawcett to be a personal as well as a public and political misfortune.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—THE EXPEDITION TO BECHUANALAND.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is a fact that the troops and materials en route from Natal to Bechuanaland are being sent from Natal to Cape Town, and thence by rail to Hope Town; whether he is aware that as good landing arrangements exist at Port Alfred as at Natal, and that a Railway equally exists from Port Alfred to Hope Town; whether, if they were landed at Port Alfred, a saving of 450 miles of sea and 170 miles of rail would not be saved, which would make a very considerable difference in the cost of their transit; and, should it be the case, whether he will give instructions to land the troops at Port Alfred?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: This Question more properly concerns the War Department; but on inquiry, both there and at the Admiralty, I find that though, no doubt, by landing at Port Alfred or Port Elizabeth there would be a saving as regards mere distance, yet there would be no saving as regards time, and the cost would be much heavier than to disembark at Cape Town, where the ships would go into dock and the horses could walk ashore.

LAW AND POLICE—LORD RONALD GOWER.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is a fact that Lord Ronald Gower lately committed an assault upon a sentry on duty at Buckingham Palace; whether the sentry, by order of his commanding officer, took out a summons against Lord Ronald Gower; whether that summons has now been withdrawn with the approval of the Commanding Officer of the regiment and sanction of the magistrate on Lord Ronald Gower having tendered an apology; whether the matter is to be allowed to rest here; and, whether he can state to the House the cause of the assault, and what offence the sentry had given to Lord Ronald Gower?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I know nothing of the circumstances referred to in the Question, except what I have obtained from the Report of the officer commanding the Scots Guards, and as that Report is a short one, perhaps I had better read it—

"It appears that about 3 a.m. on Saturday, October 25, 1884, Lord Ronald Gower walked from Stafford House, St. James's, to the Ambassador's Court, St. James's Palace. It was a misty morning, and he stood in the middle of the said Court hesitating about going further. The sentry on that post, having orders not to allow anyone to loiter about, told Lord Ronald Gower to move on. This order was repeated, and no notice taken of it. The sentry then walked up to Lord Ronald Gower, touched him on the shoulder, and ordered him to walk on. Lord Ronald Gower then struck the sentry on the leg with his stick. The attention of a police-constable was immediately called, and Lord Ronald Gower's name and address taken. The sentry, by order of the commanding officer of the 2nd Battalion Scots Guards, took out a summons against Lord Ronald Gower. The summons was withdrawn with my approval and the sanction of the magistrate on the condition that Lord Ronald Gower tendered a personal apology, which he did on the 30th ult. I consider that the matter should rest here."

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—BAILIEBOROUGH PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if the attention of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has been drawn to certain proceedings of Justices at Bailieborough (county Cavan) Petty Sessions on the 16th September and the 21st October last; whether, on the former date, two Justices, Robert Gibson and Thomas Chambers, both Protestants, heard a case in which a Protestant named James Jones charged four Catholics named Caffrey, Finegan, Halfpenny, and Ward with waylaying and beating him; and, although it was proved by a witness for the prosecution that Jones had first challenged Caffrey, struck him, and knocked him down, and that a fight had ensued between Caffrey and Jones, the others merely looking on, the Justices sentenced Caffrey to a month's imprisonment with hard labour, and the three spectators to a fortnight each; whether, on the same occasion, the Justices fined the Catholics brought before them for drunkenness ten shillings each, and the Protestants only half-a-crown, even in a case where it was proved the defendant had kicked the police; whether, on the 21st ultimo, Messrs. Chambers and Gibson, Justices, both Protestants, a young man named Keating, a Catholic, charged five men—one of them, James Hunter, a Protestant—with beating him; and, after the complainant had testified against the five men, Mr. Gibson, J.P. suggested to the accused man, Hunter, that he might have held Keating "only to save him," and this suggestion being adopted by Hunter, the evidence of the complainant was rejected, and, on the evidence of Hunter, one of the other men named Gogarty was committed and sent to prison for a month; and, whether the Lord Chancellor will cause inquiry to be had into these proceedings, and will examine the condition of the magistracy in the county Cavan, and particularly in the Petty Sessions districts of Bailieborough, Shercock, Kingseourt, Mullagh, and Virginia, in which there is not one Catholic Justice of the Peace?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: These cases have not before been brought to the notice of the Government, and the limited time during which the Question has been on the Paper has not admitted of satisfactory information being obtained. Inquiry has been ordered, and if the Government find that there is reason to think that there has been any irregularity or miscarriage in the administration of the law, they will not fail to refer the matter for the Lord Chancellor's consideration. His Lordship informs me that he has quite recently received, and has at present before him, a letter of complaint as to the mode in which the second case referred to was disposed of. The condition of the Magistracy in the county of Cavan has been and is at present occupying the attention of the Lord Chancellor, and during the present year his Lordship has been enabled to place six Roman Catholic gentlemen in the Commission of the Peace for that county.

STATE OF IRELAND—POLICE PROTECTION, COUNTY CAVAN.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there is still any necessity of affording police protection in Glann, county Cavan, to Lord Annesly's bailiff, Mr. Thomas Whiteside; whether it is a fact that there is no check as to the amount of car hire he receives per month; whether he drives to the neighbouring towns to transact his own private business, and, on many occasions, without any business; whether he receives on an average at least seventy pounds per year for car hire and remuneration from the two constables engaged in the protection; and, if it is a fact that an emergency man, named John Evans, who came to Glann nine months ago from the neighbourhood of Belfast, dispensed with police protection owing to the peaceable state of the locality, and if he still transacts his unpopular duties without fear of molestation?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is believed by the local police authorities to be still necessary to afford protection to Mr. Whiteside. This protection is given from the free quota, and involves no expense to the county. There is a check on the car hire accounts, both locally and at head-quarters. I am informed that the nearest town to Mr. Whiteside's residence is seven-and-a-half miles distant, and that he is obliged to drive about, both on his own and his employer's affairs. He has never received £70 annually for the hire of his cars for the police. In the last 12 months £44 was paid for this purpose.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Will the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister tell us what is likely to be the course of Business on Monday next? We know that there are proceedings in the City which might possibly interfere with it.

MR. GLADSTONE: I proceed on the assumption, which, I understand, is agreeable to the general expectation and arrangement made, that the debate on the second reading of the Franchise Bill will terminate this evening. In that case we shall propose on Monday that the Speaker leave the Chair, and that the House go into Committee on the Bill.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—[BILL 1.]

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [6th November.] "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, any measure purporting to provide for the better Representation of the People in Parliament must be accompanied by provisions for a proper arrangement of electoral areas,"—(Mr. E. Stanhope,)—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I think, Sir, that no speech has ever been more anxiously expected than that made by the Prime Minister the other night on the second reading of this Bill. I think it is only right to say that, as far as the tone and manner of that speech are concerned, there is nothing that anyone could wish to see altered. The right hon. Gentleman evidenced an anxiety to limit the debate, and to take out of it any vexatious question or anything that could excite differences of opinion. I wish I could say the same as to the matter of the speech. I am afraid that many who heard that speech must have felt a deep sense of disappointment when the Prime Minister sat down, having ended almost where he had begun, because we hoped, at all events, that he would have thrown some new light upon the subject, and, as the Head of the Government, would have shown us some way out of the present difficulty. But the words at the commencement of his speech, when he said that it was impossible for the Government either to take the two subjects of extension and redistribution in a single Bill, or simultaneously in two separate Bills, rather led us to believe that, as far as he was concerned, there was no hope of this matter being dealt with in a business-like and rational manner. Our only hope lay in the words that they would do nothing that, in their opinion, could tend to place the Franchise Bill in jeopardy. If we take these words of the Prime Minister into consideration they seem to point to something by which the difficulty might be got over; but as far, at all events, as his speech was concerned, we have had no foreshadowing of any such plan. Now, I think that the history of this county franchise is one which the Prime Minister ought to bear in mind. Some years ago, and, in fact, up to a very late period, the views entertained by a very large number of persons both inside this House and outside were such as are fully expressed in the speeches made last Session by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen). He has always held distinctive views upon that question, and these views have been shared by a large number of persons in the country. Nor must we forget that hon. Members opposite have not always been so unanimous upon the question. It was only in 1877 that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary first voted in favour of the measure, and the Bill or Motion which was so constantly brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman who is now Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster met a very varied fate in this House from time to time. It is instructive also to remember that the first time that measure went up to the House of Lords it was treated in a very different manner

from that in which it had been treated in this House. The first time that it appeared before them in the last Session of Parliament the principle of that Bill was practically adopted, and, although the Bill did not become law, the Motion passed in the House of Lords distinctly accepted the principle of it. Where, then, is the danger to this Franchise Bill? How is it in jeopardy? I cannot help thinking that the danger has arisen in great part from the speeches made by right hon. Gentlemen opposite before the Bill was introduced. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade made use of language which seemed to point to a total redistribution of political power, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a reference to ancient times which frightened a great number of persons throughout the country. I need hardly refer to those statements of the President of the Board of Trade, all of which created great alarm and anxiety. There was another danger to which the Prime Minister thought that this Bill was subject, and which he pointed out in the speech which he made in introducing the Bill last year. It was this—that there was this great difference between a Franchise Bill and a Redistribution Bill, that whereas a Franchise Bill was always treated in this House as an Imperial question, the question of redistribution was in danger of not being treated in the same spirit, but more as a local question, and one more likely to arouse the selfish interests of the Members of those places which were likely to be disfranchised. Those observations of the Prime Minister would only refer to the question of the Franchise Bill in this House; but as far as the House alone was concerned, the Prime Minister thought that there was that danger. In the speech which the Prime Minister made last night that danger seems to have disappeared. He told us that he thought that the important question in this House was the Franchise Bill, and not Redistribution; and, as far as I gathered from him, he was now in hopes that when we came to the Redistribution Bill he might produce such a Bill as would be passed, not by a majority, but by the whole House. Therefore, it is clear that his mind, whether from the observations he has been able to make, from the conduct of Members of this House, or from other consideration of the subject, is not apprehensive of that danger of local selfishness which pressed upon it last year, and which, therefore, may now practically be considered as having gone. The Prime Minister dwelt last night a good deal on the fear of finding that the majority in this House would not be able to enforce its own views, although “no doubt, as far as the principle of the Franchise Bill goes, the question of the extension of the franchise may be considered settled.” Nobody will dispute that; it has been acknowledged here, and admitted “elsewhere.” The majority of the House is quite able to express its will. But there is a great difference between the principle of the Bill and the procedure. No doubt, a particular mode of procedure proposed by the Prime Minister was passed by a large majority in this House; but I venture to say that if the Prime Minister had proposed another mode of procedure the majority of the House would have adopted that quite as readily. The Bill is in no danger on the question of principle, and it ought to be in no danger as regards procedure. But the will of the majority might be discovered in other ways than by the vote. We have been called together at a time which is inconvenient for many of us. We are ready, however, to do our duty to the best of our ability; but I am sure the feeling of a great majority of the House is that we should not come here for an idle and barren purpose. The majority of the House has expressed its desire in unmistakable terms that the Franchise Bill should be accompanied by a scheme of redistribution. [Several hon. MEMBERS: Followed.] I adhere to my expression, and believe that there is a general wish that the one should accompany the other. Would any man in his senses propose that we should first have an enlargement of the franchise, then an Election, and then a redistribution scheme, followed by another Election? No. The vast majority of the people would be entirely against such an arrangement. I regret very much to see that in the course of an election such a proposal was made by a candidate; but, except the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), I have never heard any person approve of the proposal, and I think the President of the Local Government Board abandoned that idea some time ago. If no Government could propose such a plan, what is the use of finding fault with the action of a Party the sole object of which is to prevent that happening which no Government would propose. Supposing such a misfortune—I believe it would be a national misfortune were it to take place—what would happen? The present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has always brought forward this question in the interests of the agricultural labourers, saying that those persons who live in the country are entitled to the same privileges and advantages as those persons who live in the towns; but as an example of what would happen in the event of a General Election occurring under the Bill without redistribution, take two divisions of my own county. Take, first, the division which is represented by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington). There are living in that division out of towns represented in Parliament 238,000 people; out of this 238,000 no fewer than 147,000 live in places with a population above 10,000; so that the remaining population, comprising the agricultural labourers, would be swamped by the 147,000. In my own division of the county we have in places not represented in Parliament, 482,000. Of that number living in places with a population above 10,000 no fewer than 315,000, so that the rural population would be absolutely swamped by persons living in towns without some redistribution scheme is first passed. There are a large number of places not now represented which undoubtedly ought to be represented; and if there is one thing more than another which constituencies like it is having a Member to themselves; they are not willing to share one with other places in which they have no interest. I am not going to labour that point, because it is clear that great evils will undoubtedly follow—indeed, it would be impossible to imagine the mischief that would occur if one Bill passed without the other; and in addition to this, you would have a costly registration scheme which would have to be thrown aside directly the Redistribution Bill passed. The Prime Minister declared his opinion in his recent speech that in great legislative changes there should be the largest possible body of friendly and contented opinion. I agree in that opinion; but unless these two Bills are to come into operation together you cannot have that body of friendly and contented opinion which is necessary. If violent measures are resorted to, and if one Bill is passed and the other is not, you will create so much ill-will that you will find it impossible to secure that which you desire. What is this Redistribution Bill to be? If it be just and fair what is it that alarms the Government so much and prevents their producing it? This, at any rate, I think, is perfectly clear—that last Session, when the Franchise Bill was introduced, the Government did not know what their redistribution scheme would be. The Prime Minister gave us a sort of shadowy idea of it; but it is clear that no definite plan was before them, though I presume they have now framed one. For my part, I am not content that such a course as that should be taken. When you approach a subject of this magnitude you should approach it in all its parts, and you should show the whole of your plan. But now, at any rate, we have shadowed out by the Prime Minister some important principles of their redistribution scheme. The Prime Minister tells us that, in the first place, it must be large and of something like a permanent character. I do not suppose there will be any great difference of opinion upon that point; and we may hope that, when the Bills are passed, the Constitution will receive that form in which it will be left for many years to come. In the second place, the Prime Minister laid it down that there must be a considerable concession to the principle of numbers. Everybody has always assented to that. Then great respect was to be paid to those places at present represented, and the right hon. Gentleman mentioned other safeguards. In the third place, he said there must be no needless complexity—we shall all agree with that—and that it must be equitable and liberal as between the four divisions of the Kingdom—namely, England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. I suppose the Prime Minister mentioned Wales specially in order to indicate that the people of Wales must be told they cannot expect quite so many Members as they have at present. I am sorry the Prime Minister did not say the number of English Members was not to be diminished. Scotland, he indicated last year, was to have more Members, and Ireland was to be let alone; while the additional Members for Scotland were to come from the South of England.

MR. GLADSTONE: No; I never said so.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Last year.

MR. GLADSTONE: No.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: The right hon. Gentleman said he could not entertain the question of increasing the Members of the House.

MR. GLADSTONE: Oh, no.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Exactly the opposite.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I certainly understood that the Prime Minister had made some statement of that character. Then he said the arrangement must be equitable and just to the different classes and pursuits of the community, and the urban and rural populations must be kept distinct. It is essential, in our mind, that the urban and the rural population should be left distinct, and I gladly recognize in that last result laid down by the right hon. Gentleman a declaration that this principle will be maintained by the Government. There is, however, one matter which will have to be carefully considered, and that is whether we are to keep the minority vote, and whether that principle will have to be extended, and, if so, to what extent. That is a matter which will certainly demand serious attention. The difficulty I feel is that if I go into the details of the redistribution scheme I shall be called to Order, and I admit it would be evidently improper to go into any debate as to the principles of redistribution on the Bill now before the House. But we want the Government to get the House out of this difficulty. It is quite clear that we must discuss these things, and until they are discussed we are all at sea as to the intentions of the Government, and how far those intentions are to be carried out; therefore, I press upon the Government the necessity of giving some further opinion on that point. There was one word in the Prime Minister's speech which I am bound to say gave me a ray of hope; that word was "coterminous." We all know that the right hon. Gentleman is a master of language, and that words sometimes have with him a peculiar significance. I cannot help thinking that there is a difference in the Prime Minister's mind between "coterminous" and "simultaneous," although I cannot tell what it is. The right hon. Gentleman said that this question was "the nearest of all coterminous subjects." The only comfort that we draw from that is that the right hon. Gentleman recognizes this as a subject so coterminous that, if he can do it without jeopardizing the Franchise Bill, he will let us know what the Redistribution Bill is. I hope the Prime Minister will understand that there is no wish on the part of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House to delay this measure. There has been no unreasonable amount of speaking, nor am I aware that there is the slightest wish on the part of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House to cover the Paper with Amendments when we go into Committee. I think the Prime Minister ought to take courage from these facts which show that his Bill is not jeopardized. He ought to meet us half-way, because we cannot meet him—[Ministerial laughter.] If hon. Gentlemen will hear the end of the sentence, I think most of them will be of my opinion. I was going to say that provided the Franchise Bill is not put in jeopardy—which is the only condition the Prime Minister makes—I hope he will join with us in securing some guarantee that the same Parliament shall deal with both questions. [Cheers and counter-cheers.] I thought I should get the approval of hon. Gentlemen opposite. That is all we have asked, and that is all we insist upon. It is not an opinion, it is not a prepossession; it is a principle, and I think it is a principle that ought to be followed out. Well, how do we stand with regard to this Bill at the present moment? It will probably be read a second time to-night. We shall go into Committee on Monday, and, so far as we can see, the Bill will be safe by the end of next week. Is not that a great step? Is not that something to show the Prime Minister that this Bill is not in jeopardy? And upon the question of Redistribution we have the authority of the Prime Minister that the danger to that measure is in local interest. What are we to be kept here for? I say that the time of this House is too valuable to be wasted, and if this Bill is to be through the House by the end of next week, what are we to be kept here for? As business-like men, I should say that we are here to see what can be done with regard to this Reform Bill; and, therefore, as business-like men, I should say that, now that the Franchise Bill is out of jeopardy, the sooner the other Bill is before us the better. If the opinion that the Prime Minister shadowed out last night is really the feeling of the Government—namely, that it is not desired to pass a measure of this kind by the majority overriding the minority, but rather with the assent of the whole House—then I say, in the name of all that is business-like, do let us set about it with all speed. Whether that is to be done by a series of Resolutions or by Bill I know nothing, not being in the secrets of the Government. But let us approach the subject, and see how near we can get to it. I am quite sure that if the Redistribution proposals are not designed to give any advantage to one Party over the other, they will certainly not meet with any factious opposition from this side of the House. It seems to me that this is just one of those occasions, one of those questions, where high statesmanship ought to come in, and where it is the duty of statesmen to take care that no ill-feeling is mixed up with the subject. I say it rests with the Prime Minister as to what he will do; but from the cheers I have heard on both sides of the House, I cannot help thinking that, whatever may have been the language used on Thursday, there is still a door open. If, however, difficulties should arise owing to the action of the Prime Minister or the Government, either through neglect in not producing their measure, or through—I hope I do not use the word offensively—some wilful determination not to let us see it this Autumn Session, or if the Government stick too closely to words and phrases which they may happen to have used, and stand by expressions made under other circumstances and at other times—then all I can say is, that the country will know, at all events, upon whom the blame ought to rest. And if it so happens that there is to be an appeal to the country, no one will more readily go to the country than we shall ourselves, feeling, as we do, convinced that the good sense of the country will see that all we have asked is that which is just and wise, and, I believe, necessary, and that we have asked for nothing else.

I ought to congratulate him and the House of Commons; but when he said, in almost his concluding words, that whatever the language used yesterday the door was still open, I could not help thinking that that was a sly reference to speeches on his own side, because we certainly have reason to complain of the tone of some of the speeches which we have heard on the other side. While thanking the right hon. Gentleman for his tone and for the several very valuable suggestions which he made, there were a few exceptions which I shall have to take to some of the statements he has made. He has told us that he hoped Parliament has not been brought together for another barren Session. If, unfortunately—and I cannot yet admit to myself the possibility of such a result—but if, unfortunately, this Session should be barren, I am sure that we, each of us, will not consider that it is our fault; and I am disposed to agree that the country will think that perhaps there are faults on both sides. The right hon. Gentleman has made one remark which I must accept with a certain amount of allowance. He said there was now a concurrence between both sides as to the principle of the franchise, and that the principle was generally admitted. That statement was made in almost the same words, but in a still more absolute manner, by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope). I have found in the course of this debate many proofs that this is not the case. Several Members have spoken from the other side and stated that they were not of that opinion. ["No!"] Look at the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), and he made the statement, not only for himself but for two other hon. Members. [An hon. MEMBER: And the Lord Mayor.] Yes; the Lord Mayor said it himself, and the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge referred to it. He deprecated the modern changes which had taken place in the Government on this subject. It is hardly possible to exclude from consideration the question of the date at which various opinions are adopted, for sudden conversions will always be open to a certain amount of doubt. I, for one, however, am quite prepared to accept the results at which we have arrived without scrutinizing too narrowly the date of particular conversions. The right hon. Gentleman on this point made a little attack, by implication, on this subject. He said that one of our Colleagues had a doubt as late as 1876, and had only become converted in 1877; but the right hon. Gentleman himself doubted as late as March last. In replying to the Prime Minister, the right hon. Gentleman said—"No doubt the 2,000,000 would be admitted if it was true that they ought to have the vote;" and in replying to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, he said—"No doubt it was so, if these men ought to have the franchise." He regarded the matter as open to doubt. I am quite prepared to admit that there is now a general adoption of the principle of this Bill by the two sides of the House; but the adoption is not one of exactly the same kind, and this is very important for practical effects and results. We admit the right of the 2,000,000 absolutely, and the other side admit it conditionally upon getting their own view in certain other points. I admit there was nothing in the speech we have just heard calling for the remark I propose to make; but we have also before us such speeches as those of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) and the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope). They are speakers of great ability, and represent the views of their own side with so much eloquence and authority that their speeches cannot be passed over. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire made this frank admission as to the conditional nature of the support which he and other hon. Members opposite would give to the Franchise Bill. The hon. Gentleman said that the Conservative Party would keep the Franchise Bill in reserve until the Redistribution Question was settled. I am, therefore, justified in saying that, while on this side of the House the principle of the Franchise Bill is absolutely supported, on the other side it is only conditionally supported. Now, I am about to utter one of those words of warning which have sometimes been construed by our opponents into a menace; but I trust that I shall give no colour to such a construction being put upon my language. I will, indeed, adopt the words of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire himself, when he said that we were placed in a great difficulty on this question of Reform, because the enfranchisement of these 2,000,000 of new voters would not brook delay, and that there was great danger of exasperating those voters by resorting to political manoeuvres which they were unable to understand. The right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken has thrown out hope to us of an agreement being come to between the two sides of the House; at least, that is what I understood from his speech. For my own part, I believe that it is possible that some agreement might be come to which would meet his views, provided it be one that without doubt or uncertainty would secure the enfranchisement of these 2,000,000. That is the point upon which it is necessary that we should be quite clear. That is the main point. In fact, it is the only point worth raising in this discussion. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the evident desire of the Prime Minister—to whose speech he did full justice—as evinced by the earlier portions of that speech to take out of this debate everything that could give rise to the use of violent or excited language; but he went on to remark that he wished that he could say as much of the other portions of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. For my own part, I wish I could approve of all the speeches which have been delivered by hon. Members opposite as much as I do of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. The right hon. Gentleman asked in a tone of marked courtesy for further information on the subject of redistribution; but the speeches of some other hon. Members on that side of the House lacked that courteous tone; and, indeed, some speakers last night asked for further information on the subject in a tone of menace, and held out a kind of threat that if their demands were not complied with, the Franchise Bill would be stopped or rejected in "another place." The right hon. Gentleman asked us whether, if we could give further information with regard to the proposed scheme of redistribution, without jeopardizing the Franchise Bill, we should be ready to give it? That question I answer most emphatically in the affirmative. I say that if you can make it clear to us that we can give you further information on the subject of redistribution without jeopardizing the enfranchisement of these

2,000,000 of new voters, that information shall be supplied. But information on the subject is not required by the other side alone. We, too, on this side of the House should like to ask for a certain amount of information, if such information could be conveyed to us from the other side without any fear that it would jeopardize the Franchise Bill. I am at a loss to understand, in these circumstances, how it is that we have not heard from the other side something like proposals that might form the basis of a general agreement, and an authoritative expression of their views with regard to the principles on which redistribution ought to be conducted. The right hon. Gentleman let drop the word "Resolution"—I do not know whether he used it with any intention—but I take that word as indicating a readiness on his part to arrive at a fair settlement of this question. I can only again assure the right hon. Gentleman that if we can give him any further information in reference to redistribution without jeopardizing the Franchise Bill, we shall be willing to do so. The right hon. Gentleman asked us another question. He asked us if we were certain that we could propose to this House a settlement of this Redistribution Question which should not be framed so as to give a Party bias to the scheme? Doubtless hon. Members opposite do not think we should frame the scheme of redistribution purposely so as to give it such a bias; but the suspicion which they seem to entertain is that, without intending to give it a bias in favour of our own side, we are likely to look at the matter from the point of view favourable to our own Party. The right hon. Gentleman wishes to meet that possibility, and he says that the settlement should be one arrived at by the House or by the country without any Party bias being introduced into it. For my own part I may say that I entirely sympathize with that view, and I believe that any Redistribution Bill that will pass this House must be a Bill which will satisfy both sides, and not one side alone. The right hon. Gentleman emphasized greatly in his speech the separation between the urban and the rural element in the constituencies, and I take that as an instance of what he meant. That is a subject of great interest and importance, and on which many of us as individuals may have great doubt, not in a Party but in a national sense; but still we may be willing to yield our opinions with respect to it in view of the enormous advantage which will result from a large measure of enfranchisement. The right hon. Gentleman made one statement which I must venture to contradict. He informed the House that last Session the Prime Minister said that by the Government scheme of redistribution a number of seats would be taken from the South of England and be given to Scotland. What the Prime Minister did say was precisely the opposite. He said that the question of the increase of Members in Scotland was to be considered in connection with a suggestion for an increase in the number of Members in the House itself, and when he spoke of Members in the South of England he spoke generally upon the existence of a great number of very small boroughs in the South of England, and said that any general redistribution must of necessity transfer a greater or less number of Members from the South-West of England, not necessarily to Scotland, but to the Metropolis and the North of England. I have already said that, in my opinion, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was in most gratifying contrast to that of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), which almost concluded the debate last night. [Cries of "No!"] I shall give reasons in support of my opinion upon that point. The noble Lord made a great attack upon my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), not my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. The noble Lord charged my right hon. Friend with having desired in the past that a different course should be adopted from that which he now advocated in view of Party exigencies. I have read every word that my right hon. Friend has said upon the subject of Reform—and very valuable and interesting reading his speeches are—and I am satisfied that if any right hon. Member in this House has been consistent on the subject of Reform, it is my right hon. Friend. Other right hon. and hon. Members may have changed their views upon the subject; but my right hon. Friend has always told the House that the two subjects of the extension of the franchise and of redistribution must be dealt with in separate Bills, and he never contemplated their being both dealt with at one time. The noble Lord has tried to set Colleague against Colleague in the present Administration; but I am glad to inform him that his artifices of political warfare have been entirely unsuccessful. The noble Lord has asserted that he was converted to the principle of the extension of the franchise to the agricultural labourer during his term of Office in the Education Department; but the only way in which he has shown that conversion has been by speaking and voting against the extension of the franchise to the agricultural labourer on every possible occasion. In 1879 the Amendment to reject our proposal was moved by a noble Lord, a near relative to the noble Lord opposite, and on that Amendment no less than four Gentlemen bearing the noble Lord's name voted in the majority, and the noble Lord never made the slightest statement which led the House to believe that he was favourable to the enfranchisement of these people. I dwell on this question of sudden conversion, because these recollections of ours of the Divisions of the last Parliament are somewhat important, and have a considerable bearing on this question. For instance, the hon. Member for Ruteshire (Mr. Dalrymple), in his speech last night, claimed to be the only surviving Conservative Member who voted for the extension of the franchise to the agricultural labourers when it was proposed in 1874. That is true, no doubt, but the hon. Member voted against it in 1876. The hon. Member said that he had stated in his speech that he voted against the measure in 1876, and he had explained why. The reason given by the hon. Member was that he did not like its being proposed to the House every year; but that was not support of a very effective kind. But all the support which the Conservative Party had given to this principle in the past for which the hon. Member claimed credit before the country, consisted in the fact that he and two others had voted for it in 1874, and that he had changed his vote in 1876.

MR. DALRYMPLE explained that he merely referred to the vote and change of vote he gave in that Parliament for the purpose of pointing out that, at all events, to him there was no difficulty of conversion, because at so remote a date as 1874 he had supported his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and had only considered it undesirable to press on a reluctant Parliament from year to year a Resolution that had been defeated by so overwhelming a majority.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The hon. Member has entirely confirmed my recollection of his action and remarks; and I can leave the matter with the mere statement that I, for one, should never for one instant deny the extraordinary facility of conversion that has frequently been displayed on the other side of the House. I wish now to make one or two remarks about some of the other speeches made last night, and especially those from the Front Bench opposite. We did not think it necessary to speak from this Bench last night, because we considered that this is a subject which, after the speech of the Prime Minister, was best dealt with by independent Members of the House. With regard, then, to the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), who opened the debate, I could not help greatly regretting the absence of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), who had given Notice of this Amendment; for, although I think the noble Lord is a powerful adversary, I do not think he would have made exactly the sort of speech delivered by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire; nor do I think that that speech is likely to lead to a future and early settlement of this question. The hon. Gentleman's speech was hostile and violent in tone; and in it the hon. Member was very severe upon us for having asserted the argument of want of time with regard to the introduction of a Redistribution Bill and having then given it up. He quoted our argument of want of time, and said that it simply consisted in our statement that it was impossible to pass both the Bills in one Session.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I did not say the Government had given up the argument, but that it had been given up by the force of circumstances. Circumstances have altogether changed.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Well, if there were that general agreement as to the principles on which redistribution should proceed, which the right hon.

Gentleman who has just spoken seems to shadow forth in his speech, then it is possible that the two subjects might be dealt with within the compass of a single Session. What we argued was that it was impossible and hopeless to entertain the idea of dealing with the two subjects in one Session when we were confronted by a hostile and reluctant Opposition. But what did the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Biddell) say on the subject? He said that if there was any subject on earth which needed long consideration it was that of a Redistribution Bill; and yet he afterwards told us that it was quite possible if the Franchise Bill were passed that the Prime Minister at the head of the Party on this side of the House would force a redistribution scheme without discussion down the throats of hon. Members who sat opposite. Then the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) made a general statement—a most startling statement—that every great issue which comes before the country ought to be decided—by whom? Not by the elected Representatives of the people, not by the House of Commons, not by Parliament, but by Dissolution and an appeal to the constituencies at the polling booths. That is a doctrine which far exceeds the ancient Chartists' doctrine of annual Parliaments. I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman how often he thinks Parliament would have to be dissolved and re-elected if an appeal is to be made to the country on every question on which there may be a difference of opinion? How could the Business of the country be carried on? Then the hon. Member told the House that the country thoroughly appreciated the position and doctrines put forward. I think if the tone of the speech of the hon. Member, and the tone of that of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), had been the prevailing tone, the country would certainly have appreciated the doctrines put forward in them. The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire also attacked the Prime Minister for not having dealt in his statement with the question of the boundaries of boroughs; but, curiously enough, the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down thanked the Prime Minister for the statement he had made on the distinction between urban and rural representation, and I think I have the authority of the Prime Minister for saying that the general expressions he made use of were intended by him to cover the various branches of that subject. The hon. Member went on to tell the House that we had neglected our duty, inasmuch as we had not made any inquiry as to borough boundaries. How does the hon. Member know that he is speaking as to that with any foundation; and what right has he to say so when he knows nothing as to what we have done on the subject? Then, again, the hon. Member attacked my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) for having spoken, in connection with the franchise, of taking away the commons from the agricultural labourers; and he said that my right hon. Friend had not lifted a finger to prevent that spoliation. Well, we think that by this Bill we are lifting a finger in that cause, and we believe that the effect of this Bill will be to put a stop to the practices that have prevailed. Then, as to redistribution, the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire not only asked for more information, but also for substantial guarantees, and went on to say that the speech of the Prime Minister gave no information on that point. Now, as to that, I think the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) was a very full and complete answer. He gave a catalogue of the guarantees and securities which the other side possessed for the settlement of this question of redistribution. In reply to the demand for information, the Government might demand additional securities. Securities were needed for the enfranchisement of 2,000,000 people who would be enfranchised by this Bill. The hon. and learned Member for West Somersetshire (Mr. Elton) made a very different speech from that of the Mover, because he spoke of the statement of the Prime Minister with regard to redistribution as being a statement in which all of us agreed; and I think we make very great progress when we get from hon. Members opposite such an expression of unanimity. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) has asked whether the Redistribution Bill is to be the Bill of the Executive Government, or of the British Parliament? A measure so complex and involving so much interference with individual interests cannot possibly pass without becoming the Bill of the House itself. The hon. Member for Preston told us that he believed that the Government would force a Redistribution Bill through the House without discussion. In reply to that, I can only say that any man who believes that the Government could do such a thing must be a Parliamentary baby in long clothes. The hon. Member for West Suffolk told us that he was thoroughly tired of this question. Well, I think a good many Members who sit for agricultural constituencies will soon be tired of this question, if by their actions they keep it open before the country. The hon. Member also told us that he was delighted with the conciliatory speech made by the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) in Lancashire some time ago. But what was the reply made to that speech by the leading Members of the hon. Member's Party. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) said at Bristol that the air was full of rumours of compromise, and that all these rumours came from the Liberal side, that he did not believe that the Leaders of the Conservative Party would be gulled by this talk of compromise, and that he did not know by what right the Members of the Liberal Party asked the Opposition to place implicit confidence in Mr. Gladstone. [Mr. WARTON: Hear, hear!] The hon. and learned Member for Bridport agrees with those views; but they do not represent the opinion of the House or of the country, which shares the sentiments of the hon. Member for West Suffolk, by whom the noble Marquess has been thanked for his remarks. The hon. Member for West Suffolk went on to ask us to humour the prejudices of the other House and to do something to please their "whims and fancies." But we really cannot deal with this important subject on the basis of pleasing the whims and fancies of any one; we must try to deal with it on principles which will commend themselves to the vast majority of the House of Commons. The hon. Member also told us that the Peers did not ask us to produce our Redistribution Bill, and that all they asked us to do was to give in a general way our views on the question. In that statement he diametrically contradicted many hon. Members on his own side of the House who have spoken in the course of this debate, and who have declared that they will not be satisfied with that which would satisfy the hon. Member. That shows what an extraordinary divergence of views there is among hon. Members opposite. The hon. Member for North Yorkshire (Mr. Guy Dawnay) made a vigorous onslaught last night upon the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, because that right hon. Gentleman had said that the people of Wales had nothing to gain by redistribution, and he tried to prove that there was a great difference of opinion between the right hon. Gentleman and the Prime Minister on this point. I can assure the hon. Member that the whole of this pretended difference rested upon an entire misconception of what my right hon. Friend said, for my right hon. Friend's reference to Wales in connection with the subject of redistribution only meant that Wales would not gain seats through redistribution to the extent to which Scotland was entitled to gain them. Then the hon. Member told us that the counties were much under-represented at the present time. But no one has denied that even the newspaper scheme of redistribution to which the hon. Member had referred—moderate as that scheme was supposed to be—would have entirely reversed the existing proportion between the borough and county Members of this House, and I cannot understand for what purpose the hon. Member argued at great length that the counties are under-represented at the present time, for no one denies the fact. The hon. Member concluded his speech by saying that there was no doubt which Party in this House ought to give in in the present controversy. Of course there is no doubt. There never has been a doubt in the minds of hon. Members opposite, for they always assumed that the majority ought, as a matter of course, to give way to the minority. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), referring to the draft scheme of redistribution which has been published, told the House that we should encounter great difficulty on our own side before we could pass such a scheme, because it would deprive the Liberals of 70 seats. He assumed that the majority of the small seats which were to be swept away were Liberal seats. Now I must join issue with him, for I find that the Conservatives and Home Rule Members together who would lose their seats under this scheme are exactly equal in number to the Liberal Members who would be displaced by it. I do not wish to say anything more in examination of the speeches that have been made in this debate. I will only once more express the warm satisfaction with which we have heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who preceded me. Such arguments as he used, and the tone in which he spoke, must conduce to a settlement of this great question. I believe that those who sit on this side of the House have great reason to desire an early settlement of this question, because they have made it peculiarly their own; but as regards its effect upon Party, I believe that this side has not so much cause to desire a settlement of the question as the Party opposite. From a Party point of view it would be no disadvantage to us if the question were to remain open for a little time longer; but it would be an enormous disadvantage to the country as a whole, and I, therefore, heartily thank the right hon. Gentleman opposite for the speech which he has made this evening.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I must apologize to the House for not having been in my place yesterday afternoon to move the Amendment of which I had given Notice; but an event of a distressing character to myself personally and to those with whom I am connected by family ties incapacitated me from dealing properly with the subject which I wished to raise. I should have thought that this would have been a sufficient excuse for my absence; but I observed this morning in an organ of the Ministerial Party that the excuses which my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) so kindly made for me were received with jeers. [Cries of "No!" from the Ministerial Benches.]

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It was a mistake. It was not understood.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I only state what I saw in The Daily News; but I daresay that paper was not accurate in its account. It will be obvious to hon. Members that the sudden death of a near relative does not conduce to the frame of mind that an hon. Member ought to be in when endeavouring to deal seriously with a subject of this kind. I should have liked to have remained perfectly quiet in this debate, believing that in so doing I should have been following the rules of Parliamentary propriety, and I should have done so if it had not been for two events which have occurred. I wish, in the first place, to apologize to the House for a circumstance which was noticed by the Prime Minister, and for which I alone am to blame. I refer to the disappearance from the Notice Paper of the Amendment which I had put down. The reason of its disappearance was that I entirely forgot the operation of the new Rule passed in 1882, by which, if you do not renew a Notice of opposition, the Notice lapses; and I beg to apologize to any hon. Members who may have been placed in doubt as to the course which I intended to pursue by the consequence of my forgetfulness. The next event to which I wish to allude is the speech delivered by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). It is well known to the House that there has existed between my hon. and learned Friend and myself a very close friendship, not only political but private, and we have acted together in this House so often and for so long that, if I were not to take notice of the opinions which he has expressed in this debate, it might very naturally be supposed that I was endeavouring, in connection with the subject before the House, to perform that operation which is called "sitting across a rail" in a more unscrupulous fashion than, perhaps, that operation has ever been attempted before by a Member of Parliament. If, as may be supposed, I had at all persuaded my hon. and learned Friend to make that speech, or even known that he intended so to express himself, it would look as if I had been endeavouring to curry favour with the Tory Party on this side of the House by proposing this Amendment, and at the same time to keep open a refuge with other Members of the House who are opposed to the action of the Tory Party in this matter. That was a suspicion so intolerable and injurious that the House will allow me to explain exactly how I stand, and my reason for disagreeing with my hon. and learned Friend. The speech of my hon. and learned Friend was, no doubt, a great surprise to me, and I may say a very painful surprise. My hon.

and learned Friend said, at the commencement of his remarks, that he was in favour of the Amendment before the House as an abstract Motion. I venture to think that the Amendment before the House is not at all in the nature of an abstract Motion. It is one of the most precise, definite, and clear statements of policy which on any particular question it would be possible to frame. My hon. and learned Friend said that he would support that Amendment if he were sure it would not impede the passing of the Franchise Bill. I can reassure him on that point. So far from that Amendment obstructing the Franchise Bill, he may be certain that the discussion and Division on the Amendment will probably assist it. My hon. and learned Friend, with his purely legal mind, does not altogether understand that in political controversy, particularly in great and sharp political controversy, the Party which makes abject surrender is not the Party likely to attain its aim, or anything like its aim. In political controversy of the kind we are engaged in at present concession is not likely to be arrived at by surrender. It is only when a Party has, if I may so speak, its arms in its hands, when it is thoroughly united, when its forces are all marshalled inside and outside the House, when it is obvious to any observer that it is ready to struggle to the utmost—it is only then that a statesman in the position of the Prime Minister will allow himself to be convinced that the Party is animated by a great and honest principle from which it cannot and will not depart, and that he will endeavour, before the battle is hopelessly engaged in, if possible, to exhaust all chances and all possibilities of peace, and not only of peace, but of honourable peace. But, Sir, I do not think that peace would be secured by the attitude taken up by my hon. and learned Friend, because in that speech he threw away all his armour and prostrated himself before the Prime Minister; he counselled his fellow-comrades to an ignominious surrender; and he incontinently took to his heels and ran away in the vain and utterly futile hope that, by some possible chance, he might live to fight another day. I should like to ask my hon. and learned Friend what would be the position of the Tory Party if they gave up now, without any guarantee or consideration, as he advised them to do, all that opposition to which it is undoubtedly so deeply pledged? What would be the position of the Party then, and what amount of confidence would any portion of the people of this country be likely to repose in us in future? There is another thing which my hon. and learned Friend does not altogether appear to realize, and that is the immense transformation which has come over this question in the last nine months. There has been a total transformation—a transformation in the direction which hon. Members opposite approve of, and also in the direction of which we approve. What was the position of this question in February last, when the Government introduced it to the House? The Government brought in a Franchise Bill; they accompanied it by many other Bills of first-class importance. They proposed that the House should deal with all those subjects in one Session; and the programme, undoubtedly, was to deal with the Franchise Bill in 1884, coupled with the vague assurance that redistribution would be dealt with in 1885. At that time, undoubtedly, the Government were not ready with any scheme of redistribution. If they had been pressed ever so much they could not at that time have produced a Redistribution Bill. What would have been our position if we had agreed to the proposal of the Prime Minister, and had allowed the Reform Bill to pass through the House without opposition? The Bill would have been through this House before the end of February; the Royal Assent might have been given to it before the end of March; the Government might possibly have been defeated on the Egyptian Question in the middle of the Session; they might have prorogued Parliament; continued in Office for a short time while the registration was being made up, and taken a Dissolution on the enlarged but unredistributed constituencies. That was not only a possibility, but a probability, if we had fallen in with the suggestion of the Government in February last. But what was the position of the question in August last, when the House of Lords postponed the consideration of Reform? The Prime Minister said in the House that Parliament would be summoned in the Autumn to consider the Franchise Bill alone; and, in order that I may not misquote the right hon. Gentleman, I have taken the trouble to refer to the debate. I stated, I think, on the 10th of July, that the Prime Minister said he would call Parliament together in the Autumn in order that we might deal with the franchise and redistribution. Upon that there were cries of "No!" and the Prime Minister then got up and said—

"I may perhaps be excused if I set the noble Lord right. It is quite possible I may have used the expression 'dealing with redistribution next Session,' but it was perfectly understood that I did not mean the Autumn Session."—(3 Hansard, [290] 702-3.)

Therefore, the position was that Parliament would be summoned in October to deal with the Franchise Bill, and the Franchise Bill alone. But what is the position now? Parliament is summoned to consider the whole question of Reform. The Motion which the Prime Minister made the other day, and which, very properly, gave him the whole time of the House, was framed so as to include "any" Bill dealing with the representation of the people, and we may be quite sure the Prime Minister did not insert that word "any" without good reason for so doing. But we know a good deal more. We know that Her Majesty's Government are ready with a redistribution scheme, and that they could produce it to-morrow if they chose; and we know, further, that in certain circumstances they will produce it. Well, I say that is a tremendous transformation, and a transformation which could not possibly have taken place had we followed the advice of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham. Sir, it is so large a transformation that a peaceable settlement of this matter, which in August last seemed perfectly hopeless, seems now, I really think I may say, without great danger, almost assured. But this I am certain of—If there is one thing which could destroy and shatter the hope of a peaceable settlement it would be the speech of my hon. and learned Friend, if it was supposed to represent the views of any large portion of the Tory Party. Because, Sir, the Government would think, and the Prime Minister would think, and very rightly, that they had nothing before them but a cowardly, vacillating, and disorganized Party; and the right hon. Gentleman would pursue, and very properly, whatever policy might be most in accordance with his own original ideas of what would suit his Party. My hon. and learned Friend last night elevated himself to a pinnacle of great superiority over the rest of the Tory Party. He said that he had always been in favour of assimilating the county and borough suffrage, and that opinion of his had lasted for 10 years. I was very much struck when I read that statement in the newspapers. I have known my hon. and learned Friend very intimately for some time, and it came upon me with all the force of absolute novelty. I find my hon. and learned Friend returned to Parliament in 1875 as Member for Chatham, and in 1875 the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) brought forward a Motion for the assimilation of the county and borough franchises. For it 161 voted, and against 268, and among the "Noes" was my hon. and learned Friend. In 1876, again, the subject came before the House, and was defeated by a majority of 99. My hon. and learned Friend on that occasion paired against the Motion of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. In 1877 the subject again came up, and my hon. and learned Friend did not vote. In 1878, also, the subject came up, and my hon. and learned Friend did not vote. The Motion was brought on in 1879 again, and my hon. and learned Friend did not vote. That is a very curious way of giving support to a question, to vote against it twice and to refrain from voting for it three times. The support which my hon. and learned Friend gave that question is singularly analogous to the support which he gives to the Tory Party. I, like my hon. and learned Friend, was greatly in favour of an arrangement on this matter last August, and so were many other Members on this side of the House. But when that arrangement was found, from one cause or another, to be impossible, when the battle appeared to be definitely begun, when the Tory Party was undoubtedly placed in a position of great difficulty, if not of absolute danger, and when other and much larger issues, involving almost the entire Constitution of the country, were dragged into the contest, then I did not follow the example of my hon. and learned Friend. My hon. and learned Friend boasts that he stood aloof from the agitation in the Autumn; but I venture to think that he would have done a great deal better if he had used his great abilities and powers in clearing up the position of his Party, and in clearing them from all the misconstruction, misconception, and misrepresentation to which they have been exposed. Certainly, I think he would have done better to have taken that course than to do what he did—namely, to prance off to the West Highlands of Scotland, and stir up among the crofters of Skye a great amount of bitterness and discontent with their position, which appears now to be degenerating into very serious riots. I have yet to learn that either the traditions of Party warfare or Party etiquette teaches one to desert one's Party and stand aloof from and refrain from giving assistance to it at a moment of crisis and of danger, simply because of the very inadequate and miserable reason that in one's own poor and very fallible judgment one does not altogether approve of the course which may have led them into that difficulty. [Laughter.] I am perfectly sure that hon. Gentlemen opposite, who laugh at that opinion, when they have disagreed with their Government, and their Government have got into difficulty, have not deserted them. My hon. and learned Friend has severed himself from the Tory Party because he considers it to be in a position of great danger; and to whom does he appeal? Of all people in the world, he appeals to the county Members, the country gentlemen, and the squirarchy of England to abandon their Leaders, the Leaders of the Tory Party, and to follow him in the advice which he has given. He says practically to them that if they take the course which the Leaders of his Party recommend them to take, and which they believe it to be their duty to take, the new voters will vote against them. My hon. and learned Friend, by that kind of appeal, seems to question their sincerity by appealing to their fears and by taunting them with the possibility of future defeat. That kind of appeal and those motives have never been of the slightest avail with the county Members. Whatever their faults may be—and I do not know that they have more than any other section—at any rate, this will be acknowledged—that they have always voted strictly in accordance with what they believe to be their duty without the slightest consideration as to what difficulties may follow personal to themselves. [Laughter.] I do not see anything to laugh at; I see nothing ridiculous; on the contrary, I think that if that independent line of conduct were a little more adopted on the other side of the House our deliberations would be more dignified, and, perhaps, more useful. At any rate, there sits the Prime Minister, who has been 52 years a Member of this House, and who at one time was among these county Members, and who has since that time baffled them and defeated them over and over again. The right hon. Gentleman can tell my hon. and learned Friend that his considerations were the very last considerations which would be likely to influence the county Members. Why, if the county Members of the Tory Party had considered these things in the manner in which my hon. and learned Friend thinks they ought to have done—namely, the immediate Parliamentary consequence of their action—they would have stuck to Sir Robert Peel in 1846, and probably have been in power from that day to this. But because they did not allow themselves to be influenced by such considerations, and insisted on doing what they believed to be their duty, regardless of what might happen to themselves, they abandoned Sir Robert Peel and kept their Party out of power for more than a quarter of a century. I do not myself believe that the action of the county Members in this matter will be misunderstood by their rural constituencies. I see sitting there the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), who made a speech in the Autumn which I happened to come across. In that speech the hon. and gallant Baronet welcomed with the greatest warmth and cordiality the admission of the agricultural labourers to the electoral roll. I do not believe that a single Member on that side of the House or on this side of the House, and I do not believe that even my hon. and learned Friend, would say or insinuate that there was a spark of insincerity in the speech of the hon. and gallant Baronet. And yet my hon. and learned Friend, talking of the county Members, and alluding only to them, said that "they flattered with their mouths and dissembled in their double hearts."

MR. GORST: I am very sorry to interrupt the noble Lord; but he was not here when I spoke, and did not hear what I said; and he has, unwittingly no doubt, misrepresented me. I can assure him and the House that I never addressed myself specially to the county Members, and never said of any hon. Members in this House that they flattered with their mouths and dissembled in their double hearts.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I know perfectly well that I have sustained an immense and irreparable loss in not hearing the speech of my hon. and learned Friend, and I am only able to judge of it from the reports in the newspapers, and which, so far as I can judge, appear to be of a full and accurate character. I wish now to examine, if the House will permit me for a few moments, what is our present position with regard to this question, and to try and find out exactly where we stand. I rather regret the speech just delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board; because, although it was a very clever and interesting speech, and reviewed all the speeches which have been delivered with almost unnecessary minuteness, I was sorry the right hon. Gentleman did not set himself to work to gather up, as it were, all the different grounds of agreement which he might have found amongst all the various sections of the House, rather than set himself to find out all the different divergencies. I regret that he alluded to the speeches made in the Autumn, and particularly that he alluded to the reception given to the speech which was made in Lancashire by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War. I thought that that was a very unhappy allusion on the part of the right hon. Gentleman; because, whatever may have been the reception given to the speech of the noble Lord by the Members of the Tory Party, without any doubt whatever, the rudest and most ungracious reception that was given to that speech came from the President of the Board of Trade. The right hon. Gentleman would have done well, I think, if he could have kept the debate clear from all reminiscences of that character, and if he could have recognized and felt the intense anxiety of the Prime Minister to leave alone, if possible, these agitating and disquieting circumstances. As far as I can look at the present position—I do not know whether I am saying anything ridiculous or absurd—we appear to be on the high road to a settlement. I read the speech delivered by the Prime Minister last night, and deeply regret that I had not the privilege of hearing it; but I may be allowed to say this—with all respect to him—that it seems to be in every sense of the word a magnanimous speech; and I could not help drawing the strongest and most striking contrast between that speech and the speech which the First Lord of the Treasury delivered on the third reading of the Reform Bill last July. In the speech of the Prime Minister last night there was not a word that should not be full of hope to all those who are desirous of conducting this controversy to a satisfactory issue; and there was only one sentence that was calculated to cloud that prospect and raise anxiety. I wish to say a word about the Division that we shall come to at some time to-night. I think the Prime Minister rather misconceived the nature of the issue which the Amendment raises. The Prime Minister said that the Government could not assent to the demand for the union of the two Bills. Now, Sir, we have not put forward such an exorbitant demand as that. Curiously enough, when I originally drew up my Amendment it did contain the word “include” with reference to measures for the rearrangement of electoral areas; and when I submitted it to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, he suggested that the word “include” was far too strong, and that it should be altered to the words “accompanied by.” The union of the two measures is not the question before the House. I am not asking for anything so preposterous. I am asking for “accompaniment” only, and even that does not mean that the two Bills need be before this House simultaneously, or before the other House simultaneously. It only means that they should be before the whole Parliament; and the words “accompanied by” do not in the least exclude the possibility or desirability of following this Bill by the other. The only one sentence in the Prime Minister’s speech which I thought was, I will not say of an alarming, but of a rather anxious character, was the following:—

“I believe I am not overstating the case—in fact, if possible, I am understating it—when I say that while the Tories admit the extension of the franchise to be a good, they regard it only as a conditional good; and if the condition of attendant redistribution does not accompany the franchise, then the franchise is in their view not a good, but an evil. That is to me unintelligible. I do not think the country has been able at all to enter into that proposition so as to see that it has a serious meaning. I quite grant that within the limits of the Party it has been largely accepted and echoed. But I never can depart from the proposition that in our view the franchise is the main matter, and that though the extension of the franchise is a much greater good accompanied with redistribution, yet that it is a good in itself, whether redistribution accompany it or not."

That, I am bound to say, is a sentence which I should have liked not to have read in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, because, undoubtedly, it is a view which on this side of the House cannot be taken. It is a view which on the other side of the House has not been taken by many men of great position and influence. It is a view which was repudiated by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War, when he said that an election with an extended franchise without redistribution would result in an unfair and improper representation of the people. I will give one example, and for the purpose I will rise above the ordinary level of human disinterestedness. I will take the case of my own borough, to which I am attached for many reasons; first of all, for having honoured me with a seat in this House; and, secondly, because it was my home. I take the case of Woodstock, with 1,000 electors; and I ask you whether an amendment of the representation of the people would be satisfactory, would be a great good in itself, that allowed Woodstock, with 1,000 electors, to return a Member to Parliament, and which only gave to the division of South-West Lancashire, with 74,000 electors, two Members? Of course, it is perfectly easy to give one example after another of that kind. I ask the Prime Minister whether he could consider that a fair and proper representation of the people? ["No, no!" from the Ministerial Benches.] Very well; but it is the fair and proper representation of the people you are aiming at; and how can it be a great good in itself to pass a Bill under which, if you take an election, you will have an unfair and improper distribution of seats? The Prime Minister has spoken two or three times in the House and out of it; but he has not explained his views on this point in detail. The only part of the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham for which we are under the slightest obligation to him is that in which he expressed the hope that the introduction of the Redistribution Bill would follow the passing of the Franchise Bill in this House; and two or three of the newspapers concur in stating that that remark of the hon. and learned Gentleman was followed by an encouraging and friendly cheer from the Prime Minister. What I want to point out is this—that if the redistribution proposals of the Government are satisfactory to hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, all necessity for means of pressure to be in the hands of the Government, and all necessity for guarantees to be in our hands, absolutely disappear. I am certain of this—that the Government can rely on the honour of the Leader of the Opposition in this House, and on the honour of Lord Salisbury in the other, as far as any agreement may be come to as to the principles of redistribution; and they also can rely on the great confidence which is placed in them by the bulk of their followers, and the control over their followers which that confidence rightly gives them. I think the Government know the wishes of the Tory Party and the general principles they would support with respect to redistribution. [Cries of "No!"] Hon. Gentlemen say "No!" of course. I cannot blame them; they constantly and persistently shut themselves off from the light of truth. If hon. Gentlemen who say "No!" had read the speech of the Marquess of Salisbury at Manchester, or the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) at Bristol, they would see that the general principles of redistribution which would be favoured by the Tory Party were, at any rate, thrown out with quite as much detail as any principles thrown out by the Government. For my own part, I believe that redistribution, which is based on the population principle, would be most likely to unite the two Parties, because in redistribution based upon that principle I cannot detect any possibility of unfair play, and I think it is the only redistribution which will give a perfectly fair representation of the people. The Prime Minister yesterday laid down four conditions. He said the Bill must be a large one; and with that I quite agree. The larger and the bolder it is the better will be the chance of passing it. The second proposition of the Prime Minister was that it should be a measure which would give a considerable satisfaction to the principle of population, and to that I have already alluded. The third condition was that, although there might be some difference in the interpretation, it ought not be of needless complexity, and needless complexity ought not to be introduced into any part of our electoral system. If the right hon. Gentleman here alludes to the question of proportional representation, I think there are many on this side of the House who would be prepared to support Her Majesty's Government, not from any dislike of the principle or idea, but from an absolute and ineradicable disbelief in the possibility of putting it into a shape which can be adopted in a Bill. This is a matter which the Government may leave open with the utmost confidence. I am perfectly certain that when the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) proposes his scheme of proportional representation, in the first place, the whole Party of 100 Members who favour the principle will fly to pieces through their disagreement upon the details of the speech; and, secondly, what remains of the Party will be scattered like chaff before the wind by a speech from the Prime Minister. I wish that that scheme of the hon. Baronet may come before the House. I have not the slightest doubt what the result will be. I hope the Government will allow no fear about that question to debar them from taking any practical course they think proper. Further, the Prime Minister said that he attached immense importance to the condition that the scheme must be equitable and liberal as between the great divisions of the country. I suppose the word "liberal" is contained in the word "equitable," and, without disrespect, I may almost say that it is redundant. That condition will be at once received with the greatest satisfaction. The fourth condition was that the measure ought to be just as between the different classes of the community, and the different pursuits to which those classes belong. In that I recognize a principle that finds considerable favour, both on the other side and on this. Whatever representation you give to manufacturing interests, and whatever you give to agricultural interests in accordance to their number, the constituencies in which they are represented should, as far as possible, be kept quite distinct and separate, on the grounds that the difference between them has been from time to time immemorably recognized by Parliament, and also on the grounds that the interests of the manufacturing and those of the agricultural classes are essentially diverse. [Cries of "No, no!"] How can hon. Members say "No!" when, in their own experience, time after time, divisions upon legislative projects have drawn the line sharply between the urban and the agricultural Representatives? Well, that is the position as far as I can make it out. If the Government, after the Franchise Bill has passed from the House of Commons, will place their Redistribution Bill before us, then I am certain there is no reason to disbelieve that before many months every one of these difficulties will be settled. The President of the Local Government Board promised us further information if we wanted it, and he has done so two or three times. But I would suggest that it is almost impossible to go beyond what the Prime Minister has said, except by laying the Bill on the Table. There was one feature of the debate of last night that I noticed, and it was that speaker after speaker got up and recognized the fact that whatever might be the former views of the Tory Party, they are now sincere in desiring an extension of the franchise. I would add, I do not believe that there is the smallest desire to trip up the Government with respect to redistribution. There is not the slightest arrière pensée in the demands pressed upon the Government. We do not think that a Bill for the redistribution of seats need be a measure which should raise a question of confidence or no confidence in the Government. We have got already to the discussion of general principles. Surely, having got so far as that, a consideration of dry details must naturally follow. In that discussion, when once the main principles are agreed on, from what has been said by the Prime Minister, I do not see any possibility of violent disagreement. I am perfectly certain in that discussion the great principle of give and take will characterize both Parties. I do not think the Division of to-night will do any harm to the possibility of an agreement. The Amendment which is before the House, which, I suppose, will be supported by hon. Gentlemen on this side, reiterates in the clearest and most distinct manner we can the position we have taken up; it confirms and strengthens our position in the country. I think it makes clear to hon. Gentlemen opposite our position before them. I honestly believe myself, in common with Liberal Members opposite, in common with many Members on this side of the House, that this question ought to be settled. I believe firmly that this question must be settled. I also have a profound conviction that this question can only be settled by a more or less close adherence to the manner and the methods we propose. The settlement of the question in that manner and by those methods will, at any rate, possess this inestimable quality which the Prime Minister seemed to desire last night—that it will be a settlement of a great national controversy, not by the voice of a faction, not by the will of a Party, but by the united and harmonious co-operation of the entire Parliament of the United Kingdom. Such a settlement, so effected, will contain within it elements of stability, of tranquillity, of finality and of safety, which no other settlement can by any ingenuity secure. It will, moreover, reflect the highest and the most enduring credit on those parties, who, after all, must be chiefly responsible in this matter not only to the country, but to posterity—I mean the Ministers of the Crown. I freely give them all, and more than all, the credit which they can gather from a settlement so arrived at. It is in the full and absolute confidence that the Division of to-night will not prevent such a great consummation that I dissent altogether from the pusillanimous considerations put forward by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham, and I give my voice and vote in favour of the Amendment which the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire has so ably put before the House.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, the greater part of the speech of the noble Lord had been devoted to a censure of the hon. and learned Member for

Chatham (Mr. Gorst); but he thought the House would agree that the present quarrel would probably issue as all lovers' quarrels did, and when the present question was settled, they would be as firm and close friends as ever. He wished, however, to assure the noble Lord that the excuses made for his absence last evening by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) were not received in the jeering spirit which he imagined. He thought he could explain to some extent why it was that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham made his remarkable speech. It was because he thought he was, in truth, following the lead and teaching of the noble Lord. No doubt the noble Lord had drafted an Amendment originally intended to express the view of the Opposition that the Franchise Bill and the Redistribution Bill should be conjoined, but subsequently altered the language of his Amendment. But the view his hon. and learned Friend apparently took was that the Amendment of the noble Lord must have been written under a temporary aberration and in forgetfulness of the statements which the noble Lord had again and again made in the House, and which amply justified the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham. Early in the present year, on the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. A. Grey) fixing a date for the commencement of the Franchise Bill, the noble Lord said that while the Opposition had no power to compel the Government to bring in one Bill dealing with the whole subject, yet, considering what had fallen from Gentlemen on both sides of the House, he thought they had power to persuade the Government to undertake that redistribution should be dealt with next year. That was the noble Lord's language then; but that was the very thing which the Government did undertake, and was the pledge given by the Government, upon which the hon. and learned Member for Chatham rightly laid such stress. But the noble Lord went on to say, still referring to the hon. Member for South Northumberland's Amendment, that the object of Conservatives who were in favour of Reform would be attained by the insertion of the date January, 1886, as the commencement of the Bill. If that were put into a Reform

Bill, the noble Lord saw no reason why the Bill should not pass into law, taking into account the declaration of the Government that they intended to introduce promptly and to pass a Redistribution Bill. His hon. and learned Friend, then, was true to the teaching of the noble Lord, and more consistent than the noble Lord had been that evening. But, in the meantime, the noble Lord found that he was being considerably blamed for the line he was taking, which was in opposition to the Party to which he belonged. On that very occasion he was taken to task by the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour), just as the noble Lord had taken to task the hon. and learned Member for Chatham. While, therefore, the encounter between the noble Lord and the hon. and learned Member for Chatham was amusing, consistency was altogether on the side of the hon. and learned Member; and the House would agree with him that, however amusing these personal passages might be, the House would have been better pleased if the noble Lord had addressed himself to answering the speech of the hon. and learned Member. He (Mr. C. Russell) had listened carefully to the speech of his hon. and learned Friend; and, in his opinion, it was one of the most convincing which had ever been delivered in that House. The noble Lord's answer to it was singularly incomplete, and no attempt had been made to tackle the hon. and learned Member's speech. It must have struck everybody that there was a sense of hollowness and sham about the whole of that debate. It was not a real fight. The main question at issue had already been determined in that House, and there was no expectation that the vote of last Spring would be altered by the vote of the House that night. It was, therefore, obvious that the only purpose to be served by prolonging the discussion was to give some show of reason and some sense of support to the proceedings of the House of Lords. What was the question before the House? It was the second reading of a Bill which it now appeared the House unanimously accepted. It was almost regretted if it was suggested that there was a lingering doubt in the bosoms of hon. Members opposite. Those lingering doubts appeared to be confined to the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), the Lord Mayor (Mr. R. N. Fowler), and last, but not least, the intrepid Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther), who had the great credit of candidly avowing his dislike to the Bill. If that was so, why was not the Bill carried? There were some features in it which he and many other Liberals did not like. He did not like plurality of votes, or the preservation of existing fagot votes, or the votes of freemen. But they were content to let these matters pass, because they recognized that the Government had honestly tried to bring in a Bill which would be as little as possible open to objection from the Conservative Party. Why, then, was it not carried? Because it was not accompanied by redistribution. But the Government had said they would not deal with the question in one Bill, nor in two Bills introduced simultaneously; and the House of Commons, the representative House, had indorsed that judgment, and, as he believed, the country had indorsed it. That was clearly shown by the public meetings held throughout the country in the Autumn. But the Party opposite said there were no such means known to the Constitution of arriving at public opinion. It might be convenient to say that now, but hon. Gentlemen opposite had tried that means. The Leader of the Opposition, who, he might venture to say, was neither by nature nor taste fitted for mob oratory, had assumed that rôle, and addressed large masses of the people, and the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition had adopted a like course. But they had found the country against them; and now they turned round and said it was a means of appealing to the country that was not known to the Constitution. It was said, however—"We must have the redistribution scheme before us." Why, what was the situation? The Government were pledged to bring in a Redistribution Bill as soon as possible, and the House had recognized the sincerity of their pledge. Further, the lines laid down by the Prime Minister in his speech on the previous day as to the leading principles of a Redistribution Bill had been recognized as just. But then hon. Gentlemen opposite said they had no guarantee that the Redistribution Bill would be dealt with by this Parliament. He did not say that was not desirable; but those who considered an extension of the franchise as a good thing in itself did not recognize the force of that argument. What was the position with respect to the question. There were still two full years unexpired of the present Parliament. Was not that ample for dealing with both branches of the subject? If such were not ample, how, then, did it lie in the mouths of the Conservative Party to complain that the Government did not embrace both parts of Reform in the same Bill and in the same Session of Parliament? It was said that there was not a perfect identity of interest between the two Parties in the State; but he would ask whether there was nothing in the present state of things that was injurious to the Liberal Party? What was the next point? It was said by hon. Gentlemen opposite—"We have no guarantee that the Bill, if you bring it in, shall be a fair Redistribution Bill." His hon. and learned Friend pointed out last night that they had ample guarantee. They had the public faith of Ministers pledged to it, and behind that they had public opinion, which would stigmatize the conduct of Ministers who attempted to turn such a great public question into a mere contrivance for a Party advantage. As hon. Members opposite maintained that they had no guarantees for a fair Redistribution Bill, he would ask them what they meant by a fair Redistribution Bill? He supposed it would be conceded that any Redistribution Bill must bring with it, by the admission of 2,000,000 of hitherto unenfranchised voters, a large accession of power to what might relatively be described as the democratic element. That element was not, in the main, one from which hon. Gentlemen opposite would expect to get a large amount of support. When hon. Members opposite spoke of a fair redistribution scheme, dealing with that democratic element, did they mean that they wanted the increased number of voters to be so manipulated that their full force and effect was not to be felt? Was it not painfully obvious, however much they might attempt to conceal the fact, that hon. Gentlemen opposite regarded this question of the franchise as a poisonous thing, not to be permitted to come into contact with the body politic, and as a kind of bane which would be fatal to the State unless it were accompanied by the antidote of redistribution. That was not the view of the Liberal Party. They regarded the admission of so many persons to the rights of citizenship as a good in itself, and as strengthening the foundations on which the great institutions of the country rested. He should now like to say a word about the other House of Parliament, for whose benefit, as he conceived, these debates were conducted and tonight's Division was to be gone through. He desired to say a word with all seriousness and with all respect. Hon. Members opposite professed to venerate the House of Lords, and to regard it as being of the highest use to the State in its legislative capacity. But were they strengthening its position, and raising it in the estimation of the people, by the course they were now pursuing? When the House of Lords came athwart the serious purposes of the people in a matter affecting their representation, they set the masses a-thinking. One was reminded that the House of Lords, with its present functions, was an anomaly unknown in the whole civilized world to-day, and unknown, as far as he was aware, in any previous part of the history of the world—namely, a House with legislative functions and hereditary institutions. Those who considered the history of that Body would do well to bring the present dispute to a speedy ending. It had been urged that the House of Lords were within the letter of their Constitutional rights when they practically rejected this Bill. But the letter of their rights and the spirit of those rights were different things; and it was a serious matter, according to the spirit of their rights, for the House of Lords to reject a measure which had been announced in the Queen's Speech at the instance of Her Majesty's responsible Advisers, and which had been passed by a large majority by that branch of the Legislature which alone was affected by it. It was manifestly felt that the House of Lords were using their great power and influence to serve what they—he was willing to admit—considered to be the interests of the country, but to serve also Party purposes. They were endeavouring to put a political Party out of power, and to force a Dissolution on the Government. As a Constitutional lawyer, he maintained that in so doing they were not acting either in the letter or according to the spirit of their rights. Let the friends of the House of Lords take warning in time. Did not hon. Gentlemen opposite know that there were many Members on the Ministerial side, and hundreds of people outside the House, who would rejoice if this question should not be brought to a settlement, because they thought the prolongation of the struggle would lead to a far more radical change in the position and constitution of the House of Lords than anything that was now suggested. He was sure hon. Members from Ireland (his Colleagues) would bear with him while he addressed a word or two to them with reference to the position of this Bill from the Irish point of view. He did not at all affect the right to advise; but he would ask to be allowed to state the grounds upon which it seemed to him there ought not to be any hesitation as to the vote which any Member from Ireland representing popular interests ought to give. When the Bill was brought forward, he recollected that the first great cry made against it was that it included Ireland. It was pointed out that in the state of Ireland it was a monstrous act of statesmanship to attempt to concede equal rights to seditious and barbarous Irishmen. When, however, it became apparent that no Minister could bring in a Bill dealing in an exceptional way with one part of the so-called United Kingdom, it was said, rather than include Ireland, "Let no Bill be brought in at all." He knew that his hon. Colleagues from Ireland were sore with the present Government, and he was not prepared to say that they had not reason to be dissatisfied with them in some respects. He should support his Colleagues in some of the questions which would come up for discussion, such as, for instance, that latest act, the reappointment or continuance of George Bolton in a position in connection with the administration of law in Ireland. He would be sorry and ashamed if Irish Members did not receive such support from the Liberal Benches, both above and below the Gangway, as would make it impossible for the Government to continue that man in his present position. On such an occasion he should act with his hon. Colleagues, and he should be surprised and disappointed if many of those around him did not take the same view of the matter. But est modus in rebus; and he would ask his hon. Colleagues what they meant to do in regard to the measure now under consideration? The Government, whatever else might be said of them and of the Liberal Party, had been loyal on this question to the Irish people. They had resisted the attacks made upon them on this point. The arguments used by Conservatives had been various. Hon. Friends of his on the Benches opposite—and he was glad to say he had many there—had pointed out to him the utter impolicy of extending this enlarged measure of enfranchisement to the Irish people, and had remarked, "It means extinction for you and men of your moderate views," as they had been pleased to describe them. His answer was—and it ought to be the answer of all who considered the question—that if the maintenance of a few men of so-called moderate and liberal views was only to be secured at the expense of maintaining a narrow enfranchisement, the sooner they disappeared the better. How had this question been dealt with lately? In the earlier discussions the main point of attack on the Government was in reference to the treatment of Ireland. They had had from the right hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) the mud cabin argument. The noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) said the Bill was a hovel enfranchisement Bill as far as Ireland was concerned. The right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) said the Bill forged a weapon for the disloyal, while his right hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Plunket) was amazed at the folly and blindness of the Government which made such a proposition. Finally, they had from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) a statement that it was neither more nor less than an enfranchisement of barbarism. He must not forget the speech delivered at Dunstable by the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodrick), who said that the Irish people whom it was intended to enfranchise knew no more about voting than a donkey knew about family prayer. But in the face of all this, the Government, to their credit, stood by their guns; and it would be recollected that in the last Division,

when the question of Ireland was raised in this connection, 137 Gentlemen exclusively from the Opposition side of the House voted against the inclusion of Ireland. He asked his hon. Colleagues whether they were going into the Lobby with the Party who used those arguments and treated the question in that way, to the defamation and vilification of their country? He could understand the Irish Members going into the Lobby with the Opposition on this question, if by their vote they could turn out the Government; that would be intelligible, although it might not be wise. But they knew that no such purpose could be effected by it. The only effect of any diminution of the vote would be to play into the hands of the House of Lords. In Ireland especially this question of the franchise was one which ought to be speedily brought to an issue; for whereas in Great Britain one in 10 of the population had a vote, in Ireland the restrictive franchise and the difficulties of acquiring a vote were such that only one in 25 of the population had a vote. Surely this was a matter that ought to be redressed, and redressed speedily. Were the Irish Members anxious to help the Lords in this matter? Did they owe the Lords anything? However pernicious the proceedings of the House of Lords might have been in regard to England and Scotland, they had been still more pernicious in the case of Ireland. Above all institutions the House of Lords had taught the Irish people the lesson that, not to mere persuasion and argument, but to agitation, often agitation accompanied by violence, they would yield the claims of justice. This lesson was taught in the case of Catholic Emancipation, of the Tithes, of the Tests Acts, of Disestablishment, and more fatally in the case of the Land Act of 1870 and the Land Act of 1881. But it was not merely that the House of Lords delayed and hindered the legislative schemes sent up to them for the benefit of Ireland. The knowledge that all measures had to run the gauntlet of the House of Lords prevented the Government putting forward measures as complete as they desired. ["Oh!" and "Hear, hear!"] The Prime Minister himself had stated that Ministers had to consider, not what might be passed through this House, but what would be agreed to in the other House. He sincerely hoped that in the Division that night no Irish Member representing what he had ventured to call popular rights and opinions in Ireland would by his vote give the least colour of support to the conduct of the House of Lords on previous occasions in reference to Ireland, or to the conduct of the House of Lords in regard to this question.

MR. FINCH-HATTON said, he recognized the duty of hon. Members, as far as possible, to narrow the issue down to the real point upon which the controversy turned. There was much in the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) with which he could cordially agree; and he should be able entirely to agree with him but for one omission he made—the fact that, although the issue was reduced to a narrow one, yet one point was still undetermined, and that a not unimportant one. He brushed away as unworthy of further consideration the charge brought against the Conservative Party, that they were opposed to the passage of the Franchise Bill. He had never opposed the passage of the Bill, nor, he believed, had any considerable section of his Party. They only wished to see the question fairly and equitably settled. Neither was he in the least afraid of any efforts that could possibly be made by the Party in power to manipulate the constituencies in any new Redistribution Bill. He was willing to believe that they would not if they could, and he did not think they could if they would. Such an attempt must fail. They might as well try to lead an elephant with a thread. Constituencies would refuse to be bound by any Party in the State, and their votes at the proper time would show where was their confidence. One point, however, was left at issue to which he must call attention—a danger to which the Constitution was exposed. But before alluding to that, he wished briefly to notice the speech of the Prime Minister last night. In many ways it was a conciliatory speech, and the applause from the Conservatives that greeted parts of that speech showed the spirit in which the Party were prepared to receive it. The Prime Minister even went so far as to say something on the question of redistribution generally. A Redistribution Bill, he said, should be a large Bill. It should deal with large numbers; it should not be too complex; and it should represent large interests in the country. But these were propositions it was scarcely worth while for the Prime Minister to present to the House, for scarcely a person in the country would take exception to them. But the danger to which he was about to allude was not at all touched by the speech of the Prime Minister; and it was simply this—that we had, at the present moment, no guarantee or security whatever that we might not be brought face to face with a General Election with the old constituencies and a new electorate. The effect thus produced could be shown by an examination of the constituency he had the honour to represent. It now numbered something over 10,000 electors. Under the new Bill it would contain something like 50,000. Therefore, by a very simple arithmetical process, it would be seen that the present constituency there would be entirely swamped should a General Election take place without a redistribution of seats. The present electors of the country had deserved well of the nation, and they had justified the expectations which were formed of them. But they had one more duty to perform before they relinquished the power entrusted to them; and that was, through their Representatives, to take care that power was not handed over to any but a re-organized constituency. They had to take care that the power was not handed over to a chaotic mass of voters, who, it was admitted on all sides, could only form a temporary constituency, which could not possibly represent the opinion of the country. But though such a constituency would itself be a temporary one, the evils resulting from its creation would be permanent, inasmuch as to it would be entrusted the duty of sending Representatives to the House, into whose sole charge would be confided the reconstruction of the whole representative system of the country. With the permission of the House he would give an illustration of the danger which would attend such a course. Supposing a new harbour or dock were to be constructed, what would be said of the engineer if he were to suggest that the water should be let in first and the works constructed afterwards? That, however, was precisely the course which, under the hypothesis he was considering, the House would be compelled to adopt. The claim of the 2,000,000 persons to be admitted within the pale of the Constitution was granted by both sides of the House, and it therefore became necessary that the boundaries of our representative system should be enlarged in order that the new votes might be safely accommodated; but the question was—should they first let in the waters and flood the works, so that it might be impossible afterwards to construct a good representative system, or should they, as wise men, first keep the water out, and then on lines of strength and beauty construct the receptacles for the new electorate? They were told there was no serious wish on either side of the House to obstruct the passage of the two Bills; and it was generally admitted that a Dissolution, under the conditions he had shown to be possible, would be a national misfortune. He was reminded, when he compared the attitude which the House of Lords and the Prime Minister had respectively taken up on this question, of a verse which was written 100 years ago describing the conduct of two English Commanders who were waiting for each other—

 Stood waiting for Sir Richard Strachan;
 Sir Richard, longing to be at 'em, Stood waiting for the Earl of Chatham.”

The responsibility of providing a remedy for the present state of affairs rested with the Government. In his opinion, the remedy was a very simple one. It was said there was no fear but that the Redistribution Bill would be passed before there was another General Election. There might be very little fear; but what the Opposition asked on behalf of the Constitution of the country was that it should be made legally impossible that such a thing could happen. If the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, would agree to insert in this Bill a clause which should prevent its coming into operation until a Redistribution Bill had been passed, it appeared to him (Mr. Finch-Hatton) that that would be the easiest and simplest solution of the difficulty. In the first place, it would afford an efficient and effective protection against the Constitutional danger to which he had referred—a protection which ought to be asked for and sought for by hon. Members on both sides of the House, inasmuch as both sides of the House admitted that that state of things would involve a very grave crisis. In the second place, it would afford an honourable compromise to both the contending Parties. On the one hand, the House of Lords would be enabled to recede from the letter of the demand which they had put forward, that both Bills should be placed before them at one and the same time; and the Prime Minister, with the full honours of war, would not then be obliged, as he had said he could not do, to bring in those measures either as one Bill, or even simultaneously. He would be enabled to pass the Franchise Bill with the greatest ease, and afterwards, when the united wisdom of the Cabinet had matured the redistribution scheme, he could lay it on the Table of the House. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the necessity which existed for some kind of lever in order to induce the House of Commons to deal with the question of redistribution. He submitted to the Prime Minister and to the Government that, after the insertion of such a clause, he would find the greatest lever which could be placed in his hands in the united force of public opinion. The Franchise Bill under that supposition would be safe; but it would be awaiting its coming into operation until the Redistribution Bill had become law. Therefore, it might fairly be contended that if any hon. Member on either side of the House were to offer any unnecessary opposition to the passage of the Redistribution Bill he would lay himself open to the censure of the country for delaying the passing of the Franchise Bill as well. The House was frequently told that under any circumstances Her Majesty's Government would introduce a Redistribution Bill during the Session of 1885; and he would remind the House that, as it at present stood, the Franchise Bill did not come into operation till January 1, 1886. If, therefore, that were so, and the clause he suggested were inserted, there could arise no possible delay, for the two Bills would become law at one and the same time. He contended, also, that a guarantee of this kind would have the effect of making the progress of the Redistribution Bill itself considerably more easy and more rapid. He asked the Government whether they did not think it wise at the present moment to attempt in some manner to secure the cordial co-operation of Members on the Opposition side of the House? Could they look forward to the next Session of Parliament and not see that there might be times when they would be very glad of that co-operation? If it should be necessary, as, unfortunately, it probably might be, to ask Parliament again to renew the exceptional powers for dealing with Ireland, surely at that moment the Government would be glad to receive the support of the Conservative Party. If this reasonable concession, not to Conservative prejudices, but to Constitutional security, was given by the right hon. Gentleman, he, for one, would promise his hearty co-operation in carrying the Redistribution Bill through Parliament. He was satisfied that if some such guarantee as that were given, the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) would see his way to withdraw his Amendment. Failing such a guarantee, he should feel it his duty, by supporting the Amendment of his hon. Friend, to take care that when the power which had been given to the present electors was taken away from them it was only handed over to a broadened, a widened, and a properly readjusted constituency, and one qualified to take up and discharge with fidelity to the State the enormous trust which would be reposed in it.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER said, he was afraid that no kind of argument would persuade the extreme section of the Radical Party to take what many Members on the Opposition side considered to be a rational and patriotic view of the question; and, therefore, all arguments must be addressed to the more moderate Members of the Party opposite, and what remained of the old Liberal Party. The Conservative Party had already proved ad nauseam that the position they had taken up was publicly approved by all the greatest men, both of the present and the past, although it was true of some of the former that—

"A merciful Providence has fashioned them hollow,
In order that they may their principles swallow."

He could not help hoping that the lessons of the Recess might have shown moderate Liberals the great dangers of the present agitation. What had we seen? We had seen Members of Parliament, ex-Cabinet Ministers, and present Cabinet Ministers joining together with paid agitators, and doing their utmost to excite the worst passions of the people by using language which, in an Irish Member, would have been called seditious. Many an Irishman had lingered in gaol for making use of language not worse than that used by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) and the President of the Board of Trade; and if that kind of thing was to continue, the Home Secretary would have to consider the advisability of establishing some gaol equivalent to Kilmainham, where hon. and right hon. Gentlemen might learn to bridle their tongues and mend their manners. It was a singular fact that even the paid and practised agitator had been unable to persuade the agricultural labourer to excite himself about his own enfranchisement. It was true that a procession of agricultural labourers, or supposed agricultural labourers, appeared in the streets of London; but it had come to their knowledge, beyond doubt, that each of those forming the procession received a return ticket in order to view the Metropolis gratis. He maintained that there had not been a large gathering of the purely agricultural population to protest against the action that had been taken by the Conservative Party. The principal meetings that had taken place of the agricultural population had, on the contrary, supported the Conservative Party and the House of Lords in the course they had taken. To do the Prime Minister justice, he was, no doubt, anxious to pass a Redistribution Bill immediately after the Franchise Bill had become law, the right hon. Gentleman wishing to crown a long and laborious political career by a full and complete measure of Reform. But, still, he thought the Prime Minister feared that he would meet with far more difficulties from the extreme Members of the Radical Party in passing the Redistribution Bill than he would meet with from the Opposition side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, meant to use the passing of an incomplete measure as a lever to force the Opposition to pass the other portion of the scheme. He would state his reasons for imploring the more moderate Members of the Party opposite to think well before they played into the hands of the extreme Radical Party.

Sir Frederick Milner

He was convinced that once the Franchise Bill became law, that extreme Party would never consent to any Redistribution Bill unless its terms were outrageously unfair, but would rather have an appeal to the country upon the large and undistributed electorate. Look at the line they had taken. They had made no secret whatever of hoping for the rejection of the Bill by the House of Lords, notwithstanding the commotion into which they had thrown the country. Their desire had not been the extension of the franchise to the county voters; but it had been the destruction of the House of Lords, the abolition of hereditary legislatures, and the ruin of hereditary landowners. Not content with making the most violent and offensive speeches against noble Lords who had done good service to the country, they had circulated tracts among the poor people of the country of a most infamous character against the hereditary owners of land. One of these tracts, which were written with the deliberate intention of creating discontent, was put under the door of many cottages in his neighbourhood; and it was of so infamous a nature that he meant to bring it under the notice of the Home Secretary, and ask him to lay it on the Table of the House in order that Members might read for themselves the poison which these agitators had attempted to sow broadcast through the land. He did not suppose it would be relevant for him to undertake a defence of the House of Lords; but he might be permitted to say, if a good judge of human nature were to come and contemplate the row of hon. Members who usually sat below the Gangway opposite, and listen to their fiery conversations, and especially listen to that refined discourse which was delivered by the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers), whom the Speaker had to call to Order three times for not behaving himself like a gentleman—["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to speak in that way, and to say that an hon. Member did not behave himself like a gentleman.

SIR FREDERICK MILNER said, he was going to say if they were to contrast the conduct of the extreme Radical Members in that House, and then were to go to the House of Lords and notice the demeanour of noble Lords who sat there, and heard their statesmanlike speeches, he thought they would decide it would be better for the country that these noble Lords should form the Second Chamber. He could only say—God defend this country from ever being under the unlimited control of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway? He was not one of those who thought that the agricultural labourer was in any way unfit to receive the power of voting, for he believed he was as much fit to receive that privilege as any of the individuals who possessed it in the towns. He had lived all his life in an agricultural district, and had taken the deepest interest in the welfare of those among whom he lived. He was certain that the agricultural labourer would far rather live unenfranchised, and trust himself to the tender mercies of the Conservatives, than, as an enfranchised man, be ground down under Radical rule. The Prime Minister, at the opening of that great Club, which was to embrace the head, the body, and the tail of the Caucus, made an allusion to the agricultural labourers, in which he said that they had been, practically, for the last half-century, under Tory influence. What had been the result of this? The condition of the agricultural labourer in these 50 years of Tory influence had been one of steady improvement; and now, in a time of unparalleled distress, when the landlord was ruined and the tenant farmer almost ruined, the agricultural labourer's position was as good and rather better than it was a few years ago. But if they looked at the case of the urban classes, the slaves of the wealthy Radical millowners, they saw a very different state of things. Day after day they heard of mills being closed and shipyards shut up, and of thousands upon thousands of their unfortunate fellow-creatures being turned out into the streets to starve. He ventured to think that the condition of the agricultural labourer in 50 years of Tory influence was somewhat better than that of the unfortunates who lived in the towns, and who had been under the influence of Radical millionaires. It might be said, if the agricultural labourers had so much to be thankful for to the Conservatives, why should they oppose the present

Bill? They did so because hon. Gentlemen opposite knew as well as he that the proposed enfranchisement of the agricultural labourer without a scheme of redistribution being introduced was a mere mockery and a farce. Unless the franchise was accompanied by a redistribution scheme, which gave a fair representation to each class, the agricultural interest would be completely swamped by the urban interest. As it was, the urban voter was in a better position already than the county voter, for the former could vote in his county as well as his borough, while the latter was confined to his own constituency or division. But, in addition to this, the country would be flooded by a large number of men whose interests were purely urban, but who happened to live outside the town. The proposed measure of enfranchisement, if unaccompanied by a proper scheme of redistribution, would be a monstrous injustice to the agricultural labourer, and to all those who depended upon land for their sustenance. He could hardly hope that the large majority on the Division on the last second reading of the Bill would be brought down to a minority; but he did hope most sincerely that now that the utter unscrupulousness of the Radical policy had been shown forth in the glaring light of day, hon. Members opposite who valued patriotism and the stability of the Constitution might be brought round to help forward the cause of the people, and that the majority might be reduced. He sincerely hoped that the House of Lords might arrange to pass the second reading of the Bill without in any way departing from the position which they had taken up; but he also hoped that on no consideration whatever would they allow such a dangerous precedent to be set as that now proposed of dividing the question of enfranchisement from that of redistribution. He supported the Amendment, not because he was in any way opposed to the enfranchisement of the dwellers in the country, but because, if the precedent was set of dividing the two questions, it would prove most mischievous and dangerous. He maintained that it was perfectly possible, if the Government chose to bring in a Redistribution Bill at once, of a just and fair character, that they could in that case pass it this Session, without the slightest difficulty, for he was sure they would be supported by the whole Conservative Party. As the great principle of the extension of the franchise was practically conceded on both sides, he sincerely hoped that some half-way ground might be found on which both Parties might meet in friendly discussion; that a satisfactory settlement of the great question might speedily be effected; and that no more disorder and riot need be stirred up in the country.

Mr. D. GRANT said, he recognized a great gain in the changed spirit with which this question had been treated by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). Members of the Opposition had expressed an apprehension that a Redistribution Bill might be introduced which would be unfair to the rural and agricultural communities. They had, however, fallen into the error of supposing that the absolute numbers given in the Census really represented the agricultural population. They took the town population at 15,500,000 and the country population at 10,500,000, without taking the trouble to analyze the figures and see of what they consisted. The numbers employed in agriculture were but 1,278,000, while the numbers employed as professional men in commercial pursuits and in industrial labour were 8,000,000. Again, it was assumed that the rural population were all Conservative. But, he asked, were the crofters of Skye Conservative? Was the Farmers' Alliance Conservative? Were the meetings connected with extraordinary tithe Conservative? Was the Labourers' Union Conservative? He had been at a meeting of farmers held that week where he heard more pronounced Radicalism than he had ever heard before in his life. The Conservative Party seemed to be proceeding on the assumption that localities had something to do with politics. There had been a time when the social influence which a single individual possessed might have produced certain results; but the introduction of railways, the telegraph, and a cheap Press had made that a thing of the past. He contended that the Conservative Party had taken up a mistaken position with respect to this Bill, and that if they pressed their demand to an issue they would meet with ignominious failure.

Sir Frederick Milner

Mr. WARTON said, he was glad that, with the single exception of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), there was not the slightest disposition in the Conservative Party to yield in this matter. For himself, he utterly disbelieved the protestations of the Government, and had no faith in the interchange of compliments which had taken place. He regretted that the speech of the Prime Minister gave no indication of a compromise between the two great Parties. If the Government had been serious in their desire to settle this question they might have done it easily by letting other subjects alone last Session; instead of that, however, they blocked the way with London Government Bills, Merchant Shipping Bills, and a hundred other useless measures. Four or five months would have been sufficient to carry a large Bill dealing with franchise and redistribution. The Government, however, did not want that; they wanted to drive the Tory Party into a corner by first passing the Franchise Bill, and then compelling that Party to accept whatever redistribution scheme the Ministers chose to place before the House. It had been said that public opinion would prevent the Government dealing faithlessly with Parliament in the matter; but, as the case of General Gordon proved, public opinion was powerless against a tyrannical Minister and an unscrupulous majority. He believed that the real object of the Government was to keep the Radical Party permanently in power; and, for himself, he had no confidence whatever in Her Majesty's Ministers. The language which had been encouraged in the agitation against the House of Lords was discreditable to political life. As an old-fashioned lawyer, he did not scruple to say that the language used by the President of the Board of Trade amounted to treason. Even the Home Secretary, himself a scion of a noble family, at the laying of the foundation stone of a big Liberal Club a few days ago, compared the House of Lords to the Cities of the Plain. He believed the effect of the agitation had been to discredit the agitators, and that time would have an effect upon public opinion in the direction of vindicating the House of Lords against the attacks which had been made upon it. The present majority of the Government in that House had been obtained by gross misrepresentation.

Mr. STORER said, he regretted that so much exaggeration had taken place on the opposite side with regard to this question. Hon. Gentlemen opposite told them that the agricultural labourers took a great deal of interest in it; but his experience was very much to the contrary. He took, perhaps, as much interest in the agricultural labourer as any hon. Gentleman in that House. He knew their feelings and opinions, and he did not hesitate to say that nothing astonished them so much as when they heard that they were to have a vote. They took not the slightest interest in politics, and placed more value on a mug of beer. He recollected that during the last contested election he was one day speaking from a waggon, when a man below cried out—"Give us the vote." He (Mr. Storer) answered—"Very well. But tell me first, what do you want the vote for?" "Oh," said he, "my brother has a vote for Nottingham, and he gets lots of beer for it." That was the labourers' idea of a vote, and that was how they valued it at the present time. He did not say that they might not be educated up to a higher ideal. He was only speaking as to the present position of the population, and, for the matter of that, they appeared to be quite equal to similar classes in town. He did not, in fact, think the experiments of 1867 had answered, and judging from the fact that since that time so many boroughs had been disenfranchised for corruption, and there were others which would have been served in the same way if they had had their deserts. It appeared that the lower classes in the towns placed about the same value upon the vote as did the agricultural labourers. He certainly, however, did not think the county voters would be in any way inferior in intelligence to their town brethren. He, for one, had no objection to their having the vote; but what he did object to, and what they all objected to on that side of the House, was that the rural constituencies should be swamped by urban voters. But how were they being met on this question? The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister gave them an admirable sketch last night of what a Redistribution Bill ought to be; but he wrapped his sketch up, as was his wont, in such a cloud of verbiage that they had the greatest difficulty in discovering what, after all, it was or was not to be. The right hon. Gentleman asked the House to accept his assurances; but he (Mr. Storer) had no satisfaction whatever in accepting the right hon. Gentleman's assurances. His assurances were somewhat defective. He (Mr. Storer) had had some experience of the right hon. Gentleman's assurances. He remembered that when the right hon. Gentleman brought forward his Bill for the repeal of the Malt Tax he foreshadowed the measure in a brilliant speech which almost brought tears to his (Mr. Storer's) eyes. An hon. Member sitting by his side said—"Wait till you see the Bill." That hon. Member was right in his scepticism, for when the Bill was brought in it turned out to be quite a different measure from that foreshadowed. Its object proved to be to increase the Revenue rather than to benefit the farmer, to whom it had proved a curse rather than a blessing. Moreover, he doubted, however good the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman might be, whether he had the power to control the manipulation of the Bill, which would in reality be in the hands of the Caucus, and would afford that unscrupulous body the lever which they desired. He warned hon. Members opposite against the danger of stirring up the passions of the people. He was old enough to remember the riots at Bristol and Nottingham—the shootings at the former and the hangings at the latter place—and anyone who had seen the concourse in Hyde Park, the banners with their mottoes—"Down with the House of Lords," "Down with the Aristocracy," "The Land for the People"—and who heard the people singing the "Marseillaise," must admit that the whole proceeding was of a revolutionary character. The right hon. Gentleman was not a farmer, but he was adopting a process to that House which was very familiar to the agricultural mind. The right hon. Gentleman had a pig to sell. He put it into a bag and took it to market. A customer came up and said—"Hullo, what have you got there?" "Oh," said the right hon. Gentleman, "it's a pig." "A pig," said the customer. "Turn it out and let us look at it. Turn it out!" "Oh, dear no," said the right hon. Gentleman, "it took too much trouble to get it in. You must take my assurance. It is a splendid pig." "Hang your assurance," said the customer; "I'm not going to buy a pig in a bag. Turn him out; let's have a look at him." Now, he (Mr. Storer), like the customer at the market, said to the right hon. Gentleman—"Turn out your pig. Let us have a look at it." That was exactly the situation the right hon. Gentleman was in. He wanted to sell a pig in a poke; but the idea did not quite fall in with the bent of the agricultural mind. There had been a little comedy enacted below the Gangway in the House. He did not know whether or not it was rehearsed, but certainly it was effective and very amusing. He gathered from it, however, one thing—that there was even in what was known as the Fourth Party a desire for compromise. Well, he did not think there was any insuperable objection to compromise on that side of the House, nor yet in the House of Lords. He hoped, therefore, that the great calamity which was said to have befallen the House, the disruption of the Fourth Party, was not irreparable, and that some means might be found possible to reunite the Party. He might suggest that that Party might perform a very useful office in this controversy, for undoubtedly the Fourth Party was an independent Party. It was independent of both sides of the House, and independent of each other; and, therefore, they might appropriately use their influence to bring both sides together on the important controversy respecting the representation of the people.

Mr. HENEAGE said, the last speaker had referred to the comedy which was enacted below the Gangway; but it seemed to him that the whole thing was a comedy, and that the debate now going on was little else than a farce. He was surprised that the hon. Members for Mid Lincolnshire had so misrepresented their constituents as to oppose the Bill, and say that the agricultural labourers did not wish the extension of the suffrage. They had carefully avoided going near their constituents during the Recess, preferring to bask in the moonshine of their Leaders in Scotland. He had attended a large number of meetings in Lincolnshire, and he believed there was throughout the country a very strong desire for the franchise. The farmers had told him there was nothing in the world the labourers were so anxious about as to get the franchise. They looked upon it as an act of justice too long delayed, and they could not understand how it was that the Bill of 1867 gave votes to people because they happened to live on one side of a hedge, when those on the other side had no votes. If the matter was to be dealt with properly they must deal with it as British statesmen. If the Bill could only pass, a great deal of time might be saved, and they might then proceed with the Bill that hon. Gentlemen opposite had so much at heart. He asked for the assistance of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He would ask them to press upon their Colleagues in "another place" that it was desirable that the measure should pass. He did not think the Amendment before the House was likely to assist in these matters, because it was likely to arouse old animosities and strifes between the two sides of the House. He thought it would have been far better for the country and the interests of both sides of the House if the Amendment had never been moved. It was nothing but a feint to give the House of Lords the opportunity of saying they had the support of the House of Commons, if they again rejected, suspended, or postponed the Franchise Bill. It was the duty of the Government to see that nothing should take place in that House to place the Bill in jeopardy, and when the Bill was secured he agreed that the sooner they got to redistribution the better. It was in the hands of hon. Gentlemen opposite how soon that question might be brought before the country. They on the Liberal side were quite as anxious, and even more anxious, than hon. Gentlemen opposite to get a Redistribution Bill passed during this Parliament, in order that the next Parliament might be free to deal with questions of local government and local taxation. He could see no insuperable difficulty to a reasonable compromise, and he trusted that most desirable end would be achieved. But such a course would not be promoted by such speeches as those of the hon. Members for Mid Lincolnshire or Nottinghamshire, or by going to a Division on the Amendment now before the House.

Mr. LABOUCHERE asked what was the real question before the House? It certainly was not the Franchise Bill. They were all agreed that these 2,000,000 of citizens ought to have a vote, and that it would be a great benefit to the country that they should. The real question now being argued was a question of procedure; but this question was settled in the last Session of Parliament, and the House was only threshing out the old subject. The contention last Session was that, certain jannissaries of hon. Members opposite in another part of the establishment having come to a certain conclusion, with the full concurrence of the Leader of the Opposition—namely, that the Franchise Bill was to be hung up or chucked out until the Redistribution Bill was before the House, the majority should submit. But what was the contention of the Government? They laid down absolutely that they would not show their Redistribution Bill until the Franchise Bill had passed through both Houses. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) cited an observation the Prime Minister made on the 10th of July last. He rather thought it was sometimes difficult for an ingenuous and simple-minded man like himself to understand the exact point of so astute a debater as the Prime Minister; but, fortunately, what the Prime Minister said then was made absolutely plain by the succeeding statement of the Home Secretary. Speaking, he presumed, in the presence of the Prime Minister, that right hon. and learned Gentleman declared, in a way which admitted of no doubt or ambiguity, that the Franchise Bill must be passed that Session in order that the Session of 1885 might be devoted to redistribution. There could be no ambiguity about that statement. What, then, were they called together to discuss? The Prime Minister had stated that he considered it necessary that the Franchise Bill should not only pass, but become law, before any redistribution scheme was laid before the House. That was the issue submitted to the country during the Recess, and the meetings called passed resolutions in that sense. But the real point of those meetings was not whether the right procedure had been adopted by the Prime Minister or the wrong, but whether the House of Lords should interfere with this measure and refuse to pass it. That was really the issue before those meetings—

Lords versus Commons—whether, when a Liberal Ministry was in power, with a majority in that House, they were not to decide upon the Business of the country rather than the Friends of the minority in the other House. He was always in favour of concession and compromise when compromise was possible; but in this case it was not, for any compromise or arrangement with Gentlemen opposite that allowed the introduction of a Redistribution Bill into the House before the Franchise Bill had passed the Upper House and had become law, would be contrary to what was fully and distinctly understood last Session, and what the Liberal Leaders throughout the country had clearly and distinctly pronounced. The proposed Bill of the Prime Minister would, no doubt, be a very moderate measure. Hon. Gentlemen opposite spoke of time-honoured institutions. The Radicals wanted to get at many of what they called their time-honoured institutions. They should go much further if it was not for the personal respect they entertained for the Prime Minister. Gentlemen opposite had accused the Prime Minister of uttering menaces; but he was their best friend. He shielded them from the Radicals, and when they lost him they would then find out what a defender they had had in him. Hon. Members asserted that they wanted particulars of this redistribution. He could not understand what further particulars they could possibly want. It was true that the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock was good enough to elaborate his views on redistribution; but they never knew whether that Gentleman spoke for himself or his Party or the Fourth Party. He had no confidence in the noble Lord as being the exponent of the views of the Conservative Party. He spoke in favour of electoral districts; but it would be well to hear that view endorsed by the Leader of the Opposition before adopting it as the view of the Conservative Party. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) proposed that certain Resolutions should be passed in that House. If they were to be of a vague and general character there might be no great objection to them; but when they came to details, he suspected some differences would be found to exist between them as to what a good Redistribution Bill ought to be. The noble Lord proposed to separate the urban and agricultural districts, grouping all the small boroughs together, and creating a great country party. If that was to form part of the Resolutions to be passed in order to induce Gentlemen opposite to give their consent to the Franchise Bill, he must enter his protest against it. If these Resolutions meant that the doctrine of hon. Members opposite was to be adopted, and that the minority were to rule the majority, he objected altogether. Of course, as the Prime Minister said, fair consideration would be given to the views of Gentlemen opposite; but they ought to consider their position. They had never realized that they were thoroughly beaten at the last General Election. The fact was the country would have no more to do with them. They had put the power in the hands of the Prime Minister and his Colleagues, and it was for them to decide, and not for the Opposition. In coming to a conclusion, he hoped that the Prime Minister would consider not only the Opposition, but his own followers, many of whom would very likely desire to go further than he. They were ready to accept the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, although it was not a thorough Radical Bill; but if it was to be still further whittled down he must protest against it. If there was to be an arrangement, they ought to know what the arrangement was; and if there was to be no arrangement, let them do what it was the business of a majority to do—crush the minority. That was his view. If the minority attempted obstructive tactics, then they must appeal to the nation on the question; but, at the same time, it would be a most wicked proceeding if Parliament was to be dissolved, although the Ministers in that House had a majority, simply because a minority in that House brought forward 400 or 500 hereditary Legislators who attempted to dictate when the Dissolution was to come. It was of the utmost importance that that House should retain its rights unimpaired, and should not give way to the permanent majority in the House of Lords.

MR. GIBSON said, he had listened to the discussion with some feeling of disappointment, as those who spoke on the part of the Government had not shown a just appreciation of the position, and certainly had not attempted to satisfy the legitimate expectations formed throughout the country. It had been said more than once that the substance of this Franchise Bill had been accepted on all sides, and that the only difference was that by some it was accepted absolutely, and by others conditionally. The reasonableness of that conditional acceptance had been admitted by the Government themselves in the strongest way, for the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War had pointed out, with the most absolute clearness, that if a Dissolution occurred before the passing of a Redistribution Bill the consequence would be an unfair and unjust representation of the people. The Prime Minister himself, in speech of marvellous shortness, considering the importance of the question—a speech of some 30 or 31 minutes—had expressed himself in a manner entitled to every recognition, and it had received it. As far as tone, manner, and gesture, and everything that went to make up graciousness of delivery, there was all that could be desired in a speech; but when one looked a quarter of an inch below the surface there was little to lay hold of. The Prime Minister laid down five main principles; but in them there was nothing upon which they could rest with any assurance of confidence. The most important of these principles was the second, which said that the Bill should have regard to numbers and population. In reference to that second main principle, five important questions presented themselves, which the Prime Minister stated with great fulness; but as to what his own opinion with regard to them was he left the House in absolute darkness. The right hon. Gentleman said that he was not devoid of prepossessions himself with respect to them; but in what manner he would give them effect he did not indicate at all. The Prime Minister, in the course of his speech, had as his keynote, and he repeated it frequently, that he regarded the Franchise Bill as of the highest importance, and that he could not sanction anything that would imperil it. Who had asked the right hon. Gentleman to do anything which would cause peril to the Bill? What possible peril could be caused to it by yielding to the fair, moderate, and legitimate requirements which had been made from those Benches and throughout the country. He could not see peril, delay, or retardation to the Franchise Bill if the Redistribution Bill that they asked for was introduced and presented to the judgment of Parliament. No one could say that hon. Members on the Opposition Benches had approached the discussion of this important question this Session in any but a thoroughly reasonable spirit. His right hon. Friend who opened the discussion that evening had spoken in a tone of moderation which necessarily attracted the attention of the right hon. Gentleman who replied to it. But the President of the Local Government Board was entirely put off his centre of gravity by his right hon. Friend's speech, because he came down prepared to deliver a reply to speeches made in the country during the last three months, and to some which had been delivered last night; but when the House desired to hear how he was to meet the reasonable request of his right hon. Friend to know what the Government would do about redistribution, they were treated with fairly expressed graciousness to platitudes which left them exactly in the same state of ignorance as before the right hon. Gentleman stood up. He defied anyone who had listened to the speech of the Prime Minister, and more especially to the speech of the President of the Local Government Board, to have the slightest definite notion as to a single point in any Redistribution Bill that might be proposed. Surely that was not a fair way at such an important time to deal with such a question. He had said in the country, and he would say now in that House, that this was too great a question to be treated as a game of hide and seek. The President of the Local Government Board said that the Government were willing to do anything in reason if it would not bring the Franchise Bill into jeopardy. "Peril" was the word used by the Prime Minister. "Jeopardy" by the President of the Local Government Board. But who asked the right hon. Gentleman to bring the Bill into jeopardy? What jeopardy would it put the Bill into if, by plain speech and frank utterance on the part of the Government, they were to say when the Redistribution Bill was to be introduced? That was a plain question which the Government must have considered; and they were entitled to a plain answer to it. It had been pointed out by that extremely candid friend of the Government (Mr. Labouchere), who in the course of his speech had been endeavouring to remind them of all inconvenient things, that the Home Secretary had stated that the Franchise Bill alone was to be dealt with in the Autumn Session. He did not suppose that the Government felt themselves absolutely bound by that statement now. If he was correct, when some Minister was to speak again let him tell the House something about the time and the circumstances in which the Redistribution Bill would be introduced. Would it be introduced when the Franchise Bill left the House? If not, why not? Would it be introduced during the Autumn Session? If not, why not? What was the scheme that the Government were to introduce? The President of the Local Government Board had referred to The Standard scheme of redistribution as a scheme in which the Government were more or less interested. [Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: A scheme.] That interruption showed the importance of ascertaining what the scheme of the Government was. The noble Lord the Secretary of State for War used in Derbyshire important and significant words on the subject. The noble Lord admitted that the plan which had appeared in The Standard was prepared for a Committee of the Cabinet for this important purpose—to put into a definite form the principles laid down last Session by the Prime Minister; but he added that, although that was the intention with which the scheme had been prepared, he was not in a position to say that either in principle or detail it had met with the approval either of the Cabinet or the Committee of the Cabinet. That was a reason why the House had some claim to know whether this Redistribution Bill was ready at the present moment. If it was ready, was it not unreasonable to keep it back from the Representatives of the people? If it was not ready, he had to remind the Government that they deliberately pledged themselves last year on Lord Wemyss's Motion that they would be ready in this November to produce a Redistribution Bill. If they were not ready, what excuse had they to allege? They had no excuse for not having utilized the last four years for the preparation of a Redistribution Bill. He saw no reason why the Government should not within the next few days produce a Bill dealing with the whole question of Redistribution. If the Government adjourned the present Session, instead of proroguing, there was nothing to prevent a prompt, frank, and fair settlement of this important question. The President of the Local Government Board said the other night that hon. Members need not be afraid about redistribution, because no Bill could be passed upon that subject that was not satisfactory to both sides. He was not quite clear about that if the Franchise Bill was first law. If the Franchise Bill was first law it would, in the case of the Redistribution Bill, be very much like Hobson's choice—take it or leave it. He was not satisfied with what the President of the Local Government Board called a guarantee. It was not even a suggestion of a guarantee; and certainly it was nothing which the Opposition could be fairly asked to accept. It was, he contended, but fair and reasonable to require that one of the two important Bills which together made up the question of Reform should not come into operative legal effect before the other. If there was an adjournment before Christmas there was nothing to prevent the Redistribution Bill being adequately discussed by both Houses, and the requirements of the Opposition being fairly and legitimately satisfied. There was nothing exceptional, startling, or unconstitutional in the demand which they made; and in pressing it upon Parliament and upon the nation they were endeavouring to prevent, in the words of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War, an unfair representation of the people.

MR. WILLIS maintained that the Conservative Party were entirely in error in supposing that they were following the precedent of 1866. The present Bill was passed nemine contradicente, and why? The hon. Baronet the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), on being asked why he did not vote against the third reading of the Bill, replied—"Well, there were questions of political action which had to be judged by the Leaders of the Party, and he believed that it was generally felt that another crushing defeat would undoubtedly have overtaken the Party just before the Bill went up to the other House, and that would hardly have strengthened the hands of the noble Lords in that place." He (Mr. Willis) also charged the Leaders of the Opposition in both Houses with having, during the earlier progress of the Bill, arranged that it should be rejected before it had reached the House of Lords, so that no words uttered by the Prime Minister on the occasion of the third reading would have affected the Upper House. He contended that there was a demand in the country for the franchise apart from redistribution, and advised hon. Members opposite to hasten to a conclusion in this matter by placing the right of 2,000,000 of people to vote beyond all dispute and accident. He was in favour of this Bill wholly apart from the question of redistribution. The unenfranchised were entitled to have votes, and they were not prepared to wait until the value of their votes had been ascertained. He was in favour of electoral districts with one Member for each; but rather than imperil this Bill he would leave distribution as it was at the present time. The Conservatives might very well do so if they had any confidence in their principles. It was said that people did not want votes unless they could be heard in this House; but he believed that this view did not enter into their minds at all. Personally he did not value the vote any less because for 20 years he had voted in three constituencies, and had never voted for a successful candidate. He was satisfied because in other constituencies candidates had been returned who did represent his views. But if there was anything in the argument about voices being heard it surely applied to a majority of 130 in this House having their votes neutralized by a majority of 560 "elsewhere." This Bill should be treated by the Opposition upon its own merits, apart from any pledge to introduce any other measure. If it were in itself an injurious Bill, let it be rejected on the second reading. The principal charge he made against the Tory Party was that, instead of confining themselves to independent action in the House of Commons as a great Party, they had been in league with persons "elsewhere," who, being clothed with authority which should be exercised for the benefit of the whole nation and not for a Party, had agreed to reject this measure. They had adopted a course which should be discountenanced by the House, and had, through the House of Lords, conceded points which they had as a Party strongly resisted in the House of Commons. There was no fear now of the democracy being led by demagogues, and redistribution might with perfect safety be left to settle itself after the 2,000,000 had been enfranchised.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that the debate was remarkable for the speech in which the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), with singular ability, demolished the attack upon his own Party of a quondam political associate, and in which he vindicated in the ablest manner the attitude of the Conservative Party. But the noble Lord was unfortunate in selecting Woodstock for an illustration, because if it continued to return a Member who addressed them with the noble Lord's ability, that would go a long way to condone the anomaly of its having one Member while a much larger constituency had only two. The debate was also remarkable for the speech of the President of the Local Government Board, who said the Government would be prepared if they could be satisfied they would not prejudice the passing of the Franchise Bill to produce the Redistribution Bill without more delay. But the right hon. Gentleman attached an impossible condition. How could it be told whether the production of the Redistribution Bill would or would not prejudice the Franchise Bill until it was known what the Redistribution Bill would be? If there was one thing which, more than another, had, did, and would prejudice the passing of the Franchise Bill, it was the concealment by the Government of their real intentions. At present, notwithstanding the Prime Minister's speech last night, they knew nothing more than they did at a previous period. The right hon. Gentleman put before them a whole string of interrogatories, emphasizing the fact that a redistribution scheme should do this, that, and the other thing; but he had not told them anything with regard to the intentions of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman laid down four cardinal generalities, which had given satisfaction to the right hon. Member for South-West Lancashire

(Sir R. Assheton Cross) and the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill); but, while agreeing with them, he wanted to know what would be justice and what injustice in the minds of the Government as between different classes of the community and their pursuits. On those points they were left completely in the dark so far as the views of the Government were concerned. He was not prepared on that point to take on trust the promises of the right hon. Gentleman. He had always observed that the right hon. Gentleman acted up to the maxim, "charity begins at home," and justice was never so great and admirable a thing as when it was conformable to the interests of his Party at the time. The right hon. Gentleman had often perpetrated acts of intolerable injustice in the name of justice, which would rise up in evidence against him long after they had all passed away from the arena in which they were enacted. The right hon. Gentleman's ideas of justice had always appeared to him to favour those arrangements which coincided most closely with the political interests of his Party. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock and the right hon. Member for South-West Lancashire seemed to assume that it was distinctly conceded by the Prime Minister that urban and agricultural districts were to be kept separate; but when the noble Lord made that statement, there were ominous cries of "No, no!" from Gentlemen opposite. Since then there had been a speech from the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) which distinctly repudiated any arrangement of that kind on behalf of a large section of supporters of the Government. He, therefore, declined to take the Prime Minister's assurances on trust until he had seen them on paper. With reference to the general position, he would observe that the Conservative Party in the House of Lords, in spite of the dulcet tones of the Prime Minister on the previous day, had been threatened with pains and penalties if they persisted in the attitude they had taken up on this question. The attitude of the Conservative Party and the House of Lords had always been that the Franchise Bill must be accompanied by redistribution, and they insisted on having an absolute guarantee that the one Bill should not become law without the other. He was prepared to maintain that in the counties, whose interests were mainly concerned, the Conservative Party occupied an impregnable position, and they had no alternative except to adhere to that attitude until the Government had made some attempt to account for the extraordinary evolution which they had themselves effected with respect to the Franchise Bill being accompanied by redistribution. What was the object of the Bill? They had been told, by no one more emphatically than by the President of the Board of Trade that the Bill was essentially meant to enfranchise the agricultural labourers in the counties. That statement was rapturously cheered by hon. Gentlemen opposite, but they did not seem ready to cheer it now. He rejoiced that the agricultural labourer should have the vote, because the welfare of agriculture was a matter of common interest, and although it was the largest and most important industry in the country, it had never exercised an influence commensurate with its position. If the Bill was a reality and not a sham, power would be added to that industry at a time when it was urgently needed. It was, therefore, necessary to prevent the Government giving with one hand and taking away with the other. It was said the Government had given the strongest guarantee that could be given. But what was its precise value? The danger was two-fold. Nothing was known of the intentions of the Government. One scheme had been revealed in the newspapers which had been admitted by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War to possess at least a semi-official character, even if it did not represent the mature views of the Government. But they might pass a Franchise Bill and then have a Dissolution. Whatever the Government might say, what the extreme Party wanted was an Election without redistribution. He had no doubt that the rural interests would be absolutely swamped by the enormous number of urban voters. His noble Friend had given an illustration of the value of the guarantee of the Government. If the Franchise Bill had been passed last Session, and the Government had been beaten in Egypt, what would have happened to the Redistribution Bill? Suppose, what he prayed God might not be the case, the news should come that Khartoum had fallen and Gordon had been sacrificed. If that happened—and no one could deny that it was possible—even the present majority, servile as it had been termed, would melt away like snow. It would be impossible to defend the Government against the wrath of the country. He agreed with his hon. Colleague (Mr. E. Stanhope), that the moment the Franchise Bill was passed excuses would be forthcoming, and knowing as he did the remarkable powers of obstruction of the supporters of the Government, and their desire for a Dissolution, the Government would find means to defeat it. Up to the present time the two questions had never been separated. He would quote the opinion of the Prime Minister himself on the subject, expressed on April 12, 1866, to show what the right hon. Gentleman's opinion on that question was at that time. On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman was responsible for the introduction of a Bill of this nature. After stating that as soon as the Bill before the House had gone into Committee he would introduce a redistribution scheme, he went on to remark—

"That is what we have said; and we have also said what I really, until the day before yesterday, had always believed to be unnecessary to state in express words—that, in speaking of this great subject of the representation of the people, as a matter vital to the credit and therefore to the existence of the Government, we included the subject of redistribution of seats along with the subject of the franchise. I had not thought it necessary to say this, because it seemed to me so obvious that nothing could be more contemptible and base than the conduct of a Government which could give forth with a view of enlisting the generous confidence of its supporters that it would deal with the subject of reform, and would stand or fall by its propositions, and which all the while could silently exclude from the scope of their declaration all portions of that question except only the reduction of the franchise, though among such questions we find one only second in importance to that of the franchise itself."—(3 Hansard, [181] 1144.)

That was precisely what they now complained of. They complained that the Government were excluding from this debate all view of their intentions with regard to the question of redistribution. The Government maintained that it would be impossible to pass the two measures in a single Session. Very shortly after this House of Commons was elected the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) boasted that it was the best and the wisest House of Commons he had ever known. Yet they were now told that this House of Commons was unable to do that which any other House of Commons could easily have done. They had been asking throughout all these debates for a Dissolution, because they believed that neither on this subject nor on any other did the Party opposite really represent the opinion of the country. Did not the right hon. Gentleman perceive what a handle he gave to his opponents if it were really true that this House of Commons was so incapacitated as to be unable to perform its duties? If that were the case, was it not the right hon. Gentleman's duty to send the House about its business with the least possible delay? The Government had advanced no valid reason for adopting this new and unusual method of procedure on the question of Reform. It was nonsense to say that they could not pass a Redistribution Bill without the lever of the Franchise Bill. To affirm that was a satire and a libel on the House of Commons. What might be their real reasons it was not for him to say. He might suspect—and a great many people did suspect—that this course had been adopted, not for the purpose of furthering this Bill, not with a view of rapidly dealing with the question of Reform, but rather with the object of raising a great cloud of controversy which might conceal from the nation the innumerable blunders committed by the Government on all other objects under the sun. Whatever unfortunate results might occur from this controversy being prolonged, he felt certain, after all that had passed that night, it would be the unanimous opinion out-of-doors that the Government, and the Government alone, would be responsible if they delayed any longer the production of their Redistribution Bill.

MR. GOSCHEN: Sir, the hon. Member who has just sat down says that he expects this will be a memorable debate, and the reason he gave for considering it a memorable debate was that the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had separated himself from his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), and had supported the Party in whose side he had hitherto been a thorn.

MR. CHAPLIN: I did not say anything of the kind. I said it had been remarkable for a speech of singular ability, in which he had done that.

MR. GOSCHEN: I think the distinction was hardly worth the interruption. I am doubtful whether this will be a memorable debate. I agree to a certain extent with the view of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) that in some respects this appears to be a sham debate. If it is memorable for anything I think it will be memorable for the different tone taken by various Members sitting opposite to us—a tone so divergent that it is absolutely impossible to understand what it is that the Party opposite are really requiring. Now, it appears to me that there is a great—I will not say a unanimous, but a very serious—wish among the great majority of the House that a settlement should be arrived at upon this question, and that the settlement should result in both Bills—namely, the Bill for the extension of the suffrage and the Bill for redistribution—being passed by the same Parliament and by the same Government; and I understand that that is a view to which the Party opposite assent. I would wish the House to understand, from the very few observations I propose to make, that I entirely share that view. There has been a good deal said to-night with regard to conversions, and there has been a kind of competition among hon. Members opposite with regard to the dates of their respective conversions. Into that competition I feel I am not qualified to enter, because in regard to my own conversion there has never been any mistake. I have accepted the decision of the House, and I think that answer would be frankest way of treating this question even by the Party opposite—namely, that the country and the House have decided that the suffrage is to be extended. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) has said there has been a great transformation during the last nine months. I think there has been a very great transformation, and that that transformation has been reflected in the speeches of many hon. Members who have addressed the House. But I wish to call attention to the extreme difference between the tone, for instance, of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West

Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), who opened the debate to-night, and the speech we heard later from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). Then, again, there is a difference in tone between the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire and the two fighting speeches which were made yesterday by the hon. Member who opened this debate with great ability (Mr. E. Stanhope) and by the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton). One might wonder, from what one hears, whether there is that desire among the Party opposite to come to an arrangement of this matter which has been foreshadowed by some of the responsible Leaders of the Party; but I note with satisfaction that the nearer to the centre of power have been the speakers the more conciliatory has been their tone. I thought that my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was perhaps a little hard upon the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex and the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), who opened the debate, in criticizing the fighting character of their speeches, for I am not sure whether they were not put forward as the Great Napoleon used sometimes to put forward his Generals, with an order that they were to be cut to pieces while the Commander-in-Chief could make a retreat behind their backs. I am rejoiced to think there is apparently some hope that a solution may be arrived at, and that the Party opposite will see in the declarations made by the Prime Minister, and in the fact of the transformation which has been so vividly described by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) since we were here in August last, that there is far more certainty of a Redistribution Bill being passed by this Parliament than they anticipated before the Recess. Hon. Members opposite know that I have shared to the full the view that redistribution was essential—that it was essential that redistribution should accompany the extension of the franchise, and that it should be passed by the same Parliament; and it is, no doubt, our duty to see what are the guarantees and what are the probabilities of a Redistribution Bill being passed. I have seen myself the necessity of dissenting from the views of many of my hon. Friends around me, who thought, as an hon. Member expressed himself quite lately in this debate, that after all the subject of redistribution could be referred to another Parliament without making any considerable change in the character of the Redistribution Bill to be afterwards passed. I assent to the view that it is essential that we should have redistribution from the present House of Commons; but I see in the present position, as I believe the Leaders of the Party opposite see, that there is infinitely more certainty of a Redistribution Bill being passed than they could have foreseen before. Under those circumstances, I cannot see what is really the object—the fighting object of the Motion—as a Motion—which is now before the House. Would it not be the fact that in proportion as that Motion were to receive strong support, so the hopes of a compromise would be diminished or removed? ["No!"] That depends on the nature of the compromise hon. Members expect. They cannot expect that the Government will depart from the position which they have taken up, and which is that the one Bill shall not be made dependent on the other. I wish briefly to point out to the House how I consider the case to stand in that respect. I understand the Government to be determined to press forward redistribution; I understand them to be convinced that their plan is such that it will command not only the assent of Members on this side of the House, but that it will be so drawn as to form at least proper material to be dealt with in the manner in which the Prime Minister suggested that it should be dealt with—namely, by the House at large. [An hon. MEMBER: Why not produce it?] An hon. Member says "Why not produce it?" Because the Government are reminded even in this debate by hon. Members opposite that if it is produced the Franchise Bill will be made dependent upon that measure. The Government have stated that they will give every information with regard to this Bill, provided they do not place the Franchise Bill in jeopardy. Now, hon. Members opposite ask what guarantees will the Government give? And I must say I think the reply given from this side of the House is perfectly justified—namely, what guarantees will Members on the other side of the House give that if the Redistribution Bill is produced the Franchise Bill will be passed? It appears to me that both sides have approached very nearly indeed to a settlement, and that the one point upon which difference still exists relates to the precise moment at which the Redistribution Bill should be passed. Now, since last Session we have this additional security—we see now that if the Franchise Bill is immediately removed from this arena, and sent to “another place,” we shall have a clear space of time before us for dealing with redistribution. We shall have more time before us than we could have expected if we had not had this Autumn Session; and I consider that if the Government will introduce the Redistribution Bill this Autumn Session, and undertake that this Session shall be continued so that the work done in it may be carried forward into the next Session, that then infinitely more security will have been given than we should otherwise have had. The guarantees—and I wish for guarantees as much as hon. Members opposite—the guarantees which hon. Members want refer to two separate points. One is the intention of the Government, and the other is the power of the Government. As regards the intention of the Government, I trust that all in this House are now convinced that it is not only their intention, but that it is their earnest hope, to carry forward this great question to a settlement as a whole. I do not admit that there can now be any question of the bona fides of the Government in regard to that intention; and I hope that I may also add that it is not only the intention, but the earnest hope, of the great bulk of the Liberal Party that this result should be achieved. If also it is the hope and the intention, as it is the interest, of the great Party opposite that a Bill drawn on those lines which my right hon. Friend has sketched should be passed by this Parliament, for my part I think that the risks have been so diminished that we can accept the position, and go forward with a determination to carry a Redistribution Bill;—[“Oh, oh!”]—and it appears to me that, notwithstanding sundry discordant notes from the Party opposite, that is their hope, and almost their expectation. So I believe that, whatever may be the result of the vote to-night, it will be possible—that it will be the intention of the Party opposite to do that which the country desires that we should all do—namely, unite in passing a Redistribution Bill. I will venture to give one more reason why I myself am most anxious that the present Government should deal with this Redistribution Bill, and that it should be dealt with in the present Parliament. I trust I may be permitted to say that I consider the statement of my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government in explaining his views on Redistribution as most statesmanlike, as most English, and in the best sense Conservative as well as Liberal. If one contrasts the indications which have been given by my right hon. Friend of his intentions with regard to Redistribution with the hints and the suggestions which have been made by the Party opposite, I believe that more confidence will be felt in the Redistribution Bill as it will be proposed by my right hon. Friend than would be felt if it were in the hands of the Party opposite, not from one point of view only, but from every point of view—even the very Conservative point of view which the Party opposite might wish to further. That is a point which cannot have escaped attention; and I trust I may say one word upon the subject, because it appears to me to be of extreme importance. My right hon. Friend sketched what he considered ought to be the attributes of a Redistribution Bill. He said that it should be large, that it should be simple, and that it should be equitable. He then asked a number of most important and pertinent questions, which show how deeply my right hon. Friend was considering to what extent you might introduce greater popular liberties and fit them into the present system of our Constitution. Hon. Members opposite in the comments which they have made have called attention to that part of his speech in which he spoke of the simplicity and largeness of the Bill; but they, almost without exception, have passed over the questions which he asked. My right hon. Friend asked the following questions:—“Was anything to be allowed to prescription?” Not a word has been said by hon. Members opposite with regard to the suggestion of my right hon. Friend on this point—“Shall anything be allowed to prescription?"—yet my right hon. Friend asked the question in a tone by which anyone could understand that his own answer would be "Yes." "Shall we," he asked again, "have regard to communities as distinct from individuals?" Let us remember that the representation of communities is the old English system—and he asked the question in a tone that indicated that he evidently meant that the answer in his own mind would be "Yes." But while hon. Members opposite have always spoken of the separation of urban and rural interests, not one word has fallen from them with regard to the important point of whether we shall have regard to communities as distinct from individuals. Again my right hon. Friend asked—"Shall we treat large towns, giving full and absolute effect to the representation of numbers?" He complimented my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) on the way in which he put the case in favour of such an arrangement; but the form of that compliment showed that the right hon. Gentleman in his own mind dissented from that view, as he had shadowed forth in a previous speech that he did not consider it necessary to give full and absolute effect to the representation of numbers. Lastly, he asked—"Shall there be distinctions between urban and rural interests?" But of all those questions the Conservative Party have only fastened upon one—that there must be a distinction between urban and rural interests. I must apologize to the House for introducing this question, which I must admit is not entirely ad rem. But we see that arrangements are in the air; we see there is a hope that the two sides may agree with regard to the principles of the Redistribution Bill; and so perhaps I may be pardoned if I have called attention to these most important points in the speech of my right hon. Friend, and which, so far as I am concerned, increase the desire which I feel that we should have time and opportunity as soon as possible to deal with the redistribution scheme. The Party opposite are thinking mainly of the separation of urban and rural districts. [Expressions of dissent.] Am I to understand that that murmur is one of dissent? [An hon. MEMBER: And a good many other things.] An hon. Member says—"And a good many other things." But the many other things have not been brought before us. Let me read, as hon. Gentlemen opposite hold that view, what was said by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) at Carlisle on the 8th of October—

"I believe myself that that scheme of redistribution will be most likely to secure the assent of Parliament and the approval of the country which approximates most nearly to the representation based solely upon numbers, and which, while preserving a distinction between the agricultural and manufacturing districts, creates as a general rule single-Member constituencies."

Does my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition cheer these sentiments? Let the country mark that passage. Are those the lines upon which the Conservative Party are prepared to assent to a Bill for redistribution which is going to be introduced? Is this the price which they ask for going forward with the extension of the suffrage? Some hon. Members will say to me that it is the Member for Woodstock who is saying this, and he is not responsible. I decline to admit that, because we are told repeatedly, and we know, that there is no Member of the Party opposite to whom the organizers of Conservative Associations look with more confidence than to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock. ["No, no!"] It is disputed, but I find that the cries of "No, no!" are more frequent from below the Gangway than from the great Party opposite. ["No, no!"] It is admitted that the noble Lord, as a fighting Conservative, representing the modern Tory Democracy, is the greatest favourite at Provincial meetings of every kind. I do not wish to push that argument further than to say this—that this is a most significant declaration, and that it well deserves the attention of the Conservative Party. What I wish to call attention to is that the speeches of the noble Lord point to the representation of numbers and the separation of the urban and rural districts. I can conceive no greater danger to the real Conservative interests of the country than that the Conservatives should think that they can intrench themselves simply in the agricultural parts of the country, while the Liberals are to have a monopoly of the great towns. It is the Provincial town life of the country which has to be considered as well as that of the large towns and the purely agricultural districts. We see how constantly the simple principle of numbers is put forward, either on behalf of those whom I may call the agricultural democracy, or on the part of the population of the great towns. I think that sometimes a voice should be raised for those other varied interests of the country, and I venture to hope that in any agreement which may be come to between the two great Parties of the State these considerations will receive a foremost place. It is because I see a determination on the part of the Prime Minister to recognize that we cannot pull down the whole of our electoral machinery simply in order to secure the separation of agricultural from urban interests, but that we must proceed on the old lines, while giving that increase of power to the popular element which the times demand, that I shall do my best to support my right hon. Friend in pressing forward the Redistribution Bill. I venture to hope, in the interests of both sides of the House, and in order that we may redeem our character as a practical Assembly, that, being so near a union as we are, means may be found to call forth concessions, if necessary, on each side, with the object of bringing about that arrangement which almost everyone desires.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down raised a question as to whether it was correct or not to say that the debate of this evening would be a memorable one. It seems to me that, whatever may be said as to the debate, there is no doubt whatever that the decision of this evening is likely to be a very memorable decision. I am bound to say that I do not think the speech of the right hon. Gentleman is likely to contribute as much as perhaps he hoped and wished to do towards an amicable and satisfactory solution. There have been two speeches from the opposite Benches this evening to which I have listened with somewhat mingled feelings. I mean the speech which has just been delivered and the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). It was impossible not to see that—at all events as regards the hon. Member for Northampton—it was no object on his part to facilitate a settlement of this question. We were not surprised to find that in his observations he took pains to bring forward every expression that had fallen from the Prime Minister or from any other Member of the Government which might throw an impediment in the way of making an arrangement by which the two measures of the Franchise Bill and the Redistribution Bill should be taken in the present Session. And in the speech to which we have just listened from the right hon. Gentleman, although he professes to desire that rapid progress should be made with the Redistribution Bill, still I think there were not a few expressions that fell from him which tended rather to make that more difficult than less difficult. Now, Sir, I do not think that any particular advantage is to be derived for this discussion from the repeated taunts that are thrown out by hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side against Members of the Conservative Party with regard to what is called the date of their conversion. I admit that for a smart Party debate such taunts may do very well; but when we come to consider how we are to solve a very important and a very practical question, I think that those taunts are sometimes rather misleading. However, as far as I myself am concerned—and I believe I may say that I share the feelings and the history of a very large number of those who sit on this side of the House—I am prepared to state very shortly and very simply what the course of my own mind has been on this subject. I have always felt that it was a very undesirable and a very critical move to make an alteration—a large alteration—in the electoral system of the country. I have always considered that whatever defects of a minor character might be pointed out in it, it was better that we should put up with some defects than that we should be frequently reopening discussions on the basis of our Constitution; and it has certainly seemed to me that however willing we might be to enfranchise a large number of our fellow-citizens, still such a measure as that ought not to be taken rashly or carelessly, or without very good cause and consideration. Therefore, after the settlement arrived at in the years 1867 and 1868, it did not appear to me to be a very desirable thing that we should for some time to come, at all events, stir up the question of our representation; and in all discussions that have taken place since the year 1874—or, indeed, since an earlier period than that, when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) first brought this matter before the House—in all the discussions I have pursued much the same line of argument, and I think most of those who have spoken on this side have pursued much the same line—namely, that however desirable in itself the admission of an additional number of voters to the Electorate might be, still it was a step that ought not to be taken hastily or rashly, but that it must be taken in connection with a revision of our whole electoral system, and that it was not altogether desirable that when this measure should be brought forward, we should undertake that great and disturbing controversy piecemeal. I have felt that for a considerable time, and I am not sure that I should have parted with it if it had still been in my power to retain that position for some time to come. But when this measure had been brought forward by Her Majesty's Government, and when they had taken upon themselves the responsibility of saying that the time had come when a great change must be made, and a larger addition by far than was ever yet known should be made to the electoral body—when that measure had been brought forward on the authority of the responsible Government, and had been pressed upon the House, it certainly seemed to me that as it was a proposition which in itself I could not deny to be a reasonable and fair one, when the proper time came I should not be indisposed to accept that proposal, on the condition that it should be carried out with all the care and gravity, all the consideration, and in conjunction with all the other measures of a proper description which ought to be connected with it. I myself felt that which was felt by my late lamented Friend Mr. Disraeli, when the question was first stirred in this House, after the Reform Act of 1867. Mr. Disraeli said that he and the Conservative Party, for whom he spoke, were in no way apprehensive of the admission of a large body of agriculturists to the country franchise. But, on the other hand, he reminded the House that if such an addition were to be made, as would largely disturb the balance of our electoral system, it would be obviously necessary to accompany it with a large alteration in our representative system, and that was a measure for which he did not consider that the country, at the time, was prepared or for which there was any demand. But we are now in a different position; we are now in the position that having had this matter brought before us, and having discussed it as we have done, we frankly, and without reserve, accept the proposition which was made by Her Majesty's Ministers in the Franchise Bill for the introduction of this large addition to the body of electors; but we accept it subject to the same condition as that which Mr. Disraeli laid down—namely, that the whole of our representative system should be considered together, when you are making so large a change as this, and that in whatsoever has to be done you should take into consideration the necessary accompanying measures. Now, of course, among these measures and far above any other is that for the redistribution of seats. And I hope I may be allowed, without giving any offence, to refer for a moment to that often-quoted speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright). I quote it not for the purpose of using it in any way as a taunt against him, or to say that there is in it anything inconsistent with the view which the right hon. Gentleman takes and has expressed, or with the conduct that he has pursued, in regard to Redistribution Bills; but I desire to quote it simply for this purpose—that I wish to cite the high authority of the right hon. Gentleman—an admittedly high authority on questions of the representation of the people—as to the very great importance of redistribution. I admit that he has repeatedly said that the two measures—enfranchisement and redistribution—may be dealt with, and ought to be dealt with in separate Bills. That, however, is not the point to which I wish now to draw attention; but I wish to show the very great and high importance which the right hon. Gentleman attached to redistribution, and which I understand he still attaches to it, and I call attention to it for the purpose of meeting objections, such as those which fell even from the Prime Minister, who appeared to think that there is no question at all to be compared in importance with the extension of the franchise, and that as to the work of the redistribution of seats it is almost a work of supererogation. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No.] I do not say that the right hon. Gentleman used that expression; but he has been constantly anxious to impress on the House and the country that the redistribution of seats is certainly a matter more or less desirable, but that the question of enfranchisement is the paramount object—that, in fact, it is so completely paramount that everything else must be sacrificed to it—and that, as regards the Redistribution Bill, we must be ready to accept a pledge from the Government that when Parliament has dealt with it, and disposed of the whole question of the franchise, they will deal in some way or other with the other question of the redistribution of seats. I say that they are relegating the question of Redistribution to a comparatively backward position which is not at all in accordance with its real importance. Now, Sir, I think I may say, without any fear of contradiction, that in a matter of such enormous importance as this of the resettlement of the electoral system, it is right that we should look round us and consider every point in the system. I am bound to say that I did not see the justice of the criticism which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) passed on the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Biddell) last night, when he criticized the action of the hon. Member, and said—and there was some inconsistency in the observation—that there was no measure which required more consideration than one for the redistribution of seats, and at the same time expressed a fear that a measure for the redistribution of seats might be too hastily thrust down the throats of the Liberal Party by the influence of the Prime Minister. My hon. Friend was putting two things together which he had a perfectly legitimate and logical right to put together, and which told strongly in favour of his argument. My hon. Friend said that this was a matter upon which we feared that if it did not receive that consideration, it might be thrust down the throats of the House by the influence of the Prime Minister and Her Majesty's Government. I say that that is a danger to which we are very seriously alive, and which it is absolutely necessary that we should guard against. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, in his comments this evening, drew a distinction between the position assumed by my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) and that assumed by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), who moved this Amendment, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton). He was, apparently, desirous of establishing some kind of distinction between the positions of these hon. Members. I entirely deny that there is any ground for such distinction as he attempted to draw. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire brought forward with very great clearness, in a very concise form, and, as I thought, in a very temperate manner, the various objections which we raise in regard to this measure. He brought forward the contention that it would be unsatisfactory to deal with this question of the franchise unless we get security that the redistribution of seats would be brought forward in such a manner that we could deal with the question as a whole; and my right hon. Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) took very much the same line. He spoke late in the evening, and when several questions had been raised which rather called for an answer; but there was no distinction whatever in principle or spirit between the speeches of my two hon. Friends last night and that of my right hon. Friend to-night. The position we have always taken up is the position we still maintain, and is one from which we cannot recede. We entirely agree that the Franchise Bill ought to be passed. We hold the same grounds which led us to believe that it now ought to pass, and which also led us to believe that it was desirable the settlement should be an early and a speedy settlement, provided only that it be a satisfactory settlement. We are anxious—we are probably more anxious than many hon. Members who sit on that side of the House—for such a settlement. We are conscious that there are Gentlemen, and especially among those who sit on that side of the House, who are not so anxious that this question should be fairly decided. We are anxious because we know that if this question is not decided, there is no saying what other questions may be opened, or of the course that may be taken by hon. Gentlemen and pressed upon Her Majesty's Government. But we feel, also, that if we allow a pretended settlement of this question, when it is not settled, if we allow ourselves to be carried away by vague generalities into expressions of satisfaction when we are not satisfied, we shall have no security for the settlement of the question, and we know perfectly well that we shall leave ourselves in a very dangerous position. The hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers) gave us a few specimens last night of the way in which he would like to deal with this question. He told us that he would not be at all satisfied with the measure of enfranchisement proposed by Her Majesty's Government, and that he desires to do away with a great many franchises and a great many methods of voting which we now possess and which we do not intend to interfere with. He says he is for putting down the freemen, for putting down University representation, and for putting down, as I understood, all property qualifications—at all events, putting down plural voting, which seemed to be the point at which he was aiming—indeed, for putting down everything in the shape of a property qualification. These are matters which we are not desirous of leaving open, and we think that now is the time and now is the opportunity when we can come to the consideration of these questions in a fair, deliberate, and unexcited manner, and so that the settlement should be of a lasting character. Nothing of that kind is, of course, eternal; but it is of the greatest importance to the country that whatever settlement we arrive at now should be one of an enduring character, and one that would not require to be opened up again every two or three years after the settlement has been made. With a view to a settlement of such a character, I think it is of the utmost importance that we should look at every part of the settlement we now make, in order to see that it is one which is consistent with itself. On that ground, I am particularly anxious that we should have the plan of redistribution before us, and should be able to discuss and consider that plan, as far as possible, in connection with the Franchise Bill. Now, we have heard something about compromise. I have always said in the country, and I am equally ready to say now, that we regard this question of Redistribution as one of such a complicated character that it is pre-eminently a question which must be discussed in a free spirit, and one on which we must be prepared to make a certain number of concessions on the one side and the other. If you maintain the principles shadowed forth by the Prime Minister, I do not see any insuperable difficulty—any great difficulty—in arriving at the settlement of a Redistribution Bill. But it will not do for us to say that we do not want to have something before us of a real and definite character. Anybody who has had experience in diplomatic transactions, or anything of that kind, is perfectly well aware that nothing is more dangerous than half-understandings; and if we are to deal with a question of this kind, we should not be content with a half-understanding upon the matter, but we must endeavour, as far as possible, to have a real understanding. I think that is a point on which we ought to insist with reference to the interests of the country, and I think it is particularly desirable now that we should insist upon it, because of the very remarkable position in which this question stands before the country. My noble Friend the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), in the remarkably able speech which he made, spoke of the great transformation which has taken place on this question during the last few months. But, without going into questions of transformation, I would point out how very important is the position in which this question stands with reference to the mode in which it has been discussed and the mode in which it has been brought before the notice of the great body of the country during the past few months. Nothing, I think, could be more creditable, whichever side we are speaking of—of course, laying aside a few exceptional circumstances—nothing could be more creditable to the great mass of the people of this country than the manner in which they have attended to the arguments that have been addressed to them upon this question—addressed to them by speakers on both sides—and the great intelligence and great acuteness which they have brought to bear upon them. But if I make that admission, as I frankly do, with regard to those who have met together to support the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and to press for the speedy extension of the franchise, much more even do I make the claim on behalf of those who have attended to support the meetings of the Opposition on this subject—and I say much more for this reason—that the Government had to say—"Will you have this extension of the franchise we promise you, and will you pass Resolutions in favour of proceeding in the way we think that we can best give it you?" That is a very easy and a very simple question for them to answer. But what we have had to say has been of a much more difficult character. ["Hear, hear!" and Ministerial cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite cheer; but they will in a moment see that we had to meet men who desired the extension of the franchise just as much as the supporters of the Government; and yet we had to point out to them that though desirous of seeing the franchise extended, and though ready to do what we could in that direction, we must also call attention to the fact that that was only part of the question—a part of the question which, though important, could not be dealt with without the other portion—that it was not a question merely of the rights and desires of those we were addressing with regard to the extension to them of the right of voting, but that it was a question of what was for the benefit of the country, and what was the best settlement that could be arranged with a view to a satisfactory settlement of our electoral system. We found that these men, keenly anxious as they were to obtain the electoral franchise, were yet thoroughly able to comprehend the argument that the whole subject ought to be dealt with, and that they were as determined that the measure should be one of a comprehensive nature as your audiences were that a measure should be passed rapidly and speedily. The position we took, and which was embodied in a number of Resolutions passed before the Recess, and the action of our Party before the end of last Session, and which we have consistently maintained before all the audiences we have addressed—that position is one from which we have no right to recede, and from which, if we did recede, we should shake the confidence of those who have placed their confidence in us. The right hon. Gentleman says that the object of passing the Franchise Bill is, with him, and with the Government, and with the Liberal Party, a paramount object. I am not at all disposed to question his right to call it a paramount object; but what I maintain is that, in treating it as a paramount object, the Government have a very much better prospect of attaining that object which they say is paramount by proceeding in a business-like and reasonable manner in regard to the other question with which it is connected than they will have if they attempt to force it on alone. There is a Greek saying that "the half is better than the whole." I do not know the precise sense in which those words have sometimes been used; but, applying them to the present case, I would say that half the trouble is greater than the whole, and that in attempting to deal with this measure in two halves, altogether separate, the Government are setting for themselves a more formidable task than if they were contented to deal with the whole together. I quite understand that in the present Session of Parliament, when Her Majesty's Government first brought forward this measure, and did not know the reception it would meet with, or how far it would be discussed, or what fate it would meet with in Committee—I can quite understand that they thought it was their business to press the measure through by itself, and that it was impossible to find time for another. But the position is now entirely different, and I do not see that the Government could, for a moment, stand excused in the eyes of the country, or in the eyes of any common-sense person, if, for the mere purpose of adhering to what they said, under wholly different circumstances, last Session, they persisted in a course which would stand in the way, and throw difficulties in the way of the attainment of the very object they desire. The right hon. Gentleman shadowed forth in his speech yesterday, and last Session, some of the leading principles on which he considers that a Redistribution Bill ought to be framed, and on which we may conclude that the Government have already prepared, or nearly prepared, their scheme. If that is so, what can be the difficulty of laying those proposals before the House? I can say at once for the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that there is nothing in the statement of those principles, if he lays them before us—there is nothing which leads me to believe that there will be any difficulty in framing a measure upon them that will be acceptable in its main principles to the great body of the House. But until the Bill is framed, and until we have seen the Bill, and know how the question is worked, it is impossible for us to form an adequate opinion. But if the Government intend to close this Session without bringing this matter forward they are laying up in store for themselves a very difficult future, which is quite unnecessary. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who got up in his place a short time ago, taunted the Government with some words that they used in July, to the effect that this Session would be confined to the particular purpose of passing the Franchise Bill. I do not think the hon. Member is a good friend to the Government in doing this. His challenges to them and his insistence upon such explanations may rather lead the great body of hon. Gentlemen opposite to see how unwise it would be to pin the Government to expressions which may have been used in the heat of debate, or under circumstances very different from the present, in order to prevent a satisfactory solution. If the hon. Member desires to prevent a satisfactory solution in order that the door may be open for him to introduce by-and-bye further questions of a dangerous and mischievous character—if that is his object, let hon. Gentlemen opposite, who, I am sure, do not share that desire, take warning from the plain and frank statement he has made. Let them see what they are endangering if they do not come to some reasonable terms for the settlement of the question. Our position is an unchanged position from that which we took up when this Bill was first laid before us, and we decided on accepting the second reading of the Bill. We have always taken the same view. We have expressed it here and in the country, and, whenever called upon, we shall always be ready to express it. We are ready to assent to the passing of the extensive measure of Reform contained in the Franchise Bill on the understanding that we shall be able to look upon the whole measure of Reform—the one part connected with the other. I do not mean to say that one shall be dependent upon the other. I do not ask you to put the two measures on the Table together; but I say that we must look at the whole measure of Reform together, and that we cannot understand a mere portion of the question until we have a clear idea of what the measure of redistribution is to be. We are told that it will be a redistribution scheme in which particular care has been taken to separate the urban from the rural districts; but I do not want to see such a separation brought about on every subject between the two interests as will lead to antagonism between them. What we desire is that care shall be taken to draw such lines as shall prevent the rural interests from being swamped, and one class being set against the other. But there are many other questions of great importance in connection with this subject of Reform to be considered. The right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) has said that we think of nothing except this distinction between the urban and rural districts. He is entirely wrong. What we desire, as well as the Prime Minister, is to see that the system of redistribution of seats is so arranged as that each different pursuit of importance shall have, as far as possible, a fair representation in Parliament. Considering the enormous importance of our Parliamentary system to those who are engaged in every kind and variety of pursuits in this country, it is of the utmost importance that we should have such a Constitution as would give an opening for the representation of those pursuits; and I am afraid, if we are to take the theory of numbers, and nothing but numbers, we should find ourselves in a very difficult position, unless we were so to arrange the details of redistribution as to meet the difficulty. I hope and trust that this discussion may produce some practical results, and that the opinions which have been expressed in various quarters may show Her Majesty's Government that there is no real difficulty in settling this question if they will only trust to the House, and to those hon. Gentlemen who sit opposite to them. For my own part, I can promise them that any practical Redistribution Bill shall be received and shall be considered by those who sit on this side of the House in a spirit of fairness, and with a desire to bring about a settlement of this difficult question. I do not believe for a moment that, in agreeing to the Amendment of my hon. Friend, we shall in any way throw back the settlement of this question. On the contrary, I believe that by agreeing to the Amendment we shall, in reality, be advancing the settlement of the question. By agreeing to that Amendment we shall be taking up the position which we took up substantially two or three months ago, and which has led to our occupying the much more satisfactory position in which we find ourselves now with regard to this question. There can be no doubt that the merits of the course we advocate have been largely recognized and greatly advanced by the course of the discussion in the Recess; but we cannot and ought not to depart from the position we formerly took up. We invite the Government—and we are anxious that the Government should accept the invitation—to deal frankly with us in this matter by introducing their Redistribution Bill, which, no doubt, they have by this time got well in hand; and we can promise them that when they have laid that Bill before us, both that and any other measure which may be connected with it shall be most carefully considered, with the desire that it shall receive our most cordial support.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, there is very little in the speech which has just fallen from the right hon. Gentleman of which it is necessary that I should take notice. In the speech of the right hon. Baronet there are, undoubtedly, many things to which I can give an almost complete assent. We all, on this side of the House, I believe, agree with him in the desire he has expressed that the settlement of the Reform Question on which we are engaged should be one of an enduring and permanent character, and that it should not be one which should last for only a very small number of years. Neither do I take the smallest exception to what the right hon. Gentleman has said as to its being the duty of the House to look at this question as a whole. I do not object, and I think it is perfectly reasonable that the House should decline to consider a mere portion of the question of Reform, and should desire to take a more comprehensive view of the great change which it is the intention of the Franchise Bill to effect. We have never, in my opinion, controverted that position. All that we have advised the House to do has been to take as comprehensive a view of the question as possible, but that at the same time they should, in their procedure, have regard to what is possible and convenient, and that they should not, by tying together the different parts of this large measure of Reform, render the handling of the matter one of great complication and of great difficulty, and so encumber the question as to make it almost impossible to deal successfully with any portion of it. In my opinion the right hon. Baronet has altogether omitted from his view one set of most important considerations to which, in the few observations I desire to make, I shall endeavour to call some attention. The right hon. Gentleman, in the observations which have fallen from him, has altogether omitted to deal with the question how far it would be possible to deal with it in a practical manner, and with the prospect of obtaining a speedy and satisfactory result in the manner which he has suggested. I do not desire to detain the House long on this occasion for many reasons. My main reason is that I wish to enter as little as possible upon subjects which, in this and in former debates on this question, have given rise to sharp and acute controversy. I think it must have struck every Member of the House who has listened to this debate that there has been a vast difference in tone between the debates of last night and to-night and the former debates on this subject, and there has also been a marked contrast in tone and substance from that of many of the speeches which were delivered during the Autumn Recess. I cannot help hoping that this marked contrast of tone, which has been, I think, so universally recognized, mainly points to the hope that it is possible for Parliament to come to some satisfactory settlement of this question, a settlement not brought about by what is usually termed a compromise, by which either Party shall surrender anything which they consider a matter of principle, or of importance, but rather a settlement which may be arrived at by a process of discussion and consideration, by which it may appear that there is not, after all, so much difference of opinion as was formerly supposed to exist between any Parties in this House upon either of the branches of this great and important question. Well, Sir, I am naturally extremely anxious to avoid, in the observations I desire to make, saying anything which would strike a discordant note, or anything that would tend to mar that degree of harmony which, for the first time, has apparently been developed in the debate on the second reading of the Bill. I confess I was to a certain extent disappointed, as has been said by my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), both by the tone, and also, to a certain extent, by the substance of the speech in which this Amendment was moved. I fully admit that the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) laboured under some difficulties, because it was impossible for him to have foreseen or to have had any foreknowledge of the extremely conciliatory tone in which the second reading of this Bill would be moved by my right hon. Friend, and also as to how far my right hon. Friend proposed to extend the explanation of his statement on the question of the intentions of the Government with regard to redistribution which he made in moving the second reading of the Bill. Therefore, I am not at all surprised that the hon. Member, in moving an Amendment which was apparently in some degree of a hostile and controversial character, should have been led into delivering a speech of a more hostile character than I think he would have been inclined to make if he could have had more time to reflect upon both the manner and the substance of the speech of my right hon. Friend. But whatever unfavourable impressions may have been made on our minds by the speech of the hon. Member, I must admit that they have been to a very great extent removed by the more conciliatory tone which has been adopted this evening in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), and in a great part to that of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), and also in the speech we have just listened to. I gather from the speech of the noble

Lord the Member for Woodstock that he regards this Amendment rather in the light of an arm which is kept in the hands of the Party to which he belongs, in order to enable that Party to obtain fuller information and to exact more complete satisfaction in regard to that which they demand upon the subject of redistribution than as an absolute condition which he considers it necessary rigidly to adhere to. Sir, on the other hand, I understand that the hon. Member (Mr. E. Stanhope), in his speech, represented this Amendment as a fair and reasonable condition which the Government might— which the Government ought, and, in fact, so far as the Opposition is concerned, which the Government must—agree to as the price of their allowing this Bill to pass. Well, now, let me examine for a moment what is the character of this so-called reasonable condition. It is that progress is not to be made with this Bill unless it is accompanied by a provision for what is termed a proper arrangement of electoral areas. Well, Sir, those are the bare terms of the Amendment before the House as they have been placed on the Paper; but I suppose we shall be justified in understanding the words “proper arrangement” as meaning an arrangement which would be satisfactory to the minority in this House, an arrangement satisfactory not only in its principles, but also in its details. But the speech of the hon. Member went a good deal further than that. He contended that before he would pass this Bill he must have not only the principles and the manner in which the Government propose to deal with redistribution before him, but that he must have them before him in such a manner that he may be able to deal with them, and, as the Marquess of Salisbury said, to “handle” them—in fact, that he was determined to keep this Franchise Bill as a sort of hostage in the hands of the Opposition, which was not to be released until perfect satisfaction had been exacted by the Opposition in everything which related to the redistribution of seats. In other words, Sir, the position of the hon. Member was this—that he would trust the House of Commons with nothing in the matter of redistribution; that he would trust the majority of this House with nothing; that he would rely not at all upon good sense, nor upon the arguments which might be brought forward on the other side; that he would trust, in fact, to nothing except to the power he would secure by keeping this Bill in a state of suspended animation until the details of the Redistribution Bill had been settled, and manipulated entirely to the satisfaction of the Tory Party. Well, Sir, in my opinion, that is not a reasonable condition. It is a condition that amounts to this. It is, according to hon. Members, a condition which is to attach to the passing of this measure, on the passing of which the country, in our opinion, has set its heart—a condition, the character of which is indefinite, and a condition which, after all, might be impossible of execution. Let the House suppose, for a moment, that we comply with this reasonable proposal. What would our position be? We are at present almost in the dark; we do not know what the views of the Opposition are on the subject of redistribution, and which views we are to satisfy before we are to be allowed to pass this measure. I must dissent altogether from the opinion expressed by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) this evening, when he said that we were already sufficiently in possession of the views of the Opposition on the subject of redistribution. The noble Lord referred to the speech of the Marquess of Salisbury at Manchester, and to a speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach). He did not refer to his own speeches, but he gave us his own opinion on the subject. I have not had the opportunity of referring to those speeches since I heard the noble Lord; but I have very distinctly in my mind an article written by the Marquess of Salisbury in The National Review on the subject of Redistribution, which has certainly been interpreted by a great number of persons as indicating a very strong preference for the adoption of the cumulative vote, or of some other form of minority or proportional representation. Now, the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock gave us to-night his own opinion on the subject of redistribution; and he told us that the scheme which he favoured, and which he believed would meet with general approval on his side of the House, was a scheme which in the main would apportion representation in proportion to numbers, and would approximate closely to the single-Member electoral districts. Now, I hardly need point out that there is an absolute contradiction between the cumulative vote and any other form of minority representation and the proposal of the noble Lord. What reason have we to know that any of these proposals—proposals which have been put forward by the Marquess of Salisbury himself, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), or by the noble Lord, do in deed and in fact command the approval and support of any considerable section of Members sitting on the other side of the House? Why, within the last few moments we have heard the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition state opinions in regard to redistribution which appear to me to lean much more towards the views which were advocated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) than towards those advocated by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock. A part of the proposal of the noble Lord suggested the separation of rural and urban districts; but the Leader of the Opposition has just told us that he does not wish to see any such sharp separation between rural and urban districts as would be likely in his opinion to mark, if it did not engender, an antagonism of interest between those rural and urban districts. I cannot pretend to say that the differences which apparently exist upon the subject of redistribution in the ranks of the Conservative Party are differences so vital that they are incapable of being reconciled; but what I am tempted to say is, that there is not before us at this moment any such announced and avowed agreement among hon. Members opposite as to what it is they require in the matter of redistribution as would even give us any fair assurance that any Bill which—I will not say we—but even they might introduce themselves would command their universal assent and support. Certainly, if we are to assume that the noble Lord does accurately represent the views of his Party in the scheme which he has set before us to-night, the progress which has been made in the education of his Party is enormous. I say, without fear of contradiction, that if the Government had last February introduced, in conjunction with the Franchise Bill, a measure of redistribution framed on the principles indicated by the noble Lord to-night, that measure would have been almost universally scouted by hon. Members sitting on the Benches opposite as a revolutionary supplement to a revolutionary Bill, and as an emanation of the Caucus which my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) is said to preside over. Well, Sir, this is to a great extent our answer, and the only answer we can give to those categorical inquiries put to us by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). The right hon. and learned Gentleman wants to know when we shall produce the Redistribution Bill; and our answer, and the only answer we can give, is that we shall introduce a Bill, or will introduce redistribution proposals, whenever we have some fair reason to believe that any redistribution proposals which we can bring forward will be accepted by the Party opposite as a basis of settlement, or which will be accepted as a fair subject of discussion for the purpose of arriving at a settlement, and which will not be made the engine and the weapon for defeating the Franchise Bill. But I think I may say to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock that he, at all events, need be under very little apprehension as to the success of the views which he entertains on this subject, if he be right that they are entertained by the bulk of his Party. It is quite possible that those views may go a good deal further than many who sit on these Benches consider necessary. It is quite possible that they may involve a larger disturbance of existing electoral arrangements than commend themselves to many who sit on this side of the House. His views will commend themselves, at all events, to the great bulk of the Radical Party; and if they are views which commend themselves to the vast majority of his own Party also, the noble Lord has little need of apprehension, and is in want of no guarantee as to our dealing with redistribution, although it may be our duty to submit to the House some reasons why the opinions of the noble Lord ought not to be pushed to their extreme logical conclusions. Perhaps the House will allow me to call attention for a moment to some of the difficulties which, in dealing with a question of this kind, we are exposed to, and the embarrassments which we sometimes experience in finding where to look for the accredited Leader of the Party opposite. I think I have heard speeches of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock which have been very coldly received by the great bulk of the Conservative Party. I have, I think, heard the noble Lord incur the severe reproof of those who sit on the Front Bench opposite; but now it appears that we are to take the opinions of the noble Lord without any further support than the cheers which they receive as the expression of the opinion of the Conservative Party on this great subject. The noble Lord, towards the conclusion of his speech, gave expression in eloquent language to what, in my opinion, were very wise and statesman-like views upon the desirability of coming to a peaceful settlement on this great question. Was the noble Lord less the Leader of his Party when, a few weeks ago, in answer to the merest suggestion of conciliation, he denounced that suggestion as an emanation from the Party of "snivel and drivel?" Therefore, Sir, our difficulties do not consist only in some embarrassment as to the exact part of the House in which we are to find the Leaders of the Party opposite, but also as to the times and seasons to which we are to have regard in estimating the value of the opinions expressed by those Leaders themselves. While I am referring to the noble Lord, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say a word on another subject; and although it is no part of our business in this House to defend the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), who appears to me to be very well able to take care of himself, I cannot help thinking that it was rather hard upon him to be made the subject of such a severe and bitter attack for having, as it seems to us, learnt the lesson which has been given to him by the noble Lord who sits near him only somewhat too well. We seem to have to-night, in the cheers of the Party opposite with which that attack was greeted, an answer to that question which has been asked so long, and which has, perhaps, never yet received an answer so complete—

"Quis tulit Gracchos de seditione querentes?"

It seems to us that a charge of want of loyalty can be borne with great toleration when one of the Gracchi, in the person of the noble Lord, rebukes another of the family with having on one occasion only been somewhat wanting in loyalty to his Party. Well, Sir, under these circumstances, what is it that we are asked to do by accepting this "reasonable condition?" We are asked, instead of presenting to the House a clear and simple issue, which Parliament and the country also can understand—we are asked to obscure the issue, to mix up with the simple issue on which we desire that Parliament should decide another complicated consideration, upon which numerous differences of opinion can, and, indeed, must, arise. Let the House look for a moment at the position in which we shall be placed if we accept that proposal. Suppose we produce a measure; suppose that the Party opposite, notwithstanding the indications which have been received to-night, object—whether reasonably or unreasonably I will not say—to our proposals on the subject of redistribution; they will resist them, as they are entitled to do, by every means in their power, by all the Forms of the House, and by all the means which the practice and procedure of Parliament place at their disposal. The Bill might fail either in this House or in "another place;" and with it, according to this "reasonable condition," is to fail also the Franchise Bill; and we are asked to make ourselves voluntary parties to that failure. We are asked to agree to the proposition that the extension of the franchise is to be indefinitely postponed. ["No, no!"] Yes; it may be indefinitely postponed, because we have not been able to satisfy conditions which never have been formulated, because we have failed to accomplish objects which have never been described to us, and because we have failed to guard against dangers which have never been indicated. Sir, that is a position which may be forced upon us; but it is not a position which any Member of this House can for one moment expect Her Majesty's Government are going voluntarily to take up. We have heard much in the course of this debate upon the subject of guarantees. Well, Sir, my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W.

Dilke) has spoken of the guarantees which the Government have given. They may be sufficient or they may be insufficient; they may or they may not be capable of extension. I will not detain the House by going into that question; but I think we may ask whether it is from the majority alone that guarantees on this subject are to be taken? What guarantees have the Party opposite given us; what guarantees are you willing to give; what guarantees can you give us that there is any measure of redistribution which will induce you to allow this Bill to pass, and to settle as a whole the combined question of franchise and redistribution? Sir, I am not going to express any doubt as to the sincerity of the conversion of the Party opposite to the principle of the Franchise Bill. I may feel some doubt in my own mind as to whether a great many Members opposite are very much attached to the principle of that measure, and I think there are a good many of them who would, if they thought it possible, be very glad to see it relegated to obscurity; but what I admit is the sincerity of their opinions that, after what has taken place, the extension of the franchise should be accomplished at once, if they could obtain reasonable security. Although I am perfectly willing to admit the sincerity of those opinions, I am tempted to ask, what is the use of this conversion if it is not to be accompanied by anything more than an academical assent to the principle of the Franchise Bill in words, accompanied by tactical and obstructive Motions in practice? If the Party opposite had told us—if they will tell us now—what it is they want, what is the sacred principle of redistribution for which they contend, what it is they insist upon, and what it is they cannot accept, then I could understand their position. But I have a great difficulty in understanding that position now, and, in my firm opinion, if the position of the Conservative Party is as stated by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), and is understood by the country, it is understood as one of obstruction to the Franchise Bill. Sir, there is one observation further which I desire to make. In my opinion the course taken by the Government is one which is not only recommended by ordinary considerations—not only as a means of passing the measure before the House, but also as offering the best security for the reasonable treatment of the question of redistribution; and we are convinced that it offers the best method of obtaining acceptance of the principle of the Bill. I think there can be no doubt, whatever the unanimity of opinion in the House may now be on the subject, that no one will contend that when the Bill was introduced last February there was anything like that unanimity of sentiment which we now witness. At all events, the course we have pursued has had the effect that the Conservative Party in this House, in the other House, and in the country are now almost unanimously committed to the principle of the Franchise Bill. But I say that it is also the course which offers the best prospect of a reasonable settlement. If we had now, or at any former stage, embodied our proposals as to redistribution in the form of a Bill or otherwise, they must almost inevitably have become the subject of Party conflict. They would necessarily have been framed in ignorance, and, to some extent, would still be framed in ignorance, of the wishes and opinions of the Opposition; and the Liberal Party, if the scheme had commended itself to Gentlemen opposite, would almost immediately have been committed to the principle and details of that measure, and the cry would have been soon heard—"The Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill." Sir, the Prime Minister has now said that it is not his desire—it is not ours—that the work of redistribution should be the work of one Party alone, but rather that it should be the work of the whole House. Surely, if that object is to be accomplished, it is an advantage that we, and the Party who support us, should not be committed prematurely to principles of redistribution which the Party opposite have not agreed to. This consideration seems to me to carry with it not only a justification of the course which the Government has pursued, but a suggestion for the future treatment of the question. If, instead of opposing, I will not say obstructive, but apparently hostile Motions to the progress of the Bill, the Opposition would give us some further indication of what they desire to secure, or, at all events, what they want to avoid, my firm belief is that such indications as they may be willing to give would not be received by us as weapons to be made use of for the purposes of Party conflict, but would be received by us in an honest and friendly spirit as a means of arriving at a safe and honourable settlement of that branch of the question.

WESTMINSTER HALL (RESTORATION).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in rising to move—

said, the House would recollect that at the end of last Session he laid before it the plans prepared by the architect, Mr. Pearson, for the restoration of the West Front of Westminster Hall, and that, in doing so, he had stated that if there was any strong difference of opinion on the subject, he should not object to refer the matter to a Select Committee. When the Estimate for the carrying out of the work came before the House, he found that considerable difference of opinion did exist; and after a debate the proposed plans were deferred, in order that they might be considered by a Committee, a comparatively small Vote being taken for certain repairs and works for the protection of the Hall, pending the consideration of plans. Since last Session, however, he had consulted with Mr. Pearson, and had come to the conclusion that it was not desirable to spend any large sum on repairs until it was decided what should ultimately be done with the building; but that it would be better to appoint the Committee in the short Autumn Session; take its decision, and that of the House, and at once proceed with the work of restoration. It seemed to him desirable that the House should come to a decision as early as possible; and he, therefore, hoped that no objection would be taken to his Motion with a view to the speedy determination of the question. It was important that the work should be commenced, or some repairs should be executed, before the coming winter. He did not think the inquiry would be a long one, and it seemed to him that it would be easier to obtain a Committee now than it would be in the regular Session next year, when the House would be in full work. The Committee would not find it necessary to sit more than three or four days. Of course, it would be his duty to see that the plans were very carefully explained to them, and that due consideration was given to any objections which might be raised to the plans. Under the circumstances, he hoped the House would agree to his Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to examine and report on the proposed plans for the restoration of the exterior of Westminster Hall."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

Mr. SEXTON said, he should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman how soon he proposed to name the Members who were to constitute the Committee, and whether it was proposed to nominate any Irish Representative upon it?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: I have already secured that. I desire to nominate the Committee on Monday, and to propose, amongst other hon. Gentlemen, one representing Ireland, who sits in the same quarter of the House as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sexton).

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY: How many hon. Members does the right hon. Gentleman propose to put on the Committee?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE: I propose that it should be a Committee of 13.

Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he did not think the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) was very satisfactory. For instance, he could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman in the opinion that the inquiry would only occupy a very short time. He had not had much to do with architectural subjects; but he objected altogether to the plans of Mr. Pearson. He was not alone in that objection, because it was taken by others who were far more competent to judge than himself. It appeared to him that if the question was to be properly discussed, the discussion must be one which would take some considerable time. It would certainly not lead to a satisfactory result if it was sought to complete the inquiry in four or five days. Now that the First Commissioner of Works proposed to appoint a Committee of 13 Members, he would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, if the Committee were not able to discuss the question, or to agree to any Report at the present moment, their Sittings would be adjourned until next Session? It was as well it should be pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman that this was a matter of great importance, and that it would be absolutely necessary for the Committee to call before it competent witnesses. Moreover, the right hon. Gentleman had adopted a most unusual form for his Motion. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) could not understand why the Notice of Motion was couched in the particular terms in which they found it on the Paper; why it did not state what powers the Committee would have. Those who had any experience of the Business of the House were aware that Notices of this kind usually gave powers to the Committee to be appointed to call witnesses and so forth. Why did not the right hon. Gentleman put his Notice down in the usual form? He need only direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to Notice No. 6 on that night's Paper. It was a Motion standing in the name of one of the right hon. Gentleman's Colleagues (the Solicitor General for Ireland); but the usual form was adopted—power was given to call witnesses, and the names of the Gentlemen who were to be proposed as Members of the Committee were also given.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had been singularly unfortunate in the reference he had made. When the Committee was nominated he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) would certainly move that the Committee should have power to take evidence; and that was the usual and proper time to make such a Motion. He proposed to nominate the Committee on Monday. He had already said that he would be able to get a much better Committee at that time of the Session than he would if he waited until next Session; and he thought that when the hon. and learned Gentleman saw the constitution of the Committee he would be of opinion that no better Committee for the purpose could be formed.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY observed, that the reference to the Committee was—

“To examine and report on the proposed plans for the restoration of the exterior of Westminster Hall.”

He thought it was fair to ask if there was more than one plan? He had never heard of more than one plan. It appeared to him that this was a Committee to be formed for the purpose of sanctioning the plan which had been already adopted by the First Commissioner of Works—that was the plan of Mr. Pearson. He had the opportunity last Session, by the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), of visiting the locus in quo, and of hearing what was to be said. He was greatly impressed with the fact that Mr. Pearson did not do the Members of the House of Commons who assembled on the site the honour of attending to explain his own plans. The company had a statement by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), and also by another well-known official of the Board of Works; but Mr. Pearson, who was responsible for the plans, and who was recommended as the only architect in England who understood the subject—[Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: Nonsense!]]—they had been told that—did not attend at all. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) took great interest in architectural subjects; but he was unable to get, upon the occasion he referred to, the information which hon. Members were entitled to. Then, when he read this Reference, he found that a Committee was to be appointed to examine and report on the proposed plans. There were no other plans but the plans of Mr. Pearson, and the intention evidently was that Mr. Pearson's plans should be sanctioned by the House of Commons. He did not approve of that kind of procedure. Furthermore, he was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had already formed his Committee, and that when an Irish Member opposite (Mr. Sexton) asked whether an Irish Member was to be nominated to serve on the Committee, the right hon. Gentleman should say in a very jaunty manner—“Oh, yes; I have settled that with someone on the opposite side.” He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) demurred altogether to the idea that the whole of the Irish representation was to be found on the other side of the House. Politics ought not to enter into a matter of this kind; and he was quite sure, from the well-known taste of Irish Members, that there were many of them eminently qualified to serve on the Committee. The public buildings which had been erected in Dublin for many years past equalled anything there was in this country, both in originality, construction, material, and in everything else. He supposed that in this House of Commons it was no use offering any opposition; but he was bound to say that the absorption by the Board of Works of everything in the Metropolis in the shape of architecture, and the assumption that the Board of Works was to be the only judge upon architectural subjects, was most unsatisfactory. The public buildings which had been created in the Metropolis within the last 30 or 40 years had been such as to make us the laughing-stock of all nations. He did not wish to detain the House many moments; but let him take, for instance, the Natural History Museum, which was an offspring of the Board of Works, and in regard to which a right hon. Gentleman who was not now a Member of the House was the supreme authority. That building, whatever its character might be, was sunk in a hollow, and its architectural effect was lost by the want of spending a little money in raising the foundations. That was the remark which every foreigner who visited the Museum made. He did not know that Mr. Pearson was the only person qualified to give an opinion upon the restoration of the exterior of Westminster Hall. Westminster Hall was never intended to be seen from outside, and the proposals that were laid before them last Session for the construction of a chamber—a room which was to be a garret for the accommodation of old Parliamentary Papers, and which could be of no earthly use in that situation—and the making of a corridor in which carriages might, or rather might not, be driven, for he understood it was only to be 19 feet in width, appeared to him to be one of the most absurd propositions that ever came under his notice. He hoped the House of Commons would not assent to the appointment of this Committee unless the inquiry was to be a genuine one. If the Committee was simply to be appointed to endorse the plans of Mr. Pearson, let it be so stated. If the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had formed a Committee to support Mr. Pearson's plans, let it be known; but do not let them have a sham inquiry to arrive at a foregone conclusion.

Mr. T. C. BARING said, he did not know whether he was right in his conjecture; but, according to this Notice of Motion, there were no plans to be submitted to the Committee but those of Mr. Pearson. If that were so, he should feel bound to oppose the appointment of the Committee. Was he to understand that if the Committee were dissatisfied with Mr. Pearson's plan, they could refuse them and call for other plans, because that would be a very different matter. If it was intended that the Committee should only make more or less alterations in Mr. Pearson's plans, he should vote against the appointment of the Committee.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE said, the House seemed to have forgotten for the moment what was the question before it. The question was the appointment of a Committee, and when the Committee was appointed it would be quite within the competence of the House to adopt an Instruction to the Committee. Surely, this Committee was not to have any limit placed on its power. It would have the power to send for other architects than Mr. Pearson. ["Will it?"] He thought the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) would hardly propose a Committee which was to be restricted in—[Mr. BARING: The words of the Motion are "the proposed plans."] The powers of every Committee were granted by the House; and when the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) nominated the Committee the House would take care that its powers were sufficient, and that its Members were men in whom the House could place confidence. The present Motion was merely that the Committee should be appointed, and that it should have the power to examine and report on the plans for the restoration of the exterior of Westminster Hall. ["The proposed plans!"] Surely it would have power to call for plans other than those drawn by Mr. Pearson. The House had only to see, when the Committee came to be nominated, that the powers given it were sufficient in the matter.

Mr. STUART-WORTLEY said, there seemed to be every probability that in the end Mr. Pearson's plans would be sent to the right about. Some considerable time must elapse before the matter was settled; and therefore he hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) would take means of securing what should be something like adequate protection from the weather for the remains of the ancient buttresses and other parts of the building, which must necessarily suffer during the coming winter if left, as at present, exposed.

Mr. DICK-PEDDIE said, he thought it was satisfactory to the House that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) proposed to refer the matter to a Committee; but he (Mr. Dick-Peddle) was afraid that the terms of the Motion were far too limited. Hon. Members were aware that the subject was discussed last Session, and that objection was raised, not only to Mr. Pearson's plans themselves, but to the whole character of the buildings proposed by that gentleman. It would be well that the Committee should be instructed to examine and report as to the best mode of dealing with the exterior of Westminster Hall.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he certainly had no intention of limiting the inquiry of the Committee. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) wished that the word "proposed" should be left out of the terms of Reference, he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) would gladly assent to the omission. He merely wished to add one further explanation in reply to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), with reference to the absence of Mr. Pearson on the occasion to which he referred. It was an entire accident on the part of Mr. Pearson that he was not present. As a matter of fact, he arrived on the site a short time after his (Mr. Shaw Lefevre's) explanation; had he been there earlier he would have given the explanation which he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) gave. Unfortunately Mr. Pearson was not there at the right moment; and he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), therefore, gave such explanation of the plans as he could. Mr. Pearson would have been very glad to have afforded every information had he been present.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the right hon. Gentleman propose to leave out the words "the proposed?"

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Yes.

Amendment made, by leaving out the words "the proposed."

Main Question, as amended, proposed.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE suggested that the words "plans for" should also be omitted, so that the Motion would read, "report on the restoration of the exterior of Westminster Hall."

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, it was not necessary to add that—he quite understood what was meant.

DR. LYONS said, he had on more than one occasion visited the site, and had had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Pearson there. He wished to take that opportunity of publicly thanking Mr. Pearson for his great kindness and courtesy in explaining the proposed arrangements.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he thought it was agreed that the word "plans" should be also omitted.

MR. SPEAKER: No; the words proposed to be left out were "the proposed."

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that before the Question was put he would like to know whether it was to be distinctly understood that the inquiry would be free and open?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Certainly.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: And that the Committee will be empowered to judge of other plans?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Yes.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to examine and report on plans for the restoration of the exterior of Westminster Hall."

And, on November 10, Committee nominated as follows:—MR. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH, MR. RYLANDS, MR. BERESFORD HOPE, SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, SIR RICHARD WALLACE, SIR EDWARD REED, SIR HENRY HOLLAND, MR. DICK-PEDDIE, LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, MR. WALTER, MR. CHEETHAM, MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY, and MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, with power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (NORTHUMBERLAND) BILL.

MOTION FOR LEAVE.

MR. JERNINGHAM: I beg to move for leave to bring in a Bill to prohibit the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday in Northumberland.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prohibit the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday in Northumberland."—(Mr. Jerningham.)

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: May I ask the hon. Member what day he intends to fix for the second reading of this Bill?

MR. SPEAKER: The formal Question is not before the House yet. Who is prepared to bring in the said Bill?

MR. JERNINGHAM: Mr. Albert Grey, Mr. Burt, Mr. John Morley, and myself.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to prohibit the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday in Northumberland, ordered to be brought in by MR. JERNINGHAM, MR. ALBERT GREY, MR. BURT, and MR. JOHN MORLEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 31.]

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): I beg to move the Motion that stands in my name.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the working of recent legislation with reference to cottages and plots of land for agricultural labourers in Ireland; and to Report whether it has been established that any amendments of such legislation are at present necessary."—(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, that, before the Question was put, he wished to draw Mr. Speaker's attention to the fact that if the form in which the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had moved for his Committee with regard to Westminster Hall was correct, the form in which the Solicitor General for Ireland was now making his Motion was not correct. The First Commissioner of Works held that the course he had pursued was the right one. He (Sir Hervey Bruce) had not received Notice that it was intended that night to ask him to serve on this Committee.

MR. SEXTON: This is only a re-appointment.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, it was not a re-appointment, because he had left the Committee before the end of last Session. It was a sudden and rather arbitrary method of procedure to put Members on a Committee without saying a word to them about it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): It is merely a re-appointment, and I thought the hon. Baronet's name was on the Committee last year. I, of course, had no idea that he would not be ready to serve again now.

MR. SEXTON: Let him off.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): I release him, of course.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he objected to the Committee being re-appointed this Session. He had thoroughly understood, at the close of last Session, that the Committee reported in favour of re-appointment; but, certainly, it was not in the least intended or believed that it would be reappointed during this extraordinary Session, which, it was understood, was to be devoted to one particular purpose. It would be exceedingly inconvenient if the Committee were re-appointed now. He could not conceive why that course should be taken—why the Committee should be reappointed for the very few days the House might sit. He failed to see why this particular Committee should be called together whilst no other Committee of the House was re-assembled. A great many Members—some, no doubt, who had served on this Committee last year—had made their arrangements, and were going away directly the Session was over. They were not prepared to call their witnesses, or to go into a matter of such importance, and it would be a breach of faith to call upon them to do it. It would be in the recollection of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland that the question of meeting during this short Session was discussed at the end of the last Sitting of the Committee, and that it was not seriously contemplated that the inquiry should proceed before the Session of 1885.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. and gallant Member was putting an interpretation of his own upon what occurred at the end of the Summer Session. The hon. and gallant Member spoke of a "breach of faith;" but he (Mr. Sexton) declared that the Government would be guilty of a gross breach of faith with the Irish Members if they refused to appoint this Committee now. He recollected what occurred at the close of the Sitting at the end of the Summer Session. It had nothing to do with the re-appointment during the present Session; but the question was whether they should Report. Some of the Members of the Committee, of whom he (Mr. Sexton) was one, had made strenuous efforts to get a Report, but had failed. The urgency which then existed, and the endeavour made to obtain a Report, was the best argument for re-appointment now. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had, by a prophetic inspiration, pointed to the end of the Session—had stated that it would not last more than a very few days. To his (Mr. Sexton's) mind, however, the hon. and gallant Member would have been more likely to be right if he had said a few weeks. He did not think there was a chance of the Session being brought to a close much before Christmas. In the meantime, the condition of the labourers in Ireland was miserable in the extreme. It would be inhuman to delay the reappointment of the Committee a day longer than was absolutely necessary.

MR. BERESFORD said, he could support what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Dublin (Colonel King-Harman), having been a Member of the Committee last Session. The subject was a most important one, which required careful investigation; and, to enable all its Members to attend, the Committee should not be called upon to meet before the early Spring. It would be very inconvenient for him—and he might speak for many other Members—to sit now; and he, therefore, hoped the Solicitor General for Ireland would not press the matter.

MR. GRAY said, it might be inconvenient to the hon. Member who had just sat down to sit; but it would be much more inconvenient for the unfortunate persons whose lot in Ireland it was attempted by this inquiry to alleviate to remain in their present condition of misery for many months, and they should not be required to do this merely because it might be inconvenient to some hon. Members to attend to their duties. If the performance of the ordinary duties of a Member of the House were inconvenient to the hon. Member (Mr. Beresford), there was a very simple mode of relieving himself of the inconvenience. Even if the hon. Gentleman did not care to go the length which the adoption of that simple mode would involve, he could relieve himself of the inconvenience of attending on the Committee by having his name struck off the list of Members to be appointed, and enabling it to be replaced by the name of some Gentleman who would find it convenient to discharge the duty his constituency elected him to perform. He (Mr. Gray) earnestly protested against the proposition to leave the Labourers' Question in Ireland, which was recognized to be an extremely urgent one, and which there was a complete—

MR. WARTON: I rise to Order. I wish to call attention to the fact that there are not 40 Members present.

Mr. Sexton

House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. OHEETHAM said, that his recollection of what occurred at the last Sitting of the Committee did not coincide with that of the hon. Members opposite (Colonel King-Harman and Mr. Beresford). The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and his Friends had been extremely anxious that the Committee should report forthwith. It was objected, however, by the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel King-Harman) that sufficient evidence had not been taken; and it was pointed out by other hon. Members that if the Committee sat during the Autumn Session it would make no difference in the matter of legislation, as no Bill could be brought in this year; and that, if the evidence was completed during the short Autumn Session, legislation based on the Report could be promoted in the beginning of the Session of 1885. To that end it had been understood that an effort should be made to secure the re-appointment of the Committee in the Autumn Session. That was his recollection of what had occurred; perhaps other Members of the Committee could confirm him in it.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN said, he wished to observe—[Cries of "Spoke!" and "Order!"] He merely wished to offer an explanation. His impression of what had occurred at the last meeting of the Committee differed from that of other hon. Gentlemen. It was that it was generally understood that sufficient evidence could not be taken before the commencement of the Session of 1885.

Motion agreed to.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Committee do consist of Twenty-one Members:—Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE, Colonel KING-HARMAN, Mr. VILLIERS STUART, Mr. BRODRICK, Mr. ILLINGWORTH, Mr. ELTON, Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Sir HERVEY BRUCE," put, and agreed to.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I rise to a point of Order. Is it competent for us to go into the names of the Committee, when they have only been brought before us to-day?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes; it is quite competent for the House to do so.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN: I move to leave out the name of Colonel King-Harman.

MR. SPEAKER: We have passed that name, and have come to the name of Sir Hervey Bruce.

Motion made, and Question, "That Mr. SHAW, Mr. BERESFORD, Mr. THOMAS DICKSON, Mr. MACNAGHTEN, Mr. GREER, Mr. HEALY, Mr. PARNELL, Mr. SEXTON, Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR, Mr. GRAY, Lord ARTHUR HILL, Mr. CHEETHAM, and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND, be added," put, and agreed to.

Question, "That there be power to send for persons, papers, and records; Seven to be the quorum," put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at half after One o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 10th November, 1884.

INDIA (SEAT OF GOVERNMENT).

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK, in rising to present a Petition from Her Majesty's European, Hindu, and Mussulman subjects in the Presidency of Madras, praying that the duration of the annual transfer of the Indian Government to the Hills may be shortened; and to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to prescribe a limitation to the residence of the Supreme Government and of the Presidency Governments in India at the Hills? said, the Petition which he had the honour to lay upon the Table was something more than of usual importance, and that would be seen in the character and object of the Petitioners. It had its origin at a public meeting of Europeans, Hindus, and Mussulmans of the City of Madras; and it was the first occasion on which such a meeting had been held in Madras for the redress of a public grievance. The meeting was representative of all classes, races, and religions in the Presidency; and they co-operated with unusual harmony and cordiality for the same purpose. The grievance of which those excellent citizens complained was, that they saw too little of their Governor, and the remedy which they proposed was that he should be instructed to live more among them. The meeting was presided over by an Indian statesman of undoubted fidelity and loyalty to Her Majesty. At that meeting a resolution was adopted—after being supported by a number of gentlemen holding distinguished positions in the Presidency—reporting the protest of the meeting against the removal of the Government; and it was further determined to present a Petition to their Lordships' House. This movement had received the sanction of 25 local Associations in the different districts and municipalities of the Presidency; and he believed that the sentiment embodied in the Petition would be substantially approved of by the members of the Civil Service and the officers of the Government generally. The prevailing opinion of those classes was, he thought, that the Government and Council should have their abode in the places where the citizens spend their days, so that they should share in the labours of their common duties. In fact, the Petition was a genuine and natural expression of the views of a numerous, loyal, and intelligent community. In 1869 the Government of Madras gave their attention to the question of the seat of Government, and their views were embodied in a Minute drawn up by the Governor. The object of the Governor was that all the Members of the Government should take their recreation and leave of absence at the same time, in order that there might be no suspension of the regular transaction of public business, and that all should resort to the same place. The Governor proposed to limit the absence to 10 weeks or three months, and this movement was to cost nothing. These proposals became the basis of a communication to the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India, and were sanctioned by the latter, and became the rule under which the Governor of Madras acted. They remained in force for three years; and during that period he was not aware that any complaint was made. Fifteen years had now elapsed since those proposals were made; and he believed the absence of the Government had now been extended to six, seven, and even eight months in the year; and, in addition to that, a very considerable expenditure had been incurred where no expenditure had been originally intended. The Petitioners complained not only of the removal of the seat of civil administration, but of the removal of the seat of military administration also. If the headquarters of the Commander-in-Chief had been transported to Bangalore he could have understood the change, for Bangalore was the principal garrison and arsenal of Southern India; but what reason could there be for transferring the military headquarters to a place where Her Majesty's arms had previously only been represented by a soldiers' convalescent hospital? In Madras itself the accommodation for the Government was ample; consequently, the expense incurred in providing accommodation for it in the Hills seemed to be hardly justifiable. He had been told that a sum of nearly £70,000 had been expended in providing the Governor of Madras with a residence in the Hills. He would ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India (the Earl of Kimberley) whether he was not surprised at the expenditure of such a large sum for such a purpose, and that it should lead to some discontent, particularly when there were other things—roads, public works, and irrigation—upon which expenditure was so necessary, and which were standing still for want of funds to carry them on? He contended that the whole of this expenditure had been cast away, and that the money might have been applied to more justifiable works. A permanent transfer of the seat of Government to the Hills would be likely to inflict injustice and hardship upon Native public servants, who would be compelled either to take their families at great expense to the Hills or to separate themselves from them, and such separation would be exceedingly distasteful to Natives, especially to Hindus. The withdrawal of the seat of Government from the plains caused great inconvenience to those among the Native community who had grievances to bring forward or proposals of public benefit to make, for, instead of finding easy access to the source of justice and power, they were compelled to take a journey to a remote station at a considerable sacrifice of time and money. Another objection to the removal of the seat of Government to the Hills was, that while the Governor resided there he lost touch of all the chief industries of the country, excepting only the planting industry. He hoped the answer of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India (the Earl of Kimberley) would go far to satisfy and to relieve the apprehensions of those whom he had the honour to represent on that occasion.

Petition offered to be presented.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in supporting the Petition from Madras and the noble Lord who had presented it, said, that it would be well first to eliminate that which, judging from the Indian Press, was not considered a grievance in this matter of the annual resort to the Hills. Firstly, there was no complaint made in the Bombay Presidency against the Government going to Mahabaleshwar, which was only about 24 hours from Bombay; the only complaint made there was one that was general all over India, that too much money was spent on the macadamized roads round these summer resorts and round cantonments, while too little was spent on roads required for traffic. With regard to the Government of Calcutta, the complaint was not so much against the Governor General, the Executive Council, and a few Secretaries going to Simla, as against all the subordinate officials who now imitated the Supreme Government and flocked to Naini Tal and other places. The complaint was that the Supreme Government was away too long—the usual period being eight months, to which another month must be added for journeys and packing and unpacking of documents. The Supreme Government might be absent without its absence being injurious, as was that of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal and the Governor of Madras, and other subordinate officials who required to be in daily contact with the people whose affairs it was their duty to administer. Moreover, there was an advantage in the Supreme Government being absent for a time from Calcutta, where it was liable to fall too much under the influence of the Anglo-Indian unofficial element. The evil of this excessive resort of so many of the officials to the Hills was not so much the expense to which they put the country, and the discontent caused by this increase to salaries already too large, since they had been fixed in consideration of the officials having to endure the heat of the Plains; the chief evil was that the officials became more and more separated from the inhabitants of the country, and more ignorant of their wants and feelings. Also it gave an appearance of decay in the English race, since the present officials are, or profess themselves to be, unable to endure such slight hardships as Englishmen formerly endured cheerfully. A short time before the Crimean War Prince Soltykoff published his travels in Persia and India; and he inveighed against the luxury of the British Army in India, and said that those troops would be victorious which could best endure the climate, and had not lost their power of marching. In the Madras Presidency there was an additional ground of complaint against the long time the Government remained in the Nilghiri Hills, on the part of the Madrassee clerks and other Natives of Madras who might be obliged to go there on business, on account of their sufferings from the cold when obliged to go to Ootacamund, where they said that even the English required fires. He knew from personal experience in Ceylon that people accustomed to the heat of the Plains would suffer from the cold in these mountains. It was not the expense of removal to the Hills alone that the people of Madras complained of. According to a Madras paper, the expenditure last year at Ootacamund for the Government House and other buildings for officials amounted to Rs. 770,381; while the Madras Government had declared at short intervals its inability to provide funds for important public works. It was also intended by the Government of Madras to have removed the Military Accountant's Office to Bangalore, to a fort claimed by the Maharajah of Mysore; but this project was stopped by the Calcutta Government on receiving the remonstrances of the people of Madras. Now, the statement in the Petition concerning expenditure was based upon, and confirmed by, a speech of Mr. Grant Duff's at the opening of the Madras Drainage Works on June 30 last. Now, in accordance with the Notice he had put down upon the Minutes, he would ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India (the Earl of Kimberley), whether he or the Supreme Government had given a previous sanction for the expenditure by Mr. Grant Duff for repairs of the Government House at Ootacamund, and for furniture and silk hangings; and, if not, why had they not fulfilled the office of what Mr. Grant Duff calls "financial demons," or, in Parliamentary language, that of strict supervisors of the way the money of the taxpayers of Southern India was expended? It was generally stated that £6,000 of this money had been expended on silk hangings for the Governor's House. He (Lord Stanley of Alderley) knew that Mr. Grant Duff's Predecessor had left the Government House in good tenable condition. Last year, when he complained in that House of Mr. Grant Duff's treatment of the prisoner of Palconda, and of his following in the footsteps of Sir Frederick Adam, he had mentioned instances of Sir Frederick Adam's maladministration of justice in the Ionian Islands. Besides that, Sir Frederick Adam had built for himself at the public expense three residences in Corfu and Zante, in addition to two palaces already provided for him. Here, again, Sir Frederick Adam's bad example had borne fruit, and Mr. Grant Duff had been as lavish on himself as his remote Predecessor had been. In his speech of the 80th of June last Mr. Grant Duff quoted a long extract from one of his own magazine articles, written 15 years ago, giving his ideal of our duties in India. The ideal is excellent, but the practice falls very far short of it. Mr. Grant Duff, however, deserved the commendation bestowed upon him by the noble Lord who had just sat down, for his industry in visiting all parts of the Presidency. Rather more than 30 years ago, there was a long correspondence at the Colonial Office with a Governor who, without authorization, had put up a pump. That might have been an excess of red tape; but there appeared to have been an excess the other way in the case of the silk hangings at Ootacamund.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in reply, said, that the noble Lord who had introduced the subject spoke with such great authority on questions of this kind, from his connection with the Government of Madras, and knowledge of India, that it was with great regret he was unable, in the main, to agree with the views the noble Lord had expressed. In point of principle, he did not see any difference at all between the Supreme Government and the Local Governments taking relaxation in the cooler regions of the Hills. So far as there was any public opinion in India, it was quite as adverse to the removal of the Governor General as it was to that of the Local Governments; and in principle he was unable to separate the one from the other. As the subject was one that had been much discussed of late, he would remark that the chief author of the migration to Simla was a Governor General who, of all others, was not the man to shirk work or to spare himself—he meant the late Lord Lawrence—the amount of work he did in India was astonishing, and his opinion was exceedingly strong on the necessity of the Supreme Government going to Simla. An interesting correspondence on the subject took place between the then Secretary of State for India—Sir Charles Wood—and Lord Lawrence, and a part of it was printed in The Life of Lord Lawrence. In a letter to Sir Charles Wood, written in 1864, and given in volume 2, at page 426, Lord Lawrence, speaking of the migration to Simla, said—

“I do not, however, think that a better arrangement is to be made. The work now is probably treble, possibly quadruple, what it was 20 years ago; and it is, for the most part, of a very difficult nature. Neither could your Governor General and his Council really do it in the hot weather in Calcutta. At the best, as you say, they would work at half speed. . . . This place, of all Hill Stations, seems to me the best for the Supreme Government. Here you are with one foot, I may say, in the Punjab, and another in the North-West Provinces. Here you are among a docile population, and yet near enough to influence Oude. Around you, in a word, are all the warlike races of India, all those on whose character and power our hold in India, exclusive of our own countrymen depends.”

The authority of Lord Lawrence seemed to him to be almost conclusive on the subject. When the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) was at the India Office he wrote a despatch, the effect of which was to prescribe a limit to the stay at Simla. As regarded what were termed the additional Members of the Viceroy's Council, there was no doubt it was more convenient, and in every way better, that the consideration of Bills should take place in Calcutta. With respect to the Petition from Madras, he was sure the noble Lord who presented it would not make himself responsible for all its statements, some of which were of an exaggerated kind. The apprehension that the Government was about to fix itself permanently at Ootacamund was altogether unfounded. Nor was there any intention to abolish the Board of Inland Revenue, although there were proposed reforms of it under consideration. Very exaggerated statements had been made as to the evil consequences of the Madras Government leaving Madras and going to the Hills. An arrangement was made in 1869, sanctioned by his noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll), that the Government of Madras should go to the Hills for three months in each year; and no doubt that arrangement had since been set aside. How this was first set aside he could not trace; but it appeared that when Lord Hobart went out he obtained permission to go to the Hills for a longer time, and since then it had become the uniform practice for the Governor to pass something like six months on the Hills. In this the Governors of Madras were only following the example of the other Local Governments. Opinions in the Indian Service had much changed on this subject. When the practice was first introduced, the older members of the Service condemned it; but further experience had changed their opinions, and the practice was now regarded as advantageous. Europeans, it was seen, could do their work much better if, during the hot season, they sojourned in cooler districts. Mr. Grant Duff had personally no objection to Madras. He said he had no particular desire to go away from Madras for six months; yet he was strongly in favour of the practice of doing so. No doubt, if the Governor simply perched himself on the Hills and did not descend into the Plains, the practice would be most undesirable; but, during his absence from Madras, it was Mr. Grant Duff's practice to take advantage of the opportunity to make journeys into the surrounding districts, to come into contact with the various communities, and to make himself acquainted with the working of the Civil Service in those parts of his Presidency. This was a very important point, and must be regarded as of great advantage, for unless the Governor saw these servants and knew how the work was being done, his administration could not be efficiently conducted. It must also be remembered that the Governor's residence on the Hills was only 24 hours' journey from Madras, and that he was, therefore, in constant communication with Madras. The Army headquarters had also been removed to the Hills, and with the strong approval of General Roberts. The proposed removal of a certain part of the military offices to Bangalore, which had been alluded to, was connected with certain changes in the arrangements of the fort at Madras; but the proposal had been given up. He (the Earl of Kimberley) did not desire to undervalue the importance of having the Governments in contact with the Europeans and all those who lived in the capitals. It was, no doubt, advantageous that the Governors should move about the country; but it would not do for them to lose touch of those who lived in the capitals. He quite admitted that; but, without saying anything derogatory of those who had raised this question in India, he thought they had, owing to their personal feelings in the matter, been led somewhat to exaggerate the inconvenience of the Governor's absence from Madras. It was very much a question of degree. It might lead to considerable difficulties if a Governor were absent unduly long; but Her Majesty's Government would take care that this did not take place. Reference had been made to the expenses of the Governor's residence on the Hills. The expense of building and furnishing that residence certainly had been large; but it would be unjust to lay this to the charge of Mr. Grant Duff, for it was in an advanced state when he first went out. It was, therefore, necessary to complete it and furnish it. The attention of the Government of India was first called to the erection of a Government House at Ootacamund in 1878, when explanations and estimates were asked for from the Madras Government. A revised estimate was sanctioned in 1882, and a final estimate in 1883. In answer to an inquiry from him as to this final estimate the Government of India explained that the expenditure was incurred by the Madras Government without their authority, under a misconception of which the origin must be traced many years back. The construction of the building entailed a corresponding expense in furnishing it; and when the matter first came under the cognizance of the Government of India the work had proceeded too far to justify any interference. As to the hangings mentioned by the noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley), Mr. Grant Duff, when he arrived at Madras, found that the house, which had been begun some years before he left England, required to be finished and furnished, and the silk hangings, about which he (the Earl of Kimberley) had no special information, were, he concluded, part of the furniture considered necessary. He had no reason to believe that they had cost more than silk hangings usually did.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM AND CHANDOS said, as one who had tried the power of doing work in India, and been able to watch the progress of work in the plains as compared with that on the Hills, he bore his testimony to the fact that there was a very material diminution, notwithstanding the high pressure at which they were working at the time, in the work that was got through during the five or six months of the hot weather in the Plains. He therefore fully endorsed the statement of his noble Friend the Secretary of State for India (the Earl of Kimberley), that a very much greater amount of work was got through by the Government in the Hills. There was one other point to which he wished to advert, and that was the marked difference of position between all Members of Council and other officers of the Government. The former, whatever amount of recreation they might have had on the Hills in former days, had now to work just as many hours in the Hills as in the plains. It must be remembered that during those five years during which a member of the Civil Service, after 21 years' service in India, served as a Member of Council he got no leave whatever, except by illness, from his regular duties; while every other officer could, if he found it necessary, cut himself adrift from business altogether for a month, whether he went away or not. That was an important difference, which could not be overlooked in the consideration of the question. During the time he had the honour to be in Madras he certainly came to the conclusion that it was for the interest of the Government that a reasonable time of change of climate should be spent by the Members of Council and the Governor all together upon the Hills.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that it was his privilege to appoint Lord Hobart; but he had not the slightest recollection of the arrangement which his noble Friend the Secretary of State for India (the Earl of Kimberley) had said originated with Lord Hobart; but he had no doubt that his noble Friend was quite accurate in stating that the change of extension of leave began in his time. He had a very distinct and vivid recollection of discussions on many occasions in the Council here when he was Secretary of State for India with reference to the Supreme Government of India. At that time, however, the Council was full of old, hardened men, some of whom were the finest specimens of humanity he had ever seen—such men as Mr. Prinsepp, Sir James Hogg, and Mr. Currie, all men who had spent 30 or 40 years in India with hardly any leave. They used habitually to quote to him the example of Lord Hastings, who never left Calcutta and always conducted his business sitting in the very stiffest of chairs, and dressed in the very stiffest of uniforms. That might be all very fine for men of such constitutions as his (Lord Hastings), and his (the Duke of Argyll's) view was simply this—that times had wholly changed since the days of Lord Hastings. The work was enormously greater, railways had been invented, and the distance from Simla was now comparatively nothing. His noble Friend (Lord Napier and Ettrick) had brought the matter forward with his usual ability and with great clearness; but, in his (the Duke of Argyll's) opinion, the balance of argument was largely against him.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, it was only fair, since Lord Hobart was unfortunately no more, to state that he had merely mentioned that he had been told that an extension had been made in Lord Hobart's time; but he had no certain authority for the statement. He wished to add that in 1882 the question of the longer stay of the Governor of Madras was before his Predecessor in Council; but the Secretary of State in Council did not then think it necessary to take any notice of the change from three to six months.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that, as far as he remembered, Lord Hobart did make some kind of understanding upon the subject of a longer stay in the Hills. That strong objection to the residence in the Hills was just dying away when he (the Marquess of Salisbury) was succeeded by his noble Friend opposite (the Duke of Argyll) as Secretary of State for India. Just then the stern Romans who had formed the bulk of the Council were beginning to resign, and it fell to his lot to fill up the vacancies; and all the younger men who were appointed fully believed in the value of the extension of the time in the Hills. Men like Mr. Prinsepp and Sir James Hogg looked upon the migration as the beginning of the decadence of the Indian Empire. He believed that the change of practice that had been brought about was due to increased facilities of locomotion, and where they existed it was impossible to resist the tendency to move. Before determining whether or not the Supreme Government should remain permanently at Calcutta, they ought to consider whether it was desirable that that Government should always be subjected to the Anglo-Indian influence, which made itself felt there, or whether that influence was not better exercised in a more intermittent manner. There was a time when it was thought that the influence in question should be exercised continuously; but recently that view had been modified. On the ground that the Government of India gained a certain independence, which might make itself felt in its decisions by an occasional absence from Calcutta, a great deal could be said in favour of its repairing to the Hills for a time. It would, however, be most unfortunate if a practice were to grow up of staying at Hill Stations during the whole of the time allowed to Government officials for such vacations. Formerly the Government used to treat the vacation as a precious opportunity for visiting various parts of the Dominion in order to come into contact with Native potentates and populations. Such visits, though expensive, conduced to the welfare of the country generally. Subject to these considerations, he thought it would be very unwise to compel officials to live throughout the year in places where at certain times the full power of their minds could not be exercised, especially when the tendency was to appoint to high places in our Eastern Empire men who had grown up in European politics rather than men having an exclusive experience of India.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that there was an informality in the Petition, inasmuch as it had no signatures attached to it, the signatures being on separate sheets. He would be extremely sorry, however, if the Petitioners should have the notion that it had been rejected. It was, no doubt, a bond fide Petition, and, though technically it could not be received, it should be understood that it had been before the House and discussed; and he hoped that the Petitioners would not entertain any feeling of disappointment.

Petition (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — OVER-PRESSURE AT GREAT WARFORD SCHOOL.—QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in asking the Lord President of the Council, Whether he intends to institute an inquiry into the causes of the death of a child named Harriet Straker, of Great Warford, from alleged over-pressure at school? said, that he would not have troubled the noble Lord for a single death only; but he was constrained to do so in this case, as the child's parents were neighbours of his, and the Macclesfield Sanitary Authority had written to him respecting it.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL), in reply, said, that the Education Department had written to the manager of the school requesting him to give his view of the case, and when it was obtained it would be at the disposal of the noble Lord, and the Department would consider whether any further inquiry would be necessary.

INDIA—THE INDIAN PENAL CODE—SECTION 7.—QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in asking the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India, Whether he will cause Section 75 of the Indian Penal Code to be amended by the insertion after the words "transportation for life" of the words "or any shorter time," so as to avoid the constant infliction of sentences of transportation or penal servitude for life for thefts of very trifling amount in cases where there have been previous convictions? said, that between 1876 and the present year the Records of the High Court of Madras showed that there had been in that Court nine sentences of transportation for life, and two of penal servitude for life, for trifling thefts by previous offenders. The alteration of the section mentioned in his Notice was the minimum that was asked for, so as to leave more discretion to the Judge; but he thought that the Code might well be amended by substituting some shorter period for that of transportation for life; and he was fortified in this view by the words of the Chief Justice, Lord Coleridge, at the opening of the Bedford Assizes, last 26th of October. The Chief Justice said—

"If heavy sentences were awarded in such cases, there were no sentences adequately severe for the far graver crimes which frequently came before Judges at Assizes."

Some time ago an official of the India Office had told him that these people who were sentenced were much better off at the Andaman Islands than in their own country. If that really were the case, it was enforced colonization, and should be reserved for deserving persons, and not for thieves.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in reply, said, he objected to the allegation that the severe sentences referred to in the Question were being "constantly" inflicted. The 75th section of the Indian Penal Code provided that in the case of second offences punishable by imprisonment of not less than three years, the Court might, at its discretion, either transport the offender for life or sentence him to a double term of imprisonment for 10 years. The provision was a salutary one, intended to meet the case of habitual offenders against the law. He was not aware that the power conferred by the nation upon the Judges had been abused; and he, therefore, could not agree to the suggestion that the Code should be amended.

AFRICA (SOUTH-WEST COAST)—ANGRA PEQUENA—THE PAPERS.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked Her Majesty's Government, If the Correspondence with the Cape and Foreign Governments relative to Angra Pequena and the neighbouring coast and islands can be laid on the Table of the House; also Correspondence with British subjects respecting any claims of property in those localities?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in reply, said, that his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville), who was engaged elsewhere, had told him that there would be no objection to lay all the Papers on the Table.

House adjourned at quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter
past Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

INDIA—LAW AND JUSTICE—MINUTES OF THE CHIEF JUSTICE OF BENGAL.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he has reason to believe that Sir Richard Garth, Chief Justice of Bengal, has twice sent to the public prints minutes containing censures on the Government of India, on one of the principal Members of the Cabinet, and on Parliament, in regard to acts of confiscation in Ireland, and in which, after publicly praying to God to avert such measures of confiscation from India, he appeals to the Zemindars to awake and resist the land policy of the Government of India; whether the Government of India, or the Viceroy, have made any representations on the subject; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have taken, or propose to take, any action in regard to it?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The Government of India have made representations on the subject of two Minutes by Sir Richard Garth, which are, no doubt, those referred to in the Question. The Minutes are certainly couched in language somewhat controversial. Having regard, however, to the high judicial position of Sir Richard Garth, and to the importance of maintaining satisfactory relations between the Government and the High Courts, it will be readily understood that it is not desirable that I should enter further into the matter.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—EXTRA PAY.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why the recommendation of the Constabulary Commission of 1882, with regard to extra payments of constables employed as Inspectors of Weights and Measures, has not been carried into effect?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Irish Government have had no suitable opportunity of dealing with this recommendation, which could not be carried out without legislation for the amendment of the Weights and Measures Act, involving an increased charge upon the cess.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — THE EDENDERRY DISTRICT, KING'S COUNTY.

MR. MOLLOY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that, in several cases recently tried by Messrs. Tyrrell and Ridgeway, Justices of the Peace for the Edenderry District of the King's County, persons convicted were advised by their solicitors to appeal, the convictions being manifestly illegal; whether the parties subsequently, and during the period open to them for appealing, were induced by the magistrate's clerk not to appeal, intimating to them that if they appealed, and were successful, the next time they came before the magistrates they would not be dealt with so leniently; whether, on the persuasion of the said clerk, the convicted parties refused to appeal; whether, in one case, the parties appealing paid the magistrate's clerk ten shillings to prepare the necessary form for his appeal; whether the said clerk accepted the said sum of ten shillings, and promised to have the appeal made out in due form, but subsequently, when the matter came before the County Court Judge, the necessary notices which the clerk undertook to serve, and was paid for drawing, were not served; whether this clerk was appointed, although he was not legally qualified; whether the said clerk is also a car proprietor in the town; and, whether the said clerk provides cars for the transfer of such prisoners to the county prison as are sentenced by the magistrates?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The hon. Member's Question is somewhat vague. More direct and satisfactory inquiry could have been made if he had mentioned the names of the parties to the cases to which he refers. So far as I have been able to ascertain from general inquiry, the clerk denies that in any cases he acted in the improper and irregular manner described in the Question; but if the hon. Member will give me some particulars by which the cases to which he alludes can be identified, I shall have further inquiry made. With regard to the position of the clerk, there is no ground for the suggestion that he was not legally qualified. It is true that, when appointed by the late Lord Lieutenant, he was over the age prescribed by His Excellency's Regulations on the subject; but these Regulations have no legal effect, and His Excellency was quite within his powers in making an exception when—as in the present instance—he deemed it for the public interests. The clerk is reported by the Head of his Department to have been always a satisfactory officer. With regard to the use of his cars for the conveyance of prisoners, I understand that other car proprietors in the district refused to hire out cars for the use of the authorities.

MR. MOLLOY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that there is not a single Catholic Magistrate for the district of Edenderry in the King's County; that in the memory of the present generation no Catholic Magistrate has sat in the Court House of Edenderry; if he is aware that there are several Catholic gentlemen in the neighbourhood qualified to receive the Commission; and, if he can state why none such are appointed?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I am informed that on the Edenderry Bench there is not at present any Catholic magistrate. I am not aware that properly-qualified Catholic gentlemen can be found in the neighbourhood to be placed in the Commission of the Peace; but the Lord Chancellor informs me that he has been in communication with the Lord Lieutenant of the county, who has not as yet been able to recommend any Catholic gentleman whose name has been suggested. The Lord Lieutenant of the county has, in the Lord Chancellor's opinion, evinced the utmost desire to redress, whenever possible, any religious inequality in the magistracy of his county.

MR. MOLLOY asked if the Lord Chancellor would receive the names of Catholic gentlemen properly qualified?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he was not precisely aware of the general course in such cases; but he would say he was sure the Lord Chancellor would be very willing to do anything in his power in the matter.

POOR LAW GUARDIANS (IRELAND)—QUALIFICATION.

MR. O'BRIEN (for MR. HEALY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that, under the 1 and 2 Vic. c. 56, s. 19, the Local Government Board have power, by general order, to fix the qualification necessary for Poor Law Guardians in Ireland; and, whether, this being so, the Board propose to reduce the qualification in all Irish Unions to a uniform £12 rating, having regard to the approval given by the Government to a provision with this object, which was included in the Poor Law Guardians (Ireland) Bill, passed by the House of Commons during last Session?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: It is true that the Local Government Board have such a power; but it is clearly not intended by the Acts now in force that they should use it in the manner suggested; and, the subject being now again before the Legislature, the Board would not deem it right to anticipate the decision with regard to it by any alteration in their procedure.

EDUCATION (IRELAND)—SUPPLY OF BOOKS, MAPS, &c., GRATIS TO NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will consider the propriety of supplying gratis to the National Schools in Ireland the books and maps requisite for educational purposes?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot undertake to make such a proposal to the Treasury. As I believe has been pointed out to the hon. Baronet on a former occasion, it would involve an increase of about £30,000 in the Parliamentary grant.

PRISONS (IRELAND) — MARYBOROUGH GAOL.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that, since Maryborough Gaol has been converted into a convict prison, the work of the staff has been very much increased; whether there are eight warders now receiving only local warders' salary, but compelled to do duty as convict warders; whether it is a fact that the warders are not allowed Sunday leave; whether two warders resigned, and two more were discharged, on medical grounds, as unable to perform the excessive work now imposed on them; whether John Gorman died of typhoid fever on the 27th October, and the chief warder and three ordinary warders are now dangerously ill, two in the County Infirmary, and two in their own homes, owing to the excessive confinement; and, whether the warders have not been subjected to an unusual number of assaults by the convicts "bordering on insanity," whom they are not numerous enough properly to control?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The General Prisons Board report to me that it is not a fact that since Maryborough Prison has been converted into a convict prison the work of the staff has been very much increased, and they explain the circumstances which may have given rise to the suggestions in the other parts of the Question. It is only in case of emergency, caused by absence of warders or otherwise, that local warders are occasionally called on to assist in the convict part of the prison. All warders are allowed their proper portion of partial or entire Sunday leave (partial every Sunday, entire one in six), except when absences on leave or through illness prevent. It is not a fact that two warders have resigned owing to excessive work. In a number of years only one has resigned, and he did so a few days after joining the service. It is not a fact that two warders have been invalidated owing to excessive work. Warder Gorman, who died recently, did not usually sleep or take his meals in the prison, but with his family in the town. Two warders are at present convalescent in the fever hospital, and two in their quarters in the prison. The medical officer states that their illness was not caused by confinement in the prison. As, however, it appears from this statement that there have been five cases of fever among the warders, I shall ask for a further special Report as to whether there can be any illness attributed to defects in the building. There have been no serious assaults in the prison; and the Prisons Board report that the staff is quite sufficient to control the prisoners.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1882 (WARRANTS) — EXTRA POLICE TAX — BALLICKMOYLER PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that, at the Ballickmoyler Petty Sessions of the 24th ultimo, the following persons were sued for the undermentioned sums on account of the Extra Police Tax, viz.: Margaret M'Donnell for  $\frac{1}{2}d.$  (one halfpenny); Thomas Delaney for  $2d.$ ; Thomas Gorman  $1d.$ ; Ellen Bruder  $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ ; John Abbin  $5d.$ ; John Brennan  $4d.$ ; William Mackey  $3\frac{1}{2}d.$ ; and whether he sanctioned these proceedings; and, whether he will state the grounds on which the Extra Police Tax is levied; and what there is or has been in the district to justify the impost?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The persons named were summoned as stated. The police tax is levied according to the valuation of the holdings, and the sums in this case were very small, as they were in payment for a period of only 18 days. The proceedings were taken in ordinary course of law, and my sanction was not required. The extra police force was sent to the district on account of the existence of intimidation and "Boycotting," whereby it became necessary to afford extra protection to certain obnoxious persons.

MR. O'BRIEN wished to know, in reference to a number of illegal decrees granted in the Monaniny case, whether the Government would pay the expenses of the police who carried out the illegal seizures?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN replied, that he was not aware of the circumstances.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he thinks it a wise or intelligent proceeding to put the whole machinery of the law in operation for the purpose of enforcing the payment of a halfpenny from a widow?

THE INDIAN FAMINE, 1877—THE MISSIONARIES.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it has been brought to his notice that missionaries, officially engaged in the distribution of relief in Southern India during the famine of 1877-8, had at the same time been engaged in lending money (at 18 per cent.) on mortgages of the lands of the natives, as shown by cases recently tried in the Law Courts of the Tinavelly and Madura districts, where judgments have been obtained for sums amounting (by accumulated interest) to nearly double the original loans; and, if there would be any objection to give a Return showing the number of such cases during the last four years?

MR. J. K. CROSS: We have no information on this subject at the India Office; and, from the papers with which my hon. and gallant Friend has furnished me, it does not appear that the action attributed to the missionaries in this matter is one with which the Government of India can interfere.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—

MR. GEORGE BOLTON.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Irish Government intend to continue any special employment of Mr. George Bolton in prosecutions under the provisions of the Crimes Act of 1882?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: No, Sir; the arrangements made in connection with the recent appointment of Crown Solicitor for Dublin will render the employment of Mr. Bolton in the capacity referred to in the Question unnecessary, and it is not intended to employ him specially under the provisions of the Prevention of Crime Act.

MR. O'BRIEN: Was not there a Crown Solicitor in Green Street during the period that Mr. Bolton was employed in the Maamtrasna murder cases?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: That refers to the past history of the matter, with which I am not acquainted; but if the hon. Member would give me Notice I may be able to answer him.

MR. O'BRIEN: Then I would ask the Solicitor General for Ireland, who must be acquainted with the past history of the case.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! This new Question does not arise in way out of the Question on the Paper.

MR. O'BRIEN: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it arises directly out of the Question on the Paper. What I wished to ask was, why it should be necessary to employ Mr. Bolton specially while Mr. Anderson was engaged as Crown Solicitor at Green Street, and not to employ him now that Mr. Coll has been appointed?

PUBLIC BOARDS (IRELAND)—AUDIT OF ACCOUNTS.

MR. PATRICK POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What decision, if any, has been come to with regard to the present system of auditing the accounts of Public Boards in Ireland; and, whether the Government intend curtailing the arbitrary power of surcharge at present vested in auditors in whose appointment the ratepayers have no voice?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: This subject could not be dealt with except by legislation. As has been stated on a former occasion, the Local Government Board do not think that anything in the action of their auditors has rendered a power of appeal from their ruling necessary; but, nevertheless, they think that such a right of appeal might properly be provided by law, if an opportunity for legislation on the subject occurred.

MR. PATRICK POWER further asked, Whether the law upon the subject in Ireland and England might not be assimilated?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he could not now make any promise with regard to legislation.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—THE SECRET SERVICE FUND.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Who is responsible for the disbursement of the Secret Service Fund in Ireland in the room of ex-County Inspector French; and, whether the men, Noonan and M'Dermott, referred to in French's letter, are still in the employment of the police?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Ex-County Inspector French never was responsible for the disbursement of the Secret Service Fund in Ireland. That responsibility rests with the Chief Secretary for the time being. Without in any way admitting the assumption involved in the latter part of the Question as to the two men named in it, I must distinctly decline to give any information as to the dealings of the Detective Department.

MR. O'BRIEN: Might I ask, whoever was responsible, was not the actual expenditure of the money in the hands of Detective Director French, and were these two men in his employment?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have already answered the hon. Member by stating that the responsibility to Parliament and the country for the disbursement of this money rests upon the Chief Secretary.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—POOR RATES, BANTRY UNION, CORK.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it has been brought under his notice that the rate collectors in the Bantry Union, county of Cork, have, by direction of Mr. Payne, Chairman of the Board, and also agent to Lord Bantry, compelled tenants on the Bantry Estate under £4 valuation to pay Poor Rate, without having first attempted to put in force section 2 of 6 and 7 Vic. c. 92; whether Mr. Payne, acting as Chairman of the Board, declined to put a resolution to the Board—

"Requesting the attendance of the rate collectors at the first meeting of the Board in each month," as required by paragraph 6 of Article

49 of the General Regulations; whether the Local Government Board will inquire into the conduct of the rate collectors; and, what notice will be taken of Mr. Payne's conduct?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This matter has been very fully before the Local Government Board, who have had explanations from the rate collectors which show that they did not act in the manner alleged. They say that they demand the rates from the immediate lessors who are rated; but that in some few instances the tenants have come in and paid voluntarily. There is no evidence before the Board that the collectors exceeded their powers; and as persons not legally liable to pay rates can protect their own interests and refuse to pay if asked to do so, the case does not call for any further interference on the part of the Board. With regard to the allegation that Mr. Payne refused to put a resolution from the chair, it appears that it was not until the clerk had declared the business of the Board to be concluded and the Chairman had actually left the chair that the resolution was proposed.

MR. DEASY: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware that the persons compelled to pay rates in these cases are very small farmers, who are wretchedly poor; and I would ask him, further, if he would grant an inquiry into the facts of the whole matter?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have already said that the Local Government Board looked very carefully into the matter, and found that there was no case for further inquiry.

MR. DEASY: Would the right hon. Gentleman send down a Local Government Inspector to hold an inquiry?

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—VOLUNTEER AND MILITIA SERGEANTS.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will take into consideration the case of the Volunteer Sergeants serving on the permanent staffs of Militia Battalions, with a view of placing them on an equal footing as regards pay and allowances with their comrades serving on the permanent staffs under Line engagements, as the former have to perform exactly similar duties, according to their rank, as the latter non-commissioned officers; if it is a fact that a sergeant who has served five years in a Line Battalion may, at his own request, be transferred to a Militia Battalion, when he will receive pay and allowances amounting to 3*s.* 5*d.* per day, with deferred pay at the rate of £3 per annum, free schooling for his children, and a pension of 2*s.* 3*d.* per day after twenty-one years' service; while a sergeant serving on a Militia engagement—though he be a Paymaster Sergeant, or Orderly Room Sergeant, no matter how long his service, or how deserving he may be—receives but 2*s.* 4*d.* per day and a pension of 1*s.* per day after twenty-seven years' service and upwards; and, whether Militia Sergeants serving on the permanent staff would be permitted to enlist on an Army engagement under the same conditions as recently granted to pensioners serving in a like manner?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is not in contemplation to equalize the pay and advantages of a Line sergeant serving on his Army engagement with those of a Volunteer sergeant who has given no service except in the Militia. The emoluments of the former must be taken as having, in part, reference to previous service in the Army, and as encouragement to good soldiers to aspire to the rank of non-commissioned officers. The ordinary source of supply for the permanent staff of the Militia battalions should be the Line battalions of the regiment.

POLITICAL CLUBS (IRELAND)—PUBLIC OFFICIALS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If Captain Lloyd, Governor of the County Sligo Prison, has become a member of the local Constitutional (Orange) Club; and if Dr. Murray, the Medical attendant of the prison, is a member of the Orange Society; and, whether, if so, such relations are permissible to officials in the public service?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It has, I believe, been made sufficiently clear upon former occasions in this House that the Irish Government entirely disapprove of public servants taking an active or prominent part in political demonstrations, but that they do not think it within their province to exercise control as to what clubs they may belong to. The Government are not made acquainted with the names of the members of the Orange Society; but I may say that I am informed that the hon. Member is quite mistaken in supposing that the Sligo Club, to which he refers, is any way connected with that society.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if the rule to which he refers applies all round; will public officials in Ireland be allowed to join Nationalist Associations, provided they take no active or prominent part in political demonstrations?

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF — PAYNE.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, If it has yet been ascertained that the young man Payne, committed for trial at the last Wicklow Assizes, on a charge of felony, had been in the employment of the Ex-Secretary to the General Post Office, Dublin; what explanation can be given of the fact that, although Payne had been committed to stand his trial for a felony, the principal witness, who had made an information, and had gone from Wales to give evidence at the trial, was informed by the police at Newtown Mount Kennedy, before the trial came on, that he would not be wanted; whether, in consequence of this intimation, the witness in question did not attend at the Assizes; whether, notwithstanding his absence, the Grand Jury found a true bill against Payne upon a minor charge; and, what became of this minor charge against Payne?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The hon. Member has been misinformed as to the facts, and hence my former answer on this subject may have appeared obscure. The charge of felony was in reference to a man named Powell. The minor charge was in reference to a man named Greene. If with this explanation the hon. Member will refer to my former answer, he will see the Question has been answered. It has not been ascertained that Payne had been in the employment of the ex-Secretary to the General Post Office.

MR. SEXTON wished to know why, in the interval in between the committal to prison and the entry of the nolle prosequi, the police took it upon themselves to get rid of the witness by telling him that he was not wanted?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER), said there was no such thing as a nolle prosequi in that case. The Attorney General for Ireland reported that he did not think the evidence sufficient to sustain the charge, and it was not proceeded with.

MR. SEXTON: But how did the police know that before the Assizes came on?

THE MAURITIUS — SIR NAPIER BROOME, ACTING GOVERNOR.

MR. WHITLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, when, in answer to a question put to him on the 3rd July last, he declined to lay upon the Table of the House the Correspondence relative to the illegal payment to Sir Napier Broome, while Acting Governor at Mauritius, he was aware that the Secretary of State for the Colonies had, several weeks previously to that date, ordered the Correspondence to be published in Mauritius, and that it was so published there; whether the Council of the Government of Mauritius has again refused to legalise the illegal payment to Sir Napier Broome; and, if so, whether any, and what, Correspondence has taken place upon such a refusal; whether he has now any objection to lay the Correspondence upon the Table of the House; and, whether he can now state what course the Government intend to adopt in regard to this matter?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: At the time named the Governor had been instructed to lay the Correspondence referred to before the Colonial Legislature for the purpose of their taking into consideration the legalizing of the payment to which that Correspondence relates. It is not customary to lay before Parliament incomplete Papers on a matter which is under the consideration of a Colonial Assembly. The objections to any such anticipation of the proceedings in the Colony are obvious. What has exactly happened in Mauritius is that the Council has suspended all further proceedings in the matter until fresh instructions are received from the Secretary of State upon a consideration of further documents and information submitted to him. As they only arrived by last mail, he has not yet had time fully to consider them. His decision and the whole Correspondence will shortly be given.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE CONGO CONFERENCE.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What representatives has Her Majesty's Government at present in the Congo, and at the Niger and Cameroons; also, whether anyone practically acquainted with West African trade will accompany the Mission to Berlin, with respect to the approaching Conference?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: There is no Representative at present on the Congo. There is a Consul for the Niger and Oil River district, who is at his post, and there are Vice Consuls on the Niger and at Amba Bay, in the Cameroon district. A third Vice Consul is about to leave England, and a fourth will be appointed. A Consular Officer will eventually be stationed on the Congo, which is within the district of the Consulate at Loanda. With regard to the second Question, it has been intimated to the Secretary of State that gentlemen practically acquainted with British West African trade will be present in Berlin during the Conference on behalf of important trade interests in the North of England. The Representatives of the British Government will be in communication with them on all points where their advice is likely to be useful.

MR. BOURKE asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, What is our Naval Force at present in the Bight of Benin, and at the Congo?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: According to the latest information the vessels in the Bight are the Alecto, steam vessel; Plirt, gun vessel; and the Forward, gunboat; at Cape Coast Castle there are the Prolic, gun-vessel; Watchful, gunboat; and the Opal, corvette. The Opal will shortly be replaced by the corvette Rapid.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND).

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has observed by the official

Return of Evictions in Ireland, in the quarter ended the 30th September last, that 1,215 families, comprising 6,139 persons, were evicted; 47 families, comprising 248 persons, were readmitted as tenants; and 569 families, comprising 2,870 persons, readmitted as caretakers, leaving 599 families, comprising 3,021 persons, homeless; whether he has noted that by the official Return for the corresponding quarter of 1883 it appeared that 957 families, comprising 4,671 persons, were evicted, 52 families, comprising 293 persons, readmitted as tenants, 416 families, comprising 1,989 persons, readmitted as caretakers, leaving 489 families, comprising 2,389 persons, homeless; and, in view of the fact that 110 families, comprising 632 persons, have been rendered homeless in the quarter ended 30th September last in excess of the number turned adrift in the corresponding quarter of last year, whether the Irish Executive have any information of the cause of the increase of evictions in the latter period, more especially in Ulster and Connaught?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Government have observed with regret the figures in the Returns from which the hon. Member quotes. They have no special information as to the causes of the increase in evictions, and the subject is too large to be satisfactorily dealt with by hypothetical arguments within the limits of an answer to a Question. I may observe, however, that persons evicted for non-payment of rent have, by law, a period of six months within which they may redeem or sell, and it may be hoped that in many of these cases this right will be exercised.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to cause the Local Government Board to instruct their Inspector to report as to the cause of the increased number of evictions?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not know that it is part of the business of the Local Government Board; but I will consider the matter.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND) — DRIMOLEAGUE (CORK) PETTY SESSIONAL DIVISION.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, At whose instance or suggestion the Lords Justices of Ireland gave notice that the question of the discontinuance of the Drimoleague (County Cork) Petty Sessional Division would be dealt with by the Justices assembled at the last Quarter Sessions at Skibbereen; whether a solicitor appeared before the said Justices, instructed by ratepayers, residents, and persons otherwise interested in the Drimoleague Division, to oppose its discontinuance, and submitted a Memorial from the said ratepayers and others assigning as reasons for the maintenance of the division, amongst others, that the district is large and populous, that the change would impose heavier costs on litigants, and that the existing difficulty in regularly holding the Drimoleague Sessions might be obviated by the appointment of eligible residents to the Commission of the Peace; and, whether the Irish Executive and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland will consider the expediency of continuing the Drimoleague Division, and of appointing local justices to transact its business?

COLONEL COLTHURST wished, before the Question was answered, to ask whether there was not a strong feeling among the ratepayers of the district against the discontinuance of these Petty Sessions; and, whether a Memorial had not been forwarded to the authorities on the subject?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The attention of the Government having been drawn to the small amount of business transacted at the Drimoleague Petty Sessions, and the frequent non-holding of Sessions, inquiries were made with the object of ascertaining the views of the magistrates and others in the district as to whether it was necessary to continue the Sessions. The large preponderance of the opinion elicited was in favour of the abolition of the Sessions. It was not until after this that the Government took the steps pointed out by Section 1 of the Petty Sessions Act, in order to have the matter considered at the Quarter Sessions. I believe that a Memorial such as is referred to in the second paragraph of the Question was presented, and I have no doubt that the Justices considered the representations contained in it. No formal Report of the result of the Justices' deliberations has yet been received. The decision rests with them, and not with the Executive. In answer to my

hon. and gallant Friend behind me, who speaks of a Memorial subsequently presented to the Lord Lieutenant, I may say that I am afraid that would have little effect, seeing the determination previously arrived at on the subject.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would make inquiries, before the Petty Sessions were abolished, in order to see whether the strong feelings of the ratepayers against the discontinuance of the Petty Sessions could not be satisfied?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN replied that, under the section of the Petty Sessions Act, the final decision rested with the Quarter Sessions.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—BECHUANALAND— MILITARY EXPEDITION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in the event of the failure of the negotiations for peace in South Africa, and a definite resolve to despatch a considerable Military Expedition into Bechuanaland, an Estimate will be submitted to the House as soon as possible, and an opportunity given for discussing it?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am now in correspondence with the Colonial Office and the Treasury as to the funds which will be required for preparations for the despatch of an Expedition.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked whether, when the noble Marquess ascertained the fund that would be required, he would afford an opportunity for discussion?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that would be decided when the arrangements were made.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)— THE FERRYBANK SCHOOLS, COUNTY WATERFORD.

MR. RICHARD POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, To state the exact date of the order of the Board of National Education, taking into connection with the Board the Ferrybank Schools, in the Waterford district, and constituting these Schools as National Schools?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Commissioners inform me that the date of their order is 25th February, 1879.

EGYPT—TRANSPORT OF THE NILE EXPEDITION.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has received any corroboration of the following statement made by the War Correspondent of The Daily Chronicle, and published in their issue of the 6th November:—

"The masts, oars, boat-hooks, punting poles, sails, and so on, of the Nile boats were all numbered, on leaving the builders, with the number of the boat to which they belonged. Somehow, or somewhere, they have been taken out, and then pitchforked, as it were, into the boats anyhow, and if a particular boat has the punting poles or a pair of oars belonging to her, she is sure to have the rest of the gear belonging to some other boat or boats. If the boat gear were interchangeable, this would matter little or nothing; but, as the gear of one builder will fit none of the boats of another builder, the consequence is that the already overworked white soldiers here have, with each successive consignment, to turn out under the hottest dry sun in the world, and sort, by numbers, every article of equipment, often, at the end of their job, finding a heap of gear belonging to some boats not yet up, and some boats without any gear at all to speak of. This is making work with a vengeance;"

and whether, if there is any truth in this statement, he will cause an inquiry to be made into the circumstances attending such apparently wanton negligence on the part of the Transport authorities, or of their subordinates?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Inquiry has been made; but we have no information which will corroborate the statement in the Question of the hon. Member. We have asked whether there is any foundation for it. The packing and despatch from this country were performed under the supervision of specially selected officers. Further, an officer as supercargo was sent with each consignment of boats to take charge of them and their gear during the voyage, so as to deliver them in a complete condition.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked, if an inquiry would be made into the truth of the matter?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I think it will be sufficient to say that it will be done when we find out that such mistakes as are suggested have been made.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BELFAST WORKHOUSE — FRAUDULENT BOOK-KEEPING.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to The Northern Whig newspaper report of the proceedings of the Belfast Board of Guardians of the previous day, in which it is alleged by Mr. Jackson, a large ratepayer in the Union, that an irregular, if not fraudulent, system of book-keeping has prevailed in the Belfast Workhouse for a long time past; if it be true that the master of this workhouse effected sales of farm produce, and other workhouse property, for one whole year and more, and made no entry, nor kept any record, of said sales in the books set apart by the Local Government Board for that purpose; if it be true that he has disregarded a resolution of the Board of Guardians requiring him to keep an inventory of the furniture and movable effects of the workhouse; if it be correct that forty paupers more were on the books of the workhouse, on the 29th September 1884, than were in the house; is it a fact that the present numbers in the house do not agree with those on the books; is it true that Major Stoddart, Government Auditor, and Inspector Hamilton, promised to conceal the master's misconduct, and did keep it concealed from the public, until Mr. Jackson's letter disclosed their conduct; have the Local Government Board condoned these offences; and, will an inquiry on oath be instituted into the whole question, or what steps will be taken?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: As this Question involves a great amount of detail, to answer which would occupy too much of the time of the House, I venture to ask the hon. Member to be content to receive a detailed answer from me in writing. The conclusion, however, to which the Local Government Board have come is that there is—"No doubt that there have been irregularities in the management of Belfast Workhouse in regard to the matters referred to in the Question, but they have received the necessary attention from the Guardians and have been dealt with by them, and there does not seem to be any reason to believe that a fraudulent system of book-keeping has prevailed in the workhouse. The Local Government Board do not consider an inquiry on oath necessary."

As regards the serious charges brought against two public officers in the Question, I may say that there are—"No grounds whatever for imputing to Colonel Stoddart and Mr. Hamilton a desire to shield the Master from the consequences of any impropriety on his part."

And the Local Government Board consider both these gentlemen incapable of acting in such a manner. They both distinctly deny having promised to conceal the Master's neglect, and the matter was brought before the Guardians by Mr. Hamilton at the first opportunity.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—ZULULAND.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that fresh hostilities have broken out in Zululand, this time between Oham and Dinazulu on one side, and Umnyamana, Undalreko, and Dabulamanzi on the other, and that the Boers, not content with the boundary line of the territory granted to them by Dinazulu, in payment of their services in the slaughter of Usibepu's people, are now laying out farms from 15 to 20 miles from the boundary then laid down? The hon. Gentleman also asked, Whether the Colonial Office have received any confirmation of the intelligence reported in The Times of Natal of October 4, to the effect that the Usutus made two fresh raids into the Reserve Territory towards the end of September, in one killing some natives and capturing 30 head of cattle, and in the other, which was made into Mr. John Dunn's district, killing one man and capturing 100 head of cattle; and, whether, if such reports are true, any steps will be taken to procure the restoration of the cattle and the punishment of the offenders, in fulfilment of the obligations of the Government towards the natives in the Reserve?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: We have no information as to statements contained in the first Question. As to the second Question, we have heard nothing about any raid made into Mr. John Dunn's district; but we have received a report that a raid was made on the 25th of September by the Usutus from Central Zululand on the kraals of the loyal Chief Mashinana, in which several Natives were wounded. The Resident Commissioner will take any steps that are advisable.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA — IMPORT DUTIES ON WEST INDIAN SUGAR.

MR. CAINE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If it is true that negotiations are proceeding between the United States Government and the West India Association, by which the United States are to remit the Import Duties on West India sugar, and the West Indies are to take off the Duties upon certain articles imported from the United States, and that it is further proposed, with a view to equalising the reciprocity, that the Duties on these articles coming from England are to be maintained; if so, will he undertake that no differential Duties will be placed against English manufactures as against those of the United States?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Her Majesty's Minister at Washington has been instructed to enter into negotiations with the United States Government for a reciprocal commercial arrangement of the nature specified in the first part of the Question. With regard to the second part of the Question, I have to say that no such arrangement is contemplated and no such proposal made.

CHINA—ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE AT THE TREATY PORTS.

MR. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table any Correspondence which may have passed between them and the Government of China, relative to the extradition of criminals or the judicial practice of torture in connection with the mixed Commission Courts at the Treaty Ports?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government have been in correspondence with the Government of China at various times, as cases have arisen, on the subject of the extradition of Chinese fugitives by the Government of the Colony of Hong Kong under Article 21 of the Treaty of Tien Tsin, and the undertaking which is given against the use of torture. There is no Correspondence relative to the Mixed Courts at the Treaty Ports. Her Majesty's Government do not propose to lay any Papers at present.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND) — MR. PETER DOUGLAS, PETTY SESSIONS CLERK OF BALTINGLASS AND DUNLAVIN.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is Peter Douglas, who holds the office of Petty Sessions Clerk at Baltinglass and Dunlavin, the same Peter Douglas who is a Poor Law Guardian for Baltinglass; and, if so, is the holding of the office of Poor Law Guardian and Petty Sessions Clerk compatible with the rule made by the Registrar of Petty Sessions Clerks lately, that the holders of such positions can occupy no other at the same time?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Mr. Douglas, the Clerk of Petty Sessions at Baltinglass and Dunlavin, is a Poor Law Guardian for the Baltinglass Union; but he was elected to the latter office before the Rule to which the hon. Member refers was issued. That Rule was not made retrospective, but contains a proviso permitting Clerks of Petty Sessions who at the time of its issue held the office of Poor Law Guardian to retain such position for the remainder of the term for which they had been elected.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether the Government had considered the Circular alluded to; and whether they had come to the conclusion that it was or was not ultra vires?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, perhaps the hon. Member would put the Question on the Paper?

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BANTRY BOARD OF GUARDIANS—MR. PAYNE.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the attention of the Local Government Board has been drawn to the fact that Mr. Payne, Chairman of the Bantry Board of Guardians, frequently commences the business of the Board before the regularly appointed time, viz.: twelve, noon; and, whether the Local Government Board will direct Mr. Payne to observe the rules strictly in future?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Local Government Board inform me that their attention has been directed to this subject, and they have written to the Guardians with regard to it, and expect to hear from them after their next Board meeting.

EGYPT (EXPEDITION UP THE NILE)— THE CAMEL CORPS.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM asked the Secretary of State for War, How many officers and how many non-commissioned officers and men were furnished by the Brigade of Guards for Camel Corps service with the Nile Expedition?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Twenty-three officers and 430 non-commissioned officers and men.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, How many officers and how many non-commissioned officers and men were furnished by the Royal Marine forces for Camel Corps service with the Nile Expedition?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: Two officers and 83 non-commissioned officers and men have been furnished by the Royal Marine Light Infantry.

NAVY—THE ROYAL MARINES.

VISCOUNT LEWISHAM asked the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, To state the total effective strength of the Royal Marine Forces on shore in the United Kingdom and available for immediate service, afloat or abroad, on the 31st October last year and on the 31st October this year?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The total strength of the Royal Marines on shore on October 31 last year was 6,081. The force available for immediate service was 3,854. The effective strength on shore this year was 5,138, and 2,984 were available for immediate service.

ARMY—LARGE GUN PRACTICE—COM- PENSATION FOR DAMAGES.

MR. GREER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is a fact that damage has been done to private property by the firing of large guns at Carrickfergus Castle, during the recent training of the 2nd Brigade North Irish Division Royal Artillery; and, if so, whether he is prepared to give compensation for such damage?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Two claims have been received for damage due to the firing of heavy guns at Carrickfergus. They have both been refused, upon the general principle that compensation is not granted for damage caused by concussion from the firing of guns from a fixed battery.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—PRO- CURATORS FISCAL—THE DISTURB- ANCES IN THE HEBRIDES.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What measures he proposes to adopt in view of the threatened agrarian troubles in the Hebrides, to ensure the impartial administration of justice, considering that the Public Prosecutor, the Procurator Fiscal, is also the principal resident land agent, and law agent of the largest landlords in the district; and, whether he is aware that, after the agrarian disturbances in Uig some years ago, the then Sheriff of the County superseded the gentleman who was then the Procurator Fiscal, and who held the same offices for the landlords as the present Procurator Fiscal, on the ground that he (the Sheriff) considered it incompatible for the same person to act for the Crown and also for the landlords?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR), who replied, said: I am afraid I cannot add anything material to the answer I gave the hon. Member when he put substantially the same Question on the 16th of June last, which I will read. It is as follows:—

"The gentleman who was Sheriff of the county at the time referred to—1874—is now dead, and I am therefore unable to obtain precise information as to the reasons which induced him to recall the appointment of the Procurator Fiscal; but I believe that one reason—I cannot say that it was the sole reason—for his doing so was the fact that the Procurator Fiscal was also the factor upon the estate—that is, manager for the proprietor. It is necessary to distinguish between factor and law agent; and I do not think that holding the office of law agent can have been considered by the Sheriff to be incompatible with the office of Procurator Fiscal, because the gentleman whom he appointed on that occasion was, as I understand, then, as now, the local law agent of the proprietor. He was not, however, and is not, factor on the estate. I may add that at the date in question Procurators Fiscal held a commission from the Sheriff, which he could recall at pleasure, and without reason assigned; but by the provisions of the Sheriff Court Act, 1877, they are only removable by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State for inability or misbehaviour, upon a report by the Lord President of the Court of Session and the Lord Justice Clerk."—(3 Hansard, [289] 399.)

MR. J. W. BARCLAY: In consequence of the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I beg to ask whether the proprietor has any other law or land agent in the Lewis or Hebrides except this gentleman, the Procurator Fiscal; and if he will be good enough to state to the House where this gentleman whom he calls factor resides?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I cannot tell as to that matter; but my information is that this gentleman belongs to a firm who are the local law agents for the proprietrix—that is say, who do any legal business that may be required. Law agent is not the term that we should use in Scotland. Further, according to my information, this gentleman is not a factor, and the estate is managed by other persons.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY: The right hon. and learned Gentleman says the factor was non-resident, and that this law agent was not factor. I wish to know whether the proprietor has any other factor except this Procurator Fiscal?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I am not in a position to state. I will inquire. My information is that he is not factor.

DR. CAMERON: I wish to ask the Lord Advocate whether the information upon which he has acted in sending armed police there, who are said to be supported by Marines, has been got from the Procurator Fiscal, who is also in the employ of the landlord there?

MR. MACFARLANE: Before the right hon. and learned Gentleman answers that Question, I should like to ask, with reference to the despatch of a police force on the ground of riots, whether there is any truth in the statement that 300 Marines are being sent to the Island of Skye; and whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be good enough to state what had occurred in the Island of Skye to require the presence of a military force?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I must say, in the first place, that there is a confusion of localities in both Questions now put to me. It is not uncommon to have Highland names which have the same significance occurring in different places. This Question relates to Uig, in the Island of Lewis, and there have been no police arrangements there that I am aware of. What I believe the other Question relates to is Uig, in the Island of Skye. I am not in a position to state at the present moment what arrangements it has been thought necessary to make for the preservation of peace and order. These will be made known in due time.

DR. CAMERON: This is a very important matter, as a collision is threatened. Things have a very serious aspect. May I ask whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman has taken, or will take, care to inform himself as to the actual state of facts from some thoroughly independent and reliable source before taking steps?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I need not say in a matter of this sort that the Government have taken, and will continue to take, the most careful steps; and it so happens, with reference to this place in Skye, that there has never been a whisper against the Procurator Fiscal. At all events, the information which the Government received is derived from a variety of sources, and is really not open to dispute.

MR. MACFARLANE: The Uig I mentioned is not that in the Island of Lewis, but Uig in the Island of Skye. I wish to ask whether it is true, as stated in a Central News telegram, that 300 Marines have been sent off to the Island of Skye?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I stated to the hon. Member that I shall not at this moment mention here what arrangements the Government have thought necessary to make.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY: In consequence of the answers of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether it is the Home Secretary or the Lord Advocate for Scotland who is responsible for the proceedings which have been taken in Skye at the present moment, and which have been alluded to in my Question?

MR. GLADSTONE: Undoubtedly, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department is the person principally responsible, and properly responsible, for the maintenance of peace and order in England and Scotland.

Subsequently,

MR. GLADSTONE added: I want to say, with reference to the answer which I just gave, that I understood the Question to be this—Whether the Government were responsible as between one Member of the Government and another? Of course, I do not mean to say that my right hon. and learned Friend is responsible in derogation of the functions which belong to the Local Authorities with respect to the maintenance and preservation of peace.

THE PATENT OFFICE—THE LIBRARY.

MR. JAMES HOWARD asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, considering the effect of the new Patent Law in increasing the number of visitors at the Library and the Reading Room of the Patent Office, he has in contemplation any plan for rendering this portion of the establishment more adequate to present requirements, and also more accessible than by the ascent of a difficult staircase of some sixty steps?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The Board of Trade has for some time past had under consideration the question of enlarging the Library at the Patent Office, and it has been decided to increase the existing Library so as to afford about double the present accommodation. The work will be commenced as soon as the money has been voted for the purpose. I fear that I cannot hold out any prospect of doing away with the staircase of which the hon. Member complains, as there is no room on the ground floor of the Patent Office for a Library of the requisite size.

MR. JAMES HOWARD asked whether there was any intention on the part of the Government to build a new Patent Office?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: No.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—ZULULAND.

MR. R. T. REID asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether in view of the statements in the public papers that the Boers in Zululand have been communicating with Sir Henry Bulwer for the purpose of order being restored to that Country, he is in a position to state that the time has come (to which he referred in his speech made on the 30th July last) when the British Government can be useful in promoting the peaceful settlement of Zululand; and, whether he can state what steps are being taken in that direction?

MR. GLADSTONE: There has been no such communication down to the present date between the Boers and Sir Henry Bulwer as would, in our judgment, constitute any ground for intervention in the affairs of Zululand beyond the Reserve; and, although adhering to the declarations we have made, we do not think that the time has come when any intervention of that kind could be usefully attempted. I may say that further Papers will shortly be laid upon the Table, and I believe that they give a clear and accurate account of the state of the facts. In the meantime, I am assured that, according to the best judgment of the Colonial Department, there seems to be no reason to fear any violation of the Reserve territory.

EGYPT—THE VOTE OF CREDIT.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to put a Question to the Prime Minister, of which I have given him private Notice. I wish to ask him, When he expects to bring forward the Vote for the Expedition up the Nile, and what will be the course of procedure with regard to it? Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will also inform us when he thinks it probable that he will have to make any communication to the House on the subject of the Earl of Northbrook's Report?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have not had an opportunity since I received the right hon. Baronet's note of holding communication with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has been at Cambridge to-day in connection with a melancholy event; but I think that I am correct in saying that it is our intention to bring forward this Vote immediately upon getting the Franchise Bill through all its stages. We have not yet got the Speaker out of the Chair, and I should not like to-day to endeavour to estimate the time or to name a day; but we should be prepared immediately—we should hope to-morrow—to be able to make a forecast. We will do so if we can, and I will then also advert to the other Question with regard to the recommendations and the Report of the Earl of Northbrook.

MR. ONSLOW: In consequence of that answer, I beg to ask will the right hon. Gentleman consider further whether he will lay on the Table the instructions given to Lord Wolseley in regard to the relative position of himself and General Gordon?

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not think it is in my power to add to what has been already stated by myself and my noble Friend. I stated that I would lay these instructions upon the Table as soon as we felt that it could be done without practical inconvenience.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE
BILL—EXTENSION AND RECTIFICA-TION OF BOUNDARIES—INSTRU-CTION TO THE COMMITTEE.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I wish to put a Question to you, Sir, in order to obtain your decision upon a point of Order. I see that the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson) has placed upon the Paper an Instruction to the Committee on the Representation of the People Bill, the object of which is to provide for the extension and rectification of boundaries. You are aware, Sir, that we discussed that question for two nights last week; and I wish to know whether, having already decided the point, it is competent for the hon. Gentleman to raise it again to-night?

MR. SPEAKER: It would have been in Order for the hon. Gentleman to have moved the Instruction—which I understand he does not intend to do; but of that I have not been officially informed. It would be perfectly in Order to move an Instruction to the Committee to do what it would otherwise not be able to do.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

BILL.—[BILL I.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Trevelyan, The Lord Advocate.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. TOMLINSON said, that he had decided not to move the Instruction to the Committee which stood upon the Paper in his name, inasmuch as he found that it had no chance of obtaining the favourable consideration of the Government.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, I do not rise on this occasion for the purpose of making a speech, but for the purpose of saving time, and what is of still more importance than the saving of time, of preventing misunderstanding hereafter. I think it right that it should be distinctly placed on record—as far as I am myself concerned, and as I believe many hon. Members on this side of the House are concerned—the fact that we have abstained from placing upon the Paper Amendments to the Bill in the interests of the time of Parliament, and not on account of our being in any shape or form satisfied to accept the Bill as it stands. The reception accorded to the proposals made upon this side of the House, during the last Session, was not such as to encourage those who desire to propose practical Amendments to again bring their views before the House of Commons. I think it also right that some reference should be made to the tone in which some observations from this side of the House during the recent debate have been received by the Party opposite both inside and outside this House. Attempts have been made to interpret the moderate and conciliatory language which has happily characterized recent debate in this House into an abdication on the part of the Conservative Party of those cardinal principles from which it never has receded—principles from which, I venture to say, it never will recede. Those principles are distinctly embodied in the very clear and unmistakable Amendment of my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Stanley)—an Amendment which I think has very properly been made an exception to the general abstention from moving Amendments on this side of the House to which I have referred. There can, however, be no greater mistake than for any impression to get abroad that any person or persons could, under any circumstances, be authorized to commit the Conservative Party to any abdication of those great fundamental principles which are embodied in the Amendment of my right hon. and gallant Friend, and in those Resolutions and proposals which have already been submitted from this side of the House. I was somewhat amused to see the eagerness with which the right hon. Gentlemen the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) seized upon an expression which he evidently had wholly misunderstood, and which he thought had fallen from my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross). The construction which he put upon that expression was that anything would satisfy the contention urged on this side of the House—anything short of a compliance with the proposition which had been formally laid down in Amendments for which the Conservative Party has made itself responsible in both Houses of Parliament. I may say that I entirely repudiate the construction which the President of the Local Government Board placed upon the conciliatory and most statesmanlike remarks of my right hon. Friend the late Home Secretary (Sir R. Assheton Cross). That construction totally differs from the true text of the speech of my right hon. Friend. The idea that any Resolution, however unanimously acceded to by this or the other House of Parliament, could in any shape or form remove the objection which has always been persistently and consistently entertained among all Members of the Conservative Party to deal with the question of the franchise without having at the same time placed on the Statute Book an enactment dealing with the redistribution of seats! However, it is not Resolutions unanimously acceded to, it is not schemes of contemplated Bills—whether surreptitiously or formally communicated to the public—which we want. We do not want Resolutions or Bills; what we want is an Act of Parliament. I would venture humbly to throw out this suggestion—that any person or persons who place any reliance upon rumours of backstairs intrigue, or attempts to settle a great question behind the back of Parliament, are reckoning without their host. When certain proposals had been made known to the public, designedly or otherwise, and were generally assumed to embody the views of Her Majesty's Government, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote) took the earliest opportunity of intimating that he would not even discuss the proposal unless formulated on the authority of Her Majesty's Government and presented to Parliament. I have thought it right to state my view of this matter—a view which I think will commend itself to the great mass certainly of the Conservative Party. With regard to the Bill now before the House, I must again express my regret that Her Majesty's Government have impaired the Bill, and have presented it, being apparently prepared to do so, without having in any shape or form taken into consideration the great and fundamental question of representation of minorities. Upon this subject I should have liked to make a proposal to the House, but it would evidently have been open to the charge of uselessly consuming the time of the House. Again placing on record my protest against the Bill on that and on other grounds, I wish to guard myself against any application of the nemine contradicente doctrine.

MR. LEWIS said, he also wished to guard himself against any repetition of what took place on the previous occasion. He was present at the celebrated nemine contradicente scene, and, like a good many hon. Members, was rather taken by surprise. He wished to take this opportunity of protesting that the Conservative Party had not in the least withdrawn from the position which they had hitherto taken up, and he could, with the full knowledge of his constituents, say that in their opinion nothing could be more disastrous to the future prospects of Ireland than the application of the Bill to that country. They had the strongest reason for believing that it would only aggravate the existing troubles in Ireland.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he also desired to state that he was quite opposed to the inclusion of Ireland in the Bill. And on behalf of a section of Irish Representatives—although they did not put Amendments on the Paper to impede the passing of the measure—it was not to be supposed they approved of the application of the Bill to Ireland.

MR. GLADSTONE: The speeches of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther) and of the hon. Gentlemen who followed him represent a sentiment of stern opposition to the principles of the present Bill. I think that the House is indebted to them, and that they have exercised a sound discretion in not renewing debates on matters which have been fairly decided and exhaustively discussed by the House. I thank them for that very Parliamentary and reasonable conclusion. However, I do not quite understand the capacity in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) spoke; because, at one time, he appeared modestly to disclaim the character of one who commits others by his declarations, but rather to speak for himself, or, at any rate, for some section of Gentlemen on the other side of the House. He was sustained in that proposition by cheering, which was extremely lively and warm, but what is called very thin, proceeding from a number of Gentlemen who might be counted on the fingers, and on the full complement of the fingers, but who undoubtedly did by zeal make up for want of numerical strength. The right hon. Gentleman went further, and made an apology or an explanation on behalf of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), who is not now in the House, and said that my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had altogether misconstrued a declaration or an expression of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire with respect to proceeding by Resolution. If there was any such declaration, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther) entirely disavowed it, and authoritatively retracted it. He did not say, however, that he had received any authority from the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) to retract it. There was a decided gap in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther) upon that point of the case; and I may observe that when that expression was used by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross), it was noticed by my right hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) in careful and guarded terms, simply speaking of it as an indication of a friendly and pacific spirit. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was in the House when my right hon. Friend spoke; he listened to my right hon. Friend's observation, and he appeared to be eminently well contented with it. I am puzzled by this very authoritative retraction which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther) seems to give, not in consequence of his having been delegated to do so by the right hon. Gentleman who made the declaration, but apparently in consequence of a kind of supreme dominion which overrides all the declarations of other Members. That is a reserve power like the sacred power of Parliament, which can do anything except change a woman into a man. The right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to mend the inaccuracies and errors of hon. Members around him; and I take it that, in the exercise of that power, he made the explanation to which we have listened. I beg to thank him for the intention which he has announced, and I think he has arrived at a sound and wise judgment.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I regret that my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was not aware that the subject would be raised, or he would have been in his place. I myself distinctly understood that what my right hon. Friend said on the last occasion was somewhat in the nature of an obiter dictum, and it was perhaps taken up by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister with more keenness than perhaps my right hon. Friend supposed would be the case. I do not know, however, that we shall gain very much by a discussion of the point. I am only anxious that no mistake on the subject should be made; and I say again what I have said frequently on this subject, that while we assent to the passing on of this Franchise Bill we do so on the understanding, and as far as we are able to enforce such an understanding, that it must be accompanied by a distinct and clear measure of redistribution.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, he was certain that the Franchise Bill would not be passed unless the Prime Minister brought forward his Redistribution Bill and placed it upon the Table. What had they been fighting for through the Recess? [Ministerial cheers.] Yes; and there had been a significant answer from South Warwickshire. He was informed that if there was one thing more than another which turned that election it was whether or not the House of Lords was to be supported in the position it had taken up. Would it not be wise and prudent, if the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was anxious that the Franchise Bill should be passed, that he should bring in a Redistribution Bill? By adjourning the House over Christmas he would have up to next June to pass it. If he declined to bring it in, upon his head and his alone must rest the responsibility.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1 (Short title of Act) agreed to.

Clause 2 (Uniform household and lodger franchise).

COLONEL STANLEY, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 11, after the word "and," to insert—

"After the passing of this Act, and of an Act to be passed for amending the Acts which settle and describe the divisions of counties, and the limits of cities and boroughs of the United Kingdom, for the purpose of the election of Members to serve in Parliament," said: In rising for the purpose of moving the same Amendment which it was my duty to propose last Session, I need hardly assure the Committee that I do not propose it any obstructive spirit. I think there is a desire on all sides of the House—and it was even evinced just now by my right hon. Friend the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther)—that the debate upon the Bill should not be any longer protracted here. I need also hardly say that I propose this Amendment not in a hostile spirit, but with a two-fold object. First of all, that we may place on record, in the most formal manner, that which is our opinion; and, at the same time, in order that we should see whether, in Committee, by an interchange of views—which is, perhaps, easier and less hampered by forms in Committee than at any other stage of the Bill—means may not be found for bringing this question nearer to some final adjustment. I ask pardon if I speak plainly to the Committee. I ask leave also to put aside many references which I should like to have made, under any other circumstances, to speeches which have been delivered in the Recess; but I think that at this period, standing as we do, it is far better that we should entirely put aside reference to all extreme statements of opinion, which otherwise might form an obstacle to steady and quiet proceedings, and that we should, as far as possible, look carefully and judicially at the position in which this House and Parliament find themselves placed at the present moment. The main question which I venture to ask, and which I think the country asks, is—"Are the differences between the two sides of the House, upon this great question, now insurmountable?" In proposing this Amendment, I need hardly say that I wish to anticipate at once the very fair objection which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister took when I proposed this Amendment last year. I take his actual words, and I have no right to complain that the right hon. Gentleman made use of them. He said, truly enough, that this Amendment, if carried, would completely hang up the Franchise Bill, and make it dependent entirely upon the passing of the Redistribution Bill, and it would follow that if no Redistribution Bill were ever passed, the Franchise Bill would be forever suspended. Of course, I make the right hon. Gentleman a present of that argument. If I could have been able, I should have been glad to find words that would express the meaning of hon. Members on this side of the House which would not be open to that objection; but, however logical that argument may be, I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman really believes, or whether anyone in this House or in the country really believes, that, at the present moment, such a proceeding as the right hon. Gentleman indicates is possible? I venture to sum up, briefly, the differences which it seems to me exist between the two sides of the House, and in doing so it is with an earnest desire, by examining them, to make those differences smaller, and to bring them to a vanishing point. But there is a certain point, as the right hon. Gentleman himself said, up to which we have a right to retain our opinion, if possible, although, on the other hand, there is nothing we have said which we desire to conceal, and in regard to which we are not open to discussion, and, if necessary, to conviction. Where there seems to be a fundamental difference is that the Government—as shown by the opinions expressed by the Prime Minister—seem to think that the conferring of the vote is that which has the greatest value—that the attaching and giving of the vote to the individual is that which is the most important part of this measure. We, on the other hand—and I will ask the Committee to follow the distinction—rather look at the giving of the vote to the individual as enabling that individual to do his duty to the constituency, and to the country of which the constituency forms part, in forming the opinion of the constituency, and in recording, in his opinion, that which is best for the constituency and the country. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman goes only to the conferring of the franchise, giving the right to the individual to vote, and leaves untouched the more important part of the question—namely, whether that individual shall exercise the franchise as one of 10,000, of 40,000, or of 100,000? That, in the view of the right hon. Gentleman, seems to be altogether immaterial. We, on the other hand, say that we are fully aware, and think it right both for the country and for the persons exercising the franchise, that they should know where they are to exercise the vote, in what proportion, and with what general reference to the vote of the constituency and the representation of the country of which the constituency forms part. Then there comes this other difficulty. We say that if you dissociate the Franchise Bill and the Redistribution Bill—however honourable the intentions of the Government may be, however fairly they may wish to carry them out—and I, for one, do not doubt their sincerity—there can be no guarantee that circumstances may not prevent you from getting the second part of the question dealt with either by this Parliament or by the next Parliament, but by a hybrid Parliament which would neither represent the old constituencies nor the new. One of the Colleagues of the Government has left on record a speech which will be read even now with some admiration as to its logic and the clear common sense which it contains. As the question is one of controversy, I only want to show very briefly where the differences lie between us. The Government say that they are anxious that redistribution should follow closely on the franchise; we, on the other hand, say that it should be part of one measure, or that it should be simultaneous. The Government say that they are anxious, to have the measure dealt with in one Parliament; we say that it is not only advisable, but essential. In the discussions which have taken place within the last few days, of which I, for one, have been glad to see the conciliatory tone, I do not suppose there is, as to all the other points—the question of population, the simplicity of the Bill, its equity towards the four divisions of the country, and the general justice which it does to the community—the slightest difference in principle on either side of the House. Then, what is the argument of the Government? We think we have a strong argument, we think we have shown a just ground, looking at its effects on future constituencies, and next as to the possible miscarriage between the passing of the one Bill and the passing of the other—we think we have shown good reason why those two Bills should be closely associated. The one answer of the Government is, that if they were to introduce a Redistribution Bill, they might jeopardize the Franchise Bill. The reply I will humbly make to that is, that they jeopardize far more the fate of their Bill by keeping back the information which the House desires, and upon which, I honestly believe, the majority of the House would very gladly act. It is my own opinion—it may be a very simple one, but I cannot help expressing it—that a fair Bill would receive fair treatment, and that distrust, or what appears to be distrust, of this House, is sure, on the other hand, to bring distrust in its turn. I have endeavoured, as I said before, to see in what form I could possibly cast this Amendment, so that it should be in a form, I will not say palatable, but the least obnoxious to the criticisms which it is likely to meet with from the Government; but I frankly confess I have failed to do so, and I have been unable to put it in any other form than that in which it stands. I am all the more convinced, if we have to record our view, that it is best we should do so in the simplest and broadest form, rather than accompany it with a reference to any date, or to hang up the Bill for a certain time in a manner which, however well meant, might, in the event of certain contingencies, form a source of serious misunderstanding between the two sides of the House. As to the fate of the Amendment, I freely confess that I have hardly a parental interest. But I may say this—that the Amendment is framed with an honest desire to facilitate, and not to obstruct, the passage of the Bill. There is only one quotation which I will venture to make, and it is one which the right hon. Gentleman will hardly dissent from, seeing that the words fell from himself a very short time ago. It is his belief that there is a feeling in many parts of the House that all our efforts in all quarters should be directed to the safe and fair adjustment of redistribution. I believe there is a general feeling that it is not for the credit of the House, nor for the credit of Her Majesty's Government, nor for the credit of Parliament, that things should be hung up in this way any longer. The right hon. Gentleman thinks there would be danger to this Bill by introducing the subject of redistribution. But surely he underrates the general feeling of the country; he underrates his own abilities; and more than all, perhaps, he underrates the merits of this question in entertaining that opinion. The people ask whether, all this time that we are debating about procedure, we could not have passed a Redistribution Bill? My belief is that if the Government, even now, were able to add to the information which they can give to the House, and to indicate clearly the general lines and principles upon which their scheme is to be founded, so far from creating any obstacles to themselves, they would have done that which will facilitate the passage not only of this, but of both Bills, during the present Session. I do not think the other side of the House is blind to the possible circumstances which may arise from our present want of information. With a little more confidence on one side, and perhaps a little less fear on the other, there ought not to be, even in the present Parliament, any obstacles or difficulties in the way. I do not venture to speak on all these points as though I were the mouthpiece of others; but I have ventured to put before the House what I myself feel with regard to this question. I do most earnestly appeal to the Government, in the sense in which they have met us within the last few days, to amplify what we have sketched out in words by giving us further information, so far as may be, of a tangible character; and if they do that, they, I think, will have done more than all to place this great question in the position in which we wish to see it—on the surest foundations. I beg to move the Amendment which I have placed on the Paper.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 11, after the word "and," to insert the words "after the passing of this Act, and of an Act to be passed for amending the Acts which settle and describe the divisions of counties, and the limits of cities and boroughs of the United Kingdom, for the purpose of the election of Members to serve in Parliament."—(Colonel Stanley.)

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. and gallant Gentleman has said that he does not make this Motion in any obstructive spirit, and I fully agree that it would be highly irrational in me to describe, as obstructive, the renewal in a temperate form of any proposition which he may have thought it necessary to make on a previous occasion with reference to the present Bill. Undoubtedly, though I am not able in any way to accede to his Motion, but, on the contrary, regard it now as more objectionable even than it was when made at the former period, I fully admit that it is a Motion he is entitled to make, and he has brought it forward in a temperate and conciliatory manner, with no larger demand upon the time of the Committee than he was justified in making. There were words at the conclusion of the speech of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman which, if they stood alone, I should have heard without dissatisfaction, when he said his desire was that information of a tangible character—of course, it must be of a somewhat sufficiently definite character—should be communicated to the House, as the only means of allowing the Franchise Bill to go forward here and "elsewhere." Well, Sir, that demand is one which it was stated by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) and my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) we had no indisposition to listen to; but I am afraid the demand must be taken as being liable to be construed with another portion of the speech of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, in which he said that nothing would satisfy him except the enactment of the franchise and redistribution in one and the same measure, or simultaneously in two measures. Then he appeals to the Government to accede to the moderate demand which he makes. But that moderate demand is the extreme demand he has ever made, or that has at any time been urged on the part of hon. Gentlemen on the other side. Our opinion, on this side of the House, is that the most decisive indications have been given, in the course of the last three months, as to the opinion of the country on this subject. When the right hon. and gallant Gentleman appeals to us to do certain things which we refused before, now that these indications—which we deem to be exceeding clear—have been given, it greatly diminishes the force of his appeal, for, as we think, judgment has been informally, but very emphatically, pronounced by those who are most interested in the matter, and a clear indication—I do not say of the feeling of every constituency—but a clear indication of the general sentiment of the nation has been given. These considerations, therefore, weaken, and do not strengthen, the appeal which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman now makes. But he asks us for further information. Now, I wish to point out to him the position in which we stand upon these two points. He admits that the object and effect of his Motion is to hang up the Franchise Bill until the Redistribution Bill has been passed. Then again he says, in distinct terms, that Gentlemen opposite—and a large portion of Gentlemen opposite—say that they are willing to grant the franchise. This means that they are willing to grant it upon conditions. Redistribution is the condition, without which they refuse to grant the franchise. It is material that it should be understood how much this compulsory friendship for the franchise, which has been so largely expressed, means. It is a willingness to grant the franchise, provided that it be accompanied by another measure, without which, in the judgment of the most moderate and favourable of the Party opposite, it is not a good measure. And yet the right hon. and gallant Gentleman calls this a most moderate demand. Then the right hon. and gallant Gentleman assures us that, although he wishes to pass an enactment which will hang up the Enfranchisement Bill until the Redistribution of Seats Bill has been passed, yet that there is no reason why we should regard a proposition of that nature with any kind of apprehension, because it is ridiculous to suppose that the Franchise Bill can now be postponed. Yes, Sir; but when we assure him of our disposition to go forward with redistribution, then he does not think it ridiculous to argue that the Redistribution Bill may be postponed. On the contrary, he says that there are all sorts of contingencies which may interfere to postpone it. Then what reason is there that I am to be so very sanguine as to the passing of a Redistribution Bill, provided we let go the hold I believe we have by the present constitution of the measure? What may happen? A Redistribution Bill we could not hope to pass very rapidly; there is no doubt about that. I am not speaking of Obstruction or anything of that kind. Putting that out of view altogether, the time, measuring from the present date, for the introduction of the measure could not occur till some fortnight or three weeks hence, when the Redistribution Bill might be proceeded with. We should then have the intervention of Christmas, and there would be an absolute necessity for some Recess—some considerable Recess, too. Then it is plain that the passing of a Redistribution Bill upon a reasonable calculation, and without assuming any resort to Obstruction, could not be hoped for until the spring was somewhat advanced. But how would it be with the actual passing of the Redistribution Bill? We are encouraged to contemplate a state of things in which the franchise is to be hung up until that interval has elapsed, and until the Redistribution Bill has passed. What may happen to the Government during that period? It is the desire of hon. Gentlemen opposite that the Government should receive its death-blow from one or more of the questions which have been raised concerning the policy of this country in other countries, independently of its policy with regard to the Redistribution Bill; and we are urged to push forward the Redistribution Bill, in order to prevent the substitution of those measures which would be fatal to it. Very well; see what is to happen. The Franchise Bill is to be hung up; we are to introduce a Redistribution Bill, and, according to the declarations of hon. Gentlemen who desire to hang up the Franchise Bill, we are to be dismissed from our Offices on account of our sins of commission and of omission in other respects. Then what is to become of the Franchise Bill? It is to be given over to the tutelage and care and guardianship of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite. Is that a prospect very satisfactory to us? Have their declarations on behalf of the Franchise Bill been declarations of a character to fill us with confidence? As the poet says—

“Vows made in pain ease will recant
As violent and void.”

And I must say that most of the vows in favour of the Franchise Bill have, in the strictest sense, been vows made in pain—vows which were made because hon. Gentlemen could not help making them. And under those circumstances, we are not very ready to hand over to your tutelage the future fortunes of the Franchise Bill. But, now, hon. Gentlemen want information. What sort of information do they want? I have said, and others of my Colleagues have said, that we are most anxious, if it were possible, that a Redistribution Bill should be founded on ideas that are generally acceptable to the House. We have said that explicitly, and we are ready to repeat it. We have said—and I think we know enough of the advantage of conciliatory steps—that we are disposed, in regard to redistribution, to sacrifice any extreme and particular predilections on this side of the House. We know, or we think we do, enough to give us no great difficulty as to the kind of Redistribution Bill we should introduce, so far as to make us confident of its receiving a favourable support on this side of the House; and, of course, if we did not carry it, we should be bound to resort to the alternative which is always looked upon as the Constitutional and only alternative course in such circumstances. There is, therefore, no difficulty as far as the majority of the House is concerned. But we are told that we ought to consult the wishes of the minority. We want to consult the wishes of the minority to the utmost degree which our principles will permit; and as far as I know we have no reason to say that we shall be precluded from consulting their views. But what are the wishes of the minority? It is not that we ask the minority to develop every particular on which they desire this or that; but we ask the minority not to stand in contradiction to itself;

and we respectfully submit that at this moment, from the indications it has given on the subject of redistribution, it does stand in palpable contradiction to itself. [Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: How?] The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) asks me how. Does he think that the speech which he made on Friday night—and I heard it in many respects with satisfaction—gave the same indications of opinion in regard to redistribution as were given a few hours before by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill)? The right hon. Gentleman asks “How?” and I have answered him. I do not assume, for a moment, that the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock, whatever his abilities may be, has a position equivalent to that of the right hon. Gentleman; but the speech of the noble Lord was in strict conformity with many other indications which have come forward in various forms, and notably with the declarations which have proceeded, or which have been reported as proceeding, and which in some cases have absolutely proceeded, from Lord Salisbury. Indeed, is there any doubt about this? The speech of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock—I do not find fault with it—as far as I could understand it, was an able and an extremely clever speech, and it was a speech which gave me the idea that the speaker was desirous, from his point of view, to arrive at a settlement of the question; but, undoubtedly, as far as I could comprehend, the drift of the speech of the noble Lord was to recommend that electoral areas should be recast on the single basis of population, qualified only by one consideration, and that one consideration was to be the ripping asunder, if I may so say, of rural and urban constituencies, and rural and urban pursuits. I desire to avoid exaggeration. That was my construction of the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock. But the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) spoke later in the evening with distinct reference to the clear and forcible speech which my right hon. Friend the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) had just before delivered. My right hon. Friend the Member for Ripon has referred to various other principles to which it seemed that he wished considerable scope to be allowed, such as regard to prescription and possession, where privilege had not been abused, regard to the principle of community and municipal life and principles of that kind, which would cross and traverse the simple principle of population. And the right hon. Gentleman opposite, if I understand him rightly, distinctly accepted the view of the right hon. Member for Ripon, and was anxious that all that diversity of considerations should be introduced in the construction of a sound Reform Bill. That is what I mean when I say that, at this moment, the minority stands in contradiction with itself. And I do not hesitate to affirm that, at this moment, there is no imaginable Bill for the redistribution of seats that we could introduce into this House with a reasonable confidence that it would not be made the subject of a fierce Party conflict. And, Sir, it is under these circumstances that this pressure for information comes. But that pressure for information would not be a matter of difficulty for us if we were to introduce a Bill that we believed would suit the views of the majority of the House. But you are calling upon us to meet your views, and at the same time presenting your views in a form in which they are absolutely incompatible with each other. And what does the introduction of a Redistribution Bill mean if it is to be made the subject of a Party contest? It means the introduction of a Bill that it would be impossible to pass in the present state of Parliamentary practice against the will of the House—it means the handing over of the whole question from the majority to the minority. The entire settlement of the question of redistribution would not rest with us, but with hon. Gentlemen opposite, if there were a disposition to use the means which Parliamentary Rules permit for resisting a Redistribution Bill. All this time, according to their proposal, the Franchise Bill is to be what is called “hung up,” and its chances are to be mixed up with all those general accidents of political vicissitude from which we are determined, if we can, to keep it separate. Now, does the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, in his own mind, really think it possible for us, under these circumstances, to agree to what he proposes? Do not let it be supposed that I am now finding fault. At this moment I am not finding fault either with the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock, or still less with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon. Speaking for myself, individually, I am not ashamed to say that my desire is to have an agreement on this subject if we can. I do not say that we are willing to agree with either; but I will say this, that it is quite impossible to agree with both. If you hold the contrary, and say that it is possible to agree with both, I must beg, in condescension to our obtuse understanding, that you will develop a little the ideas that you entertain, and show us what it is that you want. I believe I have been long enough in dealing with the speech of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, and there is no necessity for me to detain the Committee longer. We have, I think, on the whole, by the speeches made on this Bench, explained with tolerable clearness what our disposition is. I recede from nothing that I have said. I am sure that I may say the same for my right hon. Friends near me, and for my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington), not now in his place, in regard to what has fallen from them which tends towards harmony and a speedy settlement. But the demand for indefinite postponement, and, in fact, for giving over the whole of our contention, supported as we are by the great majority of the House—a majority which apparently has no tendency to diminish—the demand to give over the whole of our contention to the minority opposite, is really making a proposal to us which might almost be received with silence, so absolutely impossible must it be for us, in that form, to make any approximation towards meeting the wishes of hon. Gentlemen opposite.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I must confess that I rather gather from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that his idea is that the Opposition should draw a Bill for him. Now, I think that is not reasonable, and that it would rather invert the position which the two sides respectively hold in the House of Commons. We are desirous honestly and fairly to discuss the principle and details of a Redistribution Bill; but we think that the Government ought to take the responsibility of introducing the measure. I do not raise a question as to whether it is fair to us to ask us to lay down principles; but I ask whether it is altogether fair to the House—whether it is the quickest way of proceeding, to take the lowest ground—that we should be called upon, in the first place, to formulate the basis on which the discussion is to be carried on? That is a matter which the Government and the majority ought to undertake, and which distinctly rests with them. All that we can promise them is a fair and full consideration. [Laughter.] That statement seems very much to amuse the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). I know not whether he thinks a fair consideration is something that ought to be despised or not. Or does he think we ought to accept, in the same spirit as the followers of the right hon. Gentleman, whatever proceeds from his mouth without any discussion at all? I do not think that that is really the manner in which legislation of this importance has ever been conducted, or ever will be. What has often been remarked in regard to the legislation of this country, and what is probably true and of very great importance is, that we have had measures of the largest character brought forward from time to time which have occasioned warm contests between the two Parties in the State, and, after all, one settlement has been arrived at after another, and the result of the final settlement has generally been accepted by the whole country, let alone, and not subsequently disturbed. Why is that? It is because these measures have been made the subject of fair discussion on each side of the House. Each Party has had the opportunity of saying its own say, and when the decision has been come to, like Englishmen we have agreed to abide by the result of the decision. That is all we ask now. I sometimes think, from the indications I see on the opposite side, and certainly from the Benches immediately fronting me, that hon. Members opposite have some kind of suspicious fear that we have some terrible design in the background, and that we intend, when they have brought forward their measure, to take some insidious step which will destroy the settlement of the question. I can assure them that this is entirely a delusion. I assure them that we are prepared to discuss this matter in perfectly good faith. As the Government have seen fit to bring this question before the country and before Parliament in the serious manner they have done, we are prepared to meet them, and to endeavour to give effect to their desires in the direction of enlarging the franchise. But what we do say is this—that it is necessary that such a step as that should be accompanied by a proper redistribution of political power. We say that if you are going to bring in this large quantity of new wine, it should not be put into old bottles; but it should be new wine and new bottles. You are not treating the two measures as in point of fact being one measure, and you are running the risk of doing what the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister has indicated may possibly happen—namely, that after passing one measure, the other may be sacrificed by Party considerations. We have often been told, when we have said that we want to be assured that the two measures will be passed—“Why cannot you accept the assurances of the Government? Why cannot you take the word of the Prime Minister and all those securities which are offered to you in regard to the two measures?” We have always said that we do not doubt the word of the Prime Minister, or any assurances that may have been given by the Government, as far as they are able to give effect to them; but we see, as well as the right hon. Gentleman sees, that there is a possibility of circumstances entirely extraneous to this question, rendering something necessary which may prevent the Government from doing that which they say they are all desirous of aiming at. What I hope and trust is that the right hon. Gentleman will look at this matter in a more practical spirit. I cannot altogether accept his views that the Amendment of my right hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Stanley) is less appropriate now than it was when he brought it forward last Session. I do not altogether endorse the view the right hon. Gentleman has expressed, nor the view of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the strong expression of opinion which he says has been given in the country. I do not myself see were the proof of it is. True, we have had some indication. Not only within the last three months, but even within the last three days, events have happened which would lead us to consider that, at all events, there are two opinions on the matter, whatever may be the relative strength of those two opinions in the country; and it is by no means too certain that those who wish to see this question treated as a whole are so very much weaker, or so much more in a minority, than they were before. I am quite certain, Sir, that when any Question is to be put from the Chair, you will take the voice of the House, "Aye" or "No," and that you will pronounce your decision according to the best of your judgment as to which appears to be the larger voice. But, Sir, with all respect to you, that will not be taken as conclusive, and you will, I think, if your decision is challenged, at once direct that the Ayes and the Noes should separate into different Lobbies, so that it may be seen which is really the larger Party. What we say, when we dispute the inferences the right hon. Gentleman and the Government are in the habit of drawing from the discussion in the autumn is, that we do not accept the statement that these discussions have proved their case, and show that the country is in their favour. The natural thing, we should have thought, was that they should propose that the Ayes and the Noes should go into opposite Lobbies, and really ascertain what the state of the case is. But I do not wish to prolong this discussion. What I am anxious to do is to support the Amendment of my right hon. and gallant Friend, on the ground that it is entirely consistent with the position which we have all along taken up. The position which we have all along taken up, and which we hold now is, that, if this measure is to become the law of the land, it is most desirable that there should be some security that the other measure should pass also. I see the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) in his place. I took the liberty of referring to him the other day in some observations which I made in his absence; but I said in his absence nothing which I would not say when he is present. I claimed the right hon. Gentleman as an authority upon the very great importance of a redistribution of seats accompanying any measure for the extension of the franchise. The question whether they are to be in one Bill or two is not the question I raise. The right hon. Gentleman has undoubtedly explained his statements with a view to show that there is no inconsistency in advocating the present separation of the two measures; but the right hon. Gentleman can hardly deny that he has stated, in the strongest terms, that a measure for the redistribution of seats was at least as important, or even more important, than the mere question of the extension of the franchise. He, himself, has said something to this effect—"Reduce your franchise as you please, and if you will give me the distribution of seats, I will undertake to alter the whole effect of giving the franchise." That is what we hold to be the case. We hold that if in this matter the new Parliament is to give proper expression to the feelings and wants of the country, it must be carefully provided, in the settlement of this question, that Parliament shall really represent the different interests of the country. How that should be done is a matter for very serious consideration, and we say that the country has a right to ask the Government to undertake the consideration. We say that any Government, especially a Government which is as strong as hon. Members opposite represent—and which believes itself to much stronger than it looks—ought to give whatever consideration is necessary, and ought to produce its measure. We, on our part, promise the fairest possible consideration and discussion of that measure, and I trust that we shall not have it thrown in our teeth that we are obstructing it practically by asking that we shall have an opportunity for the full and reasonable consideration of it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I think it was not necessary for the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) to insist upon the importance of redistribution. That is one of the propositions which has not been denied, as far as I understand, in this controversy at all, nor is it one of the issues raised by the Amendment. The question is, how we are to proceed with regard to the question of franchise and the question of redistribution. I will ask the House to consider what is the light in which this matter is put before us in the present Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman said—"Why are you so suspicious; why do you think that if the franchise is postponed until redistribution is settled, that it will endanger franchise? I can assure you on the other side of the House that we have every desire to forward and secure the Franchise Bill." I am quite willing to accept that assurance on the part of the right hon. Gentleman; but how does he accept our corresponding assurances? When we say—"Do not distrust us; do not think that because we pass a Franchise Bill, that, therefore, we desire to give the go-bye to redistribution." Does he accept our assurances? Is he willing to act upon them? Is he willing to say—"We trust you, and therefore we will pass the Franchise Bill?" No; not at all. I venture to say that in this demand for controversy there ought to be some reciprocity; but I do not observe the smallest particle of reciprocity on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The right hon. Gentleman, although it did not appear to be very germane to the present discussion, referred to a recent election. Well, I remember very well the winter of 1879, and the early months of 1880, when there were some very promising elections for those who then sat upon these Benches; but when they came to reap the harvest, the ears did not prove to be as full of grain as they had expected. I would not advise them, even now, in that matter, to count their chickens before they are hatched. But what is the practical proposition offered to us by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Stanley) in his Amendment? It amounts to this, and it can be put in one sentence—it means that no Franchise Bill shall be passed until a Redistribution Bill is passed, which is agreeable to the majority of the House of Lords. [Loud cheers.] You may turn and twist the matter how you like; but that is what it means. And when the right hon. and gallant Gentleman talks of the verdict of the constituencies, he may take it for granted that, ultimately and at the proper time, we shall not be afraid to take the verdict of the constituencies. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) has talked a great deal about discussion in this House. In this House the opinion of the majority does not always, but ought, at all events, to prevail. I think it was admitted by the right hon. Gentleman in his speech that, after full discussion, the opinion of the majority prevails and is accepted. That may be true of the House of Commons; but when the Bill goes to "another place" it is the majority of the House of Lords, which represents the minority of the House of Commons, which is ultimately to prevail on this question. And, therefore, this Amendment means nothing else—for it is, of course, the Amendment which is to guide the action of the House of Lords—the meaning of the Amendment is, that these 2,000,000 of people shall not enjoy the franchise, except upon this one condition—that the majority of the House of Lords shall dictate how they shall enjoy it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for the Home Department regarded the Amendment as a reductio ad absurdum; but the arguments they had adduced in support of that contention were not of a very convincing character. The Prime Minister had drawn a dreadful picture. He said—"If you pass this Amendment the Franchise Bill will be hung up until the Redistribution Bill is passed, and we may be turned out of Office for our numerous misdeeds at home and abroad; and then," the right hon. Gentleman went on to say, "the conduct of this great question will fall into your hands." So monstrous did he regard such a possibility, that he seemed to think it absolutely disposed of the whole question. And why, in his view, was it impossible that the Conservative Party could deal fairly with the Franchise Question? The Prime Minister told them, in the plainest manner, that he could not rely on their professions as to desiring Reform. And he said that, if they were not absolutely false, at all events they were of such a character, and made under such circumstances, that they could not be expected to adhere to them. He (Mr. A. J. Balfour) believed the Conservative Party, one and all, repudiated that assertion. What he wanted to point out was this. If the Government were justified in throwing doubt on the repeated promises made, in the most formal manner, by every leading Conservative statesman with regard to the franchise, on what possible ground did they come down to the House and expect the Conservative Party to put confidence in the pledges of the Government as to their desire to pass a Redistribution Bill? As the Secretary of State for the Home Department said just now, confidence should be reciprocal; and if hon. Members opposite thought so ill of the honesty of the Conservative Party as to believe they were false in their profession of a desire to pass a Franchise Bill, on what ground could they ask the Conservative Party to put the slightest confidence in their desire for the passing of a Redistribution Bill? The Secretary of State for the Home Department seemed to think that very little confidence was to be placed in auguries resting upon bye-elections. Now, he (Mr. A. J. Balfour) did not himself place any great amount of confidence in the result of a bye-election; but although he did not place much more confidence in that than he did upon the mere fact, if it were a fact, which he greatly doubted, that hon. Gentlemen had been able to collect a larger and noisier crowd to hear their speeches during the Recess—if that were a fact, it was not a fact of such a kind as to afford any solid augury of the opinions of the people. Although he did not, in the least degree, wish to rest more upon the Warwickshire Election than it ought to be rested upon, yet he must say that it was the clearest, the most Constitutional, and the most certain indication of what the country thought. It had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition that the Conservative Party had no intention of using the Redistribution Bill as a means of destroying the Franchise Bill; and he felt certain that that was the opinion held in every quarter of the House, and held also, as far as he could judge of these things, by the majority in "another place." There was not the slightest desire either to prolong unduly the discussion upon the Redistribution Bill, or in any way to use that Redistribution Bill as a means for giving a secret stab to the Franchise Bill. He failed to see upon what grounds the Government were justified in throwing a doubt upon that statement. Had there been the slightest indication that the Opposition desired to destroy the Franchise Bill in that way? Could it be possibly shown that they had any motive in destroying the Franchise Bill? If the Government could not give them credit for common honesty, would they not, at all events, give them credit for common sense? The Secretary of State for the Home

Department, in the speech he had just delivered, drew a parallel between the confidence which the Government asked the Opposition to place in them, and the confidence which the Government was asked to place in the Opposition; but the truth was that there was no parallel between the two things, and he would explain why. The confidence the Opposition asked the Government to place in them was a mere confidence in the honesty of their intentions with regard to the Franchise Bill; and they were perfectly ready to repose precisely the same kind of confidence in the Government, so far as the matter rested in the honesty of their intentions with regard to the Redistribution Bill. They were prepared to give the Government full credit for the honesty of their intentions; but the difference was this—that where all the contingencies the Opposition had to deal with rested with themselves, all the contingencies the Government had to deal with did not rest with themselves, but depended upon considerations absolutely outside their own control. It rested with the Opposition whether they would obstruct the Redistribution Bill, or use it as a means of destroying the Franchise Bill. They disclaimed all such intention, and asked the Government to believe them. They, in return, were quite ready to believe that the Government sincerely meant to bring in a Redistribution Bill, and to make it a fair Bill; but what they said was that the intentions of the Government did not exhaust the possibilities of the case. What the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench had stated and pointed out, as he had often done before, was that there might be circumstances over which the Government could have no control, whatever the honesty of their intentions might be, but which might, practically, compel a Dissolution before they could pass their Redistribution Bill. Therefore, it was not sufficient that they should place mutual confidence in each other because the position of the Government and that of the Opposition did not, in reality, balance. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had made a great deal of the difference he had found in the speeches of the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) and of his noble Friend the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), as to what the nature of the Redistribution Bill should be. He (Mr. A. J. Balfour) altogether failed to see any wide difference or inconsistency between the two statements. He had listened very attentively to his noble Friend's speech, and he certainly had not put upon it the interpretation which was given to it by the Prime Minister. His noble Friend undoubtedly did lay down the proposition that population ought to be one of the chief considerations.

MR. GLADSTONE: The sole consideration.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he did not think the word "sole" was used. The Prime Minister, in his speech that night, said that the redistribution sketched out by his noble Friend was made to depend on electoral areas, with due regard to the interests and pursuits of the agricultural population.

MR. GLADSTONE: By ripping asunder the rural and urban interests.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the second proposition entirely destroyed the first. They could not have a Redistribution Bill which was solely a measure for constituting electoral areas, and a Redistribution Bill which would divide the rural and town population. He was sorry that his noble Friend was not present to explain his speech. As far as he had understood his noble Friend, all he desired the House to undertake was that population should be very largely indeed taken into account in deciding how they were to frame a Redistribution Bill; and he did not see anything inconsistent in the speech of his noble Friend and the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon. The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir William Harcourt) had brought down tremendous cheers from all his Friends below the Gangway when he stated that, putting the Amendment into one sentence, it practically amounted to a proposition that no Franchise Bill should become law until a Redistribution Bill was approved by the majority of the House of Lords. He (Mr. A. J. Balfour) thought that was a correct representation of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman; and the right hon. Gentleman therefore regarded as a reductio ad absurdum the statement of his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Stanley). Now, he (Mr. A. J. Balfour) wanted to know whether any Bill had ever yet been presented to the House of Commons which did not require the sanction of the majority of the House of Lords before it became law? Was there anything, then, so novel and so monstrous in the proposition that the House of Lords must pass the Bill before it became law that the mere statement of that fact should condemn the Amendment proposed by his right hon. and gallant Friend? The Government were making rapid strides. They now thought that the fundamental and original laws of the country were so absurd that it was only necessary to state them in order to make them appear ridiculous in the eyes of their followers. He was sure that no speech had been made in the course of these prolonged debates on the subject of the Franchise Bill which would be received in the country with more disappointment than the speech of the Prime Minister. Those hon. Gentlemen who, like himself (Mr. A. J. Balfour), had listened silently to the debate on the second reading, had been struck with one peculiarity more forcibly than another—namely, that the Front Benches had been largely occupied in complimenting each other on their moderation of speech. He thought that moderation was admirable. He thought that a spirit of conciliation was admirable; but, so long as it was merely confined to words and phrases, of what possible use was it? What was gained, in the cause of peace, by the Prime Minister coming down on the second reading, and making the softest, the mildest, and the most conciliatory speech that could be conceived if, directly any proposition was made that would have the effect of solving at once all their difficulties, he came down to the House and rejected it as absolutely impossible, and as a thing which he could not even take seriously into consideration? The only interpretation which could be put in the country upon speeches of that kind was that the Government, or that certain Members of the Government, at all events, were very much more anxious to get political capital by fastening a quarrel on the House of Lords than they were of passing a Franchise Bill; because he was perfectly certain that there was not a single man sitting on those Benches who did not, in his heart, know that if his real and primary object was to enfranchise 2,000,000 of people as soon as he could, the best way, the most certain way, and the quickest way, was to adopt the Amendment of his right hon. and gallant Friend.

MR. ALBERT GREY said, that, personally, he very much regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote) had not seen his way to meet the challenge of the Prime Minister, and to make a declaration as to what the views of the Opposition were in regard to redistribution. The right hon. Gentleman seemed actually indignant at the very thought that an Opposition should have any opinions at all; and it appeared to him to be monstrous that the Opposition should give those opinions, if they had any, to the world. He (Mr. Albert Grey) thought the circumstances which had occurred during the last few days rendered it very desirable that the Leader of the Opposition should say what the views of the Front Opposition Bench were on this question of redistribution. His hon. Friend the Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) told the Committee that there was no divergence and no inconsistency between the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) and that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon. If that was the case, they must search for the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman in the speeches of the noble Lord; and he (Mr. Albert Grey) happened to have an extract from a speech of the noble Lord, which, with the permission of the Committee, he would read. The noble Lord said, on Friday evening last—

"For my own part, I believe that a redistribution which is based upon the population principle will be more likely to unite the two Parties."

That declaration must be taken in conjunction with the former declaration of the noble Lord at Carlisle, when he said—

"I believe myself that the scheme of redistribution most likely to secure the assent of Parliament, and the approval of the country, is one which approximates most nearly to representation, based solely upon numbers, and which, whilst preserving the distinction between the manufacturing and agricultural districts, establishes, as a general rule, single-Member electoral areas."

He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon whether he assented to those views? The right hon. Gentleman had given the House a perfect right to believe that he did assent to them, because the Prime Minister had distinctly challenged him on the point. The Prime Minister had pointed to the fact that the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock had given expression to this doctrine in his speech on Friday night, and the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition had thus an opportunity of disowning and disavowing that view; but the right hon. Gentleman had taken very great care not to take advantage of it. He had carefully refused to accept the challenge of the Prime Minister, and had, by his silence, given the Committee the right to believe that he gave his assent to the view of the noble Lord. ["No!"] They had a perfect right on that side of the House to suppose that hon. Gentlemen sitting on the other side had views in regard to redistribution which went in the direction of representation based upon numbers, and based, also, on a system of single-Member electoral districts. He wished to put to the right hon. Gentleman the difficulty in which he (Mr. Albert Grey), as an independent Member, was placed, owing to his silence on the subject. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that he was one of those Members on the Liberal side of the House who had from the first attached great importance to the connection between the extension of the franchise and redistribution—not such a connection as would insist upon including both subjects in one Bill, or upon the simultaneous treatment of the two Bills; but such a connection as would be provided by the insertion in the Franchise Bill of a provision which would give Parliament a full and ample opportunity of carrying a fair and just Redistribution Bill before the Franchise Bill came into full and active operation. His reasons for wishing to have such a provision inserted in the Franchise Bill were these. He recognized that the existing system, which carefully maintained a broad distinction between the town and county franchise, afforded the country ample security for that variety in the representation which was regarded as so essential to the composition of a good House of Commons; and he also recognized that as soon as, by a uniform franchise, they swept away that security, they were bound to provide another security as vital but less objectionable than the old security they had decided to remove. Now, the only other security which he believed could be put up was that which was provided by a wide and vigorous application of the principle of proportional representation to our electoral system. It was because he had believed that there was a greater chance of obtaining support for the principle of proportional representation from the present Parliament than from a Parliament elected by the new and unredistributed constituencies that he had been anxious to provide for the settlement of redistribution before the Franchise Bill came into force. But now, if he was to understand that the views of the noble Lord were those of the Conservative Party—and the silence of the Leader of the Opposition left him no other choice—then he saw great danger in the settlement by this Parliament of the question of redistribution. The danger of the passage of a Redistribution Bill based on the principle of single-Member districts, which, at its worst, was only probable in the event of redistribution being settled by the new electorate, became almost certain in the event of redistribution being settled by the present Parliament. What, therefore, he had wished for most yesterday he wished for least to-day. After what had taken place, he was no longer anxious for a close connection between the two Bills. It rested with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) to set him right if he was wrong; but, unless he repudiated the view of the noble Lord, he believed that they had a better chance of obtaining a wide and vigorous application of the principle of proportional representation in the coming Redistribution Bill if they dissolved on the extended franchise before the passing of a Redistribution Bill than they had if they proceeded to settle the Redistribution Bill now. The strides that the Conservative Party were taking were very rapid. It looked very much as if the game of 1867 were to be played over again; and he thought it would be well if those on both sides of the House who had pinned their faith to the principle of proportional representation were to look carefully to the declarations of the Conservative Leaders during the last few days, otherwise they might be left in the lurch as much as they were before.

MR. CHAPLIN said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Albert Grey), who had just sat down, no doubt, thought he had cast a most ingenious fly for his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition to jump at. He (Mr. Chaplin) sincerely hoped, however, that hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House would decline altogether to enter into a discussion of the details of a Redistribution Bill which was not before the House, and which ought not to be before the House at all, until it was introduced by Her Majesty's Government. What was the position in which the Committee were placed? He really thought the proposals of the hon. Member for South Northumberland were the most unprecedented he had ever heard put forward in that House. A Government, supported by an immense majority, after due deliberation, after holding conferences in all parts of England, had come to the decision that it was their duty to introduce a Reform Bill into Parliament. They had told the House that both parts of the question must be dealt with, and that, although they proposed to introduce the franchise first, they felt themselves bound to deal with redistribution as well. That being so, the hon. Member for South Northumberland got up in his place, and coolly proposed that the Opposition should introduce the Redistribution Bill, instead of Her Majesty's Government, whose duty it was. The hon. Member could not, surely, be serious in his proposition. What he proposed to the House was absolutely without precedent, and preposterous in the highest degree. He (Mr. Chaplin) did not understand why a complaint was made of the conduct of hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House in regard to the representation of proportional majorities. He was not aware that that question had ever yet come on for discussion; and it would be time enough for the hon. Gentleman to make a charge against the Opposition when they had expressed some decided view upon the question. As to their views upon redistribution, the hon. Member ought to know that it would be useless for the Opposition to formulate them after what the Prime Minister had told them that night. The right hon. Gentleman wound up his statement by a declaration to the Committee that no imaginable Bill could be introduced on the subject of redistribution which would not give rise to Party contention; and, therefore, it was impossible for the Government, under those circumstances, to take the course of introducing a Bill. He should like to know why? He did not agree with the Prime Minister, although he presumed that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. Grey) did. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister said the Opposition were disagreed on the question. How did the right hon. Gentleman know they were disagreed? There had been no discussion upon it, and they were not called upon to state their views until the Government did that which was their duty, and placed their Bill before the House. He shared the regret which had been expressed by the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) at the attitude which had been taken by the Prime Minister upon this question. He was quite sure that hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House must acknowledge and admit that the Opposition had gone as far in the direction of conciliation as it was possible for Gentlemen to do; and they had been met by a declaration from the Prime Minister that night, which he (Mr. Chaplin) could only regard as the death-warrant of his Bill. When the right hon. Gentleman alluded to vows on the question of Reform being made in pain, he should like to ask if the right hon. Gentleman limited those vows to that side of the House alone? It was not so very long ago that the Prime Minister himself either voted against, or refused to vote for, a Motion of precisely the same character as this, when it was brought forward in that House by the right hon. Gentleman who was now the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan). He (Mr. Chaplin) would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the vows he had made on the subject since then were vows made in pain? What was the case of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington)? It was only in the last Parliament that the noble Marquess, on two or three different occasions, found it necessary to walk out of the House on this question of Reform. He (Mr. Chaplin) would like to know what sort of vows the noble Marquess had made since then; and whether they were made in pain or in ease? He only noticed this matter because, he thought, taunts of that sort were totally out of place; and, if they were to be indulged in at all, they applied to hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House quite as much as to hon. Gentlemen upon that. The Amendment of his right hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Stanley) raised the whole question which was at issue between the two sides of the House; and personally he was glad that his right hon. and gallant Friend had moved the Amendment that night, because a sort of idea, somehow or other, seemed to have spread abroad that hon. Members on that side of the House had decided, to some extent, to abandon the attitude they had formerly assumed. There could not be a greater mistake as to the present intentions of the Conservative Party as a whole. They had not departed, and they did not intend to depart, in the slightest degree from the position they had taken up from the first. Why should they? Nothing had occurred during the Recess to induce them in the least to alter their opinion. The Prime Minister said they had had a clear indication of the feelings of the country, alluding, he supposed, to the Division they had the other night. It was quite true that there was a great majority; but he (Mr. Chaplin) was not in the least concerned at that majority. It did not follow in the least that a large majority of the House of Commons at the close of a Parliament necessarily represented the feeling of the nation. Past experience taught them exactly the reverse. He remembered the large majorities in that House which supported the foreign policy of Lord Beaconsfield—a much larger majority than that now enjoyed by the Government. He remembered when the noble Lord in that House commanded double, treble, and quadruple his normal majority, time after time, on questions of supreme importance to the welfare of the Empire, yet, if he could judge from what followed in that case, he could only reckon upon the comparatively small majority of the right hon. Gentleman disappearing and being swept away altogether when he made his appeal to the country. Some stress had been laid upon the fact that Conservative Members were now heartily adopting views to which they had formerly been in opposition upon this question; but he thought that Conservatives were entitled to lay some stress upon the majority which the hon. Member for South Warwickshire (Mr. Sampson Lloyd) had obtained at the recent election. It was desirable that they should remember that South Warwickshire was the county in which the movement on behalf of the agricultural labourers originated. It was the home of Mr. Arch. The labourers had had the advantage of hearing the views of the Conservative Party during the contest; and it was remarkable that, although it had been perfectly possible for the agricultural labourers in that county to make their feelings known, and to show that they disapproved the course taken by the Opposition, not only had there not been any striking manifestations in that direction, but they had shown their approval by returning the hon. Gentleman by a very large majority. His right hon. and gallant Friend had, at the commencement of his speech, asked if these difficulties were insurmountable, and he (Mr. Chaplin) would repeat that question. He was unable to see why they should be so; but this he knew—that if the Prime Minister maintained the attitude he had taken up, there would be no possibility of settling this question in a satisfactory manner; and the responsibility would, therefore, rest upon the right hon. Gentleman and his Party.

MR. WADDY said, in consequence of the remarks of the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Chaplin) he desired to say but a very few words. They had been told that the Conservative Party had not changed their minds, and that they did not mean to change them. It was clear, therefore, that the conciliation which hon. Gentlemen opposite wanted was expected to come from one side alone. Now, the Liberal Party had a sincere desire for conciliation; they had tried it with the Opposition earnestly during last Session, and it did them no good. Since then both Parties had been before the country. The Conservatives were not pleased with the result; the Liberals were, and they had seen the clearest indication that the one point that was settled last Session in that House was a settled point in the country. To that point they must hold, and the only fear of hon. Members on those Benches was that there might be too much conciliation. They wished to press upon their Leaders that they should not be too ready to conciliate in a quarrel of which they well knew the result, and of which result they were not in the slightest degree afraid.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 109; Noes 194: Majority 85.—(Div. List, No. 10.)

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Tenure of house by office or service not to invalidate vote).

MR. MACFARLANE asked whether the Bill, as it stood, would give the franchise to workmen in factories, quarries, and similar places, whose rent was deducted by their employers from the weekly wages paid to them?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if rent were deducted from wages in the way described by the hon. Gentleman, such deduction would be equivalent to payment which would entitle the individual to vote.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Restriction on ragot votes) agreed to.

Clause 5 (Assimilation of occupation qualification) agreed to.

Clause 6 (Voter not to vote for county in respect of occupation of property in borough); Clause 7 (Definition of household and lodger qualification, and other franchises, and application of enactments relating thereto); and Clause 8 (Definition of "Representation of the People Acts" and "Registration Acts") severally agreed to.

Clause 9 (Definition and application of Rating Acts).

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he believed the wording of the part of this clause which he proposed to amend was purely the result of inadvertence in drafting the Bill. He would not dwell upon that point further than to express a hope that the matter would be rectified. The Amendment he was about to move did not touch the merits of the Bill, as far as it went; but, unless it were adopted, the Bill would have the effect of inflicting great injury upon a large class of tenants who were about to be enfranchised—that was to say, the small tenants of under £4 valuation would have to be inserted in the Valuation Roll, and would, therefore, become liable to assessment. Now, the custom in Scotland was not to put such tenants on the Valuation Roll; the proprietor paid the rates, and got the amount back from the tenant if he thought proper. In the three or four pages of the Valuation Roll of his own county, which he held in his hand, there were several entries of the kind he was alluding to—first, of 12 tenants of under £4 valuation, and 10 of a total valuation of £2 6s. 11d., for whom the proprietor was rated and paid the amount in one sum. But if the Bill remained as it now stood, these tenants could be assessed by the Local Authority and the School Board. Further on in the Valuation Roll, there were entries of three tenants of under £3, and four of under £4 valuation, and on the next page he observed in one entry no less than 44 tenants of under £4 valuation. As he had already pointed out, the tax-gatherer received the rates on this property, not from the tenant, but from the proprietor; but, as the Bill stood, the whole of these small tenants would become liable to pay, a result which would make the measure very unpopular amongst the class who were now asking that it might be passed. The Bill provided that a separate column should be added to the Valuation Roll, for the purpose of including these tenants. He asked that a separate list might be used instead of a separate column. Another effect of this Bill, as it stood, would be that the size of the Rate Book, already very large, would be enormously increased; and this would have to be constantly altered on account of the large number of labourers who, in Scotland, changed their residences about every 18 months. The book would, in fact, have to be altered every year. There were in the Valuation Roll of his county no less than 23,000 entries at the present time; but if the Bill passed in its present form there would be no less than about 40,000 entries. In Aberdeenshire alone there were 49,800 inhabited houses, and, deducting females, there would be probably 40,000 voters. Another difficulty was that the one column which the Bill provided for would not be sufficient to give the information necessary to make up the Electoral Roll. The very form which the Bill called upon proprietors to fill up had three columns in it, and the information contained in it must be inserted in the Valuation Roll if it was to be of any use. He therefore ventured to say that unless the alteration he proposed were made in the Bill, instead of benefiting the tenants in question it would be a very great inconvenience to them. Then there was another result that would follow from the Valuation Roll being encumbered with the names of these tenants. In some villages of Scotland the same name constantly repeated itself. For instance, in one village of his own constituency, under the present franchise, there were 16 men of the name of Stephens; in another village, 18 of the name of Stephens; in another, 24 men of the name of Noble; and in one village there had not long ago been only two names amongst the inhabitants. This recurrence of the same name would necessarily cause great difficulty in identifying the individuals when they came to be put on the Roll as voters in large numbers. It was difficult to identify them under the present arrangement, and that difficulty would be enormously increased by the vast augmentation of the list required by the Bill. He also held in his hand the Electoral Roll of his Division; and hon. Members who had studied the subject would know how difficult it was to get a correct Electoral Roll with a small number of columns. There were in the Roll six columns to each name for the purpose of preventing fraud; and it was easy to perceive how careful it would be necessary to be, when there were upon the Roll four times the present number of names, in order to prevent imposition and wrong. Then there was another very important change introduced in this paragraph—namely, that proprietors of holdings were required to give a list of persons residing on their property who were entitled to be registered as voters. Now, those words were not in the Bill when it went through Committee last Session; they were put in on the Report; and the effect of them was that the proprietor would have to state, under a penalty, whether a man was entitled to be registered as a voter or not. But how could he state that; could he guarantee the age and qualifications of every one out of, say, 44 tenants, which, as he had pointed out, were on the property of one proprietor in his county? It was next to an impossibility that he should do so; and yet, if he did not, the Bill proposed to fine him for a pure inadvertence. The object of his Amendment was that, so far as related to Scotland, a separate list, to be attached to the Roll, might be substituted for the additional column required by the Bill. The Valuation Roll was prepared under statute, obviously and purely for rating, and not for electoral purposes, the Commissioners and persons who prepared that Roll not being responsible for the Electoral Roll. Again, the proposed change would open the door to a good deal of trickery. Proprietors might, for instance, put down the names of tenants whom they believed to be favourable to their views, excluding others for the opposite reason, and in that way great injustice might be done. There was only one other matter to which he wished to call attention. The Bill provided an alternative mode of collecting rates. The assessors, or rating authority, might apply to the tenant, or the landlord, as they thought fit. Now, that would result in there being three different systems of collecting rates. The clause as it stood would cause very great inconvenience, both to those who had to prepare the Roll and also to the small tenants; and, therefore, he hoped the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate (Mr. J. B. Balfour) would agree to the Amendment, an Amendment which did not in the least interfere with the principle of the Bill as it stood. The Amendment simply amounted to an addition, which would give great facility for carrying on the business of rating, and also for preparing the Electoral Roll. He begged to move that the words which stood in his name be added to the clause.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 11, after the word "book," to insert "in Scotland a separate list instead of a separate column may be added for such entries."

—(Sir Alexander Gordon.)

SIR JOHN HAY said, he did not wish to detain the Committee; but, as he moved an Amendment of this character in the Spring, he was very anxious to support the proposition of his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Alexander Gordon). He would not go into the details of the hon. and gallant Gentleman had gone into; but merely point out the difficulties which would arise under the service franchise, if it were necessary that the names of those entitled under that franchise should be inserted in the Valuation Roll of the counties. In the two counties with which he had to do, he had heard, both from the assessors and other authorities, that if the names of electors under the service franchise were to be added every year—and, of course, there would be great changes every year—the expense of reprinting the Valuation Roll would be very great indeed. It seemed to him that the proposition of the hon. and gallant Gentleman was a very wise one—namely, that the Valuation Roll for rating purposes should continue as at present, and that a subsidiary list of those persons who would vote under the service franchise, and who were not rated, should be printed and circulated for the purposes of registration. The great cost to the counties of printing the Valuation Roll in each year, and added thereto twice the number of names of persons, none of whom would be necessarily on the Valuation Roll for the purposes of assessment, seemed to be a charge on the counties of Scotland it was unnecessary they should incur. He trusted the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate (Mr. J. B. Balfour) would, by the acceptance of the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, or some similar Amendment, save the counties of Scotland the unnecessary expense they would be obliged to incur under the Bill as it now stood.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he hoped that a very few words of explanation would lead his hon. and gallant Friends (Sir Alexander Gordon and Sir John Hay) to see that the reasons which had led them to support this Amendment were not valid.

There were two classes of persons whom the provisions of the Bill, to which the Amendment had reference, affected, and of whom it would, therefore, be necessary to say a word. These classes were, firstly, the small tenants with holdings under £4; and, secondly, those persons who would come on the Roll under the service franchise. The cases were distinct; and he would, therefore, explain in a few sentences how they respectively stood. As regarded the first class of persons, the general scheme of the Valuation Act of 1854 was to make every holding or every occupancy appear on the Roll; but there was a Proviso at the end of Section 2 which enacted that it should be in the power of the Commissioners of Supply, —the authorities who made up the Roll —if they thought fit, not to insert in any Valuation Roll under the Act the names of the tenants or occupiers of any lands or heritages let for a shorter period than one year, or let for a rent not amounting to £4 per annum. The leading idea of the Act was that all holdings, whether under or over £4, should appear on the Roll; but the fact was that in Scotland the practice varied very much. In some counties the authorities put on, and in other counties they omitted from the Roll all holdings under £4. The Valuation Roll in Scotland was the basis of the Voters' Roll; and, accordingly, inasmuch as this was not a Registration Bill, and as they had to take the existing machinery and work upon it, the problem came to be what should be done with respect to the Proviso to which he had referred. They had not only very good reason in principle, but they had precedent in the Burgh Reform Act of 1868, which, in substance, wiped out the Proviso, and made it compulsory to put on the Roll the names of all those occupying holdings under £4. The effect of the provisions of the Bill, as they stood, was simply to make the Roll in all the counties the same as in the burghs, and the same as it was then in very many counties. So far, therefore, they were simply adopting and carrying out the scheme of legislation which existed down to 1868. It was seen that if, in doing away with that Proviso, it would still be competent to rate as previously, there would be a defect. Accordingly, by Sub-section 6, provision was made to the effect that in every county in Scotland the Commissioners of Supply, or the Parochial Board of every parish, or any rating authority entitled to impose assessments according to the Valuation Roll, might, if they thought fit, levy such assessment in respect of lands and heritages held for a shorter term than one year, or let for less than £4, in the same manner, and for the same purposes, as if the names of the tenants or occupiers were not in the Valuation Roll. The combined effect, therefore, of the various provisions of the Bill as it stood was, that while it was compulsory to put tenants under £4 on the Roll—and if they did not appear on the Roll they would not get the vote—there was a Proviso which made them not rateable on that account. These provisions were the result of careful consideration, not only with the assessors, but with the representatives interested in small holdings under £4, and the persons consulted were perfectly satisfied with the suggested provisions. He was persuaded that when his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Alexander Gordon) perceived the effect of the provisions of the Bill as they at present stood, he would not press his Amendment, which he could not help thinking the hon. and gallant Gentleman had made under some misapprehension. Then, again, in regard to the service franchise, his hon. and gallant Friend had said that the duty of making up the Returns was not a duty which ought to be laid on the overseers. Now, if this objection were a valid one, it was common to England, Scotland, and Ireland alike. He apprehended that, when the matter was looked into, it would be found it was quite as essential in regard to the service franchise as it was with regard to the tenants under £4 that they should get the names on the Valuation Roll, which was the only basis there was for the Voters' Roll. Then, again, it would have been a defect if they had not taken care that the persons coming on under the service franchise were not rendered liable for rates. They had provided for that. His hon. and gallant Friend could not have read the Bill, or else he would have found that by Sub-section 5 it was provided that, if a man was entered on the Valuation Roll by virtue of any office, service, or employment, the entry should not make him liable to be rated. Anyone who read the Bill would see that his hon. and gallant Friend was under a total misapprehension when he imagined that it would be possible to rate servants. The next point of complaint of his hon. and gallant Friend was that it was not reasonable to ask the holder of a large estate to give a return. There was no difficulty in giving a return. It was necessary to get a return from someone; and who would the hon. and gallant Gentleman ask to furnish it, if not the proprietor in whose employment the servants were? He now came to the question whether the persons entitled under the service franchise should go on a separate list. As a matter of fact, a separate list would not be consistent with the scheme of a Valuation Roll. The only advantage of a separate list that his hon. and gallant Friend and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir John Hay) had pointed out was that there would be a great saving in printing. That matter was considered when the Bill was passing through the House last Session. There were two modes in which the Valuation Roll or the Electors' Roll might be dealt with. The one which had previously prevailed in boroughs was that the list should be reprinted annually, and the one which previously prevailed in counties was that only the alterations in the list were printed annually. Hitherto, no doubt, the changes in counties were few; but when the franchise was extended to householders in counties the changes would be manifold; in short, the County Rolls would then assume very much the character of the Town Rolls, and the reasons which led to the Town Rolls being printed annually would come to obtain in the case of the County Rolls. It was after consultation, not only with hon. Members representing counties, who aided the Government with many suggestions, but after personal consultation with the assessors, who were accustomed to make up the Valuation Rolls of the most populous counties in Scotland, that the provisions of the Bill, as they now stood, were introduced. The Government saw no reason for doubting that they were the best provisions. He could not think that the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend would improve matters. In the first place, he thought it was moved under a misapprehension; and, in the second place, it would tend to complexity, and would not have the advantages which the hon. and gallant Gentleman held out. He had omitted to notice what his hon. and gallant Friend said with reference to the similarity in names. No doubt, in Scotland there were in the one village many men of the same name. In Sub-section 3, however, the overseers were required, besides giving the name, to describe the situation, or give a description of the dwelling-house, in respect of which the man was entitled. There might be three Charles Smiths in the same street; but to meet a case of that kind the overseer was required to specify which Charles Smith was intended.

Question put, and negatived.

COLONEL NOLAN said, the Amendment which he had to bring to the attention of the Committee was one which he sincerely hoped would meet with the acceptance of the Government, because some such provision as was therein embodied was very much needed in the case of Ireland. The object of his Amendment was to provide against the disqualification of a man who accepted medical relief under the Poor Law. The Amendment might, with very good effect, be applied to Great Britain as well as to Ireland; but he should be quite content that its operation were limited to Ireland. It would be extremely hard on the new voters if the majority of them found themselves disqualified—it would be very hard, for instance, if 15,000 men in his county were made new voters by the action of the Prime Minister, and that, for the want of a little Amendment like his, 10,000 of them were disqualified under the Dispensary Act in force in Ireland. If the Bill did not provide that men should hold the franchise although they received dispensary or medical relief, the effect would be very serious. The system of medical relief in Ireland was this—the Poor Law Authorities appointed a certain number of doctors, and these doctors were supposed to attend everybody in the districts to which they were appointed, unless the patients were well-to-do farmers, or persons in a comparatively affluent position. The system had got such a hold on the country parts of Ireland that the people never thought of employing an independent practitioner. Now, a man might be very well able to exercise the franchise, although he did accept medical relief. In his opinion, it would be very hard if a man who accepted dispensary relief, or consulted the Poor Law doctor about a toothache, or if his wife had a cold and saw the doctor at the dispensary, were to be, in consequence, disfranchised. What would it lead to? In the first place, a large number of men would be disfranchised without knowing it; and, in the second place, many would say—"We do not want to be disfranchised, and therefore we will not go to the doctor." They would not pay for an independent doctor, so that it was not at all unlikely that people would die, owing to the want of attention. The dispensary system had so grown in Ireland that everybody, except tolerably affluent men, availed themselves of it. Everyone considered himself entitled to go to the dispensary doctor, and get a ticket for medical assistance. It was, therefore, highly desirable that the Government should let it be clearly understood that application for medical assistance would not disenfranchise a man. When the question came to be thoroughly understood in Ireland, it would become a most important one; and, therefore, he hoped the Committee would consent to his Amendment, which was to add to the clause—

"Provided, That the right to vote established or conferred under this Act shall not be annulled or in abeyance from the fact of a voter or householder having applied for or received for himself or his family any medical assistance, relief, or comfort, or sanitary assistance from the poor law authorities."

The Committee would notice that he had used the words "sanitary assistance." He was the Chairman of a large Union, and was, consequently, well versed in these details. Sometimes the authorities ordered that a man's house should be whitewashed, possibly without the man's consent. They certainly tried to make the man pay for it; but if he did not, it would never do that the man should lose his vote on account of the course pursued by the authorities in the interest of the public health.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 11, at end, to add, "Provided, That the right to vote established or conferred under this Act shall not be annulled or in abeyance from the fact of a voter or householder having applied for or received for himself or his family any medical assistance, relief, or comfort, or sanitary assistance from the poor law authorities."—(Colonel Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

Colonel Nolan

Mr. WARTON rose to Order. In his opinion, this point could not be raised on this clause at all. He took the liberty of suggesting to his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Nolan) the propriety of withdrawing his Amendment, and of proposing it, possibly, on the next clause.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he was obliged to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) for laying down the law on this matter. He (Colonel Nolan) was tolerably well acquainted with the Poor Law system, and with the system under which men acquired their votes. He was quite certain that this was the exact place in which to introduce his Amendment. The clause provided that the overseers should put certain names on the list; and if a man was disqualified by reason of his having accepted medical relief his name would be kept off the list. He (Colonel Nolan) wished to provide against any such disqualification.

THE CHAIRMAN: On the point of Order raised by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warton), I am bound to say I cannot see how the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Nolan) is out of Order.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had a great deal of sympathy with much that had fallen from the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan); but he was sorry that he could not, on the part of the Government, accept the Amendment. This matter was discussed at great length when the Bill was in Committee last Session. A similar Amendment to the present was then moved by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Roscommon (Mr. Commins), and the same arguments were then advanced. On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), who unfortunately was not now present, made a statement which was received with unanimous approval, and in consequence of which the hon. and learned Member for Roscommon (Mr. Commins) withdrew his Amendment. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman stated that this was a broad question, inasmuch as the Amendment included all medical relief—not only dispensary relief, but all medical relief granted by Poor Law Guardians. The right hon. Gentleman further pointed out, very properly, that if the Amendment were adopted, the inducement to many persons who were not absolutely paupers, but who were very poor, to belong to friendly and provident societies would be removed. Men, unquestionably, did join provident associations in order that they should not lose their votes, by having recourse to medical assistance. It was clear that if the Amendment were adopted, the inducement to join friendly and provident societies would be taken away; besides which, a great blow would be struck at those societies, and also at the cultivation of those provident habits which he was sure the hon. and gallant Gentleman himself (Colonel Nolan) wished to see encouraged. Last Session the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), who took a great interest in our Poor Law system, asked the hon. Gentleman the Member for Roscommon not to press his Amendment, especially after the satisfactory statement then made by the President of the Local Government Board. He (the Attorney General) did not know whether the hon. and gallant Gentleman's attention was called to the debate on the subject which took place during the last Session of Parliament; if it was, the hon. and gallant Gentleman would recollect that the President of the Local Government Board made a statement as to the course the Government proposed to pursue. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the compulsory removal to hospitals of persons suffering from infectious diseases; and he also referred to vaccination, and said that if the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Commins) thought fit to introduce a Bill dealing with such instances of relief, the Government would be willing to co-operate with him in passing it. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) pointed out that this was a question which must be considered from a sanitary point of view, and that the Government were willing to deal with the question so far as they thought it could be safely dealt with, and give medical relief where it was required in the public interest without its affecting a man's right to vote. But now the hon. and gallant Gentleman made the broad proposition that medical relief under all circumstances should not prevent a person from voting. That was further than the Government were prepared to go. They must, therefore, oppose the Amendment; but he hoped the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not think he had treated the Amendment in a hostile manner.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he was quite aware that there were these provident societies in England, and that they extended to large towns in Ireland—to Dublin, for instance, where, proportionately to its size, they existed probably as extensively as they did in London. In the country districts of Ireland, however, they were not heard of. In his own county of Galway, and in Mayo—in fact, throughout the Provinces of Connaught and Munster—such things were unknown. What the Government were proposing to do was, in reality, to give men a vote with one hand, and to take it away with the other. He, however, had been advised not to divide the Committee on the matter, and he was inclined to follow the advice. Still, he thought the subject was one of great importance; and believed that this was an example of the manner in which English Members, legislating for Ireland, fell into grievous mistakes through their endeavour to adapt the circumstances of England to Ireland. The explanation they had had of the way in which these societies worked showed that England was pointed to. In Ireland the societies were, practically, non-existent. The dispensary method worked through the whole social system, and it would be a most serious thing to interfere with it. He believed the resolution of the Government would cause a great deal of trouble in Ireland. He ought to force his Amendment to a Division; but he would not do so, as he had no hope of support from the English Members. No doubt, all the Irish Members would be ready to support him; but, with their votes alone, he would not be able to carry his Amendment. He, therefore, should not press it.

MR. WARTON said, he did not wish to lay down the law, or dispute the decision arrived at. He wished to point out, however, that the 2nd sub-section was one dealing only with a certain class of voters—namely, those who were other than the owners or holders, and that the words proposed by the hon. and gallant Member would include persons who were actually owners. The 2nd sub-section was limited to a particular class of voters other than those rated, or liable for rating.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. and gallant Member withdraw his Amendment?

COLONEL NOLAN: Yes; but I have another of the same nature.

THE CHAIRMAN: The one before the Committee must be withdrawn first.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he wished to move, in page 6, line 11, after "book," to insert—

"Provided, That no right to vote established or confirmed under this Act shall be annulled or impaired from the fact of a voter being in arrear of any payment under the Seed Act (Ireland)."

When the Seeds Act was originally brought in, it was expressly provided that the acceptance of relief under it should not affect a man's vote; but some of the Poor Law Unions connected this Seed Rate with the other rates, and the consequence was that some of the people in difficulties had got into arrear. Looking at the peculiar circumstances of Ireland, he did not think it would be right to deprive a man of his vote—to disqualify him—through being in arrear under the Seeds Act. The object of the Seeds Act was not so much to relieve the people—although, of course, that was an object indirectly—but to change the seed in Ireland; and that, he was glad to say, had been effectually done. He would submit to the Government that they should insert in the Act a provision declaring that the fact of being in arrears under the Statute in question should not disfranchise a man. The provision should, of course, apply to England.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 11, after "book," to insert "Provided, that no right to vote established or confirmed under this Act shall be annulled or impaired from the fact of a voter being in arrear of any payment under the Seed Act (Ireland)."—(Colonel Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the reason the Government could not accept the Amendment was a very simple one. Under the Act of 1880, a contribution was to be levied for seed as part of the poor rate; and before a man could vote he must have paid his poor rate. If the course proposed were adopted, they would, by omitting the necessity of payment of these arrears to qualify for the exercise of the franchise, be conferring an advantage on one person, whilst they withheld it from another. The Seed Rate now was at an end; but it might be necessary to renew it. He hoped the hon. and gallant Member would not press the Amendment.

MR. WARTON said, he wished to point out that the form of the Amendment was peculiar. The hon. and gallant Member spoke of voters being "disqualified" and "disfranchised." He presumed the hon. and gallant Member referred to disqualifying and disfranchising persons having a right to vote. At present the persons in question had no such right.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he would not put the Committee to the trouble of a Division.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Schedules agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time To-morrow.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH asked what Business, if any, the Government would take on Wednesday?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was not quite sure that they would be able to turn Wednesday to account for Supply, because the House must have some little Notice.

POOR LAW GUARDIANS (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 9.]

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [5th November], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. GIBSON said, he could not allow this Bill to pass the second reading without making two or three observations on the view he took of its provisions.

Mr. Warton

The Bill proposed to make very large changes in the mode of election of Poor Law Guardians in Ireland, and in the powers they would possess, and in the different classes that would use them. In reference to some of the broader changes, as to the mode of allowing Guardians to hold office for three years, electing by ballot, and giving the Local Government Board enlarged powers, and also the regulation of questions arising on the validity of elections, he did not propose to say anything. But to the provisions of the Bill for the abolition of the right of proxy voting, he should, unless amended, give his strenuous opposition. That clause, as drawn up at present, did not assimilate the law in Ireland with the law in England; for the law in England did not contain any such drastic provisions in dealing with Poor Law elections in this country. The history of this clause was very curious. It was proposed two or three years ago, and was met by a very considerable amount of opposition. In that opposition he believed most people recognized a great deal of substance and fairness. The right to proxy voting was a right which was to a great extent necessary for the representation of the fair claims of property. It was not a mere right of convenience to enable a man to vote by proxy because he would not take the trouble to vote in person, nor was it a luxury or privilege. It was the necessary machinery whereby property could alone in many cases obtain adequate representation. In the case where an owner had land in several Unions, it was necessary that he should be able to vote by proxy. No matter what arrangements were made by the Local Government Board, it was practically impossible for a man to vote in more than one Union on one day, and this was in itself a great and a gross injustice. It should be remembered that in Ireland property had to bear a great proportion of the rates, and that where it was under £4 rating it had to bear the whole, and it was right that it should have full representation. He objected also to Sub-section 5 of Clause 25, limiting the number of ex officio Guardians. It seemed as if it had been thought that the landlords were too powerful already and must be checked. Both the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan) and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had, in former speeches on the subject, seemed to be proud of the way the noble Lord (Lord Fitzgerald) had presented this question in the House of Lords last Session; but the noble Lord had expressed his regret that the Bill was deformed by these two clauses. He should not oppose the Bill as a whole on the present occasion, but should reserve his opposition on the points he had indicated, as well as his detailed criticism, until the stage of Committee on the Bill.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, having congratulated Irish Members on the Bill coming on so early in the evening (8 o'clock), said, the Government were very much of the same opinion towards it as they were last Session. They considered its provisions were reasonable, politic, and wise. With regard to the clause dealing with ex officio Guardians, he believed that the wording did not really convey the idea of the provision. The general idea was that ex officio Guardians should not be more than one-third of the whole body; whereas this clause provided for not more than one-third of the elected members. But he did not wish now to go into detail; and he hoped it would suffice for him to say that the Government maintained their adhesion to the Bill, and would do all in their power to secure its passing into law. He thought, however, that it was hardly possible that this Bill could come into action in February, as it was now late in the year.

MR. SEXTON, after commenting on the change in the spirit of the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), with regard to this Bill, said, he hoped this change would be maintained until the Bill had passed through the House of Lords.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

JUSTICES' JURISDICTION BILL.

(NO. 2.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD BRAMWELL, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to enable Justices at Quarter Sessions to try cases of burglary. The Bill had been already passed by their Lordships' House in a former Session, as also had the other Bill on the Notice Paper which he was about to ask their Lordships to read a second time. Both Bills were sent down to the other House, and heard of no more, and he supposed that would be their fate again. He did not say they had been treated with contempt, as had been charged against their Lordships by a right hon. Gentleman with reference to their treatment of the Custody of Infants Bill. He was quite sure that if the right hon. Gentleman who made that statement had known the facts of the case, he would have seen that it was utterly untrue. He appealed to the noble and learned Lord who had charge of the Bill (Lord Fitzgerald), and to the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack, to say whether there was anything like contempt, or anything but proper respect shown on the occasion of the discussion on that Bill? He hoped he had given a sufficient reason for making that statement to their Lordships.

—(The Lord Bramwell.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

LAW OF EVIDENCE AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 3.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD BRAMWELL, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its object was to remove the disability of all persons, including married women, to give evidence in Courts of Justice.

—(The Lord Bramwell.)

LORD FITZGERALD said, in reference to what had fallen from the noble and learned Lord as to the Custody of Infants Bill, he quite agreed that it was not treated with the slightest contempt in their Lordships' House. It was introduced in the House of Commons in February last, and was not brought up to their Lordships' House till the 4th of August. It had passed through the other House after much discussion, and its rejection was moved on more than one occasion. No doubt it came up to their Lordships with the very high sanction of the Law Officers of England and Scotland, and of Sir R. Assheton Cross and other leading Members of Parliament, and he undertook the charge of it in that House. It was a Bill dealing with a very important matter, as it proposed to alter the law in reference to the custody of infants. Objections were taken to the Bill by the noble and learned Earl opposite (Earl Cairns), who asked him not to press it on at that late period of the Session, as, if he did, he should be obliged to move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. He (Lord Fitzgerald) felt the force of the observations of the noble and learned Earl, and could not resist a Motion to refer the measure to a Committee upstairs. It was only in consequence of the late period of the Session that he felt compelled to withdraw the Bill. He had hoped to introduce the Bill again this Session, and would have done so if he knew that there would be an Adjournment, and not a Prorogation. At all events, he hoped to introduce it next Session.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it was certainly somewhat irregular for a conversation of this sort to take place on the Bill before the House, as it was irrelevant to it; but as they had not much to do that evening, and as they had excused his noble and learned Friend, so he hoped their Lordships would excuse him if he made a few observations in reference to the statement made by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell). He confessed that he shared in the disappointment very naturally felt by those who, with great labour and pains, had conducted the Custody of Infants Bill through the House of Commons almost against hope. After the best study that he (the Lord Chancellor) could give to the Bill, he thought that the general object and principles of the Bill were sound, and its provisions well considered, and that their Lordships' House would be justified in passing it. He would, therefore, have been very glad if his noble and learned Friends, whose assistance the House looked for, had been as far advanced in their judgment upon the merits of the Bill as himself. But he could not but say that it appeared to him improper to deny the right of such great authorities as his noble and learned Friends to have time for the deliberate consideration of changes in the law on a subject of such great importance. His noble and learned Friends thought at that time—the Session being close at an end—that there was not sufficient time for consideration. He felt, therefore, unable to resist the proposal of his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns), that the Bill should be postponed, because he did not think it would be reasonable—or, indeed, possible—to press the matter at that time against the opinions of his noble and learned Friends.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns), who was not then present, was himself very much influenced by the fact that the Bill had not undergone any careful or exhaustive discussion in the House of Commons, and that it had passed through its several stages at very late hours of the night. He had thought that the subject was not one of trifling importance, because the Bill, if passed, might have made a revolution in the domestic concerns of a vast number of families in this country. Therefore, his noble and learned Friend thought that under those circumstances it would not be seemly, right, or safe to put upon the Statute Book a law of this kind, without the certainty that it had been fully considered by at least one of the Houses of Parliament.

IRELAND—THE NEW MUSEUM OF SCIENCE AND ART, DUBLIN.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT POWERSCOURT, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government, The reason for the delay in commencing the works for the new Dublin Science and Art Museum? said, he had received private information that the matter had been settled; and, therefore, he need not detain their Lordships about it. But the Dublin public were very anxious on the subject, and they would be glad to have a public intimation that the building was about to be commenced.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL), in reply, said, that there were questions raised by the Treasury upon the designs for the new building, and that they had involved a good deal of correspondence between the different Departments; but those questions were now settled. He was glad to tell his noble Friend that all was now going smoothly, and that, at the beginning of this month, the Treasury had sent their order to the Board of Works in Dublin to enter into a contract for the erection of the remaining buildings.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON'S STATUE —THE SITE AT ALDERSHOT.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD asked, Whether any steps had been taken towards re-erecting the statue of the Duke of Wellington in a suitable spot at Aldershot Camp; and, when the work in question was likely to be completed?

LORD SUDELEY: In reply to the noble Viscount, I have to state that the statue of the Duke of Wellington is now safely housed at Aldershot, where it will be erected in the course of next year. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales proposes shortly to visit Aldershot, in order, in conjunction with the Military Authorities there, to select an appropriate site.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, that this was an instance of the inconvenience of dealing with a question by halves. The Question of the noble Viscount (Viscount Enfield) only referred to half the matter—the re-erection of the statue—and it did not take into consideration the completion of the alterations and improvements at Hyde Park Corner. He would remind their Lordships that last Session they had also the assurance given them that there should be no unreasonable delay in re-erecting the statue in a suitable manner, and yet the delay had occurred. It was obvious now that the object was to clear the space in order to make room for future statuary and other ornamental decorations at Hyde Park Corner, and that those things were much more in the mind of those who had promoted the scheme than any honour to the Duke of Wellington.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Third Reading—Representation of the People [1], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

NAVY—THE DOCKYARDS—HAND- DRILLERS AT PORTSMOUTH.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Board have yet received the petition from the hand-drillers in Portsmouth Dockyard; and, whether the same is being considered?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY, in reply, said, that no such petition had been received by the Admiralty.

SEA AND COAST FISHERIES (IRELAND) —TRAWLING IN GALWAY BAY.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he has made the inquiries promised on the 3rd November, as to whether a majority of the fishermen and coast inhabitants of Galway are anxious to have trawling forbidden as before in the inner portion of Galway Bay; if he has made these inquiries, what are the result; and, will he obtain the prohibition of trawling as is now the case in Dublin Bay?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have looked further into this matter. There is no doubt that the Claddah fishermen and other persons on both sides of Galway Bay are opposed to the permission of trawling; but no valid reason in support of this objection has ever been given at any inquiry held by the Inspectors. This local feeling on the subject was fully before them, when, after careful and protracted investigations, they arrived at the conclusions which were acted on in 1877, and which they have not since seen any reason to alter.

In reply to a further Question from Colonel NOLAN,

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Well, Sir, I have stated before that these inquiries were carried out at great length, and such fishermen as desired made suggestions on the subject. The Board do not propose to make any alteration.

MR. KENNY: Will the right hon. Gentleman kindly say whether he has any objection to give the reasons of the Fishery Commissioners, and lay them upon the Table of the House?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not know whether the Reports are published; but I will inquire.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)— TEACHERS IN THE COLERAINE DISTRICTS—RESULTS FEES.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the amount of Results Fees paid in the Coleraine District each year since the present Inspector of National Schools took charge, and the amounts for an equal number of years during his Predecessor's tenure of office; if the reduction is occasioned by the adoption of too high a standard, or by fewer pupils being presented for examination, or by deterioration in the teaching staff; if it is not a fact within the experience of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, and borne out by the statistics and records of the Education Office, that, when inspectors of comparatively limited experience in inspection and examination of schools are transferred to a new district, the Results Fees are cut down by one-third or one-half; whether it frequently happens that schools obtaining a high and satisfactory percentage of passes one year are reported on next year as insufficient and unsatisfactory under a new inspector; what guarantees do the rules of the Commissioners of National Education provide to secure their teachers from the whims and prejudices of the Board's officers; and, whether the records of the Education Office do not show that, if a teacher takes any action against his inspector in order to assert his rights, he becomes a marked man amongst the official staff, and that his professional career continues to be reported ever after as unsatisfactory?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, in reply, said, that the Commissioners of National Education entirely objected to the production of Returns having for their object comparison of the results examination by different Inspectors. Such a course the Commissioners believed would be a severe blow to the independence of the Inspectors. In that view he entirely concurred. The Commissioners had taken elaborate precautions to secure absolute fairness in the examination. No new Inspector was commissioned to take charge of a district until he had mastered all details connected with his duties under two or three experienced Inspectors. He might mention that in the Coleraine district the test examinations showed almost an identity of judgment. The public rules of the Commissioners provided for appeal on the part of any manager or teacher who felt aggrieved by the results examinations. He was assured that the suggestions in the last part of the Question were absolutely without foundation.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)— COUNTY CAVAN—POSTPONEMENT OF PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that in county Cavan it often happens that cases have to be postponed at Petty Sessions from the scarcity of Local Justices of the Peace; and, whether he will draw the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the subject, with a view of remedying the defect?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: From inquiry I find it to be the case that several Petty Sessions have been adjourned owing to a sufficient number of magistrates not being in attendance. The attention of the Lord Chancellor will be called to the matter.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—REPORT OF THE COMMISSION.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any steps have been taken to carry out any of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Irish Prisons; and, if so, what steps have been so taken?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Report of the Royal Commission has been only a few weeks in the hands of the Government, and the evidence upon which it is based has not yet been issued. I can, however, assure the right hon. Gentleman that the valuable and important recommendations of the Commission are receiving careful consideration on the part of the Irish Government, and that no time will be lost in coming to a conclusion with regard to them.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to point out that there was a very strong recommendation with regard to those prisoners kept in confinement for a long period before their trial? With regard to these prisoners it would seem important that their cases should be taken into consideration as soon as possible.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The point which the right hon. Gentleman refers to was taken into consideration, and will be immediately dealt with. But it will be necessary, in the first place, to consult as to what had best be done with regard to them. I have the Report, which I only received yesterday.

MR. HASTINGS: I will put to the right hon. Gentleman a Question, of which I have given him private Notice. I would ask him whether, in view of the serious disclosures contained in the Report of the Irish Prisons Commissioners, the right hon. Gentleman will be willing to receive a deputation who are prepared to lay before him additional facts and representations with regard to the existing administration of prisons in Ireland?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Yes; I shall be glad to communicate with my hon. Friend in the matter.

CHOLERA HOSPITALS ACT, 1884—
MOVABLE HOSPITALS (IRELAND).

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If there are any temporary and movable hospitals now in the possession of the Local Government Board, or any other body in Ireland; and, in what time such a hospital could be delivered at a railway station?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: There are no temporary movable hospitals in the possession of the Local Government Board; but there are a few Constabulary huts obtainable, which might be purchased by Sanitary Authorities in cases of emergency, and which could be delivered without any delay. Under the Cholera Hospitals Act of last Session local Sanitary Authorities have power to take sites compulsorily, and the Local Government Board ascertained and reported in July last that iron hospitals can be put up in a short time by Messrs. Maguire and Son, of Dublin, and by Messrs. Brady and Co., of Euston Road, London; also that they are kept in stock by Humphreys, of Albert Gate, and can be supplied immediately when ordered.

COLONEL NOLAN: Could the right hon. Gentleman name the number of hours which would be required to move one of these huts?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: No; I cannot name the number of hours.

COLONEL NOLAN: I will ask the right hon. Gentleman can he inquire and name the number upon next Thursday?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I will.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware whether any "Land League huts" are available?

[No reply.]

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)—DIS-TURBANCE AT VICTORIA PARK TABERNAOLE, HACKNEY — "THE EX-MONK WIDDOWS."

MR. SEXTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, With regard to a serious disturbance recently at the Victoria Park Tabernaole, Hackney, on the occasion of "a lecture on the fallacies of the Church of Rome" by a person describing himself as "the ex-Monk Widdows," whether the police have inquired into the antecedents of this person; whether he formerly lectured against Protestantism in Canada, was the cause of a riot in Toronto, and underwent an imprisonment of eight months in the gaol of that city for a felonious offence; and, whether any steps will be taken to prevent him from continuing to obtain money by false pretences, and to cause breaches of the public peace?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am informed that there was a disturbance at a lecture given by a person who seems to bear this name; but I have no power to prevent persons in this country from lecturing either for or against Protestantism; and if people attack them it can hardly be said that the lecturers cause the disturbance of the peace. I cannot see how I can interfere in this matter; but I have given instructions to the police to prevent a breach of the peace in future, should there be a likelihood of disturbance occurring.

MR. SEXTON: If this impostor attempts again to lecture, and if there is a reasonable probability of his attempting to do so leading to a breach of the peace, has the right hon. Gentleman no power of interfering?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: What the hon. Gentleman asks me to do is rather beyond my power, and certainly a very difficult task—namely, to prevent any impostor from lecturing.

SCOTLAND—THE CROFTERS AND COTTARS IN THE HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS—LAND LAW REFORM—DISTURBANCES IN SKYE.

MR. SEXTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Major Fraser, the landlord upon whose estate the movements of the Crofters took its rise, is a member of the Board of Commissioners of Supply at Inverness, and whether this Board is responsible for the despatch of the body of police which came into collision with the Crofters; whether the Crofters have hitherto abstained from violence, and that their demands are nothing more than "a fair rent, and the restoration of the sheep land of which they were deprived many years ago;" whether the Government have considered the expediency of creating a public tribunal to fix the rents to be paid by tenants in the exceptional condition of Crofters in the Highlands and Islands; and, whether the intimation of the Right honourable Gentleman that the Government are considering the Report of the Royal Commission, with a view to act upon it, may be interpreted to mean that the Government, at the opening of the ensuing Session, will ask the House to legislate on this subject?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: These Questions seem to invite me to express the opinion that there is some palliation or justification for the defiance of the law and the breach of the peace which have unhappily occurred at Skye. I can give no answer at all in that sense. I regard these proceedings as entirely unjustifiable and without extenuation. If there are grievances there are other means of redressing them; and the first duty of the Government in these matters is to take measures to support law and order and maintain the public peace. So far from "the Crofters having hitherto abstained from violence," that is entirely contrary to the information which I possess on the subject. With regard to the latter Question of the hon. Member, I have already stated that the Government will feel it to be their duty to take action at the earliest possible time, so far as they can, upon the Report of the Royal Commission. I have already given the reasons for not making any further statement at present on the subject.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman be good enough to answer the first part of the Question?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I do not know whether it is so or not. I do not know how that affects the question. There is no reason why the police should not act because one individual, whose house was burned down, was on the Police Committee.

MR. SEXTON: I put the Question as to whether the person who passed for the landlord had not used his position on the Board of Commissioners in order to provoke these disturbances by sending the police.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: If it is suggested that the action of the Police Committee was the action of Major Fraser, I have no reason to believe it was so. On the contrary, I have reason to believe it was not so, and that the action of the Police Committee was called for apart from the case of Major Fraser.

MR. MACFARLANE: May I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman if there has been, in the locality to which the military and police, it is said, are being sent, a single failure in the operation of the Civil Law? Has any civil process been stopped by violence which it is necessary to carry out by the employment of additional police?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: There has been an open and flagrant defiance of the law. Threats were used towards persons in that district that made it necessary. I think it proper that the Police Committee should have acted as they had in not allowing the people in the district to declare that there should be no police in the district, and that they should by force turn the police out of the district. I think they have acted quite properly in supporting the police.

MR. MACFARLANE: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my Question. [Cries of "Order!" and Interruption.] If I am not entitled to put my Question, the Speaker will rule me out of Order. I will repeat the Question to the right hon. Gentleman, Is there a single instance of the failure of the operation of the Civil Law in the district to which the police are being sent?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Yes, Sir. What I have told the hon. Member is that there have been all sorts of petty outrages. I have already said the Papers will be laid before the House. But, quite apart from that, it is not possible that a district can be allowed to say it will not allow the Local Authorities to place in that district whatever police they may think necessary. That is what has been done—the police were going there, and they were forcibly expelled.

DR. CAMERON: Is there any chance of these Papers being presented before Friday, when there is to be a debate on the subject?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am afraid they cannot be presented before Friday.

Subsequently,

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked the Home Secretary if he could state whether the very serious accounts in the Scottish papers of the state of affairs in the Island of Skye were substantially correct, and especially whether it was true that three hundred marines were on their way to the Island?

Mr. Macfarlane

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I suppose the hon. Member was not in the House; but I have already made a statement in answer to the Questions put to me upon that subject, and I do not think that, in so grave a matter, the hon. Member ought to ask me to say whether I entirely endorse, or entirely deny, the statements in the newspapers. It is far too grave a matter to be dealt with in that way. The official Report on the subject we are about to lay on the Table. I have also stated that Her Majesty's Government have decided to take energetic measures to support the police in Skye in the execution of their duty.

EGYPT—THE EXPEDITION UP THE NILE.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any, and, if so, what preparations have been made, and what plans and route have been decided on, for withdrawing the garrisons and refugees from the Soudan, on the arrival at Khartoum of the British Expedition now proceeding up the Nile? He wished, further, to ask whether any confirmation had been received by the Government as to the rumours of the fall of Khartoum, which had appeared in The Times of that morning?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No confirmation of the rumours in question has been received either at the War Office or the Foreign Office. With regard to the Question on the Paper, I have to say that it is quite impossible to form, at the present time, a definite and final decision, still less to announce that decision on matters which must be considered in the various circumstances which may arise. A great deal must depend upon the General commanding on the spot in order to make the best arrangements.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his own information confirms the reports which have been published of the delay and difficulties experienced in transporting the troops and stores of the Soudan expedition by row-boats along the Nile, and the length of time and labour that such a system must entail; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will now take further into consideration the question of constructing a Railway from Suakim to the Nile, such as may be of use in establishing communication with Khartoum, with drawing the garrisons and refugees from the Soudan, and forming a permanent route for commerce with Central Africa?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: We have received no official Report of any greater delay or difficulties than we anticipated in transporting troops and stores by means of row-boats. The Government are not of opinion that it is necessary to reconsider the question of constructing a Railway from Suakin to Berber. These matters will, however, be more conveniently discussed when the Vote in connection with the Expedition is moved.

INDIA (BOMBAY)—THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. GIBSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, What is the number of high (or gazetted) appointments in the Bombay Civil Service having a salary of 400 rupees and upwards per mensem, now held by the following classes respectively:—(a) Covenanted civilians; (b) Natives of India (other than Covenanted); (c) Military officers; (d) Uncovenanted Europeans?

MR. J. K. CROSS: According to The Bombay Civil List, there were, on July 1, 1884, 633 Civil appointments in the Bombay Presidency, with salaries of 400 rupees and upwards per mensem. They were distributed as follows:—159 were held by Covenanted Civil Servants, 113 by Natives of India (other than Covenanted), 98 by Military officers, and 263 by Uncovenanted Europeans. There were also 57 Civil Medical appointments, of which 50 were held by Military Surgeons, five by Natives of India, and two by Uncovenanted Europeans.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—REMOVAL OF PLACARDS AT DROGHEDA.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, on the 7th instant, a policeman at Drogheda publicly removed from the shop window of one of the principal newsagents of the town the coloured cartoon supplement of The Weekly Freeman, and of United Ireland, and threatened him with prosecution in the event of its being again exhibited; whether this was done by the authority, or with the approval, of the Government; whether it is true that on former occasions, when similar conduct on the part of constables was complained of in this House, the representative of the Irish Government stated that the acts were done without authority, and that steps would be taken to prevent their repetition; and, whether, in the event of the constable having acted without authority, and proceedings being taken against him, he will be defended at the public expense?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The cartoons were posted up outside a shop window in a very narrow thoroughfare, and caused an obstruction by collecting persons at that point. It was on this account they were interfered with, and not because of anything in their character. The newsvendor had previously received several cautions as to obstructions at his door; and on this occasion the person in charge of the shop was asked to remove the cause of the obstruction before the police interfered with it. If the obstruction was real, the police acted within their instructions, which, as regards placards, are, that they must not allow them to be posted in situations where persons collected to read them intercept the passengers. The former cases to which the hon. Member refers were not, I think, analogous, there having been no question of obstruction. With regard to the last paragraph of the Question, the rule is that when proceedings are taken against the police for alleged violation of duty, they are required to defend themselves; and the question of reimbursement depends upon whether or not it is shown they are to blame.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Was the placard outside the shop, or placed inside the window, in the ordinary way?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: It was posted outside the window.

MR. CALLAN: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is the fact that for the last 10 years the same newsvendor has posted placards in that same identical spot, and has never been even summoned by the police?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I do not know whether it was the same newsvendor; but it could not have been the same placard.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Then, am I to understand from the right hon. Gentleman that it is the character of the last placard that is objected to? If I understand aright, the right hon. Gentleman did not deny the statement of my hon. Friend that this news vendor has posted these placards without any opposition from the police for the last 10 years, and that exception was taken to it for the first time in the case of the last placard. Further, I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware that no person in existence, except himself, believes the explanation of the police-constable?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not think the last Question is intended to be answered. In answer to the previous Question of the hon. Member, I have no information as to what has taken place during the last 10 years. I have read the Report received on the subject, and which gives, prima facie, sufficient reasons for what has been done.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND) — THE MESSRS. SYNNOTT, CO. ARMAGH.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been drawn to a report in The Irish Times of the 7th November of the case of Mark S. Synnott v. Margaret Murphy, heard before the Queen's Bench Division, in which Mr. Justice O'Brien is reported to have stated that there had been a gross fraud upon the Treasury; whether he has made himself acquainted with the facts of this case, and whether he is aware that the persons implicated in this matter, namely, Mr. Mark S. Synnott and Mr. Parker G. Synnott are both in the Commission of the Peace for the county of Armagh, and the former also a deputy lieutenant; and, whether it is intended to direct a prosecution against them for this alleged fraud, or to call the attention of the Lord Chancellor to it?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer. I have seen the Report referred to; but I am informed that what Mr. Justice O'Brien said was that a fraud would be practised on the Treasury if the sale was allowed to stand. The proceedings under the Arrears Act were quite regular, and no prosecution could be sustained under that Act. The action of the landlord consisted in endeavouring to execute a judgment which was in legal effect satisfied. There may, no doubt, be a civil remedy for this against the landlord; but it is not, in our opinion, a case in which a criminal prosecution could be brought, or the matter should be referred to the Lord Chancellor.

BOARD OF TRADE RETURNS, No. 258 (SHIP INSURANCE)—MR. MAC IVER.

MR. MAC IVER asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he can give any explanation of the circumstances under which the name of Mr. Mac Iver, M.P., was inaccurately inserted in Parliamentary Return No. 258, in connection with the loss of the steamer Stromboli, amongst a "list of Delegates and Members of Parliament who, during the five years ended 1882, lost 65 ships, with 367 lives;" whether it is within the knowledge of the Board of Trade that the Stromboli belonged to the Cunard Company at the time of her loss, and that Mr. Mac Iver, M.P. had absolutely nothing to do with her, having sold his interest in the Cunard steamers, and retired from the firm of D. and O. Mac Iver on the 30th September 1874, some five years previous to the disaster; and, if it is true that the Board of Trade, upon being asked to correct their mistake, not merely omitted to do so, but wrote, attributing to Mr. Mac Iver, M.P. the loss of the steamer Thesaly, which had not been lost, and suggesting that he might write to the newspapers?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The compilers of the Return were not aware at the time that the hon. Member for Birkenhead had ceased to belong to the firm of D. and O. Mac Iver or Burns and Mac Iver, and the Stromboli was entered in the Return as having been wrecked; but in the Return the name of "O. Mac Iver" was entered in the column for name and address of owner, and the hon. Member's own name was only entered as a delegate. As regards the Thesaly, she did belong to Mr. D. Mac Iver, and she was reported as wrecked; and her crew were taken off by another vessel. She was what is known as a "constructive" total loss, for it appears that she was subsequently got off the rocks and repaired. She was, however, reported to the Board of Trade and the Registrar General of Shipping as a wreck, and her certificate registry was cancelled in consequence. A full Return of the loss of ships during the last five years, with the names of the owners, has been ordered, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone). In this Return I will take care that the name of the ship which was lost during its ownership by Mr. D. Mac Iver is correctly stated as the Thessaly, and not the Stromboli.

MR. MAC IVER: I am sure that the House will allow me to say that it is not true that the Thessaly was ever a constructive total loss, though she was on the rocks. She was the property of the Company of which I was Chairman, and, as far as I know, she is in perfect safety at the present moment.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The statement of the hon. Member is not inconsistent with my own. It is a peculiarity of constructive total losses that in many cases after the vessel has been returned as lost it is again repaired. The hon. Member himself, in a letter, states the steamer Thessaly was stranded in 1879, and was consequently removed from the Register.

MR. MAC IVER: I think I may be allowed to say that a constructive total loss means that a ship has been seriously damaged and has been handed over to the underwriters. The ship in question met with a serious disaster; but she was got off the rocks, and I myself paid more than one-fourth of the cost. She was distinctly not a constructive total loss.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)— ACQUITTAL OF MR. FITZGERALD.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether, considering the determination of the Crown to put Mr. P. N. Fitzgerald on his trial before trying the eleven Tubbercurry prisoners, and the fact that Mr. P. N. Fitzgerald was yesterday acquitted, the Crown will now immediately cause the discharge of the eleven Tubbercurry prisoners from custody?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) was understood to reply that he had telegraphed for information, and had not yet received any reply.

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL IN CAPITAL CASES.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, considering recent discussions in which suspicions have arisen that innocent persons have been sentenced to death and to long terms of servitude, Her Majesty's Government are prepared, in the pending Session, to introduce a measure providing for appeal in cases of sentences of death and of penal servitude for long periods?

MR. GLADSTONE: In reply to this Question, I have to say that in 1883 Her Majesty's Government made proposals upon this subject, and a Bill was submitted to the Grand Committee and passed by that Committee; but, owing to the opposition which was manifested on the other side of the House—I do not know whether it was confined to that side of the House—the Bill was not prosecuted during that Session. The Government have not since then arrived at any new decision on the subject; but it will be their duty to consider the matter before the time comes round for arranging the annual Business.

MR. WARTON asked the right hon. Gentleman, whether the reason why the Bill he had referred to could not be brought before the House was because it was linked by the Attorney General to a large measure for the codification of the Criminal Law?

MR. GLADSTONE: I must refer the hon. and learned Gentleman to the Attorney General for an answer to that Question.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—SUPPLY—THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK'S MISSION.

MR. GLADSTONE: In pursuance, Sir, of an engagement which I entered into yesterday, in reply to a Question put to me by the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), I wish to refer to the proceedings which we propose in Supply, and also with regard to Lord Northbrook's Mission. With regard to Supply I partially answered the Question last night—that when we get through the Franchise Bill we shall proceed with Supply. We now propose to take Supply on Thursday, and the necessary Notice of the Supplementary Estimates which will then be moved will be laid on the Table. As far as we are concerned, we shall proceed with respect to them as we should proceed with respect to other Supplementary Estimates, and move them in the same way. It is our intention also to be prepared to proceed on Friday if we are able, but we do not intend on Friday next to interfere with the Friday Rule. Should it be necessary, however, to do anything to expedite financial business, we shall not hesitate to make a proposal on the subject. With regard to Lord Northbrook's Mission, his Report, properly so called, is not yet in form; but his Colleagues are sufficiently cognizant of his general plans to take them into consideration, which they will do, and on some day in the coming week I hope to state to the House the course that we propose.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I understand that it is in the contemplation of the Government to propose a Vote for Sir Charles Warren's Expedition to Bechuanaland. If that is so, I would express a hope that before the Vote is proposed to the House we may be furnished with the instructions given to Sir Charles Warren. There have been rumours on that subject of a very grave nature, and I think the House ought to have them.

MR. GLADSTONE: I shall see that that matter is considered. I was not aware there was any question on the subject.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN: I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he contemplates the House taking any other Business during the Autumn Session save that which arises out of the Franchise Bill and the Votes for South Africa and the Nile Expedition, and the discussion on Lord Northbrook's proposals?

MR. GLADSTONE: There has been no change in the general intention of the Government, which was to make this Autumn meeting subservient, as far as they could, to purposes connected with the Franchise Bill. Then there has arisen the necessity in connection with the Expedition up the Nile and the military preparations having reference to Bechuanaland. That, of course, the Government must take upon themselves, and whatever grows naturally out of it. The hon. Gentleman has referred to the discussion upon Lord Northbrook's Report under his commission. With respect to that matter the Government have nothing to propose to Parliament at the present moment. I have already said that we shall be prepared to refer to the matter next week. With respect to anything beyond, I think our understanding was this—that the Government did not contemplate at this Autumn meeting—did not consider this Autumn meeting the proper time, or would last sufficiently long, for the prosecution of the general legislation of the year. That proposition we adhere to. At the same time, it will be readily understood that occasionally subjects arise with regard to which there may be some peculiar pressure, and the scope of which is not of any great extent, on which, if the Government see cause, they may make an exception. There is, for instance, the subject referred to at the close of last Session—the federation of the Australian Colonies. Undoubtedly, as regards the general Business, our views are as already stated; and I should say in the exceptions I have made, and for which I have left the door open, I spoke of Business which, besides being small in character, is what may be called of a non-contentious nature.

SIR JOHN HAY: I hope the Navy is not going to be neglected.

MR. GLADSTONE: There is a pledge that a Government statement shall be made on that subject, which pledge holds good. I am obliged to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman for mentioning the matter.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: There is an expression of the Prime Minister which I do not quite understand. Speaking of Lord Northbrook's Report, the right hon. Gentleman said there was no proposal which the Government would have to make. ["No, no!"] That is just what wants clearing up. The right hon. Gentleman said he would give us some information; and I should wish to know whether he means that the Government do not at this moment contemplate calling attention to Lord Northbrook's Report, or whether, having considered it, it would not be necessary to make any proposals at all? If he contemplates having proposals to make hereafter, we should be glad to know when we shall be furnished with any Papers on the subject; and also whether we shall have further Papers as to the Expedition up the Nile?

MR. GLADSTONE: As regards the Expedition up the Nile, I am not in a condition to answer. I am not aware that there are such Papers. The right hon. Gentleman has made reference to Lord Northbrook's Mission, the allusion to which arose out of the Question of my hon. Friend (Mr. J. Cowen). This Question assumes that the Government would have something to propose; and all I wished to convey was that that assumption was premature. I do not mean to convey either that we had or had not anything to propose. My intention was, as I have said, to state that the matter was under our consideration, and that I hoped to be able to announce the course we shall take. With regard to the Papers, I will bear in mind what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: As the Vote for the Soudan is to be laid on the Table this evening, and as there may be some delay on the part of the printers, perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will state what the amount will be?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is no part of my duty to deal with Votes in the nature of Supplementary Estimates. These are entirely under the charge of the Ministers of Departments; and as I believe there are a considerable number of Votes charged under different heads, I do not think it would be possible to enter upon particulars, nor do I think it would be convenient in anticipation of the Vote.

WESTMINSTER HALL (RESTORATION).

In reply to Mr. MITCHELL HENRY,

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the removal of earth in front of the buttresses on the west side of Westminster Hall was merely for the purpose of levelling the ground. No money would be spent on the structure until the Committee had reported, and it would not be necessary to replace the earth whatever was done.

QUEEN'S SPEECH — HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord KENSINGTON) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as followeth:—

I receive with much satisfaction your loyal and dutiful Address.

I rely with confidence on your assurance that the Measures which may be submitted to you will receive your most careful consideration.

You may count on My cordial co-operation in your endeavours to promote the happiness and contentment of My People.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—

THE MAAMTRASNA MURDERS—CONVICTION OF MYLES JOYCE AND OTHERS.

MR. O'BRIEN (for Mr. HEALY) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether the dying depositions of the two men executed with Myles Joyce were taken by and before a resident magistrate; whether each deposition was made independently by each of the condemned men in his own cell without any knowledge or communication of what the other had said or done; and, whether any copies of the depositions have been made, in whose custody do the originals remain?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): There were no "depositions" taken; but statements of the two men referred to were made before a Resident Magistrate. They are in the custody of the Irish Government, and will remain there. As the Government have declined, for reasons already fully stated, to produce those statements, I must respectfully decline to give any further information regarding them.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Are we to understand that these depositions were sworn depositions?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): On the contrary, I have conveyed that they were not sworn.

MR. O'BRIEN: Might I point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman that he has not answered the most important portion of my Question—whether each of the depositions was made independently by each of the condemned men in his own cell without any knowledge or communication of what others had said or done?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER): I have answered all that I could consistently with the statements already made, and as far as the Irish Government are prepared to answer.

LAW AND POLICE—THE CLEATOR MOOR RIOTS, CUMBERLAND.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to The Carlisle Journal, of November the 4th, with reference to the evidence of Superintendent Sempill at the Cumberland Assizes; whether he is aware that the Journal states that, on reference to—"Another and perfectly independent report of the same portion of Mr. Sempill's evidence," as that impugned in the case of the

"There was also a constable from Longtown named Tomer. Tomer was brought down because he was an experienced detective officer ;"

whether he has observed that the learned judge in summing up the case showed that he was under the same impression as to the evidence in the following remarks in reference to Mr. Sempill's evidence :

"I think it would have been better if the Deputy Chief Constable had candidly admitted what the object of the proceeding was. Instead of that he somewhat insults our understanding by telling us that he got this experienced detective from a distance for the purpose of ascertaining the state of the man's mind, and whether he was likely to injure himself in his cell ;"

and, whether, under these circumstances, further inquiry will be made into the matter ?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that he did not see how he could make any further inquiries that would lead to any different result than he had already stated. The Superintendent of Police, Superintendent Sempill, had informed him that the man referred to in the Question was not a detective, but an ordinary police-constable, and he had had a statement to the like effect from the man himself. That being so, he did not see that there was any use in making further inquiries.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL.—[BILL 1.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Trevelyan, The Lord Advocate.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. GOSCHEN: Before this Bill passes to "another place" I wish, with the permission of the House, to make a few observations. No one can fail to have been struck by the fact that yesterday there was a change of tone in all parts of this House on this matter, and that the hopes of a very speedy arrangement, satisfactory to all Parties and to the country at large, seemed yesterday to be more distant than they had done before. Any regret which I may feel for the fact, whether or not it has an echo on either side of the House, is, I feel sure, shared by a great many persons out-of-doors. And in proportion as they see the prospect both of these measures—the Franchise Bill and the Redistribution Bill—being passed by the present Government, and the present Parliament receding from view, so there will be a very great regret that this Parliament has not been able to arrive at that solution which, I believe, the country desires. I should like to ask what is the cause of the change that seemed to come over the House of Commons with regard to this matter yesterday? Was it that the House considered that, after the hints and the suggestions which had been made by the responsible Leaders of both Parties, there was less hope than there was before that some agreement might be arrived at? Or did it appear that there was less prospect of agreeing to a Redistribution Bill when that Redistribution Bill had been introduced? Or was it that one isolated political event out-of-doors so changed the opinions of hon. Members opposite—"Oh, oh!" from the Opposition—that that which they seemed to approve of before was not approved of yesterday? I call the attention of the House, not only to the speeches, but to the cheers and the demeanour of hon. Members opposite. [Laughter.] I do not see why hon. Members opposite should indulge in merriment at that suggestion, and I do not think that the part I have taken with regard to this measure should dis-incline hon. Members opposite to listen to my observations. If I now venture to address hon. Members opposite, I have not shrunk from speaking frankly to my own Friends; and it is not in any spirit of opposition, but it is because I feel certain that the country will regret the prospect of a solution of this question receding, that I venture to make this appeal. I do trust that the Conservative Party will not think that they are serving the cause they have at heart, or that they will strengthen the position of the House of Lords, or that they will promote that solution which they so much desire—namely, the speedy introduction of a Redistribution Bill—by giving way to any feeling which may arise in their minds that their success at an isolated election means that the country endorses the position which they have taken up. Supposing that that were so—supposing that that election had been fought on the ground that the Lords had done right, and that the election had been won on that ground—and, indeed, for my part, I believe there was much force in the remark of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), that the action of the House of Lords has brought the question of redistribution nearer than it was in the last days of August; that we are now standing in a different position from what we were then; and that we have a greater certainty that it will be dealt with, and greater guarantees, and more prospect of performance, than we had before. Nevertheless, even if the late election expressed that opinion, I think distinctly it would be a great pity if the prospect of other elections, such as South Warwickshire, were to change in any respect the conciliatory attitude which I understood the Conservative Party to assume on Thursday and Friday last. I do not know whether the position of the Government has been thoroughly and correctly understood; but, to my mind, their position is this—not that they invite the opposite Party, as has been represented, to introduce or sketch a Redistribution Bill themselves, but that the Government are prepared at the very earliest date to introduce their Redistribution Bill, provided they only have some indications—not formal, not complete indications, but some indications of the attitude which the other side, or, rather, which the whole House, is likely to take with regard to these proposals. [Cries of "Oh, oh!" and "What are they?"] I will tell hon. Members what they are. They are, that the Redistribution Bill shall not be founded simply upon the principle of population; that in the Redistribution Bill the principle of communities as against individuals shall be maintained; and that the Redistribution Bill is to be fair and just as between rural and urban districts. All these indications have been given by the right hon. Gentleman speaking on behalf of Her Majesty's Government; but the House has had no indication, the country has had no indication whatever, of the attitude which will be taken by the Conservative Party with regard to any one of these great principles, and so I understand the position of Her Majesty's Government to be, that they invite some indication of opinion, being convinced in their own minds that they are going to propose a Redistribution Bill which will be satisfactory to hon. Members opposite. I am afraid that, standing in this place, it is incidental to political human nature to express oneself with more warmth than one would desire; but what I wish to suggest to hon. Members opposite is simply this—that they should return to the frame of mind in which they were on Thursday or Friday last. [Opposition laughter, and cries of "No, no!" from below the Ministerial Gangway.] I quite understand "No, no!" coming from that quarter, and it is because I understand it so well that I make my appeal to hon. Members opposite. Why have hon. Members opposite wished, and why have some of us wished, that these two Bills should be carried together? Because they consider, and I agree with them, that the present Parliament is a fit Body to deal with this question of redistribution, and will deal with it, possibly, in a fairer spirit than the new electorate would before redistribution has taken place. But there is a danger that is equal to that danger, and that is this—that we should now embark upon a controversy between the two Parties who, in the heat of an election, will produce rival schemes of redistribution. For my part, I think that the whole of that subject will be dealt with in a fairer spirit, and in a manner much more representative of the true interests of the country, and with a consideration for all sides, if it is done by a friendly arrangement after the manner suggested by the Prime Minister through the action of the whole House, than if we were to go to the country with each side making this question of redistribution one of the planks in its political platform, and with both sides bidding against each other in order to secure popular, and even democratic, support for their proposals. I do not think that the Conservative Party will find that their views will be subserved by such a course, because it appears to me that even Conservatives will go much further in the heat of election, and even in a bye-election, when they publish their addresses, than they will do when they are sitting in this House and carefully considering the question like statesmen. On the subject of redistribution Lord Salisbury says that he has been misrepresented when it is said that he has adopted the principle of population as the basis of representation. In his article in The National Review, which circulates in clubs, and which is read in society, he complains that any reference on his part to the four rules of arithmetic before popular audiences is considered as showing that he is in favour of making population the basis of representation. But, certainly, if, on a public platform, the noble Lord says that a district is entitled to so many Members in proportion to its population, it is highly probable that that district will think that that means business. You cannot dangle these arithmetical problems before an excited audience without their drawing their own deductions from them, and it is not by any kind of explanations in The National Review that the effect of such statements will be diminished. But the moral of that appears to be that we must make every effort to deal with this question of redistribution before a General Election. Hon. Members opposite will see, I trust, that it is with no feeling against them that I make these remarks. I believe that statesmanlike and steady principles will be more likely to be introduced into the Redistribution Bill, which I trust may be—and, indeed, which must be—introduced within the next few weeks. [An hon. MEMBER: The next few days.] Very well, the next few days—[loud Opposition cheers—] which I trust will be introduced within the next few days, after the invitation of this side of the House has been met, and hon. Members opposite have somewhat lifted the veil with regard to their views concerning redistribution, which we, on this side of the House, have been unable to penetrate. But as long as hon. Members opposite do not give us the slightest indication as to what degree of favour the sketch made by the Prime Minister is likely to be met by with among hon. Members on that side, so long it is difficult and almost impossible for Her Majesty's Government to produce their Bill. I was about to say that I see in the very language the Prime Minister has used this night that he intends to reserve this Session for the question of redistribution as well as of the franchise. There were words carefully chosen, too, in the Queen's Speech which indicated the same thing; and I implore hon. Members opposite to do what they can in order that that which they themselves have hitherto wished may be brought about, and that the country may see that, to the credit of this Parliament, we are able to carry out the wishes of the people, which I believe to be that both these great questions may be dealt with forthwith. By doing so I believe that we shall best vindicate the practical character of the House of Commons, and that we shall also vindicate the position of the House of Lords, which will be saved from an agitation which cannot be to its advantage; and, above all, it will be possible tranquilly and quietly to consider that scheme upon which the future of England must depend, and which we ought to be able to consider in this House like men of business, and putting the interests of the public above the interests of Party, rather than in the heat and turmoil of a contested election. In that spirit we might be able to consider that scheme of redistribution which, if both sides would only approach each other and pass over that small interval which still seems to separate them, I believe could be devised to the satisfaction of both Parties in this House and to the great advantage of the country.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: I am disposed to agree with the right hon. Gentleman in the expression of his regret at the change of tone which was perceptible in the debate of yesterday; but I think that it is necessary to make this qualification—that that change of tone was only recognized after my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Stanley) resumed his seat. There was no change of tone in his speech, which was moderate and temperate; the change of tone was only perceptible in the reply of the Prime Minister, and in what I venture to call the hectoring speech of the Home Secretary. If there was such a marked change of tone in the speeches we heard yesterday from the Treasury Bench, and equally, undoubtedly, on this side, the House and the country out-of-doors must place their own construction upon the causes of that change. The right hon. Gentleman has invited us to recur to the frame of mind in which he supposes we were on Thursday and Friday last. I wish to give the right hon. Gentleman every satisfaction in my power, and if I could recur to the frame of mind in which I was on those days I would endeavour to do so; but the fact is that I am in exactly the same frame of mind now as I then was. I am quite at a loss to understand what the right hon. Gentleman means when he says that not only the language but the demeanour of the whole Conservative Party has undergone some wonderful change since Thursday and Friday last. I cannot enlighten the right hon. Gentleman as to the causes of a fact which has no existence. But the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to refer to three possible causes for that change of language and demeanour. The first, and, as I assume in his opinion, as he dwelt the longest upon it, the most important, of those causes is the result of a recent contested election. But there have been one or two contested elections lately; and when the right hon. Gentleman says that the change in the whole demeanour of the Conservative Party of the House is probably to be attributed to the results of a single bye-election, I feel disposed to ask him to which bye-election he refers, because, if I am right in my assumption that the change of tone is on the Ministerial side of the House and not on this, then it must be the Scarborough and not the South Warwickshire Election to which the right hon. Gentleman refers. What inducement does the right hon. Gentleman hold out to us to depart from the position and principle which we have hitherto inflexibly maintained? The right hon. Gentleman says if you will only kindly tell the Government what your general scheme of redistribution is, and, more than that, if every section of this House will kindly tell the Government what their scheme of redistribution is, then he has little doubt that Her Majesty's Government will forthwith proceed to introduce a measure which will satisfy everybody and will discontent nobody. Was ever so extraordinary a proposition submitted to the House? Has the right hon. Gentleman himself communicated his scheme to Her Majesty's Government, and have his hon. Friends who sit around him—the highly respectable, but, I fear, the somewhat diminishing, Whig Party—communicated to Her Majesty's Government what scheme will find favour in their eyes; and has that banded phalanx of the enthusiastic supporters of Her Majesty's Government who sit below the Gangway on this side of the House communicated to Her Majesty's Government the scheme of redistribution which they will support? I might also go through every Bench below the Gangway on the Ministerial side of the House, and ask whether the hon. Members who sit upon them have told the Government what their scheme of redistribution is? No, Sir; the appeal is really made to Her Majesty's Opposition, and to Her Majesty's Opposition alone.

" 'Will you walk into my parlour?' said the spider to the fly."

Now, Sir, had it not been for the rather lugubrious tone of the right hon. Gentleman, I was rather disposed to congratulate you, and the House at large upon our impending relief from the vexations and troubles of what obviously, since the speeches from the Government Benches, is about to be a barren and a fruitless Session. I think this House and the other House of Parliament and the country ought to know that, while on some occasions Her Majesty's Ministers can speak in honeyed accents, and appear to be in the most amiable of minds, in reality they intend not to budge one single inch from the position they have taken up; and that, while they insist upon this isolated measure being placed on the Statute Book, they will not take this House nor the country into their confidence as to the corresponding measure of reconstruction which this Bill renders absolutely necessary. For I must contend that while the Government are complimented upon the simple character of this Bill and upon its enfranchising qualities, there is another aspect and another character of it to which, I think, too little attention has been directed, and that is its disfranchising influence. This is a Bill in reality—and I am not sure that the same thing was not pointed out last night by the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. A. Grey)—which logically and practically destroys the existing system of the borough representation of the Three Kingdoms; and this is a Bill which annihilates practically the existing county constituencies of the Three Kingdoms. It is not too much to say that this Bill throws down the Parliamentary walls of every borough which does not contain a population of above 50,000. And this Bill, by merging those towns in the adjacent counties, and by the emancipation of county voters by its other provisions, does substantially disfranchise, as far as political power is concerned, the existing constituencies of the counties. Well, Sir, these being the two disfranchising effects of this measure, I would ask what are the proposals of Her Majesty's Government in the way of reconstruction? What they do in the way of destruction is patent and obvious. What they are prepared to do in the way of reconstruction, I say, has always been, and still remains, vague, indefinite, and uncertain. The right hon. Gentleman who has just resumed his seat has told us that nothing could be clearer or more definite than the principles of reconstruction laid down by the Prime Minister. I take exception to that statement entirely. I should say that, compared with the statements of the right hon. Gentleman last Session, those which we heard with respect to reconstruction the other night are still more vague and still more indefinite. Now, let me take one—and I take one only—of these five principles, as I think the right hon. Gentleman called them—perhaps some will call them propositions, some perhaps—certainly nobody in this House—might be tempted to call them Parliamentary platitudes—but whether principles, propositions, or platitudes, I will test by one, and by one only, what they really mean, and what construction anybody can place upon them. I will take the fourth. Last Session the right hon. Gentleman was, I thought, clear and distinct on the subject of that fourth proposition—the proportional representation between the Three Kingdoms. Ireland was to keep the whole of her present representation; Scotland was to gain new Members; and England was to lose Members unless Parliament should agree to an increase of Members of this House. I am sure some hon. Gentlemen will remember the sort of shudder which passed through the crowded Benches when it was proposed to increase the numbers who were to sit upon them. This Session all that is dropped. Now, what is the fourth proposition or principle of the right hon. Gentleman? It comes in these words—

“Further, and to this I attach immense importance, it must be equitable and liberal, as between the great divisions of the country; and in speaking of these great divisions I have avoided the term ‘the three countries known in the Constitution,’ because it is not unnatural to speak of the four countries, England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales.”

That is the sole amount or item of information which we have had communicated to us by the right hon. Gentleman. Last Session Ireland was to keep all her Members; this Session we are not told that. Last Session Scotland was to gain Members; this Session we are not told that. But the proposition, like all other propositions, is regulated by a qualification; and the qualification in this proposition is that it must be equitable and liberal, as between the great divisions of the country. How are we to interpret those two epithets? If we look at the first epithet, and take it as the ruling epithet of the sentence, we may be disposed to think that, after all, Ireland and Wales probably will not keep their present number of Members. If, on the other hand, we disregard the epithet “equitable” and think only of that which follows, “liberal,” the Irish Gentlemen below the Gangway may even hope for a considerable addition to their number. And so, Sir, throughout all the divisions of the country. Is Wales to gain, is Scotland to gain, is England to lose? This will all be regulated by those two epithets in conjunction “equitable” and “liberal.” Now, Sir, when we press our well-founded demand—from which in principle I apprehend the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) does not dissent—that redistribution should accompany this scheme of extension of the franchise, what are the answers which we received in the course of yesterday from Her Majesty's Ministers? They were twofold. First of all, that to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, the information which has already been vouchsafed to us, and with which we are told to be content, that no more will be afforded to us until the Franchise Bill is placed upon the Statute Book; and the other is an answer of the most extraordinary character I think I ever remember even in this House. We are told in answer to our demands—“Oh, why do not you come forward and tell us what you wish for?" I object altogether to either of these answers being regarded as satisfactory. I have already given the reason why I think the information with which Her Majesty's Government have favoured us is altogether illusory and insufficient; and with respect to the other argument—the only new one which I heard from the right hon. Gentleman yesterday—it was certainly an injudicious one—the argument of fear. The right hon. Gentleman said in effect—"I fear if we do not first of all enrol the Franchise Bill on the Statute Book, something of a very unpleasant Parliamentary character may ensue, and this House of Commons may, in my greatest need, desert me, and on some question connected with Egypt or South Africa I may find myself in a minority, and then what becomes of the Franchise Bill? Why, it would be intrusted to your suspicious, suspected, unfriendly hands, and that is a danger which I dare not face." Now, I have always had a high opinion of the courage of the right hon. Gentleman, but it would seem to be destroyed by himself if this argument is admitted. But I would bid the right hon. Gentleman to take encouragement from the recollection of what has occurred during every Session of this Parliament. Cannot he rely, after all that has gone by, on the unswerving fidelity and the dauntless resolution of his bands of serried followers. What amount, I should like to know, of humiliation, or disgrace, or calamity is likely to sever them from his victorious car? The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down passed an eulogium—a very well deserved eulogium—on himself for the impartiality and fairness of his conduct on this and all other questions; but unless my memory deceives me, the right hon. Gentleman himself, on that very Egyptian Question, condemned the conduct of the Government in his speech, but abstained from recording that unfavourable opinion in the Division Lobby. No, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman may address his followers in a classical and well-known quotation—

But, supposing—because the right hon. Gentleman at least desires that the House of Commons should suppose, the position he has placed before them is, at any rate, a possible one—suppose the catastrophe which he dreads should occur, and he should find himself in a minority on some crucial foreign question—what would happen? A change of Government would ensue. Would the right hon. Gentleman or anybody on the other side of the House contend for one single moment that any Government which could be formed in this House of Commons could remain in Office a week without an appeal to the constituencies of the country? Therefore, it is not that the right hon. Gentleman dreads this House, not that he dreads his supporters or his opponents here; but what he dreads is that there must be under those circumstances an appeal to the country. He dreads what sort of answer the country would have to give even upon this question of the Franchise Bill. I will not ask the right hon. Gentleman to trust to the honour of his political opponents. Let him think as meanly and as poorly of us as he pleases. Let him suppose that we are capable, after having accepted the principle of the Franchise Bill on the condition that the measure is accompanied by a full scheme for the redistribution of seats—let him suppose that even after that we are mean enough to throw over the whole subject if we have a chance. Let him think all that if he pleases; but what can he think of the country, of the constituencies, without whose consent or assent, base as we might be, we could never hope to perform so extraordinary a feat? Now, I will say a word or two on the other branch of the question which has been put before us—namely, this new doctrine of the duty of the Opposition to furnish the Government with their views on the question of redistribution. It is the first time during my long career in Parliament that I have heard such a proposal made to an Opposition. I am quite certain that the right hon. Gentleman himself the last time he dealt with the question of Reform never invited the Opposition to favour him with their views on redistribution. At first, it is true, he was a little shy of introducing his Redistribution Bill; but after awhile his repugnance was conquered, and he placed before the House his scheme of redistribution, as well as the scheme for the extension of the franchise. The present proposal is a complete and entire novelty, not likely to lead to satisfactory results, or to the due discharge of the Ministerial responsibilities of the Government. If the right hon. Gentleman is sincerely anxious—and I do not for a moment doubt his sincerity in the matter—to obtain the support of a large section of the House for the scheme of redistribution to which he has given his assent, he must wait for the exposition of that approbation until the proper time and opportunity have arrived, and that will be when he submits his scheme on his own Ministerial responsibility to the attention of Parliament. This is no new view of mine. If hon. Members will turn to the interesting work with which many of them are doubtless by this time familiar—namely, The Memoirs of Mr. Croker, they will find in it a very admirable letter written by Sir Robert Peel on this question. Somebody, it appears, in 1831, had made that sort of communication to Sir Robert Peel which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon has made to us to-night, and suggested that it would be a very good thing if Sir Robert Peel would indicate in a friendly sort of way his view of Reform to the Government of the day, and this is what Sir Robert Peel said in answer—

“My fixed determination is to keep myself wholly unfettered in regard to any measure of Reform brought forward by the Government, and to decline all communication, direct or indirect, with the Government of the day.”

I think that Sir Robert Peel expressed in this sentence tersely and well the true Constitutional position which Leaders of the Opposition should assume towards the Government of the day. The Government have deliberately, persistently, and for their own purposes, tried to divorce franchise from redistribution. They maintain that position; and, so long as they maintain it, it will be impossible for us to communicate, publicly or privately, with them on the subject of redistribution of seats. When the Government show a disposition to qualify that position the whole condition of affairs will be immediately changed. But, after the speeches which we heard last night, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon we must reconcile ourselves as best we can to the impending strife of tongues which is apparently before us, and we must do in our respective spheres the best we can to maintain and promote those principles which, on one side of the House or the other, we have been sent here to maintain. For myself, I can only say that every debate which has taken place on this subject, every meeting which I have had the opportunity of attending—nay, that even the general result of the descent by the Prime Minister and his Colleagues into the streets during the autumn, have, in my opinion, confirmed the wisdom, the prudence, and the patriotism of the course which the Constitutional Party in both Houses of Parliament and in the country have adopted and maintained. That being the state of the case as it presents itself to our minds, we shall, when the Question is put, say “No” to the third reading of the Bill, animated by the conviction that in so doing we shall be simply discharging our plain and bounden duty to the constituencies, the country, and the Constitution.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not rise for the purpose of endeavouring to answer the speech of the noble Lord (Lord John Manners) in the spirit in which it has been conceived and delivered. On the contrary, I shall endeavour to reply to it in a tone as far removed from his as I can possibly make it; for what, Sir, is the speech that we have heard from the noble Lord? It is a speech which introduced with great ability every combative element and consideration into this debate which could tend to render it impossible that anything but a great Constitutional crisis should ensue. To widen a breach, to insure a conflict, to extinguish hopes that might yet remain of reasonable accommodation, I admit there is no man so well qualified as the noble Lord. What is the real upshot of the speech which we have just heard? It is to convey to the mind of the House that it is idle to think of aiming at any union of minds and spirits in the settlement of this great question, and that an accommodation is impossible; and, as if that were not enough, every word of that speech has been directly addressed to the purpose of rendering accommodation impossible. Now, I shall not deal with the parts of the speech of the noble Lord which may properly be called combative, for there is something more important at issue to-night than drawing cheers from those who sit upon the Benches of this House. There are greater issues even than the Motion which you, Sir, have proposed from the Chair, and the thought which weighs and presses upon my mind is, who is to be responsible for events that may possibly happen? So far, Sir, as I am concerned, and I think I may say so far as my Colleagues are concerned, we do not covet any share in that responsibility; and my duty, therefore, is to avoid all topics which, if I were to handle, I could only handle, or might be tempted to handle, in the spirit and the manner of the noble Lord. I come, then, to those portions of his speech which refer to the course of actual events, and I wish to see how far the noble Lord has made good his main contentions in those portions of his speech. He said that there had been a change in the tone and temper of the House since Thursday and Friday last, and he regretted that he could not replace himself in the frame of mind in which he was upon those days.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The right hon. Gentleman has entirely misunderstood what I said, which was, that I could not put myself back into that frame of mind because I had never come out of it.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sorry to say that I am afraid I have an additional cause for regret, because I did hope until I heard that explanation of the noble Lord—which, nevertheless, I must thank him for—I did hope that on Friday last he had for once been in a pacific frame of mind, and that the passing state had been so short-lived. Then I will not refer to what the noble Lord has told me of his frame of mind on Friday last. I can only condole with him on many subjects of misgiving and pain which that evening, I am afraid, suggested to him, and very much regret that he is still so faithful to ideas of a different order. But the noble Lord says there was a change of tone in the speeches made last night, but that change of tone never began till after the speech of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Stanley) in moving his Amendment. Was the noble Lord in his place last night? Did he hear the speech of the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther)? Is he not aware that in that speech, proceeding from the right hon. Gentleman who sits in common cause and common council with the other Gentlemen on that Bench, the change of tone to which we refer was more conspicuous—if I may say so, more violent—than in any speech which followed? What does the noble Lord mean, then, when he says that this change of tone began with speeches from the Treasury Bench? Why, Sir, the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) not only gave no indications agreeable to the general tone of his speeches in this House, but he actually undertook upon his own responsibility to efface and destroy the effect of the remarkable declaration that had been made by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) now sitting near him, on the subject of proceeding in this matter by Resolution; and the right hon. Gentleman, whose presence would have been invaluable on that occasion, was, either inconveniently or otherwise, absent from the House—

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS was understood to say that he had been present.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman was not in the House. His absence was referred to at the time. He was not present in the body. He was not visible to our eyes. I shall have more to say on the subject of that declaration to which I have referred. The noble Lord, declaring that this change of tone proceeded from the Treasury Bench, has carefully avoided all verification of his assertion. He has not referred to a single statement, a single phrase, that was used from this Bench. He has conveniently overlooked the fact that more than once in the course of my remarks, while lamenting the change of tone that had been perceptible, I stated that, with regard to the conciliatory expressions that had been used, neither I nor my Colleagues receded from one syllable of them. And it is after that that the noble Lord puts out of view the speech of his own Friend and Colleague, and tells me that the change of tone was in speeches from the Treasury Bench. I do not deal, like the noble Lord, in those general accusations which are so easy to throw out against opponents, because, from their general character, they do not admit of confutation by reference to particulars. But the whole purpose of my speech last night was to point out—and to point out with deep regret—the change of tone which had taken place in the speeches and in the sentiments of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The noble Lord has, no doubt, gone carefully over the debate of yesterday, and has found himself unable to cite from my own declarations, or any declarations on this side of the House, any one proposition indicating this change of tone. [An hon. MEMBER: Friday night.] Well, I shall go back to Friday night, and to our position as taken on Friday night. The noble Lord says that it is impossible that there can be any communications, publicly or privately, between the leading Members of different Parties on this subject. Did the noble Lord make that declaration for himself? I am afraid not. The noble Lord is well able to enter into the debates of this House without any premeditation; but the speech he has made to-night bears, unhappily, too many marks of premeditation, especially considering that a very large part of it consisted in the treatment in detail of the substance of yesterday's debate. The speech of the noble Lord, therefore, does not permit me to believe that the main propositions he has delivered are the offspring of the thought of the moment alone. He lays down that there can be no communications on the subject, publicly or privately, between the leading Members of Parties. He refers to the case of Sir Robert Peel. I am glad to hear the example of Sir Robert Peel quoted in this matter from those Benches. But the misfortune is that when they quote it they totally misunderstand and misapply it. The noble Lord is now citing Sir Robert Peel as his example and justification on this subject of Parliamentary Reform, especially of redistribution; and Sir Robert Peel did decline those communications. But why? He declined them because he was opposed to Parliamentary Reform. He declined them because he was determined to be responsible for no plan of Parliamentary Reform. May I refer to the consequences of his declining them? Are those consequences so very satisfactory and so very inviting to the noble Lord? What happened in consequence? The passing of the Reform Act and the utter humiliation of the House of Lords. That was the unfortunate consequence of the course Sir Robert Peel took on that occasion; but his course was honourable, manly, and consistent. Being opposed to Reform, being determined to be responsible for no measure of Reform, and seeing that he could not disarm that question of what he thought its danger, he naturally and properly said—"I will have no communications; but will reserve my own absolute freedom on a subject of that nature." Is that example applicable to the noble Lord? Does the noble Lord love Reform as much as we do? Is he anxious beyond anything for the redistribution of seats, that even the double-distilled poison of the Franchise Bill may be diluted possibly by virtue of a Redistribution Bill, and embrace that also? To make the reference applicable, Sir Robert Peel ought to have been saying—"I agree with you in your objects, I am as ready as you are to pass a Reform Bill, I wish to consider in a fair and candid spirit every object which I conceive to be of doubtful advantage, but I will hold no communications with you." If the noble Lord could have cited Sir Robert Peel as saying that, I admit his citation would have been in point; but instead of that he has only shown how entirely out of application is the language which he held. It is necessary, in resorting to that kind of argument, to make use of liberal exaggeration. How did the noble Lord treat the point when he came to say that we had invited the expression of opinion? He said—"Has everybody given his opinion to the Government? Has the right hon. Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) given his opinion to the Government? Have the Gentlemen on this Bench, have the Gentlemen on that Bench? Have you gone round the House to every section and demanded this expression of opinion?" The noble Lord pays me sufficient respect not to pay the slightest regard to the declarations made by me on the part of the Government. I have declared, in the most explicit terms, that, so far as the great majority of the House is concerned, we were at one with them—that we felt perfectly confident as to the principles of the measure of redistribution, that it will meet their cheerful approval and assent. There is no question of referring to my right hon. Friend, or to any Gentleman connected with the majority of the House, upon the subject of the franchise and redistribution. But we did undoubtedly invite communications from hon. Gentlemen opposite, and that appears in the view of the noble Lord a great offence, and he repudiates it altogether, and says—"It is impossible to have these communications, publicly or privately." If that be so, recollect how we stand. Our own course is this—to pass the Franchise Bill, and then be secure of a fair unobstructive treatment of the Redistribution Bill. That is our plan of proceedings. But of that plan you complain, and make use of the power which by sympathy you enjoy "elsewhere." I do not say you threaten—you give warning—that the controversy shall continue, and you are ready to risk the consequences. Well, Sir, under these circumstances, what we have sought is to consider whether we could depart from our own plan and meet your views, and instead of seeking to give effect to our own political principles and desires we are asking for communication of your ideas. That is our actually pacific intention, and for that pacific intention the language of denunciation has been liberally bestowed upon us by the noble Lord. But the question, after all, is, Where lay the change of tone that has unfortunately cropped up? What happened on Friday night of a material character, and how far have the material occurrences of that night been altered? The first thing that happened on Friday night that was material was the speech of the late Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir R. Assheton Cross). The late Home Secretary did not hold this language at all, of the impropriety and impossibility of communications between Parties with a view to an agreement. If I understood the general spirit of that speech, on the contrary, it was an encouragement to free communication. I do not presume to dwell upon the interpretation of the speech, but I do recollect one portion of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and it does not rest in my memory alone, because it was specifically noticed by my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, who followed him in the debate. When the right hon. Gentleman had expressed his desire that an accommodation should be arrived at, and his belief that it might easily be arrived at, he went on to say—I think he said very modestly—that it was not for him to determine on the form of proceeding; but it might be by Bill or it might be by Resolutions, and the choice between them was a question on which he did not think it his duty to enter. Well, Sir, that was a most conciliatory declaration on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. It was noticed as such by my right hon. Friend on the part of the Government. But what happened last night? Why, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman, the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) took into his own hands the entire responsibility for the late Home Secretary, just as if the late Home Secretary had been his ward, and the right hon. Member his guardian. What did these words mean, or, rather, did they mean anything at all? What between possible defects of statement and total defect of apprehension and understanding on the other side, they were words which might never have been spoken at all. But if the authority of the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire is open to some question—although, from the seat he occupies and the tone he generally assumes in this House, I do not see how it can be questioned—we have the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote). How did he endeavour to get rid of this reference to "Resolution?" By saying that it was an obiter dictum, and that an obiter dictum—he could not very well say it was equal to nothing at all, but he brought it as nearly as possible to obiter dictum. I apprehend that obiter dictum is essentially and by the very meaning of the phrase something that has nothing to do with the issue that is directly before you. But this had to do—it was an essential part of the issue before us. It was a question as to the mode in which this desire for accommodation was to be brought about upon which the right hon. Gentleman gave his obiter dictum. It was a judicial utterance directly pertaining to the mode of dealing with this great issue between us, proceeding from Gentlemen in authority, and couched in such a manner that we had a right to treat it as a serious declaration, an important declaration coming from a very weighty and leading Member of the Party, and distinctly conceived in the interests of peace. Was there no change of tone in the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite when this most important and conciliatory declaration was described and accentuated by the Leader of the Party as obiter dictum? But that was not the only point. No complaint had been made, as far as I remember, from this Bench of the insufficiency of the declarations from the opposite Bench or from the Leaders of the opposite Party with regard to the principles of redistribution. I am not aware that such complaint was made—certainly not by myself, and certainly not by either of those two Colleagues I see beside me (the Marquess of Hartington and Sir Charles W. Dilke) who took part in the debate. But what I did presume to observe was, that the declarations of the minority of the House were in contradiction with one another upon this subject; and when I said that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon called across the House “How?” I then pointed out that he himself had given an encouraging and sympathetic response to an invitation of my right hon. Friend the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) in favour of a particular form for the measure of redistribution—a most encouraging and sympathetic response; but that form was initiatory, and if there had been a disposition to peace it would have been so recognized and so treated. My right hon. Friend referred to a Bill which, in giving great scope to the principle of population, was to have that principle limited and its application varied by the introduction of a number of other elements. I said that was one form and one possible idea of a Redistribution Bill. But we also had another declaration from the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), and that declaration, in apparent coincidence both with previous declarations of his own elsewhere and of declarations made by Lord Salisbury, on the contrary, pointed, not to varied and diversified construction, but to the application of the principle of population only, qualified to a certain extent, as far as the noble Lord was concerned, by a division of rural and urban constituencies and pursuits. Then, when the right hon. Gentleman asked “How?” I said—“We are anxious to know the general tone and tendency of your views; but they have been laid before us in terms which are contradictory and incompatible.” I endeavoured—as the right hon. Gentleman had asked me—to explain my meaning. I endeavoured to get at the meaning of the right hon. Gentleman, and asked him whether he adopted the declarations of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock as to the scheme of redistribution? But the right hon. Gentleman maintained a persistent silence. I again challenged the right hon. Gentleman to reconcile these indications, both of them rather authoritative and both given us from the Opposition. I said they appeared to me to be contradictory, and I requested him to reconcile them and show what their real meaning was. The right hon. Gentleman deliberately avoided any attempt to reconcile, and he resorted to what I must call a mere Parliamentary shift—well known in Parliamentary warfare—that of saying that I had asked him to lay a Bill, forsooth, before us. I had asked nothing of the kind. I had not stated that either the one declaration or the other was insufficient, but I had stated that the declarations were incompatible. The right hon. Gentleman knew that they were incompatible, and, therefore, he would not, or at least he did not, attempt to reconcile them when he had the opportunity afforded him and almost forced upon him. This is the change of tone that has taken place. We can get nothing in the sense of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire; but I hope, if he speaks to-night, he will speak in his own sense and not in that of somebody else. We can get nothing to give unity or intelligibility to the two very different utterances which have taken place on the subject of redistribution. That is the change of tone that has taken place. We are not a whit less desirous than we were on Friday, or any other day, of making use of any opening that is afforded us. Is it improper to hold language of this kind? No doubt, as the right hon. Gentleman knew, when we were dealing with the Franchise Bill the Members of the Opposition were sufficiently free in reproaching us with our vigour and severity in refusing Amendments. We stood on a question of principle. We knew that the differences between them and us on the franchise were very wide, and the noble Lord's (Lord John Manners's) speech is the last evidence we have had how wide and how deep they are. We knew that on the Franchise Bill we could have no communications of that kind; but I say that where you have no reason to know that there is a difference of principle, where you are desirous upon a measure of complex structure to put the House, if you can, in the way of an easy and effectual solution, there is nothing more perfectly warrantable, there is nothing more honourable than an open invitation given to Gentlemen in this House to afford those indications which might enable us to judge whether, by some deviation from the rules and provisions we are ourselves ready to adopt, we can procure that harmony which is admitted to be so desirable, and on the attainment of which we are averting a serious crisis. Now, I hope I have shown that the change of tone of which I have spoken has not proceeded from this side of the House; and the noble Lord, notwithstanding the loud and imposing tone of his speech, has not cited one word in order to sustain his very broad and perfectly gratuitous allegations. I think, on my side, I have pointed out the changed tone. I have pointed out the difference between the reference to the Resolutions on Friday, and the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire, and the doctrine of obiter dictum from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon, and I have pointed out that the object in view of declaring the difference which we see in the two schemes of redistribution, or the two tendencies of redistribution that have been declared, was not polemical. The object was to procure some reconciliation of those schemes, so that when that reconciliation had been effected we might have given full force and effect to it in determining our own proceedings. It is all very well to say—"Produce your Redistribution Bill; it shall have a fair trial." Well, I suppose you think you gave the Franchise Bill a fair trial last Session. It had! The Franchise Bill, with its simplicity of enactments and 25 nights of debate, the noble Lord says, had a fair trial. I am not making it a matter of reproach; I am endeavouring to get at the facts, and it is that kind of reception they gave to the Franchise Bill that they are now so kind as to promise to the Redistribution Bill. I am not aware that we have anything to qualify or anything to retract in the debates last week, or in the debate of this week. I have not now said a word averse to accommodation. I have explained and justified the fact that it is honourable, Parliamentary, within our history and our precedents, and within the dictates of reason, when you have no right to charge upon your opponents a vital difference of principle, to invite communications with a view to a more easy and effectual agreement. I will invite them again, in spite of what the noble Lord has said. If they fail they shall not fail through our fault. If we are not to have peace, at any rate we will leave behind us some record that we sought peace—and we esteem that record of having sought peace, with a view to the general interests of the country, much more highly than the boasts of our own consistency, or appeals to the heated sentiments of political controversy.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I should not have interfered in the debate to-night had it not been that my former speech has been alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. I cannot help thinking he has somewhat forgotten what took place last Session, because he has taunted my noble Friend (Lord John Manners) with saying that he thought the Franchise Bill last Session was fairly and properly discussed.

MR. GLADSTONE: What I said was in answer to the noble Lord.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: The right hon. Gentleman seemed to have entirely forgotten one of the many causes why those debates on the Franchise Bill were so long as they were. It was because of the positive refusal of the Government to accept the Amendment of my noble Friend—namely, that these two Bills should be taken together. If the Government had assented to that principle, in one form or another—that one Bill should have been accompanied by the other—none of those debates would have taken place on the Amendment of the noble Lord or on the Amendment of my right hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Stanley) in Committee. I listened to the speeches of last night with the greatest pain. When I left the House I said to myself I cannot imagine how it is that the tone, manner, and spirit of the Prime Minister, and of the occupants of the Treasury Bench on Thursday evening, were so entirely changed. Everyone remembers the conciliatory tone and manner of the Prime Minister on Thursday. I felt bound myself to take notice of it, and I believe

The vote simply expressed the feeling of the majority on the vital principle of the Bill itself, about which we are all agreed, because the principle is accepted by both sides. But so far as the mode of procedure went, I said that the vote was in favour of the procedure simply because it had been proposed by the Prime Minister, and there were other points upon which the will of the majority could be gathered quite irrespective of that vote. There were two points on which I thought the majority of the House had made up their minds—namely, that, if possible, this should not be a barren Session, and that there should not be a General Election after the passing of the Franchise Bill and before the passing of a Redistribution Bill. I said it was a matter of principle with us that we would not, as far as we could avoid it, run the risk of an Election upon the Franchise Bill, unless it were accompanied by a Redistribution Bill. Someone below the Gangway said "Followed by;" but I adhered to the phrase "Accompanied by." This is the principle we laid down and upheld throughout the country at the first, and which we shall uphold to the last. That being so, I had not the remotest notion but that, when we came to discuss in what way we were to avert the undesired result, it must rest with the Government to proceed with the Redistribution Bill on their own authority, and not on ours. It is quite true, I believe, that I said it would be the same whether the procedure were by Resolution or by Bill; but what I was endeavouring to urge was, that any step to be taken must be taken on the authority and the responsibility of the Government alone. I understand that my right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Lowther) afterwards said that neither Resolution nor Bill would be satisfactory, that what we wanted was a definite legislative measure, and that was what was in my mind. Of course it was. Why, my whole argument was founded upon that. It was that the Government, on their own responsibility, must bring in a Bill, and that the two must be passed, I did not say simultaneously, but I said contemporaneously. We were to insure the one thing, that there was to be no Election under one measure without the other. If the Government take hold of an isolated part of that speech, they remind one of a drowning man catching at a straw. If I had thought that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had meant anything more than a passing allusion to that speech, I should have got up at the moment. The matter lies in a nutshell. Does the Government intend in any form or shape to meet us on that point? This is all we want to know. That we have no wish to delay the passing of this Bill is evident from what passed on the second reading and in Committee. We have given you every guarantee of our good faith we can. We tell you that if you bring forward a Redistribution Bill for the purpose of passing it, provided it is not intentionally so drawn as to give advantage to one Party as against the other, it will meet with a fair, a full, and a candid discussion, and we shall do all we can to pass it. Our desire is that both Bills shall be passed by the same Parliament. What more can we say? We say we are able to carry out the pledge we have given, and as a matter of good faith we shall be bound in honour to do so. There is no intention to oppose the Franchise Bill, and we will do all in our power to pass a Redistribution Bill. We will give you credit for all your good intentions; but you are not masters of the situation. You cannot insure the fulfilment of your pledge, because events at home or abroad may lead to an adverse vote of this House, which may render it impossible for you to fulfil your pledge. That being so, there was a great change in the tone and manner of the speeches from the Treasury Bench. From beginning to end the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department was one of defiance. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: Quote what I said.] I cannot do so at once, and the right hon. Gentleman would not wish me to read the whole speech. As is usual when the right hon. Gentleman throws himself with vigour into debate, the speech was bellicose in matter and tone, and it did not in any sentence hold out the slightest hope that the Government would meet us in any way. He ended by putting the matter in the clearest possible light, when he said that the question was whether a majority of this House was to be overridden by a majority of the House of Lords. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: I did not say so.] Well, the close of the speech practically came to that; and if he did not intend to say I hope he will withdraw his words. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister seems still anxious to say he has been anxious that some arrangement should be made. Any arrangement to be made on a matter so vitally affecting the interests of the people must be made across the floor of this House. Nor is it possible for us to say what Motion or Resolution we should like to have brought forward. They must be brought forward on the responsibility of the Government of the day. Two things, to my mind, are absolutely clear. When the Government brought forward their Franchise Bill they had not made up their minds about the provisions of the Redistribution Bill. And now they have not made them up still. They know perfectly well, whatever the opinions of right hon. Gentlemen on this side may be, on that side there is the greatest possible difference of opinion, and they do not know how to draw a Redistribution Bill in order to catch most votes on that side of the House. They want to find out what the majority wants in order to draw up a Bill. I will defy any right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench to get up and say—"We have a Redistribution Bill drawn." If you have, we are entitled to say—"Produce it." It must be produced some time in the course of these debates. I sincerely hope the time is not yet past when we may be told that the moment this Bill has passed this House, trusting to the good faith of what we have said as to the way the matter is to be discussed, we may be favoured, at all events, with a satisfactory utterance from the Government on this question, in order that, if possible, both those Bills may become law at the same time during the present Parliament.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I rise not to prolong this debate, but to offer some explanation with regard to the extraordinary representations made by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down of my speech of yesterday. I should not have complained if the right hon. Gentleman had thought my speech unworthy of his attention. But he ought not to have professed to have quoted a statement which it contained unless he was quite sure of its accuracy. The right hon. Gentleman has composed a very admirable sentence for me, and I am not sure that I differ from the sentiment of it, and if the right hon. Gentleman will lend me the sentence I will be very happy to see if I cannot use it on some other occasion. But that was not the sentence I made use of last evening. What I did say last night was, that the Amendment of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Stanley) was a proposal that the Franchise Bill should be made dependent upon the passing of a Redistribution Bill which should be satisfactory to the majority of the House of Lords. That very plain and simple proposition is quite true, and cannot be disputed. I was observing upon the proposals which had been made on both sides of the House to see whether we could not come to some arrangement as to the Redistribution Bill. I pointed out that it was in vain to expect that we should come to that arrangement here, when it was possible that the House of Lords would take a different view from that taken in this House on that question, and that, after it was settled by accommodation between the two Parties in this House, the House of Lords might throw it over, and then the Franchise would go with it. That, I said, was a proposition which we could not assent to, because, whatever terms we might come to here, if the Franchise Bill were made dependent upon the Redistribution Bill, the final decision of the House of Lords on the Redistribution Bill would determine the fate of the Franchise Bill. That seemed to me not at all a defiant argument, but a reasonable argument, and an argument founded on the facts of the case, and I desire to make that explanation, as I should be extremely anxious not to be thought—by anything I have said or done—to throw any obstacle in the way of accommodation on this question, which I desire as much as anybody.

MR. RITCHIE said, he was one of those who desired most sincerely that this question should be settled. He did not think, indeed, that anyone could view with a light heart a continuance of this agitation throughout the country. The working classes would have to face with the coming winter a state of commercial depression, and they would probably be called upon to undergo considerable privation. The manufacturers and traders had already felt the depression keenly; but the distress had not yet reached the artisan class. He would be very glad indeed, for his own part, to see this burning question removed out of the way, so that the artisan and trading members of the community might be the better able to devote themselves to the amelioration of their material condition. The change which had undoubtedly taken place in the aspects of this matter since Friday last he looked upon with something like dismay. He had certainly believed that the result of the discussion on Thursday and Friday last was a distinct and definite approach to a settlement of the question; and he had perused with no little apprehension the speech which had been made on the previous day by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther). He understood the term "compromise" to mean that something was to be given up by both Parties. But if he understood it rightly, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman demanded that the Opposition should give nothing, and the Government should give everything. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Lincolnshire declared that nothing would be satisfactory to him but the production of a Redistribution Bill, and its passage into an Act of Parliament, before the Franchise Bill was passed. That was the position which the Conservative Party and the House of Lords took up, and which they were entitled to take up, and he thought the whole argument was in favour of that position. But recognizing, as he did, the extreme importance of a settlement of the question, and that if a settlement were to be arrived at it was impossible for the Opposition to give up all they desired, he could not help feeling that it was also perfectly impossible for the Government, after the statements they had made, and the support they had received, to yield all that was demanded of them, by allowing the Franchise Bill to stand over until the other Bill had become law. But surely there was something besides that which would reasonably satisfy both Parties. They were not children, but men of business, and if they were agreed upon so much, was it not possible to agree on the rest, and would it not be a disgrace to that Party which stood in the way of a settlement? All Parties were agreed that the franchise ought to be extended to the counties, and that it should be done quickly, and that without a Redistribution Bill that could not be satisfactorily accomplished; and being agreed on those two fundamental principles, could they not go a little further, and come to some settlement of the remaining portion of the question? No doubt, there were Members who desired to humiliate one Party or the other; but such were not worthy of the name of statesmen. It ought not to be the desire of either Party to humiliate the other. If the House of Lords were to surrender at discretion, without some tangible security for the passing of a Redistribution Bill, they would be so humiliated in the eyes of the people as to render them in the future perfectly unable to carry out their part in the Constitution of the country. They would, perhaps, still drag on an ignoble existence, neither good for themselves nor beneficial to the country. Rather than be a Member of that House under such circumstances, he should welcome some reform which would give him some power in the Constitution, and make him a useful member of the great legislative machine of the country. Those who expected the House of Lords absolutely to surrender their position were asking what they had no right to ask. But was there not a middle way? [MR. WARTON: None.] His hon. and learned Friend said "None;" but he ventured to assert that the people of this country would think it a very extraordinary thing if no middle way were to be found. The Government had let fall something of what they intended in the way of re-distribution, and he had not heard that what they intended had been considered unreasonable by the Conservative Party. But as they had gone so far, why would they not lay on the Table, after the Franchise Bill had left the House, the scheme which they had indicated? He honestly believed that if the Redistribution Bill were framed in a spirit of fairness on some general principle which should be acceptable to all reasonable men, it would receive the assent of the House of Commons and be passed into law. But the refusal of the Government to do that gave a colour to the accusations made against them. Surely if the Franchise Bill would be, as they said, in jeopardy if they produced a Redistribution Bill, it would be in greater jeopardy if they did not. It was because he felt most earnestly the desirableness, not for the sake of one Party or the other, but for the sake of the country, of settling this matter, that he implored the Government to meet this question in the only way in which he thought it could be met—namely, by producing their Redistribution Bill. He did not ask for a promise that the Government would push the Bill forward and pass it into law as soon as the Franchise Bill passed into law; he did not even say that there should be any compact as between one side or the other; he only said—“Let the Government produce the Bill and throw upon the Opposition the responsibility of dealing with it and the Franchise Bill, after that Bill is produced.” If there be a failure, and if the Redistribution Bill be a fair one, on the Conservative Party would rest the responsibility, and it would be for them to defend the position which they had taken up. He could not conceive of a reason, when they were agreed upon so much, why they could not agree upon what remained. It would be a shame and a scandal to the Party, whether the Opposition or the Government, which stood in the way of a settlement of this question, when they had already agreed upon so much.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that while he could not go so far in retreat as the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Ritchie), yet he could say this, on the part of Warwickshire, the Northern Division of which county he had now for 41 years represented, that the feeling of Warwickshire was that she would not submit to be governed by half a Parliament. North Warwickshire, nay, the whole of Warwickshire, he believed, insisted that all attempts to ignore the House of Lords, as an Estate of the Realm, should be energetically resisted. Nay, he would go so far as to declare that, if he knew the county at all, she would not accept any Act of Parliament, without using perpetual endeavours to get that Act altered or repealed, if she suspected that it had been passed by half a Parliament. In fact, the county would not regard any such Act as a legitimate Statute. [“Oh, oh!”] He (Mr. Newdegate) hoped that he had expressed that opinion with sufficient plainness. He was thoroughly convinced that such was, and would be, the determination of the county, in the representation of which he had so long shared, and that, pass what Act the majority of that House might, unless it had the full sanction of both Houses of Parliament, it would never be accepted as legitimate in the county which he had the honour to represent. Warwickshire included Birmingham, and Birmingham had often shown that it had a will of its own; and if it had any suspicion that what was termed a Statute had been passed in bad faith, he (Mr. Newdegate) had little doubt but that Birmingham knew how to practice agitation for the amendment or repeal of any such misbegotten measure. He (Mr. Newdegate) supposed that it must be accepted as a strong probability that the county franchise would have to be lowered to the level of the borough franchise created in 1867. That appeared just now to be the will of the country. The question might be asked, what had the Conservative Party to complain of? Why were they to complain of that, as the authors of the Reform Act of 1867. At the opening of these discussions in the late Session, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government held up to the view of the House the example of the United States. Why, then, did the right hon. Gentleman not follow the example of the United States? What were they doing in America? Were they recommending the Lower House of Congress to set itself in opposition to the Upper House? Had they been endeavouring to supersede their Senate? Were they endeavouring unduly to exaggerate the administrative power of the President of the day? On the contrary, they were doing exactly the reverse of all that in the course they were adopting. Their determination was to strengthen the Senate; to strengthen the Supreme Court, and to control the President. The Conservative Party might well believe that the Americans were not ashamed of their origin; and might well admire the courage of the Americans in endeavouring to follow the former example of England in these respects. He might be taunted, he and other hon. Members who admired the conduct of the people of the United States, because they sat here in a minority of that House. But it must be admitted that, by the Rules of the House, a considerable minority could render the legislative action of a majority impossible in attempting a large measure of Reform without a Dissolution. Why, then, did not the Liberal Party accept their legitimate position? The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury referred in his introductory speech for Reform to the United States, and then sketched out a scheme for a Redistribution Bill at the commencement of these discussions in the late Session; he evidently felt the necessity for doing so. But did he not warn the House that he could not answer for his Colleagues. He (Mr. Newdegate) had a right to put this question to the right hon. Gentleman—"Is it because you cannot agree with your Colleagues now, that you shrink from producing your Redistribution Bill? Are you about to plunge the country into the difficulty which you know must ensue if you pass the Franchise Bill, and then, before a Redistribution, force a Dissolution?" What would be the nature of such an appeal to the country? It would not be a regular Parliamentary appeal; it would be more in the nature of an appeal through a Convention. This country had had Conventions. We had a Convention in the year 1660, another in 1689; but these constituted revolutionary action. And why should the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues drive those, who represented the stable and peaceful elements of this country, even to consider such an alternative in defence of the freedom they valued? Did the right hon. Gentleman think that they were incapable of any such action—with their Irish neighbours sitting beside them on those Benches, ready to join them, for aught he knew? The right hon. Gentleman was conscious that this possibility might arise from the action of his Administration. It was evident that they were prepared to make concessions to violence, nay, even for the purpose of avoiding the opposition from his (Mr. Newdegate's) neighbours on the left. Did the right hon. Gentleman think that these exemplars of his conduct were wasted upon hon. Members who sat upon the Opposition Benches? The right hon. Gentleman proposed to increase the representation of Ireland and of Scotland; did he think that Englishmen were blind? All the Opposition asked was, that the right hon. Gentleman should abide by Constitutional practice; that he should discourage all attempts to ignore the House of Lords as an Estate of the Realm; and that he should not shrink from the responsibility, which was attached to his position, by refusing to give legitimate effect to the principles which he had introduced, and which the Bill before the House involved. The Opposition demanded nothing that was unreasonable; and he warned the right hon. Gentleman that by attempting dealings or negotiations across the Table of the House with the Leaders of the Opposition, he would rouse the English suspicion, would excite a temper among the majority of the people of this country such as had already been displayed in the firm attitude of the county which he (Mr. Newdegate) had the honour to represent. In Warwickshire, they had not yet forgotten what happened in 1867 respecting the suburb of Aston, near Birmingham. A late Speaker of that House (Lord Eversley), now in the House of Lords, was the Chairman of a Royal Commission which recommended that two additional Members should be given to Birmingham, and that Aston should be included in the borough. That proposal was laid before the House by the then Government which was in a minority, and was abandoned during the miserable proceeding of a minority struggling to pass a Reform Act. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister of to-day had majority enough at his command; that was not the case with the late Lord Beaconsfield, when, owing to the exigencies of the Leadership of a Government in a minority, he was obliged to hand over the Report of the Commission, to which he (Mr. Newdegate) had referred, to a Committee of the House, who grossly mismanaged the matter. The right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Government had no such excuse. He was supported by a large majority in the House, and had the consent of the other House of Parliament to proceed with a measure for the extension of the franchise. But the people of England felt that they had a right to expect from him this much—that if he had framed, as it was known that he had framed in his own mind, a scheme for redistribution of seats, he should insist upon the acceptance of that scheme, or of some other, by his own Colleagues. That he should conform to Parliamentary practice by presenting a scheme for redistribution to the House and the country on his own responsibility, according to acknowledged Parliamentary practice. There was nothing to prevent any communication the Prime Minister might be pleased to make in private to the Conservative Leader in the House of Lords, or to the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons. But the people of England had a right to insist upon this—that the Minister who undertook the responsibility of passing a Bill for the reform of Parliament, which was almost revolutionary, should not shrink from his responsibility, or from completing his task, and that in completing his task he should give them—the people—a fair opportunity of examining the whole Bill, or the whole Bills, through their Representatives, before any measure of Reform was enacted, as complete, into a law.

Mr. ILLINGWORTH said, he thought the country would be somewhat perplexed at the change of front which had taken place on the other side of the House since Friday. He wished to express his admiration of the spirit which the Prime Minister had shown that night, and which all through those discussions had animated him and his Colleagues, and he hoped that in even the unpromising situation in which the matter now stood that disposition would still continue to be manifested by the Prime Minister when the Bill went to "another place." He confessed that the disposition shown by the Government in meeting the views of the Conservative Party had gone much further than many independent Members on his side of the House could reconcile with their views. The great majority of Members in his section of the House had agreed to abate a great deal of what they regarded as due to the majority in the country, both in the Bill before the House and in the measure which must subsequently be dealt with. He ventured to hope that the Prime Minister and his Colleagues in "another place" would do nothing which could in any degree abate from the approbation, which the country would express by an overwhelming majority, of the fact that they had done everything which honourable men could do to settle a great Constitutional question. His object in rising was to make it known on behalf of many Members who sat below the Gangway, and a great number of people out-of-doors, that if, after all the efforts that had been made at conciliation, a struggle of a wider and more serious character should be entered upon, they, at any rate, were free from any binding obligation, either as to the character of this Bill or as to the scheme of redistribution. He admitted it would have been better for all Parties in the State if, even at some sacrifice, this question had been settled for a long time to come; but he feared that the country would say that far greater changes must be made if this Constitutional struggle was not now terminated; and, for his own part, he should look forward to the turmoil and trouble that were before them with the conviction that he was justified in going thoroughly with those who demanded more extensive changes than had now been recognized as necessary by the Government. It was impossible that the people of this country should excuse their Representatives if they were to permit the rights of the representative system to be trifled with over and over again. If the discussions of last Session, the manifestation of public opinion in the Recess, and the recent majority of 140 in that House were of no avail, then he said that nothing short of a radical change in the relationship of the House of Lords with the Government of this country would satisfy the people. He unhesitatingly said that there would be ample compensation in the coming struggle for those who had been put through the ordeal which the great majority of that House had submitted to, by the ultimate and not distant results which would follow.

Mr. STUART-WORTLEY (who rose amid some interruption) said, if the House was impatient he had no wish that the debate should be continued. Representing an important constituency, he had not yet had the opportunity of addressing the House during the recent debates of the present Session. He wished to follow the non-Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), and to say what he could to show that there were some others on that side who in voting for the amendment of his right hon. and gallant friend (Colonel Stuart-Wortley), and in thus formulating what undoubtedly was their extreme demand, did not mean to be understood as refusing to accept anything short of what was therein demanded. But when they were asked to abandon their demands, why was there no suggestion of yielding something on the other side? Why did the Government refuse to listen to the reasonable and much-lessened demand that the Redistribution Bill should not be submitted to the House further than by being in print and laid upon the Table? There was no excuse why that could not be done, except such excuses as were based on those kinds of insinuations and imputations which were what caused the speech of the Prime Minister to be so singularly deficient in conciliatory character. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman, if he would drop these insinuations and imputations that Conservatives, in their support of the Bill, were not sincere and that in their intentions as regarded the Redistribution Bill they had scarcely masked intentions of no patriotic character, the progress of both the Franchise Bill and the Redistribution Bill would be much easier. These were the only reasons upon which the non-production of the Bill could be defended. It was true there was also the foolish heat with which the Government had always said they would never do anything of the kind. But let them remember these ill-judged declarations were made last Session when time was limited and important, and there might be truth in the statement that to pass a Redistribution Bill in the Session was impossible. But now the case was very different; and so, before the Bill left the House, he wished to address one word of entreaty. Much of the present difficulty arose from the fact that those at the head of the Government persisted in accepting advice from those other Members of the Government who did not wish that any accommodation of the difficulty should take place. Much of the difficulty arose from the fact that the Government treated this question not as statesmen, but as men treated a contest over the card table, in which they tried to outwit each other by arts of concealment and suppression of mutual intentions. He had seen the astute shake of the head with which the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) invariably met the proposal that the Redistribution Bill should be made known to the public; but he could assure the right hon. Baronet that if there was one thing Englishmen loved, it was the open and fair disclosures of their intentions—one thing they detested, it was suspicion and concealment. He was confident that the declaration of the intentions of the Government with regard to redistribution would materially assist, and not impede, the Franchise Bill. There was no difficulty in the way of negotiation. He wished the Prime Minister would give a single instance in which a Bill had been settled in consultation by both sides of the House, against such a high authority as Sir Robert Peel, whom the right hon. Gentleman sought to demolish that evening. Another difficulty in the way of negotiation was their unfortunate experience in the summer of this year, in which there was a disclosure, for platform purposes, of abortive negotiations, in which they had seen formulated the extraordinary new doctrine that it lay with those who concealed those negotiations to show that they were bound to conceal, not to those who disclosed that they had a right to do so. He would not detain the House further. He hoped the difficulty would still be accommodated; and he believed that by the formal introduction of the Redistribution Bill at this present stage, or some early stage, practically the necessities of the case would be met, and, for his own part, he should be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. MACFARLANE said, that he had heard Ministers ask the Front Opposition Bench what kind of Redistribution Bill would satisfy them. His own belief was that the Redistribution Bill which would satisfy the Front Opposition Bench would be the one which would most neutralize the effect of the Franchise Bill. The extraordinary change which had come over the Opposition since Friday was probably due, to some extent, to the result of one bye-election; but it should be remembered that the hopes that were built a few years ago on the result of the bye-election of Southwark were not afterwards realized. He pointed out that if the majority of the House of Lords were united to the minority in the Commons, there would still be in the Lower House a majority of 90 in favour of the measure.

Mr. PARNELL said, after the contests of giants, great and small, to which they had listened, he was very unwilling to withdraw the attention of the House from the subject it had been pursuing, and to stand in the way of the Division which might, perhaps, be expected. The question of which he had given Notice was one of some very considerable importance, and he would respectfully claim the attention of the House and of the Government for a few minutes to its consideration. His Amendment proposed to effect a reduction in the charges which Returning Officers were entitled to make upon candidates where the return was unopposed. It might, perhaps, surprise many Members of the House to learn that no change had been made in the scale of charges which the Returning Officers were empowered by law to make in the case of unopposed and opposed candidates since the Act of 1875; that was to say, nine years had gone by since the attention of Parliament had been directed to this important matter. It consequently happened that Parliament, legislating on this matter nine years ago, had in view the proportion of the then existing constituencies under the franchise, and did not, of course, take into its contemplation the greatly increased proportions which those constituencies would attain to under such a Bill as that which the House was now discussing. Now they were going to admit many persons to the franchise in England and Ireland who were not largely endowed with the goods of this world, and it was possible that in some instances those large masses might desire to be represented by persons without much wealth; and he submitted that if it could be shown—as he thought he could show—that the present charges authorized to be made by the Returning Officers at Parliamentary elections, both opposed and unopposed, would, in the presence of the existence of the new constituencies, become most exorbitant, and impossible for any but rich candidates to pay, he thought that he would then have made out a fair prima facie case for invoking the attention of Parliament to the matter, which at first might appear to be a little outside the scope of the Bill. Now, on referring to the Schedule of the Act of 1875, which governed the charges which could be made by the Returning Officer, he found in some cases, which would be many in England, and which would be somewhat numerous in Ireland, charges were sanctioned by the Returning Officers, in the case of unopposed returns, ranging from £200 to £100. In the case of constituencies whose registered electors would exceed 30,000, £1,000 caution money could be demanded beforehand by the Sheriff from the candidate, and in the event of the election not being contested the Sheriff could retain £200 of this amount; and he would beg of the House to notice that his Amendment, and consequently his argument, would be limited to the excessive amount the Returning Officer was allowed to take in the case of unopposed returns; but, to a considerable extent, a good deal of what he had to say as to the excessive charges in cases of unopposed elections would also apply to opposed elections. In the case of unopposed returns, he would ask what possible justification could there be for giving the Sheriff in any constituency in England, Ireland, or Scotland, £200 for driving from his home, which was usually fairly close to the county town where the election was held, and for superintending the very few legal formalities which were necessary in the case of an unopposed return? He believed that the only expenditure the Returning Officer would necessarily incur in such a case would be the expenditure for a junior barrister to act for one day as his advising counsel, and for that a very small fee would be sufficient. His contention was that the House ought not, in contemplation of its taking a great step towards the enfranchisement of the masses, and in view of the fact that they compelled a candidate, con-

MR. SEXTON recognized the spirit of the hon. and learned Gentleman's comments. Indeed, it must be apparent to every Member who had listened to his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) that the case he made was unanswerable. He had shown that as much as £200 had to be found in some cases. Now, he presumed the House of Commons did not desire to restrict its Membership to persons of any social class. [Mr. GLADSTONE : Hear, hear!] The extension of the fran-would necessitate and involve the coming forward of working men as candidates. [Mr. GLADSTONE : Hear, hear!] How was a working man to put down a sum varying from £100 to £200? The matter was urgent; and they wanted to know what security the Government intended to offer that these charges should be brought to a tolerably reasonable level before the time for the next General Election?

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to say that I entirely agree with the view of my hon. and learned Friend. I certainly think that, if possible—I do not see why it should not be possible—the opportunity ought to be taken in the present Parliament to make a just legislative provision on this subject.

MR. PARNELL said, that, under those circumstances, he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

SALMON WEEKLY CLOSE TIME (IRE- LAND) BILL.

(Mr. Healy, Mr. Leamy, Sir Joseph M'Keown, Mr. O'Shea, Mr. Barry.)

[BILL 17.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. PARNELL, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it was a Bill to enable the salmon fishers on the estuaries of some Irish rivers to fish on Saturdays. He understood they were prevented by the existing law from fishing during some portion of Saturday. The Bill had been prepared by the late

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "now read the third time," and insert the word "re-committed,"—(Mr. Parnell,)—instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that this was a subject which deserved to engage the attention of the Government. At present, however, they had to deal with the Amendment as a practical question; and he submitted that this Bill was a Franchise Bill, and that the question of the charges of Returning Officers was not one of franchise. If the Government were now to take up that matter, they would be acting inconsistently with their previous action on this Bill. He would, therefore, appeal to the hon. Member for the City of Cork not to press his Amendment. He hoped by withdrawing it the hon. Gentleman would not be making much sacrifice. He assured him the Amendment he desired to propose would not accomplish everything that was necessary, for it did not propose to deal with certain charges now made by Returning Officers which probably the House would not be willing to continue. He thought that when the constituencies were enlarged there ought to be a revision of the Returning Officers' charges as well as of the deposits. Returning Officers ought not to be allowed to charge too much for professional services. When an opportunity occurred he should be very glad to join with the hon. Gentleman in reconsidering the present law in relation to the existing charges. But the

Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake), who always took a very great interest in the question of the Irish Fisheries, and who knew more about them than any other Member coming from Ireland. The Bill was recommended to their care by that gentleman when he retired from the representation of the county, and he trusted it would be accepted by the Government without very much difference of opinion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he quite recognized the importance of the subject. The Bill proposed to repeal certain changes introduced about 20 years ago in the law with respect to Salmon Fisheries. The result of these changes had been to effect a most marked improvement in the Salmon Fisheries of Ireland. Everyone would agree that they ought only to alter the law affecting that industry with great care and deliberation. In this Bill there were various provisions of great importance with regard to which there was a considerable difference of opinion among the highest authorities whom they could consult. The Fisheries Board were divided in their opinion as to the effect of the changes introduced in 1863, and which were so introduced as the consequence of an inquiry. In his opinion, therefore, this subject was one calling for an inquiry to ascertain whether such changes as the Bill proposed were required; and he did not think it would be right for the Government to assent to the principle of the Bill without some inquiry which would furnish them with the basis upon which to proceed. He was not anxious to pronounce an opinion either for or against the proposals of the Bill. He would suggest to hon. Members in charge of the Bill that the Motion for the second reading should either be withdrawn or adjourned for a considerable time. In that case, the Government would be willing for a Select Committee to be appointed to consider the question of the Salmon Fisheries, and the changes that might be required.

MR. TOTTENHAM said, the Bill was one drawn exclusively in the interests of one class of fishermen—namely, those who fished by boats or other movable contrivances, to the detriment and injury of the owners or lessees of fixed nets and weirs. It proposed to limit the close time for this class to practically half the existing close time, as it threw open to them 12 hours of the daylight of the closed 48 hours. The Bill might be more accurately described as one for the more effectual destruction of breeding fish, which, in the interests of the consuming public, required all the protection they could be given rather than additional facilities for their capture. As a proof of the decline in the supply, he took the returns of Billingsgate Market, one of the principal markets for Irish salmon, and it would be seen that in 1882 the number of boxes arriving there was only two-thirds of the average of the preceding 10 years; and in 1884—the returns for which were not yet complete—he was informed the number of fish taken was considerably lower than any of the previous years. The latter part of the Bill might be called the "Poachers' Facilities Clauses," as one of the provisions of the Bill was to make different close seasons for trout and for salmon fishing in inland waters, under which it was quite possible that a man might be caught in the act of fishing, and assert he was fishing for trout and not salmon, although, as soon as he was alone, there was nothing to prevent his pulling a salmon into his boat instead of a trout. Another provision enacted that there should be a different close time in different parts of the same water. This would enable a man, who was caught in the possession of fish in the close season, to say—"Oh, this fish came from the other water in which the close season does not exist." The same argument would apply to the estuaries. The last provision was one for legalizing during a certain period the most destructive engine that could possibly be used in fishing—he referred to the half-trawl net. Therefore, he thought the Government should not only ask for time to enable them to secure full information, but that the House should resolutely refuse to read the Bill a second time now.

MR. SEXTON said, he was not surprised that the hon. Member (Mr. Tottenham) had spoken as he had, since he was anxious to prevent Irishmen enjoying free means of living by fishing. The Irish Members fully agreed with the Chief Secretary that it was not material that the second reading should be taken trary to the practice of most other countries, to pay all the official expenses connected with the election as well as his own, to insist on maintaining a charge which was manifestly not necessary, and to continue a payment to Sheriffs in the case of unopposed returns which it was obvious the Sheriff could not spend. He regretted the subject was not touched by the Act of 1883; but it was not now too late to deal with it before the new franchise came into operation, and he hoped the House would hear from the Government some expression of opinion on the subject. In conclusion, he moved that the Bill be recommitted with the view he had indicated.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "now read the third time," and insert the word "re-committed,"—(Mr. Parnell,)—instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that this was a subject which deserved to engage the attention of the Government. At present, however, they had to deal with the Amendment as a practical question; and he submitted that this Bill was a Franchise Bill, and that the question of the charges of Returning Officers was not one of franchise. If the Government were now to take up that matter, they would be acting inconsistently with their previous action on this Bill. He would, therefore, appeal to the hon. Returning Officers ought not to be allowed to charge too much for professional services. When an opportunity occurred he should be very glad to join with the hon. Gentleman in reconsidering the present law in relation to the existing charges. But the acceptance of the Amendment at the present time would place the Government in such a position that he could not consent to adopt it.

MR. SEXTON recognized the spirit of the hon. and learned Gentleman's comments. Indeed, it must be apparent to every Member who had listened to his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) that the case he made was unanswerable. He had shown that as much as £200 had to be found in some cases. Now, he presumed the House of Commons did not desire to restrict its Membership to persons of any social class. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] The extension of the franchise would necessitate and involve the coming forward of working men as candidates. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] How was a working man to put down a sum varying from £100 to £200? The matter was urgent; and they wanted to know what security the Government intended to offer that these charges should be brought to a tolerably reasonable level before the time for the next General Election?

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to say that I entirely agree with the view of my hon. and learned Friend. I certainly think that, if possible—I do not see why it should not be possible—the opportunity ought to be taken in the present Parliament to make a just legislative provision on this subject.

MR. PARNELL said, that, under those circumstances, he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

SALMON WEEKLY CLOSE TIME (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Healy, Mr. Leamy, Sir Joseph M'Kenna, Mr. O'Shea, Mr. Barry.)

[BILL 17.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. PARNELL, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it was a Bill to enable the salmon fishers on the estuaries of some Irish rivers to fish on Saturdays. He understood they were prevented by the existing law from fishing during some portion of Saturday. The Bill had been prepared by the late of arrangement, that the Local Government Board should undertake to fix the elections, as far as they could, on different days. The words of the clause were very elastic, and they did not lay down any hard-and-fast line. He hoped the Local Government Board, as far as was practicable and reasonably convenient, would take care to fix the elections for such times and upon such dates as would enable owners connected with different Unions to go from one to the other, if they were so minded, in order to record their votes. He would himself suggest words to meet the difficulty when they came to Clause 9, which proposed to deal with proxies. When that clause came under consideration, he would submit an Amendment, not for the purpose of laying down a hard-and-fast line, but to empower the Local Government Board to provide that these cases should be dealt with in accordance with the obvious requirements of common justice.

Mr. PARNELL said, he would strongly recommend the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to leave the carrying out of the elections, so far as the dates were concerned, to the Local Government Board themselves, because he thought, when the matter came to be considered and investigated, that it would be found to be a work of great difficulty to introduce into any Bill a provision which would absolutely carry out the suggestion of the noble Viscount. It appeared to him (Mr. Parnell) that the Irish Local Government Board might be fairly relied upon to fix the days for these elections for Poor Law Unions in such a way that the times and days would be most convenient for those who had the privilege of exercising the vote. Although he did not wish to deprecate the merits of any provision which the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) might propose, yet he thought it might be found exceedingly difficult by any general arrangement to carry the matter further than it had been carried by the late Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan).

Mr. GRAY pointed out that the Bill had been framed in accordance with the suggestion of the late Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan), which was now confirmed by the present Chief Secretary (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). He did not see why it should be amended. His own opinion was that it would be much better to leave the matter in the hands of the Local Government Board, and to allow the arrangements to be of such an elastic character that they could be easily made to work when a difficulty arose. He did not think it was necessary to lay down any hard-and-fast line which they could not possibly change, in order to meet exceptional circumstances.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 (Voters to vote in person).

VISCOUNT CRICHTON said, he had put down an Amendment on the Paper to omit this clause; but he saw another Amendment in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce), and as his hon. Friend was not present, and as he approved of the Amendment, he would move it in the place of his hon. Friend. The clause required that every ratepayer must himself attend in person to vote at the place of polling, and he proposed to add to the clause, with a view to inserting hereafter the necessary provision, the words "except as hereinafter provided." This was the vital clause of the Bill, and it made provision for the mode in which the election of Poor Law Guardians was to be conducted. In Ireland, the landlord paid one-half of the poor rate, except in the case of tenants under £4 a-year, where he paid the whole. In addition, he paid the rates for the land he held in his own hand, and in this way it was computed that the landlords paid five-eighths of the entire rates of Ireland. That being so, it was only just that they should have some corresponding influence in the election of Poor Law Guardians. This Bill, however, took from the landlord altogether the power of voting by proxy, and he would be practically disfranchised in every electoral division in which he had property except in the one in which he was able to vote personally. The clause virtually disfranchised him for every other division, but, nevertheless, he was still required to contribute very largely towards the rates. The Session before last, the late Chief Secretary—the right hon. Gentleman who was now Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Trevelyan)—recognized this hardship, and, in order to meet it, he made a proposal the effect of which was to provide that an owner of property voting in one electoral division in the power of voting sent to the Returning officer by letter in all the cases in which he held property. The right hon. Gentleman, supported by a Notice of opposition of the proposal, was asked by the hon. Member for Roscommon (Viscount Crichton) or not, he (Viscount Crichton) was unable to say; but, subsequently, that opposition had the effect of killing the Bill for the Session. The right hon. Gentleman since then has been about-face, and last night he proposed the very proposed Bill, which dealt with matters relating to Parliamentary elections, that electors who had a vote in more than one county should vote in one case in person and in another by means of a registered letter? If the Government were prepared to do that, then he would have no further objection to the adoption of a similar principle in the present case; but, otherwise, he certainly could not see the necessity for introducing this objectionable principle into the election of Poor Law Guardians alone.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he could not accept the Amendment.

The object of the noble Viscount was to prevent representation and taxation from going together, although that was the established principle of the English Constitution; and he hoped the Committee, by acceding to the terms of the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce), would admit, to some extent, the justice of the claim made by the Irish landlords, and mitigate the injustice which the Bill, as it stood, did to them.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 12, after the word "polling," to insert the words "except as hereinafter provided."—(Viscount Crichton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GRAY said, he was altogether opposed to the Amendment. Since the Poor Law Act was originally passed, its provisions had been rendered quite intolerable by the power of interference with the representative character of the Board of Guardians exercised by the landlords. It must be remembered that the Poor Law Guardians had important powers conferred upon them, which were not given to any other representative body or in connection with any other municipal institution. Nevertheless, the landlords enjoyed an undue share of voting power. As an illustration, he might mention that in certain districts there were Town Commissioners, Corporations, and Boards of Guardians; but whereas the election were conducted on the principle of personal voting, as a general rule, in the election of Boards of Guardians, the landlords enjoyed privileges which were not given to other voters. He asked if the Government were prepared to propose in the Franchise

Bill, in view of proposing it was perfectly intelligible, and to that extent he sympathized with it, because he had a great objection to anything which would have a disfranchising effect. But he thought they were bound to consider, before effecting a change in the law, whether that change would be antagonistic to the principles of the general law. He must say that, as far as he was concerned, he looked upon the proposal of the noble Viscount as one which would introduce a new species of proxy voting, and he could not see that it was at all desirable, in making any change in the mode of voting in the election of Poor Law Guardians, to introduce artificial arrangements for the purpose of exempting a particular class of persons from the requirements which attached to all other classes. There might be cases, but he did not think they would be very numerous, where Poor Law elections in different localities might come into collision with each other, and one individual, holding property in more than one district, might be disfranchised to a certain extent; but he thought the objections to the introduction of an elaborate and novel system of voting in a Bill of this sort were greater than any advantages which could be gained from it. It was proposed that if an elector voted personally in one division, he should have the right of recording his vote, by means of a registered letter, in any other division. Now, he did not see how the fact of an elector having voted in one division was to be known in the other divisions to which registered letters might be sent. All sorts of objections might be raised to arrangements of this kind, which were necessarily of an artificial kind. His opinion was that it was desirable to have the elections conducted in as simple a manner as possible; and although, in some instances, the present system might act as a disfranchisement, he could not see that it would be judicious on the part of Parliament to attempt, by any artificial arrangement, to remedy the evil.

Mr. PLUNKET said, he was not disposed to overlay the debate with further points, when all of them had been urged over and over again; but he must enter his protest, once more, against the course which had been adopted by the Representative of Her Majesty's Government in Ireland on this occasion, as he had done formerly in regard to the same matter. It was nothing more nor less than the same surrender which was made last Session, and which was now being repeated again in order to save trouble, and to conciliate Irish Members below the Gangway. The right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had not been able to adduce one single particle of argument in support of his contention. The right hon. Gentleman had not shown that there was any difficulty, and indeed there was no difficulty, and there could be no difficulty, in carrying out the system of voting by registered letter, which was suggested by his own Predecessor in Office. He defied hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway to suggest that there was any difficulty in the matter. As to the observations which had fallen from the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray), when he spoke of the importance of the special duties conferred on the Poor Law Guardians, he (Mr. Plunket) confessed that he did not know what the hon. Gentleman was referring to.

Mr. GRAY said, that one part of the duties of the Guardians was to administer the Sanitary Acts.

Mr. PLUNKET said, he failed to see in that a reason why additional votes should not be given to the owners of property in the country, who had certainly quite as deep an interest in the proper administration of the Sanitary Acts as in any other portion of the working of the Poor Law. The case was altogether different from elections for Members of the House of Commons, and the duty of the Board of Guardians was, or ought to be, to see to the proper application of the rates provided by the ratepayers. There was no elaborate or novel system evoked by the present proposal, but it simply followed out the suggestion of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan). If the Bill were passed in its present shape, the poorest ratepayer in the Union would have precisely the same influence as the ratepayer who owned a very considerable amount of the property of the parish. He had no wish to detain the Committee, but he should certainly vote for the Amendment.

Mr. T. A. DICKSON wished to say, in reply to the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken, that his (Mr. Dickson's) experience in connection with the working of the Poor Law extended over a period of more than 16 years, both as an elected Guardian and as an ex officio Guardian, and, in his opinion, there could be no worse system of election than that now adopted. He thought the Local Government Board were tired of the present system of electing Guardians. There was hardly an election in regard to which there was not a contest or some dispute, and he certainly could see no valid reason why the Guardians should not be elected on the same principle as Members of Parliament. He protested against all this elaborate arrangement for fancy voting either by registered letter or by proxy. What they really required was some plain and simple plan of voting by ballot.

Mr. DAWSON said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) said that the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) had advanced a curious argument in support of the Bill, and in opposition to voting by proxy, in pointing out that the Guardians had to deal with sanitary questions and with matters affecting the health and well-being of the people. What did these sanitary questions mean? They meant an intimate acquaintance with the condition of the district sufficient to enable the persons elected to know what the evils were that required to be remedied. Persons who voted by proxy were persons who did not reside in the locality, and were, therefore, unacquainted with its wants. The very pith and marrow of the argument of the hon. Member for Carlow was that these persons who desired to vote by proxy and by registered letter possessed no local knowledge and had no personal interest in improving the sanitary con-person should have the power of voting by voting papers sent to the Returning Officer in a registered letter in all the other divisions in which he held property. Whether the right hon. Gentleman was frightened by a Notice of opposition in consequence of the proposal put down by the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) or not, he (Viscount Crichton) was unable to say; but, undoubtedly, that opposition had the effect of killing the Bill for the Session. The right hon. Gentleman since then had turned right-about-face, and last Session strongly opposed the very provision which he had himself previously suggested. The object of this clause was to prevent representation and taxation from going together, although that was the established principle of the English Constitution; and he hoped the Committee, by acceding to the terms of the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce), would admit, to some extent, the justice of the claim made by the Irish landlords, and mitigate the injustice which the Bill, as it stood, did to them.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 12, after the word "polling," to insert the words "except as hereinafter provided."—(Viscount Crichton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GRAY said, he was altogether opposed to the Amendment. Since the Poor Law Act was originally passed, its provisions had been rendered quite intolerable by the power of interference with the representative character of the Board of Guardians exercised by the landlords. It must be remembered that the Poor Law Guardians had important powers conferred upon them, which were not given to any other representative body or in connection with any other municipal institution. He asked if the Government were prepared to propose in the Franchise

Bill, which dealt with matters relating to Parliamentary elections, that electors who had a vote in more than one county should vote in one case in person and in another by means of a registered letter? If the Government were prepared to do that, then he would have no further objection to the adoption of a similar principle in the present case; but, otherwise, he certainly could not see the necessity for introducing this objectionable principle into the election of Poor Law Guardians alone.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he could not accept the Amendment. The object the noble Viscount had in view in proposing it was perfectly intelligible, and to that extent he sympathized with it, because he had a great objection to anything which would have a disfranchising effect. But he thought they were bound to consider, before effecting a change in the law, whether that change would be antagonistic to the principles of the general law. niscence. He (Mr. Sexton) certainly remembered in Ireland recommending that the landlords should be required to pay for the sustenance of the families of the suspects while the suspects themselves were confined in gaol, because he believed that the practical effect of such a course would be to render the landlord interest more cautious in procuring the arrest of honest men. With regard to the question more immediately before the Committee, he thought there could be no question that the adoption of the system of proxy voting was a great scandal, and a source of grievous injustice in Ireland. His hon. Friend the Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray) had pointed out that, in addition to the relief of the poor, the Poor Law Guardians performed other most important functions, among them being the administration of the Sanitary Acts with a view to the preservation of the public health. It would be intolerable if persons drawing large incomes from the land in Ireland, but leaving the country and residing abroad, should be able to throw sheafs of proxies into the hands of agents which would virtually control all the elections under the Poor Law, seeing that these persons no longer resided upon Irish soil, and had no interest whatever in the country or the well-being of the inhabitants, except so far as the income they drew out of it was concerned. He had known cases where persons—intelligent men—were candidates for the office of Guardian, and had the support of every resident ratepayer; but the landlords' agent was able to come down with a formidable sheaf of proxies in his hand, and throw them out. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) had done the Irish Members below the Gangway the honour of speaking of them as clever. He (Mr. Sexton) did not claim for them that they were any more clever than hon. Members in other parts of the House, and it was not only unreasonable, but absurd, to suppose that the Local Government Board in Dublin in making its preparations for the election of Poor Law Guardians would not take care to fix the elections in the different electoral divisions in such a manner that no landlord would find himself embarrassed in exercising his right of voting. No doubt, having regard to the fact that property might be held in more than one division by the same individual, the Local Government Board would so fix the elections in the different divisions that one did not clash with another; and there would be no difficulty at all, except the persons claiming the right to vote happened to be non-resident. In that case, of course, the vote would not be recorded; but, surely, if the vote was worth anything at all, it was worth giving in person. The proposal made by the noble Viscount the Member for Fermanagh (Viscount Crichton) was that in the event of an election taken place in two electoral divisions on the same day, in both of which a landlord happened to have property, he should be allowed to vote in one division personally and in the other by sending a registered letter to the Returning Officer, proving to such Returning Officer that he had voted in person in another division. But surely that was a physical impossibility, because the letter in the one case must be despatched while the voter was actually on his way to record his vote in the other. He thought the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) deserved but scant gratitude from hon. Gentleman who sat on that side of the Gangway. The right hon. Gentleman had made a speech in which he said that he had a strong feeling of dislike to any proposal which had a disfranchising effect; and then he went on to attribute such an effect to the present Bill. The right hon. Gentleman never paused for a moment to ask himself whether the present franchise was an equitable one, but said he was opposed to any rating franchise, however reasonable it otherwise might be, which was calculated in any degree to deprive the landlords of their influence in controlling the municipal government of the country. He might tell the right hon. Gentleman that the present Bill was the result of a compromise. The Irish Representatives had asked for much more than was contained in the Bill; but they had consented to accept the measure in a spirit of compromise, the effect of the compromise being still to leave the landlords a large plurality of votes as compared with those enjoyed by the occupiers. If by peculiar practices in that House, or by moving the power of their friends in the other House, Gentlemen of the Tory Party obstructed and embarrassed the measure now, and prevented it from being passed into law, as they did last Session, he warned them that they would have to face a much more disagreeable Bill next Session.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA believed that the Irish landlords would lose nothing whatever by accepting the Bill as it stood. At present, there were insinuations that they made use of their influence to control unfairly the Poor Law elections. What was it they would lose? They would simply lose the chance of influencing the election of one Guardian as against another; and he did not think that that was a privilege which ought any longer to be preserved to them. Their privileges were fully preserved for them now by the plurality of votes which they enjoyed. He had no interest, personally, in any election in Ireland for Poor Law Guardians except as a landlord. He held property, as a landlord, in three counties in Ireland; and so much had he always felt that it was only for the people on the spot to decide what persons should be elected to perform the duties of Poor Law Guardians, that he had never for 25 years given a vote either by proxy or otherwise. He ventured to say that it would be a most mistaken policy, indeed, if hon. Members above the Gangway were on this occasion to force the Committee into a Division. He trusted that better counsels would prevail, and that the Bill would be accepted, as it stood, seeing that it was the result of a fair compromise.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that, notwithstanding the threat which had been held out to the Irish landlords by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton)—

MR. SEXTON: A warning; not a threat.

MR. MACARTNEY: Oh, a warning! Well, notwithstanding the very menacing warning held out to the Irish landlords by the hon. Member that they would be worse treated if they did not now take what they could get, he must resist this attempt to deprive them of their rights, at the proper time, and not wait for some other opportunity. His objection to the present Bill was this. When it was introduced in the Session before last, when the right hon. Gentleman, now Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, was then Chief Secretary of Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan), a difficulty arose as to the abolition of proxy voting, and the desirability of preserving the proprietor's right to the vote. He (Mr. Macartney) suggested, and the suggestion was accepted and acted upon by the Chief Secretary, that every proprietor should be allowed to send in a paper containing his vote, as now proposed in the Amendment of his noble Friend the Member for Fermanagh (Viscount Crichton). It was further suggested that the papers signed by the landlord, and duly filled up by a magistrate, should be sent in a registered letter to the Clerk of the Union. It was all very well to say that the owners of property in different Unions, if they valued the vote, would attend to record the vote in person. One thing appeared to have been completely forgotten, and that was, that in many instances females were owners of property, and had the right to vote for the election of Poor Law Guardians. They would be completely disfranchised by this Bill.

MR. SEXTON: Not at all.

MR. MACARTNEY asked what female, who happened to own property in five or six Unions, would take the trouble to go about in order that she might vote in person? The hon. Member had, perhaps, no respect for those who had property, and reserved it for those who had none. It had been stated, in the course of the discussion on this Amendment, that a part of the rates were paid by the landlord; but he would point out that, in addition to that, the landlord paid for all his occupiers under £4 valuation, who were very numerous, and, besides that, he paid the total amount of the rates on the land which he himself occupied. That being so, the landlord paid a much larger proportion of the rates than the tenant, and it was only right that he should be proportionately represented in the election of Guardians. The principle that representation should follow taxation was, in his opinion, eminently applicable to the case.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 88: Majority 62.—(Div. List, No. 11.)

MR. GIBSON said, the Amendment he had to propose was with reference to a subject which he had referred to at an earlier stage of the proceedings. It had been admitted that it would be unfair and unreasonable for the Local Government Board not to make a practicable arrangement by which the opportunity of voting might be secured to those whose property lay in different localities. The only objection to that principle had been stated by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), who said that it would not be desirable or practical to lay down a hard-and-fast line for determining the action of the Local Government Board. That was precisely what he did not wish to be done, and he was, therefore, in agreement with the hon. Member on the point. But it was perfectly reasonable, and had been done over and over again in Acts of Parliament, to suggest in words to Public Departments that Parliament expected them to do what was reasonable and practicable in the discharge of their duties. He, therefore, put forward words which would direct the Local Government Board to fix such times for the election of Boards of Guardians as they might think fit, to assist, as far as might be convenient and practicable, owners having property in different districts in recording their votes. That, the Committee would see, was to draw no hard-and-fast line, but to put the matter upon a common-sense footing.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "The Local Government Board shall fix such days and times for Poor Law election as they think fit, and as may assist, so far as may be practicable and convenient, owners who have properties in different unions to record their votes."—(Mr. Gibson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. SEXTON said, he had expected that the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland would have made a statement with reference to the representation of Irish tenants on Boards of Guardians in Ireland. The recent experience of official life in Ireland on the part of the right hon. Gentleman had certainly led him (Mr. Sexton) to expect that the Committee would have been furnished with at least one example of the manner in which the landlords exercised their powers in this respect towards the tenants. The general belief was that it was exercised in an unsatisfactory manner. He thought the Local Government Board might in this matter be allowed to exercise the discretionary power which they already possessed, and he should, therefore, oppose the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. GRAY said, it would be inconvenient to the community generally for the Local Government Board to fix times for the elections in the manner proposed. There were about 163 Poor Law Unions in Ireland, and the words proposed would almost coerce the Local Government Board to fix those elections for so many different days, if, as might happen, there were proprietors who, in respect of them, had property in different Unions. The Local Government Board would be driven to fix 163 days for holding the elections, in order to avoid the attacks that would be made upon them.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite would not press his Amendment. The Government had already stated their opinion that this was a matter which might be left to the discretion of the Local Government Board. He thought there was a good deal of force in what had been said by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Gray)—namely, that any injunction of this kind would lead to constant reclamations on the part of people who thought that other arrangements might have been made. It was, therefore, very much better to leave the point to the Local Government Board, who had both experience and discretionary power in the matter.

MR. MACARTNEY said, they had been told last Session that the rights of landlords in respect of their votes at these elections should be preserved; but, from what had been said, it appeared that justice was not to be done to them.

MR. O'SULLIVAN hoped the Amendment would not be agreed to. It would lead to great inconvenience.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 81: Majority 57.—(Div. List, No. 12.)

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 10 to 24, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 25 (No minor entitled to vote. Fresh election to be ordered forthwith on vacancy. Justice of Peace not to be qualified as ex officio Guardian unless a ratepayer).

MR. BRODRICK said, before the right hon. Gentleman proposed his Amendment to Sub-section 5, he wished to call attention to a point in Sub-section 3. He did so merely as a protest against the provision that—

"No Justice of the Peace shall be qualified to be an ex officio Guardian of any Poor Law Union, unless he is a ratepayer of such Union."

It happened that in Ireland there were a certain number of Justices of the Peace, who were either agents representing landlords, or the eldest sons of landlords who were old and decrepid. These persons might be very able and efficient men as Guardians; and he raised the point indicated, because he could not think that any abuse could creep in as a consequence of allowing such Justices of the Peace to be ex officio Poor Law Guardians. He hoped the matter would receive the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman; but as the animus of the Committee at the moment was quite clear on the point, he would not press it at greater length. He simply put it to the right hon. Gentleman, in the hope that he might be prepared to omit the words in question.

COLONEL NOLAN said, that so far as concerned agents who were Justices of the Peace, they had generally farms in the country. He did not see why agents should be on the Boards of Guardians simply because they represented proprietors. One object of the clause was to get the proprietor to live in Ireland, although, of course, if he was unable to do that it was a proper thing that he should go away and give his son the opportunity of representing him. He could not see that any practical inconvenience would arise from this; but he was at a loss to understand why a Justice of the Peace, who was not a ratepayer in the Union, and who lived in a country town, should be ex officio a Poor Law Guardian. He did not think that the proposal of the hon. Member would tend to the proper working of the Act.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he understood it was the general feeling with regard to this Bill that the number of ex officio Guardians should be limited to one-third of the number of the members of the Board. That, however, was not exactly carried out by the wording of the clause in its present form, and he was therefore anxious, in order to prevent any doubt as to the meaning of the Bill, to amend the clause in such a way as would express the general intention. He would propose to add words to the effect that the number of ex officio Guardians in any Poor Law Union should in no case exceed one-third of the number of members of the Board. But the objection to that was that the total number of which the ex officio Guardians were to be a third would be a movable quantity by the fact of their being ex officio Guardians, and the words, therefore, that would best express what was intended would be words which implied that the ex officio Guardians should be not more in number than half the elected Guardians. In that way they would be one-third of the whole. He had heard other ways of expressing it, but that appeared to him to be most correct. The section would then read—

"The number of ex officio Guardians of any Poor Law Union shall not exceed half the number of the elected Guardians in the Union;"

and then there would be added, to meet a very obvious case—

"Where the number of such elected Guardians is an uneven number, it shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be diminished by one."

They could not have half a Guardian. He believed that if these words were inserted they would carry out what was the universal intention when the clause was before them last Session. At present, anyone who read the section would see that it did not convey that impression at all.

Amendment proposed,

In page 8, line 32, leave out the beginning of the sub-section to the word "and," in line 34, and insert "the number of ex officio Guardians in any Poor Law Union shall not exceed half the number of elected Guardians in the Union. Where the number of such elected Guardians is an uneven number, it shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be diminished by one."—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

MR. MACARTNEY said, they had abolished the proxy vote, they had made it impossible for landlords to vote in any place except that in which they resided, and now it was proposed that the number of landlords sitting on Boards of Guardians should be reduced from an equal number to only half the number of elected Guardians; and, on the suggestion of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), where the elected Guardians were 21 in number the ex officio Guardians should be only 10—that was less than half. That the ex officio Guardians should be only half was unfair. They seemed in Ireland to be proceeding upon the principle adopted at the time of the Revolution—namely, property and robbery. Nowadays, to be possessed of property in Ireland was sufficient to disqualify a man from enjoying any of the privileges which anyone else enjoyed, and to subject him to the suspicion that he had bad intentions towards his country and the community amongst whom he lived. He (Mr. Macartney) was bound to say that the compact, whatever it was, that had been entered into between the Government and the Gentlemen (the Home Rulers) sitting below the Gangway was a most iniquitous one, sacrificing, as it did, those who were attached to the connection between the Three Kingdoms; sacrificing those who represented law and order in Ireland; sacrificing those who represented, he would not say the smartness, but certainly the education of the country, and also insuring for the future that in every district in Ireland where there was a Poor Law Union there should be a small Parliament in which the voice of reason should be smothered by numbers.

MR. GIBSON only wanted to state how he understood the matter to stand. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), in his observations, had not applied himself as yet to the consideration of the substance of the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman only proposed to put the matter into the shape in which it was understood to be left by those who put forward the suggestion in the last Session. The Chief Secretary, however, was a little incorrect in saying all parties.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he thought it was universally understood that that was the meaning.

MR. GIBSON said, his only desire was to have the matter put quite right; and, therefore, he saw no objection, as a matter of form, to what the Chief Secretary said should be done. He thought that when that was done it would be put into the shape that was intended by the Mover of the sub-section last Session. When the Amendment suggested by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had been made, the noble Viscount the Member for Fermanagh (Viscount Crichton) would move the omission of the whole of Sub-section 5, because the contention of the noble Viscount and of others was that the existing law was more just and more reasonable than the change proposed to be effected by the amended sub-section.

MR. T. A. DICKSON: Before we pass from this section—

MR. GIBSON: Let us amend the section first.

MR. GRAY said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was technically correct. The words of the clause, as they stood, carried out the intention of the framers of the clause, because they provided that the number of the ex officio Guardians should be one-third of the whole Board. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND dissented.] He saw the Solicitor General for Ireland shaking his learned head. As a matter of fact, under the clause, as it now stood, all Guardians were elected, both ex officio and those elected by ratepayers. He understood it was contemplated to propose an Amendment to remedy that defect. The clause, however, as it stood, fully carried out the intention of its framers, because it did secure—although, he granted, not in a very clear manner—that the number of ex officio Guardians should be one-third of the whole Guardians.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, he did not think the hon. Member (Mr. Gray) was quite correct. As the clause stood in the Bill, it said—

“That the number of ex officio Guardians of any Poor Law Union shall in no case exceed one-third of the number of Guardians to be elected by the ratepayers of such Union.”

That was not what was intended. It was intended that they should not be any more than one-third of the Guardians, whether elected by the ratepayers or appointed in some other way.

MR. SEXTON said he thought it would be well if the Committee allowed the words “by the ratepayers” to remain in the clause.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the words he had proposed had been carefully drawn.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, it was now necessary he should move to leave out from "exceed," in line 36, to the end of the section, in order to insert "one-half the number of elected Guardians."

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 36, to leave out from the word "exceed" to the end of the section, and insert the words "one-half the number of elected Guardians."—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. T. A. DICKSON proposed to omit all the words after "by the," in page 9, line 2, down to the words "fifty-six," in line 4, and insert—

"16th section of the Act of the Session of the 10th year of the reign of Her present Majesty, chap. 31."

His object in moving this Amendment was to point out that, if the words in the sub-section were retained, the Justices might elect Justices who paid little, if any, rates, and who had no interest whatever in the taxes. Now, the section he proposed to insert provided that the Justices who were the highest rated should be elected, his desire being to prevent the abuse of Justices being elected who had no interest in the Union.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 2, after the words "by the," to omit all the words to "fifty-six," in line 4, and insert "16th section of the Act of the Session of the 10th year of the reign of Her present Majesty, chap. 31."—(Mr. T. A. Dickson.)

Mr. MACARTNEY pointed out that Sub-section 3 already provided that no Justice of the Peace should be qualified to be an ex officio Guardian who was not a ratepayer of the Union.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, it was the fact that Sub-section 3 did provide for the qualification mentioned by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Macartney). He (the Solicitor General for Ireland) thought it might be but reasonable that if there were a number of ex officio Justices to be elected, the Justices should have the power to select which of their number should be ex officio members of the Board.

Mr. CALLAN expected the Solicitor General for Ireland would have informed the Committee how the law at present stood. If, at the present time, there were more magistrates in a Union than elected Guardians, and if they had property and were otherwise qualified to act, how were the ex officio Guardians elected? It was not by voting amongst the magistrates, but the highest rated magistrates became ex officio members of the Board of Guardians. In the very ward in Dublin to which the Solicitor General for Ireland belonged a question was raised last year as to the constitution of the North Dublin Union. By some peculiar manipulation, some of the Liberal magistrates had their rating so reduced that they were deprived of the right to sit as ex officio Guardians, and Conservatives were put in their place. This state of things arose by manipulation that was well known in ex officio circles in Ireland. Why should the Committee change the law? If the sub-section were dropped altogether and no words substituted, the existing law would come into operation. If the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) confined himself simply to omitting the last four lines of the section, and no directions were given as to the manner in which the ex officio Guardians should be elected, the highest rated Justices would, under the existing law, be elected. It was upon that point he (Mr. Callan) thought the Solicitor General for Ireland would have enlightened the Committee. The law at present in existence provided that the highest rated magistrates were ex officio Guardians of the poor, and he did not see that any reason had been advanced why there should be a reversion to the practice of 50 years ago.

Mr. GRAY said, he did not catch the exact words of the Solicitor General for Ireland; but he understood they were not unfavourable to the Amendment. The Amendment was a very important one, because the effect of the clause, if it remained as it now was, would be disastrous. The existing law provided that where there were in a Union a number of Justices, the highest rated should be elected ex officio Guardians. What was proposed to be done by the Amendment was simply to leave the law in that respect unchanged. Two systems had been tried in Ireland, and after experimenting in the fashion now contemplated by the Bill, the law, being found unsatisfactory, was amended. There was no reason why they should go back to a system which had been tested and failed, and which Parliament had found itself obliged to amend. The Amendment was a very reasonable one, inasmuch as it would simply leave the law as it stood at present.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, that when the law was amended, and the ex officio Guardians were allowed to be equal in number to the elected Guardians, if there was an excess of Justices, the highest rated were elected. It really appeared to him a matter of very little moment whether the Justices were to select those who should represent them on the Board of Guardians, or the ex officio Guardians should be the highest rated magistrates.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he hoped the Committee would not restore the law to the condition in which it stood 20 years ago, but that they would continue to enforce the principle of selecting as ex officio Guardians those who were the highest rated Justices in the Union. He would even recommend that only the highest rated resident ratepayers should be elected.

MR. VILLIERS-STUART hoped Her Majesty's Government would accept the Amendment.

MR. GIBSON said, he remembered perfectly well how the words appeared in the clause. They were Government words. They were put in by the late Chief Secretary (Mr. Trevelyan), after consultation with the draughtsman, and, he (Mr. Gibson) presumed, with the sanction of the Solicitor General for Ireland (Mr. Walker). He (Mr. Gibson) was surprised to hear it proposed to omit the words without any consideration. If the Government wished to reconsider the propriety of their own words, the wisest and most satisfactory course for them to pursue would be to let the matter stand over for Report, by which time they could confer with the draughtsman. The words were put in last Session after consideration by the Government, and it was now proposed to omit them without any consideration or argument. He could see several objections to the election of those who might chance to be highest in the rating, without knowing whether they desired to attend or whether their health enabled them to attend.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) said, provision was made by law against the appointment of persons unable to serve.

Amendment agreed to.

VISCOUNT CRICHTON said, he had an Amendment on the Paper providing for the omission of Sub-section 5 of this clause. He had no intention of travelling again over the ground which had been already gone over, but would merely say that as the landlords in the Unions paid five-eighths of the rates they ought to have a reasonable share in the representation. It was quite idle to say that the elected Guardians were likely to be overborne by the ex officio Guardians. He thought the contrary was the case, because the elected Guardians were always on the spot and able to attend to their duties, while the ex officio Guardians were very often away. He believed that originally the number of ex officio Guardians was fixed at one-third; but it was found there was so much extravagance and waste in the administration of the funds of the Unions that a Bill was brought in in 1847 by Lord John Russell establishing the proportion as it now stood. He looked upon the present proposal as a distinctly retrograde one, and one by which it was intended to revert to a system which had been already condemned. On these grounds, he moved the omission of the sub-section.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the sub-section was only part of the clause, and that part of the clause having been amended the noble Viscount could only propose to omit the whole of the clause. Amendments having been made in the section, it was impossible for the noble Viscount to omit the section. If it had occurred to him, he would have called the noble Viscount's attention to the matter at the time the Amendments were made. It would, however, be competent for the noble Viscount to take a Division against the whole clause.

VISCOUNT CRICHTON said, he would, therefore, take a Division against the clause.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, it was now necessary he should move to leave out from "exceed," in line 36, to the end of the section, in order to insert "one-half the number of elected Guardians."

NEW PEER.

Marmaduke Francis Baron Herries in the peerage of Scotland, having been created Baron Herries of Carlaverock Castle in the county of Dumfries and of Everingham in the East Riding of the county of York—Was (in the usual manner) introduced.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ADJOURNMENT.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK (for Earl GRANVILLE) stated that, as there was no Business on the Paper for to-morrow, it was proposed to adjourn at the rising of the House to-day until Monday.

ARMY AND NAVY—DEFENCE OF COLONIAL POSSESSIONS—THE CORRESPONDENCE—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, in rising to call attention to the Correspondence concerning the defence of Colonial Possessions and garrisons abroad in reference to the recommendations made to Her Majesty's Government by the Royal Commission appointed to report upon British Possessions and commerce abroad, said: My Lords, I have thought it right to call the attention of your Lordships' House to this very important matter, which has recently attracted a good deal of the attention of the public; and I hope my justification for entering upon the subject may be found in the fact that, as Chairman of the Royal Commission appointed for the defence of our foreign stations, I may speak both for myself and, to a certain extent, also for my Colleagues on this question. That Commission, my Lords, was appointed in September, 1879. It presented its first Report in September, 1881; its second Report early in 1882; and its last Report in July, 1882. Since then I cannot accuse myself of having allowed the subject to sleep in silence. During the time, I have twice or three times pressed it upon the attention of my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty (the Earl of Northbrook), and, I think, of other Members of Her Majesty's Government, and in May of last year, in public, I earnestly urged upon Her Majesty's Government the risk of any further delay, and the great importance of dealing with this question. My Lords, I hardly know what course I should have taken but for the appearance, a few weeks since, of a short Parliamentary Paper, in which it was proposed to expend a certain sum of money upon the fortification of British coaling stations abroad. I must say I should have been guilty, I think, of a breach of public trust if, as Chairman of that Commission, I did not for my own part, at all events, disclaim all responsibility for the proposals now made in this Treasury Paper, and if I did not say that, in my humble opinion, the estimate of work to be done is really wholly below the needs of the case, and, in one word, illusory. In approaching the subject, my Lords, I am beset by two difficulties; the first of which is that within the last few hours, I may say, a second Paper

MR. TOTTENHAM said, that before the Chief Secretary (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) made any reply to the noble Viscount (Viscount Orichton), it would be well some reason should be assigned for the suggested reduction. Up to the present not one syllable of reason, good, bad, or indifferent, had been given as to the justice of reducing the number of ex officio Guardians from one-half of the whole Board to one-third the number of the elected Guardians. Moreover, no reason had been shown why the people who paid five-eighths of the rates should now be reduced to one-third of the representation. It was due to the Committee, the country, and ex officio Guardians that the Chief Secretary should give the Government's reason for sanctioning the present proposal.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, the reason why the proposal was made was not far to seek. Any man who had experience of Poor Law work knew full well that more than two-thirds of the ex officio Guardians did not attend regularly to the work of the Board; they only attended when an officer was to be appointed, or when there was a job to be done.

MR. TOTTENHAM said, his experience of Poor Law administration, which he had no doubt was equal to the hon. Member's (Mr. O'Sullivan's), was precisely the reverse of that of the hon. Gentleman's. He (Mr. Tottenham) had been in the habit for years of attending regularly Poor Law meetings, and he could confidently say that what the hon. Member had stated was absolutely without foundation.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he was surprised that his hon. Friend the Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) had asked for a reason why the Government had assented to this proposal. The reason was obvious. It was to be found down there. [The hon. Gentleman pointed to the Home Rule Benches.]

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 84; Noes 23: Majority 61.—(Div. List, No. 13.)

Clause 26 agreed to.

Clause 27 (Commencement of Act).

MR. GIBSON said, he had understood the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had indicated that this was one of the points which required consideration and examination—namely, the date at which the Act should come into operation. This clause fixed the date at the 1st of February, 1885. That time was near at hand now, and the Chief Secretary had expressed the opinion that it was too soon—that though it might have been a suitable date to fix last Session, it was not a suitable one to fix now. The question was one affecting the machinery of the Executive Government, and, as he (Mr. Gibson) had already pointed out, it was more the business of the Government than of an independent Member to deal with it. He now merely drew the attention of the Chief Secretary to it, so that he might adopt whatever date he thought desirable.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, it was well to remind the Chief Secretary that all the notices of election in Ireland were issued on or about February 1, and that if, therefore, that date were passed, the measure could not come into operation for 12 months.

MR. SEXTON said, he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant to let the clause stand as it was.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said, he did not think it would be well to alter the date at all. The question had been inquired into since last Session, and since the commencement of this Session, owing to the extraordinary alacrity with which hon. Members had got through the Business, the prospects of the Bill becoming law were much improved. Though there would not be too much time to make all the arrangements for conducting the elections before February, and although a great deal of work would be thrown on the Department, he did not think it would be right to postpone the elections under the new system for 12 months through pressure of business. When the Bill was introduced this Session, Public Business had not made such progress, and the probability of the measure becoming law was not so great. Then there might have been a strong case for altering the date; but now that they were within measureable distance of the Bill becoming law, if it became law at all, it should be passed as it was. To put off its operation a whole year would be a great sacrijoice, for my own part, that the Treasury have become so amenable to public criticism; and I should rejoice still more if this were but the first of several steps taken in the same direction. My second difficulty, however, is a far greater one, and it is this—the Commission over which I had the honour to preside was of a strictly confidential nature; and evidence was given to us on the distinct understanding that it should never be published, and a great deal we ourselves stated and recommended was also of the same character. At the same time, I find it extremely difficult to discuss a Parliamentary Paper such as this without alluding to the views which the Commission held. It seems to me that it would have been very fair had I been allowed to give simply what I may call the corresponding and comparative figures to those given by the Government—for instance, that where the Government, the War Office, or the Treasury recommended a certain sum—say £100,000, I should have been at liberty to say that, in that same case, the Commission stated that £200,000 or £300,000 ought to be expended. I cannot see that any unfairness or injury whatever would have accrued to the Public Service by such a course. But my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty appealed to me the other night not to use one single figure out of that Report, and to treat the Report from first to last as an absolute secret. I earnestly hope that my noble Friend and other Cabinet Ministers are themselves as careful as they can be in their custody of these confidential Papers; for it has been my fortune several times to become aware of Papers of the highest importance, both on military, naval, and foreign affairs, having found their way somehow or other into the possession of foreign Governments. I do not know where the fault has been; but I know that matters of extreme, of the most vital, importance have been allowed to leak out and found their way into other hands. I think it would have been fair had I been allowed to make a comparative statement on this occasion; but I am not, and when the Report of a Commission is confidential, and when the Government asks one to treat the document as secret, one is bound to accept that view, and I do accept it; but in arguing this case I am greatly fettered and restrained, and I shall find it very difficult indeed to make my case clear, dealing, as I shall be obliged to do, with generalities, instead of with the few explicit figures which would have made it absolutely certain. With these explanations, I will proceed to the subject in hand. First of all, I observe that, as regards the dates of this Correspondence, some comments have been made out-of-doors. There was a long delay between March 19, when the first letter was written, and August 12, when the last was written, if it be the last. But the great fault that I find in respect to chronology is in this—that three precious years have been allowed to go by since the first Report of the Commissioners was presented to the Government, and that two years have been allowed to pass since the presentation of the last Report. Now, one word as to the order in which these stations are taken. In the first Paper Aden, Singapore, and Hong Kong were the three stations chosen for these works, and in the second Paper Ceylon (Trincomalee) is added, and Simon's Bay. I could say something about the choice of Trincomalee; but I will leave that matter to the responsibility of my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty and his Colleagues. So two stations have been added, Trincomalee and Simon's Bay. The place which one would think would be the very first point to be defended was ignored in the first Paper. The Commissioners said that the defence of the Cape was of essential, vital, and primary importance; but now that has been put in a great measure aside, and if the First Lord of the Admiralty will refer to the Reports that were issued, he will appreciate the weight of my remarks. Let me remind your Lordships what the Cape really is to us, for that is of the highest importance in the consideration of this question. First of all, it is the alternative route to the Suez route; and, more than that, it will be the only route to our Eastern Possessions if the Suez route should ever be blocked, and he would be a very bold man, indeed, who did not contemplate the contingency of that route being blocked should a European war arise. Secondly, we have to consider how very large a stake we have commercially in that route. Five years ago, the commerce that went round and touched the Cape was represented by £90,000,000 yearly, while upon the same subject has been laid before the House. Through the courtesy of my noble Friend opposite, I was allowed a sight of it yesterday, and, therefore, though I have not had time to examine it very carefully, having time only for a cursory perusal, I think I am generally aware of the modifications it introduces. That Paper is very embarrassing to me in dealing with this question. In the first place, it involves a considerable change, I am willing to admit an important change, in one respect, but one that I cannot look upon as important in another respect. That Paper makes an important change; because it contains a public retraction by the Treasury of the extraordinary doctrine which they had laid down in the first Paper, and by which Her Majesty's Government were at that time apparently governed. Since the first Paper was published, the War Office remonstrated against the Treasury view on the point; and, thanks to that remonstrance, and thanks, I am bound to say, to a great extent, to public criticism, the Treasury have seen that they could not possibly stand by the ground they originally took up. In order to make myself clear, I had better, I think, point out to the House, in a few words, what is the substance of these two Papers. The first Paper, which has been for many weeks before the public, begins with a letter from the War Office to the Colonial Office of the 19th of March. It is, therefore, some months old, and contains, first of all, an estimate from the Inspector General of Fortifications of works and harbours which it is proposed to execute in certain stations and in certain cases there given. My Lords, these stations are Aden, Ceylon, Singapore, Hong Kong, Sierra Leone, St. Helena, the Cape of Good Hope, the Mauritius, Jamaica, and St. Lucia, and the Inspector General estimates for the works in these different cases £560,000, and for the armaments £331,000, or a total of £891,000. In the next place, it will be seen from the official Correspondence that the estimate is based upon the Reports of 1881 and 1882, and assumes to represent the views of the Commission, who suggested that Singapore and Hong Kong should be at once fortified, and they said that Simon's Bay was a matter of the first consideration. Now, my Lords, as the Correspondence proceeds, the War Office first suggests Singapore and Hong Kong as two points to be fortified, and subsequently Simon's Bay enters into their view, as also does Aden; while I am sorry to say that Singapore and the Cape practically disappear. The Correspondence then winds up by the Treasury agreeing that Aden, Singapore, and Hong Kong should be brought in at a cost of £345,000 out of the £891,000 originally proposed, naming, at the same time, no time for the completion of those works, and in a most remarkable sentence proposing to postpone the completion of the armaments—"As no expenditure need be incurred for them until the works have been completed." At present, I make no comments upon this. The second Paper, which has only within the last few hours been laid upon the Table, is a very remarkable comment upon that I have just quoted. It commences with a letter from the War Office on the 1st of November, which proposes certain modifications in the original estimate; first of all, a general increase on the whole sum of £18,000. The first proposal was £891,000; their proposal is now £909,000. But there is a special increase in the Vote for Armaments, and that special increase amounts to no less than £117,000. But, my Lords, that increase is purchased by a reduction of £97,000 upon the works, the first proposal for the works being £560,000, and the second £463,000, showing a reduction of £97,000. The War Office then proceeds to recommend that the armaments should be postponed until the completion of the works, and further proposes to deal with many more stations than was originally intended, including Aden, Trincomalee, Singapore, Hong Kong, Simon's Bay, and Table Bay. They further propose that the work should be completed within the space of three years, and the whole Correspondence is wound up by the remarkable retraction by the Treasury of the doctrine they had originally advanced that the armaments should be postponed until the completion of the works. That is the state of the case as it is before the public in these two very important Parliamentary Papers. As I said before, there is a certain improvement effected by the second Paper—that of the increase of armaments; and I rejoice, for my own part, that the Treasury have become so amenable to public criticism; and I should rejoice still more if this were but the first of several steps taken in the same direction. My second difficulty, however, is a far greater one, and it is this—the Commission over which I had the honour to preside was of a strictly confidential nature; and evidence was given to us on the distinct understanding that it should never be published, and a great deal we ourselves stated and recommended was also of the same character. At the same time, I find it extremely difficult to discuss a Parliamentary Paper such as this without alluding to the views which the Commission held. It seems to me that it would have been very fair had I been allowed to give simply what I may call the corresponding and comparative figures to those given by the Government—for instance, that where the Government, the War Office, or the Treasury recommended a certain sum—say £100,000, I should have been at liberty to say that, in that same case, the Commission stated that £200,000 or £300,000 ought to be expended. I cannot see that any unfairness or injury whatever would have accrued to the Public Service by such a course. But my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty appealed to me the other night not to use one single figure out of that Report, and to treat the Report from first to last as an absolute secret. I earnestly hope that my noble Friend and other Cabinet Ministers are themselves as careful as they can be in their custody of these confidential Papers; for it has been my fortune several times to become aware of Papers of the highest importance, both on military, naval, and foreign affairs, having found their way somehow or other into the possession of foreign Governments. I do not know where the fault has been; but I know that matters of extreme, of the most vital, importance have been allowed to leak out and found their way into other hands. I think it would have been fair had I been allowed to make a comparative statement on this occasion; but I am not, and when the Report of a Commission is confidential, and when the Government asks one to treat the document as secret, one is bound to accept that view, and I do accept it; but in arguing this case I am greatly fettered and restrained, and I shall find it very difficult indeed to make my case clear, dealing, as I shall be obliged to do, with generalities, instead of with the few explicit figures which would have made it absolutely certain. With these explanations, I will proceed to the subject in hand. First of all, I observe that, as regards the dates of this Correspondence, some comments have been made out-of-doors. There was a long delay between March 19, when the first letter was written, and August 12, when the last was written, if it be the last. But the great fault that I find in respect to chronology is in this—that three precious years have been allowed to go by since the first Report of the Commissioners was presented to the Government, and that two years have been allowed to pass since the presentation of the last Report. Now, one word as to the order in which these stations are taken. In the first Paper Aden, Singapore, and Hong Kong were the three stations chosen for these works, and in the second Paper Ceylon (Trincomalee) is added, and Simon's Bay. I could say something about the choice of Trincomalee; but I will leave that matter to the responsibility of my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty and his Colleagues. So two stations have been added, Trincomalee and Simon's Bay. The place which one would think would be the very first point to be defended was ignored in the first Paper. The Commissioners said that the defence of the Cape was of essential, vital, and primary importance; but now that has been put in a great measure aside, and if the First Lord of the Admiralty will refer to the Reports that were issued, he will appreciate the weight of my remarks. Let me remind your Lordships what the Cape really is to us, for that is of the highest importance in the consideration of this question. First of all, it is the alternative route to the Suez route; and, more than that, it will be the only route to our Eastern Possessions if the Suez route should ever be blocked, and he would be a very bold man, indeed, who did not contemplate the contingency of that route being blocked should a European war arise. Secondly, we have to consider how very large a stake we have commercially in that route. Five years ago, the commerce that went round and touched the Cape was represented by £90,000,000 yearly, while that which went through the Suez Canal was represented by £65,000,000. The commerce that might have to pass the Cape in time of war might amount to £200,000,000. Now, in the last Parliamentary Paper, it is proposed to fortify Simon's Bay alone, and no mention is made of Table Bay. But the two places are so dependent on each other that it is impossible to defend the one without fortifying the other, and to fortify Simon's Bay without fortifying Table Bay also would be to leave your back door open to the foe, and to have only half the fortifications which you ought to have. This has never been controverted or denied. It is said in this Paper that the interests which we have at the Cape are confined to Simon's Bay, and that at Table Bay there are only Colonial interests. That is a most extraordinary statement. It is also alleged in this Paper that you may leave the fortification of Table Bay to the Colonial Government; but anyone who knows the views of the Colonial Government knows that it is idle to think that the Cape Government will undertake this task. They will co-operate with you by giving valuable land and spending a very considerable sum of money; but anything more than that we cannot expect from them, nor do I think we have a right to expect more. Having disposed of the question as it affects the Cape, in order to illustrate the way in which this subject has been treated by the Treasury, I now proceed to the consideration of the subject generally. What is it we have to defend? The question must be considered under four separate heads—1, Ten great Colonies; 2, ten small Colonies; 3, the trade which is afloat; and, 4, coaling stations and Imperial stations generally. As regards our great Colonies, we need do very little indeed. Australia has set an excellent example, which we need do very well to follow, their public-spirited and generous expenditure of public money having, I trust, placed Melbourne and Sydney in a position of almost confident security. Therefore, the case of these great Colonies need not now be discussed. As regards our smaller Colonies, they are defensible so long as we maintain the supremacy of the sea, and no longer. As regards the trade afloat, it was calculated, four or five years ago—and I have no doubt that the figures have increased—that £900,000,000 sterling represented the commerce of this country which crossed the seas; beyond that, we were the great carrying Power of the world, £650,000,000 representing the commerce which was afloat in one single year. Now, I come to the question of Imperial and coaling stations. In time of peace the Admiralty have about 50 stations upon which they can depend for coaling; but of these the greater number are in foreign countries, and I need not remind your Lordships that, in time of war, coaling stations belonging to belligerents or neutrals would be shut against us. There remain the four great stations, which I may call the maritime quadrilateral of England—namely, Gibraltar and Malta in the Mediterranean, and Bermuda and Halifax on the other side of the world. Those four great stations have, for many years past, been the special care of Her Majesty's Government. They were remitted to the Commission; but about a year and a-half after we had commenced our investigations they were withdrawn from our cognizance, and, therefore, it is impossible for me to express any opinion with respect to them. But I do say, when Her Majesty's Government removed those four stations, which formed a maritime quadrilateral, from our cognizance, they assumed a very weighty responsibility, and are bound all the more to account for and take all necessary steps for their defence. I hope and trust that the defences are adequate to any occasion that may arise. I have my own views upon it; but the responsibility rests with the Government, and with them alone. There remains, after this deduction, something like 16 or 17 coaling stations abroad, some of greater, some of less consequence in time of war. Now, what is the value of those stations? because out-of-doors I very often notice a most singular ignorance on the subject. Those stations I hold to be vital to us in time of war. Steam has revolutionized all the conditions of modern warfare, especially in ships of war. My noble Friend knows very well that coal is the life and soul of modern ships of war, though the amount of coal a war ship can carry is comparatively small; and coal is to a modern ship of war what sails were to a wooden three-decker in the time of Nelson. If you allow your ships to be deprived of coal, they will lie useless on the water. In the old days, the wooden ships might be repaired by the ships' carpenters after a general action; but your iron ships must go to places where there are docks and means by which they can be properly repaired. At the principal of those coaling stations there are those facilities which would enable the refitting to be undertaken. But it is perfectly necessary to defend those places; and if you leave them exposed, you leave them to be taken possession of by the enemy. It will not do to defend them merely by ships of war; because if ships of war are to watch over the coaling stations in which those valuable stores are deposited, they are tied to particular points of the coast, and they cannot operate generally with effect against the enemy. But, with the coaling stations themselves out of danger, the ships themselves would be set free for defensive purposes elsewhere. It is necessary, as this Report states, to defend your coaling stations against the heaviest guns and artillery; you cannot have very slight works, because, during the last few years, the calibre of the guns has so much increased that you must now count on ships with 6 inches or 8 inches of armour; and this, at lowest, involves both a considerable increase in the solidity of the works and the range of the guns. I have seen it stated of late that an alternative is to be found in the increase of the Navy. That is a total mistake, and would not by any means meet the case, for the reasons I have already stated. There must be places properly fortified and guarded, at which our vessels can refit and recoal; and to double or even treble the Navy would not be an adequate substitute for properly defended coaling stations. Therefore it is for the Government to determine what the number of those different stations should be, and then adequately provide for their defence. England has, undoubtedly, more and better stations abroad than any other great European Power. How if those stations are undefended? Instead of being a source of strength in time of war, they become a distinct source of weakness. I shall wind up this part of the case by reminding your Lordships that upon that question depends, not only the keeping afloat of Her Majesty's

Navy, but the whole maintenance of the trade of this country; and, inasmuch as the life of this country is commerce, our national existence itself may, in time of war, be said to depend on the number of our well-defended stations. Now I come to the proposals which Her Majesty's Government and the Treasury have made. I cannot compare these proposals with the recommendations which the Commission made. And here arises one of the great difficulties under which I labour. I must not contrast the proposals which the Government make with those of the Commission; but I may surely give this as my opinion—that the scheme ought to be a whole and complete scheme, and by that I mean that there should be works both by land and sea. I may observe, in passing, that I am at a loss to understand whether, in this estimate of the War Office, it is land works or sea works that are meant, or whether both are included. I hope my noble Friend when he speaks will throw some light on this subject. Sea works or land works ought to be supplemented by mines and torpedoes and other defences of that kind. The one would be useless without the other. I now come to the question of expenditure. The land and the sea works and the other separate matters dealt with in the first Parliamentary Paper fall very much below what I consider satisfactory. If I were to say that they ought at least to be doubled, I should not be going at all beyond truth. It must be remembered that there is no provision made for those supplementary items to which I have just alluded. I read the other day a speech made by Sir Thomas Brassey, in which he dealt with the question of the Navy. Sir Thomas Brassey was one of the original Members of the Commission, and I wish very much that he had remained to the end upon it. His loss was a great loss to us, and it was still greater as he was removed at the time when we came to consider the subject as a whole. Sir Thomas Brassey, speaking lately for the Government, used these words—

"The protecting of our coaling stations is another matter of urgency, and the correspondence lately published will show that the Government are alive to the requirements of the Empire, and have made proper arrangements for the commencement of the work."

When I come to contrast these words of Sir Thomas Brassey with the proposals it will be seen that there is a great hiatus. Take the first Paper. The Treasury is the governing spirit in the matter, and therefore I must speak of the Paper as the Treasury Paper. The Treasury allow for the expenditure £891,000—I consider that sum of £891,000 to be far below the requirements of the case. The next step, and it is a very ingenious one, is to reduce the sum of £891,000 to £345,000. How is that done? It is done by striking out the majority of the places that are to be fortified, and naming Aden, the Straits, and Hong Kong, as being the most urgent. No doubt, those three places are extremely important stations; but, unless the Government have before their eyes the danger of an Eastern War, I do not think that they are the most important. In the order of priority I do not see what there is to justify the Government in assuming that those stations are the most important. The fact is they are the richest, and larger local contributions can be obtained from them than from other places. But the Estimate is subject to a further reduction. The £345,000 is brought down to £150,000 by the separation of local and Imperial charges. The local charges are set down at £195,000, and the Imperial at £150,000. That is not all. The sum of £150,000, again, by a most ingenious process of arithmetic, is reduced to £47,000, the division being—armaments, £103,750; works, £47,000. The Treasury then wind up by postponing the armaments until the works are completed, and by informing us that the Indian Government had undertaken to advance the £47,000, or something like that sum. Thus they say that little, if any, charge will fall on the Army Votes this year; and it will be certainly unnecessary to present a Supplementary Estimate this Session. I have come to this conclusion—that, whatever the expenses of the Government in this matter may be on paper, in practice they will be found to be nil. This shows the spirit in which the whole of the proposal is conceived, and what vital injury will be done to the country if the Treasury are allowed to overrule and overbear the action of those Governors who were responsible for the safety of the country abroad. Let me say on that point that the Commissioners framed their estimates upon the lowest possible scale; and my own feelings, and that of some of my Colleagues, was that if we erred it was in recommending an insufficient sum for the defence of these places. Let me explain how we arrived at our estimates. We framed them, first of all, upon data supplied to us from the Inspector General's office, and from the War Office and the Admiralty. We subjected it to the closest scrutiny, and sent out the estimates to be verified by local Committees on the spot. We also sent out most experienced naval and military officers to test the accuracy of the estimates. I should like to know upon what data the Treasury, the War Office, and the Admiralty are proceeding in this case, and how the different views of the War Office three years ago and at present are reconciled? In the next place, the Commission endeavoured to look at the scheme as a whole; but this scheme which is now before us is conceived in as narrow and Departmental a spirit as any I have yet seen. We rescued many separate questions from the Departmental mode of treatment; and, for the first time, we obtained a certain concentration of official knowledge and communication. It was my earnest hope that that state of things would continue, and that some means would be adopted to prevent the terrible difficulty which arises from each Office corresponding separately and distinctly with one another. To my deep regret and sorrow, such has not been the case, and I see from this Paper that you are working under a most unsatisfactory system. I am satisfied in my own mind that until some such system as I have indicated is adopted this country will hardly be in the position in which it ought to be as regards naval matters. The word "garrisons" is mentioned in the title of this Parliamentary Paper; but it is the beginning and the end, for we hear nothing further about garrisons. With regard to this part of the question, the Commission recommended concentration of troops, and I hoped and believed that that part of our recommendations would be carried out; but I am bound to say that, in my humble opinion, the existing garrisons in some parts of the world are inadequate, though, no doubt, much has been done by means of local contributions and local levies, but I have not heard that they have been sufficient. Of one thing I am sure, and that is, that this question of garrisons cannot be separated from the question of fortifications. It is useless to build fortifications unless we have the men to man them; and I quite admit the extreme difficulty of the question of garrisons. Still, I appeal to those who knew the subject best, whether it is not one that must be faced by any Government, and in time of war would be such that some remedy must be found? I come now to the question of armaments, which may be considered from three points of view—numbers, the weight of guns, and the cost. If I can trust to the first of these Parliamentary Papers for the original proposals of the Government as to armaments, I can only say they are like the works—singularly insufficient, and below the mark. I find that, while the number of intermediate and light guns was somewhat below that which it should have been, the real deficiency occurred in the class of heavy guns, and I need not point out that in time of war it is upon the heavy guns that you must depend in the fortifications. In the second Paper the item is more satisfactory; but at the same time, as far as I can judge, the Estimate is too low. I am very much afraid that the guns on which you depend are very much in arrear. You have to provide for the Navy, for home fortifications, and for foreign stations. The Navy is not yet supplied, and on the home fortifications many of the guns are of an old type, and are useless. The real difficulty is, as I apprehend—and it is well that Parliament should know it—that we have not got plant adequate to turn out the number of guns we need. We are dependent upon Sir Joseph Whitworth for the steel required for the heavier guns, and I believe the best gunpowder we now use is imported from Germany, and is produced by a process which is a secret and a monopoly. Can anything be more anomalous than that this country should be in such a position? Some guns can be manufactured in a year, and some require three years, so that the average time required is about two years. Therefore, taking one thing with another, and that as the time required, it is extraordinary that the Treasury actually propose to defer dealing with the armaments until the works are completed. If the Treasury think we could turn out the guns we should want, if a war broke out, one can only marvel at their holding such an opinion. There are many proposals, subsidiary to those to which I have alluded, which the Commissioners thought it their bounden duty to bring under the attention of the Government, and I hope that they have had a somewhat larger consideration than others in the Inspector General's Office. May I call to mind the composition of that Commission? It was composed of very representative men. We examined witnesses of every class and kind—the highest military, naval, commercial, and scientific authorities, including the illustrious Duke at the head of the Army, the First Lord of the Admiralty, and the highest military and naval officers. There was not a single branch of knowledge, science, or information, that could be brought to bear on the question that was not appealed to in the course of the inquiry. We sat for three years; we did not shrink from any amount of work; and we only discharged our consciences in saying anything which was calculated to awaken anxiety in the minds of the Government. Therefore, it is with regret that I see the outcome in the Treasury Letter. I know what the Treasury is. No doubt, it is a valuable Office in restricting extravagance and keeping accounts; but it has no special knowledge on questions of this kind. If the responsible Heads of a great Department like the Navy allow the Treasury to come in and overbear their deliberate judgment by mere arithmetical considerations they incur a great responsibility. The position seems to me to be by no means satisfactory. On the one hand, we have, first of all, these four great fortresses to which I have alluded. I hope they are adequately and fully defended. We have 16 or 17 others that are very inadequately defended, or not defended at all. We have inadequate garrisons. We have, at many points, no works worth speaking of. We have no guns worth speaking of. Our lines of commercial steamers are not duly guarded; and we have no security that in time of war our food supply will be safe. There is everything which, under a few adverse conditions, might easily lead to a great national disaster. On the other hand, what are the proposals with which this state of things is met? The coaling stations are dismissed. There is no provision made for barracks, or for any of the essential secondary supplements of the existing works, which, in my opinion, are much below efficiency. Even the armaments to be provided will be still below the mark. It is impossible not to feel extremely anxious that the Government should not, in a case of this kind, be influenced by considerations of parsimony, and should not hesitate to look the facts in the face. I have no wish to say a word to produce a panic. The proof of that is, that, for three years since the Report of this Commission was presented, I have waited patiently, giving only a few occasional indications of my opinion to my noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Northbrook), and to the Government generally. I hope I have said nothing from a Party point of view. I should scorn to initiate a discussion on a question of this sort on Party lines. It is my conscientious belief that I have said less than the case really requires. I, for one, refuse all further responsibility in this matter. I personally wash my hands of whatever liability there may be attaching to me or any other Member of the Commission, as regards the Government not acting on our recommendations. I have spoken my mind fairly and fully; not as much so as I could have done, but yet sufficiently for my purpose. My object is to warn the Government and the country that the present state of the defences is inadequate and unsatisfactory, and that when any untoward or unfavourable circumstances occur the greatest and most vital interests of the country may be placed in serious jeopardy.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, that he wished, as a Member of the Commission, to ask a question which his noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty might, perhaps, find it convenient to answer. He wished to know whether it would be possible to state, or lay on the Table, the detailed calculations or Papers to show on what data the estimates of the Inspector General of Fortifications were based? He was bound to say, without quoting the figures, that there was a great margin of difference between the calculations of the Commission and those of the Inspector General; and he entertained doubts as to the correctness of the calculations of the Inspector General. These doubts were strengthened by the fact that when the Report of the Inspector General was submitted to the Director of Artillery, he found a deficiency of more than £100,000 in the estimates for armaments. For himself and for the other Members of the Commission, he could say that they had prepared their estimate with the greatest care, and that they had been extremely anxious to avoid anything like extravagance; but if the Inspector General's estimates were, as he could not help thinking they were, insufficient, it would be a great misfortune to the country, if these works were undertaken with an insufficient consideration of all points required for the public interest.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: My Lords, I can assure the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) that I quite appreciate the interest he takes in this question. No man has a greater right than he has to take an interest in it, and to bring it under the notice of your Lordships. He presided with great ability over the Royal Commission to which he has referred; and, besides that, his position in this House would be a sufficient reason why your Lordships should listen to any observations he might wish to offer. I hope your Lordships will understand, at the outset, that I quite agree with a great deal of what the noble Earl has said, and particularly with regard to the value of fortifications for the defence of our coaling stations in different parts of the world. No one can fill the position of First Lord of the Admiralty without being aware that, of all the measures that could be taken by this country for its defence in time of war, none can be more urgent than the defence of our coaling stations. It is the measure which, of all others, would strengthen our naval force, for the obvious reason that, if the coaling stations are left unprotected, we should have to provide for their defence by ships of war which, if they were fortified, could be employed in offensive operations. But it must be remembered that these defences are not intended as defences against any possible attack by an armed squadron of large force, but as sufficient defences against cruisers and such forms of attack as might be reasonably expected. These coaling stations are situated in different parts of the world. We should have notice of the despatch of anything like a powerful attack by an expedition against them, and it would be met by a counter-expedition by ourselves. Therefore, it is not against such attacks as these that coaling stations are to be protected. I wish to assure your Lordships that I quite agree in all that my noble Friend has said—as I agree with him in many other things he said—about the importance of the subject he has brought forward. But I admit that I heard my noble Friend's speech with some disappointment; because, although we may differ as to the amount to be spent on the protection of our coaling stations, I hoped that instead of his making a condemnatory speech, he would have, at least, given us a little encouragement by expressing some satisfaction with the intentions of the Government as shown in these Papers. The Government are determined to proceed at once with the fortification of these coaling stations in such a manner as they consider to be adequate and proper. I am sorry, therefore, that I cannot get even the slightest encouragement from my noble Friend when we are really taking up this question, and that I have only to reply to adverse criticism. I wish to reassure my noble Friend on one point. It seems to me that he is quite right in saying, as I understand the matter, that he, like the Chairman of any other Commission, is only responsible for the Report which the Commission has made. We do not attribute to my noble Friend any responsibility for the proposals of the Government. The responsibility rests on us alone, and not on the Members of the Commission, and we do not shrink from it. With respect to my noble Friend's inability to quote the figures or other particulars of the Report, I would say that, when a Report is of an absolutely confidential character, it would be a dangerous practice to say that this or that part of it may be quoted. I think, therefore, that my noble Friend has exercised a wise discretion in abstaining from quoting any figures given by the Royal Commission. But when he expresses regret that he was not able so to do, I might retort that I had equal cause for regret, for if he had quoted any figures I might have quoted others as against him, in order to show that the estimates of the Government were sufficient, so that I think in the matter of figures my noble Friend and myself are in the same position. There is another matter in my noble Friend's speech to which I am inclined to take exception, and that is the way in which he attributed to the Treasury everything vicious in the conduct of this question. Those who occupy a position like that which I have the honour to hold are inclined, of course, occasionally to look upon the Treasury as natural enemies, as we are often desirous of spending a great deal of money which the country cannot afford. But my noble Friend is entirely mistaken in this case in speaking of the Treasury as overbearing the Military and Naval Departments. As a matter of fact, the Treasury has done all that it has been asked to do. The proposals for the defence of these stations were not inaugurated by the Treasury, but by the War Department. There was, no doubt, a letter from the Treasury, suggesting that the estimates for armaments might be postponed until the works were completed. But when the Treasury received a letter from the War Office, explaining that such a course could not be followed, the Treasury at once gave way and conceded the point. In fact, the Treasury have agreed to all the proposals put before them by the War Office with respect to these defences without making any difficulty. I am not one of those who take up a strong attitude against the Treasury. Some restraint is needful on the great spending Departments; and if proposals for expenditure were not carefully examined by an independent body like the Treasury, we might be landed year by year in unnecessary extravagance. My noble Friend has very properly explained the manner in which the Commission of which he was Chairman obtained its information. There was nothing secret in that. I quite agree, also, in the description of my noble Friend of the manner in which the Commission did this work. Having concluded its labours, it was the duty of the War Office to examine the Report, and it was referred to the Inspector General of Fortifications, who examined the proposals with great care, and, with the assistance of the Local Authorities, the conclusions at which he arrived were submitted to a Standing Committee, termed the Defence Committee, whose duty it is to examine and report upon all such proposals; and I think that the same confidence is due to the opinion of that Committee which my noble Friend claims for the work of the Commission. I cannot agree with my noble Friend in the remarks he has made about that Committee. I do not know why my noble Friend should depreciate that Departmental Committee, and speak in disparaging terms of it. It was composed of men who possessed the greatest knowledge of the subject, and I do not see why the term "Departmental" should be used of them as a slight, when they were dealing with a matter with which their whole professional education qualified them to deal.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he was afraid the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook) had misunderstood him. He had not spoken in disrespectful terms of the Members of that Committee, but had said that the estimate seemed to have been conceived in a narrow Departmental spirit.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: I did not in the least misunderstand my noble Friend. The estimate was, in my opinion, properly framed in that Departmental spirit—that is to say, the professional knowledge of competent officers—which my noble Friend depreciates. The estimate of the Inspector General of Fortifications was fortified by the assistance of a naval officer of great experience, and to be worth anything it must necessarily be so. If my noble Friend will look at the first page of the Correspondence laid on the Table, he will see that the recommendations of the Inspector General of Fortifications were approved by the Defence Committee, which was under the Presidency of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief. I cannot see why my noble Friend should criticize the spirit in which the estimate was framed with the approval of a body of men who were more competent to express an opinion on the subject than any men in the Empire. The noble Earl has indulged in some very unfriendly criticisms of these proposals; but from whom do they emanate? From a Committee of which the illustrious Duke was President, and among the Members of which were Sir Cooper Key and Lord Wolseley. These are the "Departmental" gentlemen whose proposals he has so severely criticized. I have communicated with Sir Cooper Key on this subject, and I am authorized by him to say that he entirely agrees with these recommendations generally; but, in accordance with the practice of the Committee, each particular plan will be brought before them in detail before it is finally adopted. These proposals come forth endorsed with the approval of this most influential Committee; and I think they are deserving of somewhat more respect than the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) has paid them to-night. This, after all, is a question of authority; and if I thought the noble Earl was more likely to be right than the Inspector General of Fortifications and the Defence Committee I should bow to his authority; but, much as I respect his opinion, I must give greater deference to that of the qualified and responsible persons I have named. I now come to some questions which the noble Earl dwelt on with respect to these proposals. He asked whether these fortifications were to be of a nature directed against an attack from the land or from the sea? To that I answer that they are to be sea works. No provision, it is true, is made in these proposals for submarine mines; but that is not because we have overlooked this point. We think that, the cost not being very great, the cost for submarine mines ought to be taken in the Estimates for each year. Everything cannot appear on the Estimate which is confined to works and armaments; therefore, torpedo boats are unprovided for in these proposals; but their importance has not been forgotten. So it is with the minor coaling stations, on which, however, an expenditure of £200,000 will be made. The noble Earl has referred to the importance of fortifying the Cape station at Simon's Bay. I entirely agree with him on this point. In fact, I think that of all our coaling stations it is in the first category of importance; and, therefore, provision has been made for proceeding with the defences of Simon's Bay at once. I was sorry to hear the noble Earl saying that the defence of Simon's Bay is impossible without the defence of Table Bay. That is a point upon which he will find the general current of professional opinion opposed to him. The noble Earl is, I think, under some misapprehension. The Government have deliberately determined not to fortify the stations against the attack of a large fleet and army, but merely against isolated cruisers; and the reason is this—that in time of war there would be ample warning if an army was to be despatched, and such an expedition would be met by a counter-expedition on our part. The only thing I regret in the noble Earl's speech is the discouragement he gave the Cape Government in the defence of Table Bay. On this point he was very hard on the Treasury; but the Treasury had nothing to do with this matter as to Table Bay. I regard Simon's Bay, Hong Kong, Singapore, and Aden as our four most important coaling stations; and I am glad to say that the works at Aden and Hong Kong are already in progress, and the guns for Aden have been already ordered; so that it is a mistake to suppose that nothing has been done. With respect to the armaments, the noble Earl must, I think, be under a misconception if he thinks that their power has been reduced by the substitution of lighter guns. The policy of the scheme under consideration is opposed to light armaments. By the scheme now before your Lordships, these coaling stations will be provided with better guns than they could have obtained at the time of the Report of the Royal Commission. Year by year improvements are made in the manufacture of guns, and these stations will now be provided with guns capable of piercing 17-inch armour plates; whereas the guns proposed by the Commission would only have pierced 14 inches. The noble Earl is under an entire mistake if he supposes that the armament proposed for the works is a light armament. It is true that this is the year 1884, and that a considerable interval has elapsed since the Report of the Royal Commission. But this is a matter involving the country in a large expenditure, which cannot be lightly undertaken, and which no Government would be right in undertaking without full and cautious inquiry. It has, no doubt, taken some time to arrive at a conclusion, and to formulate its proposals; but the delay has not been without advantage, for we can now place on these works, at the different stations, better guns than we could have obtained some years ago. Although there has been some delay in commencing the works, yet, when finished, they will be more powerful and better able to fulfil the objects in view than if they had been commenced a few years ago. As far as those of the Government who have had this matter in hand are concerned, they have always regarded the Report of the Commission over which my noble Friend presided with the greatest interest, and they are under great obligations to the Members of the Commission for the manner in which their work was done. I am only somewhat disappointed to find that, when we are acting, as we think, upon the lines of the Report of that Commission, the encouragement my noble Friend has given us to-night is rather more scanty than he might have offered us. In answer to the question of my noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Camperdown), I have only to say that I should very much prefer to show him the details of the proposals in private than to lay them on the Table of the House.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, as Chairman of the Defence Committee referred to, I feel called upon to support what has been said by the noble Earl (the Earl of Northbrook). Like him, I am not allowed to make comparisons in detail; but I do say, in general terms, that before these works were undertaken they were brought before the Committee of which I am Chairman. The details were founded on the basis of the recommendations of the Royal Commission; and, from the fact that a considerable period has elapsed since the Report of the Commission, and that great changes in the power of guns had taken place during that period, we found we could not only accomplish the object in view in a modified form, but no less efficiently than was originally proposed. The plans have accordingly been considerably modified since these recommendations were made; but, as the noble Earl has said, though the guns are fewer in number, they are more powerful in effect, and the Committee considered that that was of very great advantage. At the same time, they thought there was a possibility of getting the work done at a less costly rate. What was recommended by the Royal Commission, presided over by the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon), has really been carried out in the form now suggested by the Government. I can only say that I rejoice that these proposals are being carried out, and I apprehend that the works now proposed are only an instalment of what is to be done to carry out the complete scheme. I take it for granted that these are only a portion of the recommendations, and that it is the intention to proceed with all the proposed works. They cannot be carried out with equal facility at once, and therefore the most important points are now brought before the public; and I believe that is a clear proof that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to carry out to the fullest extent in their power the recommendations of the Royal Commission. One point to which I must just allude is the expenditure on the works and the expenditure on the armaments. I am bound to say that the noble Earl was fully justified in saying that there is no use in the works and armaments if there are no men to put behind them; and I am quite sure the noble Earl at the head of the Admiralty will agree with me in thinking that the Navy is considered as the essential element of the power which ~~that~~ <sup>these</sup> ~~works~~ <sup>and the</sup> ~~require~~ <sup>will be found</sup> defend these works than we have now available. But sailors cannot be spared for this duty, and therefore soldiers are required to defend the works. I am bound to make this remark, because I believe that without adequate garrisons these defence works will not be of that value which I should attach to them if properly manned.

LORD NAPIER OF MAGDALA said, he would point out to their Lordships that unless mechanical guns were provided with an efficient repairing staff to keep them in order they would be useless, as the slightest check put them out of order. As His Royal Highness had said, the best armaments being useless without garrisons, the construction of barracks in a safe position sufficiently near should always accompany the construction of these defensive works. He did not think too much importance could be attached to the defence of the Cape, because if anything should obstruct the passage of the Suez Canal—and no one could say that it might not be obstructed—they knew that by the means of their fast steamers they had the power of making the passage by the Cape nearly as quickly as by the Canal. He attached as great importance to the fortifications of Table Bay as of Simon's Bay. He knew the country between the two places, and that there was no serious difficulty in passing from one place to the other. He well remembered the late Sir Bartle Frere describing the alarm awakened in some Members of the Cape Government at being told by some Russian Commanders of men-of-war how easy it would be to land a party and carry them off to sea, or levy a heavy contribution. With reference to the other places mentioned, he also attached great importance to the fortification of Aden, because, if it was possible, though not probable, the Suez Canal might fall into other hands; and in the event of such a contingency to find Aden it would be very satisfactory to find Aden in a thoroughly good state of defence. He would also recommend that Kurrachee and Bombay should be kept in view by the Government of India and properly fortified. The connection of the detached rocks in front of Kurrachee would be the means of making it one of the finest harbours in the world, capable of holding the whole Fleet of Great Britain.

LORD OF LONGFORD said, it did not appear that the Government were prepared to proceed in this matter with anything like the vigour and energy that was required, and that had been taken up in mere correspondence between the Departments. It was not possible to command the sea, if we had an insufficient Fleet, and it was impossible to hold our Possessions abroad without an Army. The present establishment of the Army was altogether too low for the various duties demanded from it. He feared that each Minister who came into Office was more anxious to reduce the Estimates than strengthen the defences of the country. The country would not be satisfied with mere Ministerial explanations across the Table of the House. They had great responsibilities; and although an increase in their armaments might add 2d. or 3d. to the Income Tax, the national safety was of more importance than a narrow economy. That increase was, of course, a most disagreeable thing; but it was preferable to the risk of national disgrace.

QUESTIONS.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND) — COUNTY MONAGHAN ASYLUM—CHARGE OF CRUELTY AGAINST OFFICERS.

MR. BIGGAR asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether he is aware that Rose McKenna, Patrick Moan, and Robert Stockdale are prepared to prove that John Geehan, Edward Sherry, James Sherry, and John Gillanders burned the cat at Monaghan Lunatic Asylum; and, if he will now order a prosecution of the persons charged with that offence?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I am not aware that the persons named are prepared to prove what is alleged. If the statements are furnished, the Attorney General will consider whether any grounds for a prosecution exist, having regard to the explanation already made.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—MANORHAMILTON UNION—MR. THOMAS CUMMINGS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. Thomas Cummings, clerk to Manorhamilton Union, entered into a contract for the making of a sewer on the property of a Mr. Miller without the authority of the guardians; and, if so, will the Local Government Board take care that the clerk be made personally liable, and not the ratepayers of the electoral division of Drumkeeran?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Clerk of the Union reports that he did not enter into a contract for the making of the sewer referred to. The work was carried out by a Committee of the Guardians, the Sanitary sub-officer acting under them.

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) ACT, 1882—DR. DAVIS, J.P.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Dr. Davis, J.P., swore an affidavit, for the purposes of the Arrears Act, that one Reilly was bond fide tenant of a holding near to Kingscourt, County Cavan; whether Dr. Davis on the same night induced Reilly to sign a declaration that he was only a caretaker; whether Dr. Davis has signed over his interest in his property to his sons, but still retains control of it; and, whether he will direct an inquiry to be held into the facts of this case?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer the Question. Dr. Davis swore an affidavit for the purposes of the Arrears Act, which proceeded on the assumption that Reilly was a tenant. Reilly did contemporaneously sign a declaration that he was only a caretaker. I have already stated that, in the opinion of the Attorney General, a prosecution under the Arrears Act could not be successfully sustained. As Dr. Davis has become a bankrupt, if he has made any fraudulent transfer of his property, it is the province of the Bankruptcy Court to investigate that matter.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARMS LICENCES.

MR. MAYNE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether at the petty sessions held at Cappawhite on Friday October 24th, two cases of carrying arms without licence were heard, in one of which, Connors, the defendant, was punished by a fine of five shillings and costs, while in the other case Ryan, the defendant, was awarded a month's imprisonment, although the latter is described in the report of the case as being of deficient intelligence; whether Ryan so described was further sentenced to six months' additional imprisonment for kicking in the leg the policeman who arrested him; whether it is a fact that Connors had only recently been released from Limerick Gaol after a term of imprisonment; and, whether a remission of the sentence will be granted in Ryan's case?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The two cases were disposed of as stated in the Question. There was nothing before the Court to show that Ryan was of deficient intelligence. Connor's sentence was a light one, because the circumstances of his offence were not serious. Being a caretaker on an evicted farm, he was given a revolver for his protection; but carried it before his licence had been issued. Ryan's case was quite different. He was found carrying a gun without a licence, and, being unknown, he was questioned by the police, and refused to give his name or any information whatever about himself, and violently resisted the policeman who arrested him. The policeman assaulted was so seriously injured that he is still suffering from the effects. Connors was released from Limerick Prison nine months ago, after a term of imprisonment for obtaining money under false pretences. In Ryan's case an appeal is pending, so that, in any case, the Lord Lieutenant could not consider an application for remission of sentence, even if it were made to him.

PUBLIC HEALTH — QUARANTINE AT GIBRALTAR.

DR. CAMERON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true, as stated by the Madrid Correspondent of The Times, that the authorities at Gibraltar

"Have decided to impose 21 days' quarantine on all arrivals from Italy and France, counting from the day of departure, whether with clean bills or otherwise;"

and, if so, whether, in view of the belief as to the uselessness of quarantine entertained and acted on by the Home Government, and the frequent remonstrances which this country has occasion to address to other nations regarding their quarantine regulations, he will instruct the authorities at Gibraltar to adopt precautions less at variance with the practice and policy of the United Kingdom?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The 21 days' quarantine is imposed on all arrivals from Italy; but in the case of France only on vessels coming from her Mediterranean ports. The Governor will be requested to consider whether these restrictions cannot now be relaxed; but the Secretary of State is not prepared to require the Local Government to act upon the opinions of the Home Government in such matters, in opposition to the very decided wish of the people, and in view of the very peculiar position of Gibraltar.

ROUMANIA—TREATMENT OF THE JEWS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can now state the result of the inquiry which he promised in the House on the 5th August last would be made as to the allegation that the Jews and their families, reduced to destitution by the edict against hawking issued by the Roumanian Government, were unable to leave Roumania for the purpose of earning their living elsewhere from the fact that the Roumanian Government would not, even in the case of those who had been domiciled in the country for generations, grant them the necessary passports, on the ground that they were not Roumanian subjects?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sufficient time has not elapsed for a reply to be received to the request which, as I informed the hon. Member privately last week, has been addressed to Her Majesty's Minister at Bucharest for further explanations respecting the passport system in Roumania. When Mr. White's reply is received, I will lose no time in communicating with the hon. Member.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY — HEAD CONSTABLE VAUSTON.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary has not been made aware that when Head Constable Vauston was, a few months ago, removed from Newtownbarry to Rosbercon, he unlawfully took and carried away from the barracks a valuable press, which was the property of Mr. Hall Dare, a minor, the landlord of the barracks, and which had been placed in them for the use of the men; and, whether it is intended to take any steps to have Vauston punished for this misappropriation?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Inspector General informs me that Head Constable Vauston did, when transferred from Newtownbarry, remove with his furniture an old press. When called upon to return it, he was unable to do so, as it had fallen to pieces on the journey. But he at once, about a month ago, ordered a new one to be supplied in its place; and he explained to the satisfaction of the Inspector General the mistake under which the old one had been removed. The Head Constable is a man of nearly 23 years' service, and during that period no report had ever been made against him.

MAGHERA PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that in the Petty Sessions district of Maghera, county Derry, there is no Catholic magistrate; whether the Catholics form a large majority of the population of the district; and, whether he will ask the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the desirability of appointing a Catholic magistrate in this district?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Lord Chancellor informs me that he has recently placed in the Commission of the Peace four Catholic gentlemen residing not very far from Maghera; and he will ascertain whether some of them may not be able to attend the Maghera Petty Sessions, where the Resident Magistrate, who is a Roman Catholic, now attends. I may add that within the year the Lord Chancellor has placed nine Catholic gentlemen in the Commission of the Peace for the county of Londonderry.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURE—THE CIVIL SERVICE—THE SELECT COMMITTEE OF 1873.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Why he does not carry out the recommendation of the Parliamentary Committee on Civil Service Expenditure of 1873, presided over by the Right Hon. H. C. E. Childers, to the effect that suitable vacancies in all branches of the Civil Service should be filled up by the transfer of redundant officials, and that whilst there are redundant clerks or officers in any department or departments there should be no new appointments to the public service; if he will state how many redundant clerks there are at present in the Customs eligible for and awaiting promotion to the Upper Division; how many, in accordance with the recommendation of the Parliamentary Committee (supported by that of the Playfair Commission), have been transferred to fill vacancies in the Upper Division in other departments; and, how many new appointments, contrary to the recommendation referred to, have been made to the Upper Division and Class I. of the Civil Service since October 1st 1879?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): In reply to the hon. Gentleman's first Question, I must remind him that from a few weeks after the Report of the Committee of 1873 was presented to Parliament until last year I have had no official connection with this question. The following, however, are the facts:—The Committee did not recommend an absolute and unconditional course of action to be followed independently of circumstances, but a preferable course, to be followed when circumstances permitted of it. Their words are not precisely of the effect which the hon. Gentleman attributes to them. They recommend that the reduction of numbers which they believed to be practicable—

"Should be effected rather by an entire cessation of appointments to the clerical service, and by transfers from one department to another, than by superannuating (on terms of abolition) the clerks who might be redundant in particular offices."

Subject to this qualification, my answer to the hon. Gentleman's first Question is that I shall give effect to the recommendation of the Committee so far as lies in my power and circumstances permit. In reply to his second Question, there are 60 redundant officers in the Customs; but in this sense—that they have been made so by reductions in the upper ranks of the future Customs Service. As they are absorbed or retire, they will be replaced in a great degree by less expensive successors. In the meantime, they are performing duties which must in any case be performed. They are the remainder of 130 resulting from the great reorganization of the Customs effected between 1875 and 1880. No new appointments have been made to the clerical staff of the Customs since 1879. In reply to his third Question, no redundant clerk has been transferred from the Customs to the Upper Division and to Class I. in other Departments since 1st October, 1879. In reply to his fourth Question, out of 131 appointments 33 have been effected by transfer and 98 by open competition to the Upper Division in various Public Departments. I am not prepared to say, without looking into the facts as to each clerk, that any of these appointments are contrary to the recommendations of the Committee of 1873.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—RATE OF INTEREST TO SCHOOL BOARDS.

MR. C. H. JAMES asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any correspondence has taken place between the Treasury and the Education Department upon the rate of interest charged to School Boards, under the Treasury Minute of the 19th August 1879, by the Public Works Loan Commissioners; and, if so, whether there would be any objection to lay it upon the Table?

MR. COURTNEY: There has been Correspondence on this subject, and it will, I hope, be completed very shortly. When it is so I shall be happy to lay it on the Table.

EGYPT—THE EXPEDITION UP THE NILE.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Secretary of State for War, If he could give a list of the officers who advised Her Majesty's Government to attempt the relief of Khartoum vid Suakin and Berber, and also a list of those who advised the Expedition vid the Nile; whether he could state when Lord Wolseley expected to be before Khartoum; and, whether there is now any reasonable prospect that our troops will accomplish their task and return before the next hot season arrives?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The opinions referred to in the Question of the hon. Member are always given entirely confidentially; and it would be quite impossible for me to give to the House such a list of the officers who have expressed one opinion or the other as the hon. Member asks for. In reply to his second Question, I have to say that the preparations for Lord Wolseley's advance are being made with all possible expedition; but, under the circumstances and conditions of the case, I should be very sorry to hazard any conjecture as to when he will be before Khartoum. There is, however, every reasonable expectation that the troops under Lord Wolseley's command will be able to accomplish the objects of their mission, and return to Egypt within the present winter.

MR. ONSLOW: May I ask whether any communication has been received from Lord Wolseley to the same effect as the answer just given by the noble Lord, and as to the time when he hopes to arrive in Khartoum?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not think that Lord Wolseley has committed himself to any opinion as to when he will enter Khartoum.

THE IRISH LAND COURTS—APPLICATION FOR FAIR RENTS—THREATENING ACTION OF LANDLORDS.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD (for Mr. CHARLES RUSSELL) asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether it has come to his knowledge that, in many parts of Ireland, landlords have prevented tenants going to the Court to have a fair rent fixed by threatening to deprive them, if they did so, of the right of turbary or the right to take seaweed, which they then enjoyed, in connection with their holdings, or by threatening to charge them increased payments for the exercise of such rights; whether it is a fact that, where tenants have gone into Court to have a fair rent fixed, landlords have recouped themselves wholly or in part for the reductions effected in rent by increased charge for the exercise of such rights; and, whether he will inform himself fully of the facts (by referring to the Land Commissioners, or otherwise), and lay them before the Government with a view to considering what steps can be taken to prevent the objects of the Land Act being defeated by these means?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I have observed with regret the embarrassments created in the fixing of fair rents by the conflicts between landlord and tenant about the rights to different kinds of profits and prebends. It appears to be the fact that cases have occurred in which landlords, after fair rents had been fixed, have made charges for turbary, and seaweed, and the like, which had not been made before. I have not had the opportunity of ascertaining the views of the Land Commissioners; but I shall take all the means in my power to make myself fully acquainted with the important subject referred to in the Question.

THE CIVIL SERVICE (PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATURE)—SIR W. BRAMPTON GURDON.

MR. TOMLINSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is aware that Sir W. B. Gurdon is a candidate for the representation of West Norfolk in Parliament, and that he has in that capacity delivered political addresses; and, whether Sir W. B. Gurdon is still in receipt of pay as a senior clerk in the Treasury; and, if so, whether such action on the part of permanent Civil Servants is in future to be permitted by the Lords of the Treasury and the heads of other public Departments?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): Yes, Sir; since the Question was put to me before, I have ascertained that Sir W. Brampton Gurdon has delivered political addresses as a candidate for West Norfolk. Sir Brampton Gurdon is a principal clerk in the Treasury; but he has now been informed that candidature for Parliament is inconsistent with employment in the permanent Civil Service. He is an officer of great merit and judgment, and we have every confidence that his decision will be a proper one. Should he decide on prosecuting a Parliamentary career, we shall greatly feel the loss of his services at the Treasury.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—THE BALLYFORAN MURDER—INCITEMENT TO GIVE EVIDENCE.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Upon what authority he has declared that there is no foundation for the statement that Mr. George Bolton, and other officials, endeavoured to incite or terrify Thomas Nolan to give false evidence in the Ballyforan murder case; whether he will lay upon the Table any documents on which he rests his declaration; whether the statement handed by Nolan to Constable O'Brien was a statement of his ignorance of the crime: if it was at the instance of the Irish Executive that the Board of Commissioners of National Education dismissed Thomas Nolan from his post of teacher whilst he was in prison; why the Crown did not examine Nolan in Court, or put him on his trial, if, as alleged, he made a statement in prison betraying complicity in the crime, or guilty knowledge of it; and, whether Mr. George Bolton denies that he privately visited another of the prisoners, Thomas Kennedy, in his cell, and that Kennedy hanged himself immediately after?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): My statement was on the authority of every person appearing to have knowledge of the subject, including the officials, five in number, to whom Thomas Nolan refers. It is not the intention of the Government to lay documents upon the Table, especially as there are two men still in custody charged with the murder, and whose trials are pending. The statement handed by Nolan to O'Brien was not a statement of his ignorance of the crime. The Commissioners of National Education did not dismiss Nolan from the post of teacher, nor did the Irish Executive ever apply to them to do so. The manager, the parish priest, informed the Commissioners that he had appointed a successor to him. The Crown did not examine Nolan as a witness, as they believed his evidence unreliable; and they did not put him on his trial, as there was no sufficient evidence against him. As to the other person, Kennedy, Mr. Bolton did not visit him privately. Kennedy, on the 2nd June, wrote a letter, in his own handwriting, expressing a wish to see him, and Mr. Bolton did see him, but not alone. Kennedy committed suicide on the 30th June.

MR. SEXTON: Might I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he will, when the trials connected with this case are over, lay the documents on the Table?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I did not at all say that.

MR. SEXTON: Is this, then, the position of the hon. and learned Gentleman—that he denies the truth of a statement publicly made, with the name of the author attached, and that he refuses to state the authority on which he grounds his denial?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WALKER) assented.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—MISCONDUCT OF CONSTABLES, KERRY CO.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, as the result of the proceedings of a constabulary investigation lately held at Farranfore, county Kerry, the Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary has found two members of that force, Constables Donovan and Kennedy, guilty of having, on the night of the 19th September last, attacked a number of houses, amongst others that of the parish priest, and to the terror of the locality fired several volleys of shots; also a third constable, named Moroney, guilty of having supplied the other two with ammunition which did not bear the regulation mark; whether the sentence upon Moroney is a fine of ten shillings, and the sentence upon Donovan and Kennedy a fine of two pounds each, and removal to other districts; whether the crime of which the Inspector General declares Constables Donovan and Kennedy guilty is one punishable by penal servitude; what authority, if any, the Inspector General has to withhold the trial of a criminal charge against constables from the regular criminal tribunals of the Country; what steps the Irish Executive intend to take in the case; and, whether copies of the evidence taken by the investigating officers, their report to the Inspector General, and his Judgment, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The constables were charged with a very grave and serious breach of discipline—namely, firing off three shots, and shouting, while on patrol duty. There is no foundation whatever for the report that they attacked houses. The sentences upon them, and upon the third constable, who tried to screen them by furnishing them with some ammunition to supply the deficiency improperly caused, were as stated in the Question, the removal being at the men's own expense. In dealing thus leniently with the case, the Inspector General was influenced by the consideration that they were men of previous good character. The constables were not charged with any criminal offence, still less of any offence punishable by penal servitude. The Executive do not intend to take any steps in the case. I cannot undertake to lay the Papers on the Table.

Mr. SEXTON asked if the right hon. Gentleman was aware that in this district an extra police tax was now being levied for the maintenance of these constables, although no outrage had been committed, except the outrage for which the Inspector General had punished these policemen?

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, the question of maintaining extra constables did not arise out of the hon. Member's Question.

Mr. SEXTON gave Notice that he would ask a further Question.

NAVY—THE NEW ORDNANCE.

Mr. CARBUTT asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the new 63-ton gun and the 110-ton gun, which are in the course of manufacture, are a new design, or are they being made on the same system as the 43-ton gun; has the 43-ton gun been tested; and, if so, can he state its penetration at short ranges, and also its length of range; can he state if any of the 43-ton guns were fired during the bombardment of Alexandria, and how many rounds were fired from one gun; and, can he give a list of the guns which were damaged at Alexandria, and state what the damage was?

Mr. BRAND: With the hon. Member's permission, I will answer the Question. The 63-ton and 110-ton guns, which are in course of manufacture, are on new designs. The 43-ton gun has been tested. It can perforate about 21 inches of wrought iron, or about two-thirds of the same thickness of compound plate. Its maximum range is about eight miles. None of the 43-ton guns were fired at Alexandria, as none were mounted in vessels at that time. The guns reported damaged at Alexandria were five in number—namely, one 11-inch, which showed a crack at the muzzle; two 10-inch, which exhibited trifling defects on the exterior near the muzzle; one 8-inch, struck on muzzle by enemy's shell; and one 20-pounder, handle of vent piece blown off.

IMPORTATION OF IRISH CATTLE AT BRISTOL—LEVYING OF DOCK DUES.

MR. KENNY asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, If his attention has been called to a dispute between cattle importers and the Bristol Corporation Docks Committee; if the individuals comprising the Docks Committee have attempted to levy an import duty of three pence per head upon Irish cattle landed at the port of Bristol; if, upon the refusal of the importers to pay this impost, 3,000 Irish cattle were impounded by order of the Docks Committee, and if Bristol police were employed in the work of impounding; and, if the Government proposes taking any steps to prevent any such interference with the staple trade of Ireland?

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, that a letter had been put into his hands written by the Clerk of the Bristol Town Council, which he thought would answer the hon. Member's Question. He said that the docks of Bristol belonged to the Corporation, who were advised that under the Local Act of last Session they had power to impose a dock-rate on cattle landed at the docks, and more than a month ago the Town Council resolved to levy a rate of 3*d.* per head on all cattle so landed. Of this rate full notice was given, but some of the importers refused to pay it and withdrew their cattle. Upon being informed that steps would have to be taken to prevent the cattle being removed until the rate had been paid, and on seeing preparations being made to prevent removal, the leading importers, to avoid inconvenience to the business, met the Corporation officials and arranged to pay the rates under protest until the legality of the rates had been determined by the Law Courts. This arrangement was now being carried out, and proceedings to test the legality of the rate had been commenced. No cattle had been impounded, and consequently the Bristol police could not have been engaged in impounding cattle. The hon. Member would see that the rate was not a differential duty on Irish cattle.

MR. KENNY asked if it were on the authority of the Town Clerk of Bristol that the right hon. Gentleman had stated no cattle were impounded, and did he know that the newspaper reports stated Irish cattle had been impounded?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Town Clerk denies that. The matter is not one that in its present stage could possibly attract the interference of the Government. It is a legal question. The only point on which the Government ought to inform itself—the Board of Trade I believe is the Department—is whether this rate was levied against any particular country or part of the country.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would consider the advisability of recommending the Town Council of Bristol to levy a protective duty of 3*d.* per head upon all foreign cattle?

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND)—PAYMENT OF SALARIES.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with regard to his statement that the "last pay day" for teachers of Irish National Schools is the 14th day of the month succeeding the end of the quarter, Whether the Board's Circular of March 1878 fixed the 11th day of the month succeeding the end of the quarter as the last pay day; and, if any change has been made in this rule since the issue of the Circular in question; whether he is aware that the men of the Royal Irish Constabulary are paid on the 3rd or 4th of each month, and that English teachers are paid monthly in advance; and, whether there is any sufficient reason why the Irish National Teachers should not be paid as punctually and as often as the English teachers, or the Irish Police?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The Commissioners of National Education inform me that in consequence of the operation of the Pensions Act, and owing to the increasing necessity for strict scrutiny in each case, it has been found necessary to alter the quarter day from the 11th to the 14th of the month. There is no analogy between the case of the Constabulary and that of the teachers. The Constabulary are the immediate servants of the Crown. There is absolute certainty on the day their pay is due, as to the service rendered. The teachers, on the other hand, are immediately appointed and controlled by their managers; and upon the reports of those managers, the Commissioners have to investigate the claims and make the payments. This they succeed in doing in 17,000 and odd cases within a period of 14 days with absolute punctuality with very few exceptions, and they can hardly be expected to do any more. If English teachers are in any cases paid in advance, it must be by private arrangement with their managers, and not upon the responsibility of the Education Department, which, as I understand, makes only an annual payment in a lump sum to the managers, and that after the termination of the results examinations.

ARMY—ORDNANCE STORE DEPARTMENT—QUARTERMASTER BRUCE LONGHURST.

MR. JUSTIN HUNTLY M'CARTHY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, for the last four and a-half years, Quartermaster Bruce Longhurst, Ordnance Store Department, has been in charge of the Athlone Sub-District, a sub-district that embraces about a fourth of all Ireland; that he has been reported upon to the War Office as having carried out his duties with zeal and ability; that 18 months ago he was promised by the Surveyor General, War Office, a change of station out of Ireland; and that he has lately been removed from Athlone to Haulbowline, Cork Harbour, for having reminded the War Office of the promise made to him; whether it is the fact that Quartermaster Longhurst has not been allowed to see the letter ordering his removal to Haulbowline, and that the only document he has received bearing upon his removal is an undated memorandum from Dublin Castle; and, whether such treatment of a deserving officer is in accordance with the usages of Her Majesty's Service?

MR. BRAND: It is the case that Quartermaster Bruce Longhurst has been in charge of the Athlone Sub-District for about four and a-half years, that he has been favourably reported upon, and that a promise of removal was made to him by the War Office; but the exigencies of the Service have prevented the War Office from carrying into effect this promise. He has recently been removed to Haulbowline; but this removal has been made for reasons connected with the efficient working of the Department. The removal has been carried out in accordance with the usages of the Service; and if the officer considers himself aggrieved, he can seek redress under Clause 42 of the Army Act of 1881, which gives him the right to put forward a complaint to the Commander-in-Chief, who, to use the terms of the Act, is required "To examine into such complaint, and, through a Secretary of State, make his report to Her Majesty in order to receive the directions of Her Majesty thereon."

IRELAND—CORPORATION OF LIMERICK—EXTRA POLICE TAX.

MR. DAWSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a letter from the Town Clerk of Limerick has been received by His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland offering to leave the matter of extra police tax in dispute to be inquired into at a public inquiry in Limerick by a Commissioner to be appointed by His Excellency; whether any answer has been given to the Town Clerk's letter; and, if not, would he state the grounds; whether the Constabulary Patrol Books had been always presented to the city magistrates for inspection up to the time of Mr. Clifford Lloyd's arrival in Limerick; whether that practice has since been discontinued notwithstanding the public protests of the magistrates at the police courts; and, if so, by whose orders; whether these Patrol Books afford the only evidence of the manner in which the extra police were employed either on duty in the city or elsewhere; and, whether the Corporation allege that the extra police were employed, not in preserving the peace of the city, but in performing escort duty for Mr. Clifford Lloyd?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: On the 3rd of September, His Excellency had intimated to the Corporation of Limerick his readiness to receive a deputation, and, if possible, arrive at an amicable settlement of this question after a personal interview. This proposal having been, on the 19th of September, declined by the Corporation, it was intimated to them on the 22nd that the demand against them would, subject to certain modification in amount, be enforced by process of law, and the matter was put in the hands of the Law Officers. The letter of the 2nd of October, therefore, to which the hon. Member alludes, came too late; but, in any event, it would have been impossible that the proposal it contained for a public inquiry could be entertained. His Excellency regretted to find that, from some inadvertence, it was omitted to send a formal acknowledgment of the receipt of this letter; but I hope the hon. Member will believe that no discourtesy was intended towards the Corporation. It was a mere accident. With regard to the production of patrol books, the practice was discontinued as stated, because the patrols themselves were discontinued, the beat system having been substituted. In Limerick, therefore, as in Belfast and Londonderry, no patrol book is kept. I believe that the allegation in the last paragraph of the Question is a part of the case of the Corporation; but the Government are not prepared to admit the accuracy of that view.

MR. DAWSON asked the right hon. Gentleman if he was not aware that a deputation to the Lord Lieutenant was not the proper occasion to enter into a mass of facts and figures, and that the better way would be to ask a Commission to make investigation in Limerick? [No reply.]

NAVY—H.M.S. "GARNET"—THE "GRENADA PEOPLE" NEWSPAPER—CHARGES AGAINST OFFICERS.

MR. DEASY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, What has been the result of the investigation into the charges made by Mr. Donovan, editor of The Grenada People newspaper, against certain Officers of H.M.S. Garnet?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: A Report was received from the Commander-in-Chief of the North American station with reference to the charges brought by Mr. Donovan against the captain of Her Majesty's Ship Garnet. The Admiralty have informed Captain Montagu that they consider he acted very injudiciously in writing the letters which he addressed to Mr. Donovan, but that they accept his explanation respecting the other charges brought against him by that person.

IRELAND—THE NEW SCIENCE AND ART MUSEUM, DUBLIN.

MR. DAWSON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether a definite period for commencing the building of the New Science and Art Museum and National Library of Dublin has yet been fixed; and, if so, what is the date?

MR. COURTNEY said, that he was glad to inform the hon. Member that matters were sufficiently advanced to enable the actual work to be commenced about the 24th of this month.

IRELAND—CORPORATION OF LIMERICK—EXTRA POLICE.

MR. DAWSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the city of Limerick is still proclaimed, and that extra police are still retained; and, if so, if he will state the grounds?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, in reply, said, that the proclamation of the City of Limerick had not yet been withdrawn, but the extra force, having been from time to time reduced as the state of the city permitted, now numbered 10 men only. The Government had no desire that any of these men should be left in the city a day longer than was necessary, and they would order a further Report on the subject.

MALTA—CONSTITUTION OF THE COUNCIL.

MR. DAWSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is a fact that out of eighteen members of the Council of Malta ten are official and eight members only elected by the people; whether, during the absence of an official member from illness or other cause, the Government can appoint a substitute; whether an absent elected member has any power to nominate a substitute in like circumstances; whether the elected members are constantly outvoted by the official members in questions of importance, including finance; whether the elected members desire a Civil Governor instead of a Military Governor, or, in case the latter is retained, that a portion of his salary should be paid out of Imperial funds for his Military services; and, whether the Government are forcing the substitution of the English for the Italian language as the official language?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: In answer to the first Question my reply is, Yes, the Governor at present being one of 10 official members. My answer to the second Question is also Yes, in this sense—that if an official member is unable to perform his duties the Governor has power to appoint a substitute temporarily to carry on the official work, and by right of that he sits in the Council. My answer to the third Question is No. In reply to the fourth, I will recall to the hon. Member's memory the despatch which has been laid before the House from the Secretary of State to the Governor in March, 1883. It is the desire of the elected members to have a Civil Governor; and as to the question of his salary, it has been partly met by the Secretary of State giving his decision recently that £2,000 of the Governor's present salary should be paid out of Imperial funds. With respect to the last Question, there is no foundation for the statement.

ACT, 1882 (SEARCHES)—LIMERICK COUNTY—MR. JOHN O'SULLIVAN, SHANAGOLDEN.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that the police, under Inspector Harrison, searched the house of Mr. John O'Sullivan of Shanagolden, county Limerick, broke open some locks and took away some books and papers without stating any reason for such action; and, if he will cause inquiry to be made into the action of the police on that occasion, and direct them to return Mr. O'Sullivan the books and papers which they carried away?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The house was searched for illegal documents by virtue of the Lord Lieutenant's warrant issued under the Crimes Act. This was explained at the time to Mr. O'Sullivan by the District Inspector, who offered to read the warrant to him, but he said it was not necessary. The documents taken away cannot at present be returned, as they are the subject of further inquiry. If found not to be required for any legal proceedings they shall be returned.

THE LONDON THEATRES.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has seen the Report of the Building Act Committee to the Metropolitan Board of Works, which stated that "The Board, having completed their requisitions with respect to the structural alterations required at various theatres existing in the Metropolis at the time of the passing of the Act of 1878, do not propose to take any further action with respect to such theatres, unless in any case they shall receive an official intimation from the Lord Chamberlain that additional alterations have been made;"

whether such structural alterations can be fairly stated to have provided such exits as the public have a right to consider sufficient for their safety; whether he is aware that it was publicly stated at the Board, without eliciting a denial, when this Report was presented, that the Lord Chamberlain

"Received fees for work he was unable to perform," that "in Middlesex the justices granted licences without asking the Board if they were satisfied with the entrances and exits or not, and the Surrey justices granted licences to places the plans of which the Board had actually rejected;"

whether he is aware that nearly 8,000 persons were admitted to Covent Garden Theatre on the night of the 27th October; and, whether, in view of the late terrible catastrophe at Glasgow, and the serious consequences which must have ensued had a panic occurred at Covent Garden Theatre, he is prepared to support a Bill giving such powers to the Lord Chamberlain or Metropolitan Board of Works as will allow a constant and proper inspection of theatres at irregular times instead of only annually and by appointment?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: As the hon. Member is aware, the responsibility of looking after the state of the theatres rests with the Metropolitan Board of Works. I have called the attention of the Board to the matter; they have taken action upon it, and I have no reason to think that the action they have taken is not satisfactory. I have a letter from the Lord Chamberlain's Office, with the Report of the architect employed by the Lord Chamberlain to inspect the theatres previous to the issue of his annual licences in September last, and from this it would appear that the Metropolitan Board have done their work very well, and that the exits from the theatres are safe under any ordinary circumstances. As regards the Question whether the Lord Chamberlain receives fees for work he is unable to perform, the statement is that the Lord Chamberlain receives no fees for the inspection of the theatres, and has no staff available for the performance of such duties, and, therefore, he has specially to employ an architect to inspect the theatres. With respect to

Covent Garden Theatre, I have no knowledge as to the number of people who attended there on any particular date, and it is not one of the theatres annually licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, it being open under a Patent dating from the Reign of Charles II. With reference to this Question, which is both important and interesting—If the Metropolitan Board require any further powers? all I can say is that, assuming their proposals are reasonable, they will have all the support I can give them. I may mention that the suggestion made from the Lord Chamberlain's Office, which I think a good one, is that legislation should be provided to the effect that it should be made compulsory that the managers of each place of public entertainment applying for a renewal of their annual licence should produce a certificate from the Metropolitan Board of Works of their safety to the public, making that a condition precedent to the renewal of their licence. If that were done, I think that all the securities that could be reasonably required would be given.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND inquired if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have any objection to laying upon the Table Captain Shaw's Report as to whether the exits from theatres were properly constructed?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had already given his reasons for coming to the conclusion that the Report should not be published.

MR. O'KELLY: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that the exits in question are required not for ordinary, but extraordinary occasions?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, it was very difficult to provide for extraordinary occasions. They might provide for what they could anticipate, but it was very difficult to provide for what could not be anticipated.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD asked whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman had received a Report as to the accident in the theatre at Glasgow?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would ask about that.

INLAND REVENUE OFFICE—GRIEVANCES OF OFFICERS.

MR. VILLIERS STUART (for Mr. Monk) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, having regard to the fact that 357 Petitions, signed by 3,290 Inland Revenue Officials, were presented to this House during last Session praying for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the inequalities and grievances complained of by the Petitioners, Her Majesty's Government is disposed to accede to the appointment of such Committee?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS), in reply, said, that the complaints of the Inland Revenue officers had been fully considered, and such of the grievances alleged by them as appeared to be well founded had been remedied. But the Petitions to which his hon. Friend referred were really applications for larger salaries, and the inequalities complained of arose out of comparisons made by the Petitioners with salaries in other Departments. Full information on the subject was given to Parliament last Session, and the decision of the Government was communicated to the Service. He saw no reason for altering that decision; and certainly this was no time for increasing the charge for the collection of the Revenue. He could, therefore, give no encouragement to the appointment of a Committee.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked whether the 3,290 officials who signed the Petition did not form 97 per cent of the entire employees?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he could not tell.

MR. TOMLINSON asked whether the officials did not ask for an opportunity of showing to a Committee of the House how their demands could be satisfied without increasing the charge for the collection of the Revenue?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, it was not unusual for gentlemen asking for increased salaries to suggest how the money to satisfy their demands could be raised.

THE WEST INDIAN ISLANDS—THE ISLAND OF DOMINICA.

MR. TOMLINSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can say whether there is any foundation for the statement in The West Indian newspaper, published at Barbadoes, on the 24th October last, that the Legislative Assembly of the Island of Dominica have passed Resolutions recommending that Her Majesty's Government be memorialised to cede the Island to the United States of America; whether half the Members of the Legislative Assembly are nominated by the Crown; and, whether the Government have any information as to the grounds on which the inhabitants of the Island have become dissatisfied with their position as belonging to the British Empire, and expect improvement from becoming connected with the United States?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, the only knowledge he had of this matter was from the newspaper paragraph referred to in the Question. It stated that the alleged Resolution was caused by the action of the Mother Country in permitting bounty-fed sugar to come into the English market. It was true that half the Members of the Assembly were nominees.

MR. TOMLINSON asked if the Government had any information whether the nominated Members supported the Resolution or not?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY replied, that the report referred to, which was their only source of information, did not state who voted and who did not.

MR. TOMLINSON asked if the Government would make further inquiry into this important matter?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, that, of course, the Government would get official information in time.

THE INDIAN FAMINE, 1877-8—THE MISSIONARIES.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he would refer the documents in his possession, with reference to alleged cases of money lending at high, if not usurious, interest during the famine of 1877-8 by certain missionaries in Southern India, to the Government of Madras, so as at least to prevent these gentlemen (should the allegations made turn out to be well founded) being appointed at any future time official members of relief committees?

MR. J. K. CROSS: As I informed my hon. and gallant Friend on Monday last, this matter is not one in which the Government of India can interfere; but I shall be glad to send the documents in question to Mr. Grant Duff, who will, no doubt, give them due attention.

Mr. Tomlinson

EGYPT—MILITARY EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, immediately after the battles of Tanagerieb and Tamasi, General Graham telegraphed from Suakin that there was no reason why a sufficient portion of his troops should not advance to Berber and relieve General Gordon if he were permitted to obtain the necessary transport; whether the Government, after consultation with Lord Wolseley, inquired from General Graham how many camels he would require, and their price, and received an answer, 3,000 camels, and their price would be about £50 each; whether General Graham was then asked if he could do with 1,500 camels, and could purchase them at the old price of about £15 a-piece; and whether, on his replying in the negative, he was ordered to at once ship his troops; and, whether, in order to economise this £150,000 which the camels would have cost, this plan of General Graham's was abandoned, and the present expedition for the relief of General Gordon rendered necessary?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that before the Question was answered, he wished to ask the noble Lord whether Lord Wolseley was the same person who, being some years ago in command of the expedition against Coomassie, received a message from Captain Glover to the effect that he was prepared to cross the Prah with a Native force, and who sent back a reply that he was not to do so until ordered by him?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I really have no knowledge of the circumstances referred to by the hon. Member, nor do I see in what way they are relevant to the Question on the Paper. With regard to the Question of the hon. Member for Evesham (Mr. Dixon-Hartland), there is no foundation whatever for the statement that any such telegram was either received or sent.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT asked whether at that time the noble Marquess did not receive any telegram from General Graham suggesting that it was perfectly possible to march from Suakin to Berber, and stating that if he had 3,000 camels he would be able to do so?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No, Sir; there were no such telegrams.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT : May I ask if there was a letter or other communication, if there was no telegram?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : To the best of my recollection, there was no such letter. If the hon. and gallant Member likes to put a Question on the Paper I will answer it. I have no recollection of anything of the kind.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT— CHILDREN'S PENNY DINNERS.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether his attention has been called to the manner in which Penny Dinners have been provided for the children of Rousden School, Devon; and, whether, in view of the evidence recently given as to the insufficient nourishment of many thousands of the children of the poorer classes who are compelled to go through great mental strain, the Education Department will bring all the details of the Rousden system under the notice of the Elementary Schools and recommend its adoption?

MR. MUNDELLA : The hon. Gentleman asks me whether my attention has been called to the excellent experiment of Sir Henry Peek at Rousden School in providing penny dinners for the children of that school, and whether I will recommend it for general adoption? In making my annual Statement in July last year, I especially called the attention of the House to the remarkable success which had attended the Rousden experiment, as well as that which has been carried on for many years at the Jews' Free School in Spitalfields. The hon. Member for the University of Glasgow (Mr. J. A. Campbell) also gave the House full details of a similar successful experiment in Scotland. All these statements, together with the most explicit information as to the cost and composition of the dinners, have been collected and published in a pamphlet which I hold in my hand, which has passed through several editions, and of which 18,000 copies have already been sold. The result is that in many towns and villages throughout the Kingdom the system has been adopted, and in London a single organization has started penny dinners in about 13 centres, and more are about to be added. School Boards have no power to expend money in the feeding of children; but I have the fullest confidence that voluntary effort will supply all that is needful.

MADAGASCAR — THE HOSTILITIES WITH FRANCE—PROTECTION TO BRITISH INTERESTS AND SUB- JECTS.

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any effectual measures have yet been taken to protect British subjects and British commerce in Madagascar, and to obtain reparation for the heavy losses inflicted upon British subjects by the French attack on that island?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : I have already on three previous occasions informed the House of the additions made to the Consular Staff in Madagascar with a view to the protection of British subjects and commerce. I have also stated, in reply to a similar Question of the hon. Member, that until the conclusion of hostilities it would be premature to enter upon the consideration of claims. If the hon. Member will refer to the Papers recently laid before Parliament (Africa, No. 6, page 39), he will see that the French Government undertake that a Commission shall hereafter be appointed to decide upon demands for compensation arising out of warlike operations in Madagascar.

TURKEY—THE TREATY OF BERLIN— THE STIPULATED REFORMS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any steps have recently been taken to press upon the Porte the reforms in European and Asiatic Turkey, as stipulated in the Treaty of Berlin; and, whether any Correspondence can be presented on the subject?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE : Constant representations have been made, but without success, to induce the Porte to introduce the promised reforms into Armenia, and I have already undertaken to lay further Papers on the subject. It will be considered in connection with these Papers whether information relating to the condition of the European Provinces of Turkey may not be laid at the same time. It was left to the discretion of Lord Dufferin to press for the execution of the reforms stipulated for under the 23rd Article of the Treaty of Berlin, but he was not able to do so with the prospect of any immediate result. The subject, will, however, be borne in mind in framing the instructions to Lord Dufferin's Successor.

NAVY—NAVAL PENSIONS.

MR. JOHN REDMOND asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is not the practice to pay to widows of deceased pensioners of the Navy any arrears of pension due at the time of their deaths; whether one quarter's pension was due to Michael Sullivan, pensioner Royal Navy at the date of his death last September; and, for what reason the authorities refuse to pay it to his widow?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY replied, that Naval pensioners were paid quarterly in advance, and that no arrears were due as suggested in the Question.

MINES REGULATION ACT—EXPLOSION AT POCHIN COLLIERY.

MR. BURT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has appointed, or will appoint, some competent person to represent the Home Office at the coroner's inquiry into the cause of the recent fatal explosion at Pochin Colliery, near Tredegar?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Yes, Sir, I shall certainly have a careful inquiry made into this matter; and I venture to point out with regard to the representations I have received against the measures proposed to be taken for greater precaution against shot-firing, that I received to-day from the Inspector of Mines a Report stating that, in his opinion, the explosion was due to shot-firing.

THE WEST INDIES—THE REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will state whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to give effect to all or any of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the West Indies?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No doubt, a considerable number of the recommendations of the Royal Commission will be adopted; but no definite answer can yet be given to the Question, as there are many matters still pending, such as confederation of the Islands and reciprocal tariff relations with the United States, which must be settled before a final determination can be arrived at.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF THOMAS BEHAN, A CONVICT, KILDARE CO.

MR. LEAHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Irish Government have received Resolutions from the Town Commissioners of Naas, Newbridge, and Athy, in the county of Kildare, expressing their firm belief of the innocence of Thomas Behan, convicted and sentenced to penal servitude for arson at Newbridge, in said county, and requesting the case to be further inquired into; and, if any steps will be taken to further investigate his case?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Upon receiving Notice of this Question yesterday, I referred it to Dublin for inquiry. There has not been time for the reply to come to hand.

MR. LEAHY: I will ask the Question again on Monday.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—PROSECUTIONS FOR AGRARIAN AND POLITICAL OFFENCES.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will supply to the House a Return giving the number of criminal prosecutions during the past four years, in Ireland, for agrarian and political offences; the number of convictions recorded; the number of cases in which approvers were employed by the Crown; and the number of instances in which convictions were secured either in part or wholly owing to the evidence of such approvers?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, in reply, said, he had no objection to give a Return of the criminal prosecutions during the past four years in Ireland for agrarian and political offences. It would, however, be a very tedious Return to prepare, involving much labour. He could not undertake to give a Return of the number of instances in which convictions were secured by the evidence of approvers.

NAVY—STATE OF THE NAVY.

Mr. W. H. SMITH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he can now inform the House when the statement of the Government as to the Naval defences of the Country will be made to the House?

Mr. GLADSTONE: I believe, Sir, that the Admiralty will be ready with the promised statement certainly on Tuesday, the 25th, probably on Monday, the 24th. I have not yet received a final answer on that subject; but perhaps Monday will be the better day.

Mr. W. H. SMITH: Is it the intention of the Government to propose a Supplementary Estimate, so as to afford the House an opportunity for discussion?

Mr. GLADSTONE: We will take care to find an opportunity for discussion; but Monday would be the preferable day, as the Government have the command of it without the interposition of any other question. (After consulting with Lord Richard Grosvenor, Mr. Gladstone proceeded.) I understand from my noble Friend, who has more recently heard from the First Lord, that Monday, the 24th, will do quite well. I cannot promise to bring forward a Supplementary Estimate.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM—LOAN DEPARTMENT.

Mr. COOPE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is aware that a remarkable and highly-valuable collection of old Wedgwood ware, at present exhibited at the Nottingham Castle Museum, was offered on loan to the authorities of the South Kensington Museum, and refused by them on the plea of "want of space;" whether at that time many of the cases in the Loan Department were filled, and still are so, with objects of little value or artistic merit; whether a collection of old specimen Sévres plates, formerly the property of the Director of that Royal Manufactory, was also similarly offered, firstly accepted, and then refused, and, whether the Government is prepared to take such steps as will prevent the recurrence of similar refusals?

Mr. MUNDELLA for Mr. GLADSTONE: I have inquired into both these cases of proffered loans, and find that neither of them are of recent date. Mr. Joseph's collection of Wedgwood ware was courteously declined in 1876 owing to the want of space which has been increasingly felt up to the present time. No communication has been received on the subject during the last eight years. The Sévres plates were offered on loan about five years ago, and the Department agreed to exhibit them; but before they were sent to South Kensington they were sold to the proprietor of a West End business, who offered to leave them on loan for six months only, whereupon the Department declined to receive them. Owing to the stoppage of building at South Kensington, there is great pressure upon the space at the command of the Museum authorities, and loans have constantly to be declined. In all cases great care is exercised that loans made with a view to subsequent sale are not accepted.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—REDISTRIBUTION.

Sir JOHN HAY asked whether the Prime Minister would give facilities for the discussion of the Motion on the redistribution of seats which stood on the Order Book as the second Order for Tuesday?

Mr. GLADSTONE: I hope, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman will not think me guilty of any discourtesy; but I am bound to say that I do not see the advantage, with reference to what we have all at heart—namely, the pacific and effectual progress of the Franchise Bill—of discussing a redistribution scheme at the present moment, unless it were a scheme supported by the authority of some large body of the House. I am afraid I cannot make that assumption with reference to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, because I believe he proposes it in his personal capacity. He now brings forward Resolutions. I do not think that a discussion at large on redistribution, so far as I am able to judge, would be beneficial or would advance us towards the settlement of the question.

Sir JOHN HAY gave Notice that, in consequence of what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, he should remove the Notice of Resolutions from the Order Book in order that the Bill, which stood for second reading on the 3rd December, might take its place.

CENTRAL ASIA—THE RUSSO-AFGHAN FRONTIER.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If his attention has been called to the disclosure of the contents of a Report upon the Central Asian frontier question in certain newspapers, and if he can state by whom the Report in question was made; if it was of a confidential character; and, what steps the Government propose to take to punish the offender?

MR. J. K. CROSS: I must ask the hon. Member for Carlisle not to press for any answer to his Question until the communications now passing between the Government of India and the Secretary of State are complete. A certain Memorandum has been made public purporting to have been written by the Quartermaster General of India; but I cannot go into the matter referred to in the Question.

INDIA—THE QUETTA-CANADAHAR RAILWAY.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, What progress has been made with the Quetta Railway; on how many miles the rails has been laid; on how many miles the formation has been prepared; what proportion of the necessary materials have been provided or are on the ground; and, when it is expected to be completed?

MR. J. K. CROSS: I wish to be allowed to correct an answer which I gave on the 27th of October in reply to a Question by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton Cross) concerning this railway. I stated that no permanent way having being laid above Nari, the opportunity for taking it up did not occur. I learn, on direct communication with the Government of India on the subject, that—“ Rails were laid one mile near Nari, 2½ miles near Gandakin, and 2½ near Koochali. The rails near Nari were removed on washing away of embankment, others to use for other purposes.”

These rails had been placed on detached portions of earthworks 15 and 22 miles from Nari. In reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir Henry Tyler), I am not able to give the definite information he asks for; but from a telegram received yesterday from the Government of India, I learn that the line may be completed in two years. The progress depends very much on the work in the tunnels; and I may add that some immediate delay may occur from an outbreak of cholera which has taken place at Nari.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was obliged to the hon. Gentleman for giving him Notice of this matter. He should like to know whether the statement interfered with the allegations made as to the rails being laid and the works in progress for 40 miles beyond Sibi?

MR. J. K. CROSS said, earthworks were in progress. He would read the following telegram, dated October 25, from the Viceroy—

“ Line practically complete, with temporary bridges, to foot of Bolan and Nari Gorge, distance in all of about 165 miles. Permanent bridges and ballastings in progress. For 30 miles from Nari Gorge into Hurnai Valley at Spintangi earthworks more or less finished; bridges not commenced, but girders at Sibi. From Spintangi to Quetta service road for country carts made for whole distance, except two miles through Chapari Rift.”

There was nothing in this about the permanent way.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—REPORTED DEATH OF GENERAL GORDON.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: There is a telegram in several evening papers of a disquieting character, in which it is stated that a telegram has been received through Reuter's Agency in Paris to this effect—

“ At a Cabinet Council, held this morning, M. Jules Ferry communicated despatches, from which it would appear that General Gordon has been shot dead while on the way from Khartoum to Berber.”

I wish to ask whether any news has been received by the Foreign Office in reference to this matter?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir; no such information has been received at the Foreign Office. The only information at all bearing on this subject that has been received by the Foreign Office is a telegram received yesterday, which I wish to read to the House. It is dated the 12th of November, and is from Sir Evelyn Baring to Lord Granville, in which the former says—

"The French Consul General has communicated to me information which he has received vid Massowah and Suakin to the effect that Khartoum has fallen and Gordon has been massacred. This is probably only the same rumour which reached us down the Nile Valley some time ago. It is almost inconceivable that if the news be true it should not be known at Dongola."

MR. BOURKE: Perhaps I may be allowed to put a Question which will allay anxiety with respect to General Gordon. Can the noble Lord state whether General Wolseley has sent despatches home during the last day or two with regard to the possibility of communicating with Khartoum?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not recollect that Lord Wolseley in any recent despatch has referred to the possibility or otherwise of communicating with Khartoum.

MR. O'KELLY: Has the Government communicated with General Wolseley in reference to this rumour?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: When the rumours were so prevalent a short time ago as to the fall of Khartoum and the death of General Gordon, Lord Wolseley was asked by Sir Evelyn Baring whether, in his opinion, there was any foundation for the reports. His reply was, I think, communicated to the House.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION (SUB-COMMISSIONERS)—MR. WALPOLE.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Justice O'Hagan, when replying to the Memorial for the removal of Sub-Commissioner Walpole, from the Cork Sub-Commission, had inquired into the specific charges of partizanship set forth in the Memorial, when he wrote—

"The Commissioners do not believe that any valid reason exists in the case of any of their Sub-Commissioners;" and, if so, what was the nature and result of his inquiries?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, that the Land Commissioners did not make any inquiry of the kind suggested in the Question; and as to Mr. Walpole, he could only say that an absolute contradiction had been given to the allegations.

MR. O'BRIEN: I beg to give Notice that, when the Vote for the salaries of the Land Commissioners comes up for consideration, I will draw attention to this serious and inexcusable neglect to inquire into grave and serious statements.

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS' (IRELAND)—THE COMMITTEE.

MR. PARNELL asked the Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether he would explain to the House the cause of the delay that had taken place in the summoning of the Labourers' Committee, in view of the fact that it was nearly a week since it was appointed?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER) said, he was very anxious to facilitate the matter; but he was not in a position to give any explanation.

MR. PARNELL: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman kindly say when the Committee will be summoned?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): If it rested with me there would not be any delay.

MR. PARNELL: In view of the very unsatisfactory reply given to the Question by the hon. and learned Gentleman, I will call attention to the unusual delay in this matter. I shall call attention to it on going into Committee of Supply to-morrow.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I will take steps so far as in me lies to have the Committee summoned for Monday.

MR. PARNELL: In making that statement, has the hon. and learned Gentleman considered the probability that on Monday this House will not be sitting, owing to the disposal of all Business necessary for it to transact?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I believe it will be sitting.

BOARD OF TRADE—SHIP INSURANCE (RETURN No. 258)—MR. MAC IVER, M.P., AND THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. MAC IVER: I ask the permission of the House in order that I may make a personal explanation. I am sorry that I do not see the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) in his place, gave public Notice of my intake this statement, and I had it would have been convenient ght hon. Gentleman to have

ent. If he were present, I t him, after the statement I am about to make, to withdraw, com-id unreservedly, the whole e said on Tuesday last in re-self. [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN here House.] As the right hon. man is now in his place, I will de the very few words I wish to to the House by a request to
hon. Gentleman to withdraw, the

com) stated in reference to myself on Tue-last; to omit entirely my name from the Return in which it has been inserted by the Board of Trade, in connection with the lost steamer Stromboli, which did not belong to me; and to recall altogether the Parliamentary Return No. 258, in which those names now appear. I shall also ask him to omit the name of the steamer Thessaly from any proposed further Return with reference to lost ships. It will be in the recollection of the House that the right hon. Gentleman stated, positively and repeatedly, that the steamer Thessaly was a constructive total loss. At that time I ventured to contradict the right hon. Gentleman; but I think that now I need do no more than read two telegrams from sources which will be entirely satisfactory to the right hon. Gentleman himself, and which will show to him, beyond any kind of question, that I was right. The first of these telegrams is from Mr. Richard Lowndes, the well-known average adjuster at Liverpool, who has been professionally concerned in connection with the Thessaly's accident of five years ago, and who knows all about the matter. He has sent the following telegram to me—

"Your statement was correct. The Thessaly was not a constructive total loss. The steamer was floated and proceeded to her destination, and was repaired there."

The next telegram which I have is from Glasgow, where the steamer was insured.
It is from Messrs. Bennett, Brown &
Co., the well-known insurance brokers there. They have forwarded this telegram to me this morning—

"You are quite right. The Thessaly was not a loss, and the Underwriters only paid for her repair."

I think I need not trouble the House

Mr. Mac Iver

further in regard to the Thessaly; but I submit that I have some right to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to withdraw unreservedly every word he has said about that vessel, in regard to which I have a further telegram announcing her safe arrival at St. Vincent on Saturday last.
Under these circumstances, I think I have a right to ask the right hon. Gentleman to recall and omit entirely my name from the Parliamentary Return No. 258, in which it is inserted, in connection with the lost steamer Stromboli, notwithstanding what I have said in this House.

Anyone who looks at page 6 will find my name inserted as a delegate, although the right hon. Gentleman knows that I was not a delegate, and that, as regards the Stromboli, I had nothing whatever to do with her for some four or five years previous to the disaster. I have only to thank the House for the kindness with which it has listened to me, and to call upon the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw absolutely and completely the whole of what he said.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I am sorry that I did not hear the opening remarks of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Mac Iver); but the fault rests with himself in not having given me Notice that he intended to raise the question. I understand that he complains of an answer which I gave to a Question put by him on Tuesday, which he says was inaccurrate and which he asks me to withdraw.
Now, I should like at once to say that I made a technical mistake in describing the Thessaly as a constructive total loss.
["Oh!"] I repeat that it was a technical mistake only, that I was misinformed in the description I gave of the Thessaly as a constructive total loss. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes; a technical mistake only. I was speaking, of course, from information which I had received, and I believe I was wrong in describing the Thessaly as a constructive total loss. That, however, does not affect the general question in the slightest degree. But, having said so much, I have no other word to withdraw from the statement which I made, and I cannot accept the invitation which has been made to me by the hon.
Member. The Thessaly was removed from the Register, and was described as a loss in a letter which the hon.
Member himself wrote to the Department, in which he stated that the vessel had been stranded, and had been removed from the Register in 1877. In these circumstances in my opinion, she was correctly described as a loss. It is perfectly true that after this very serious accident she was got off the rock upon which she had been wrecked, her crew having been provisionally removed from the wreck, and that, having been repaired, she is, no doubt, now in service. But that fact does not in the least degree alter the accuracy of the statement which I made. With regard to the Stromboli, I have only to repeat what I said yesterday. I do not understand that anything which the hon. Member has said has impeached the accuracy of my statement. I may add a little to the statement which I made the other night. On the second reading of the Merchant Shipping Bill, I stated that certain picked men in the shipping trade—50 in number—who had been selected as a deputation at a large meeting, and who must, therefore, be taken to be among the best and most honorable men in the trade, and against whose character not a word was to be said, had lost a considerable number of ships, and that attendant upon that loss there had been a considerable loss of life. It may be understood that I do not bring against a deputation against any of these gentlemen as owners of these vessels. I was only stating the extent of the losses, and I have no knowledge that any one of these cases of loss, any thing attached to the owner. I was only stating the fact to show that, where such a terrible loss took place in connection with the ships of the picked men of the trade, the trade as a whole had no right to pretend that it should be removed from consideration, and have no legislation applied to it, such as is applied to other and less favoured trades. That being so, my one wish is to have it understood that I do not know that any one of the gentlemen of the first shipowners of the country would have been glad to come place his name forward as any particular case made against him. In making that statement I was anxious to say it personal all round, and therefore I did not give the names of the gentlemen in question. I only gave the aggregate number. The names, however, were demanded, and I was compelled to furnish them in a Return which was moved for by the hon. Member for Sunderland Mr. Storey, and which I could not refuse to give. I had, in that Return, to show how I obtained the aggregate I had given. The name of the hon. Member's Mr. Mac Iver's brother, or some other relative—Mr. C. Mac Iver—appeared as the owner of the Stromboli, which was lost, and the hon. Member himself was at the meeting. Mr. C. Mac Iver was undoubtedly the owner of the ship; the Stromboli was undoubtedly lost; and, with the exception of having treated the Thetis as a constructive total loss, whereas she was a stranded vessel, I have nothing to withdraw, and I do not see what the hon. Member complains of.

MR. MAC IVER: I hope the House will extend its indulgence to me for a few minutes longer. I will say nothing more about the Thetis, because the telegrams which I have read to the House put that matter right; but I want to refer to the Stromboli, and to read a sentence from the Return to which I have alluded. I obtained this Return in the Vote Office to-day; and I quote from it these words:—

"SINCE Mr. Chamberlain's speech, inquiries have been continued in cases where any doubt existed, and the facts appear to be as follows:—The names of the delegates and Members of Parliament who attended the Chamber Street meeting, and who put their own names to the ships lost, are as follows:—

and so on. A list is given in the Return which purports to be the names of these delegates and Members of Parliament, and also a list of the ships and number of lives lost, and among the names of the delegates and Members of Parliament I find I have been included. In the House, I presume, will be borne in when I say that I did not attend the meeting as a delegate, unless being Member for Barking, which is a shipping constituency, and I constituted myself a delegate. I attended the meeting simply as a shipowner. If hon. Members will refer to the Return, they will see that on page 10, my name is mentioned in connection with the loss of the Stromboli. I cannot express in Parliamentary language what I think of the right hon. gentleman's statement with regard to the loss of the Stromboli in connection with which my name undoubtedly appears in this Return. The Stromboli did not belong to me. I have only one word more to say before I sit down. I because I gave public Notice of my intention to make this statement, and I had hoped that it would have been convenient for the right hon. Gentleman to have been present. If he were present, I should ask him, after the statement I am about to make, to withdraw, completely and unreservedly, the whole of what he said on Tuesday last in regard to myself. [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN here entered the House.] As the right hon. Gentleman is now in his place, I will conclude the very few words I wish to address to the House by a request to the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw, completely and unreservedly, all that he stated in reference to myself on Tuesday last; to omit entirely my name from the Return in which it has been inserted by the Board of Trade, in connection with the lost steamer Stromboli, which did not belong to me; and to recall altogether the Parliamentary Return No. 258, in which those names now appear. That being so, any one who finds his name mentioned in that list will know that it is included with those of the first shipowners of the country, and he has no right to complain, or to believe, that any personal accusation is made against him. In making that statement I was anxious to avoid personal allusions, and, therefore, I did not give the names of the 59 gentlemen in question. I only gave the aggregate number. The names, however, were demanded, and I was compelled to furnish them in a Return which

and so on. A list is given in the Return which purports to be the names of these delegates and Members of Parliament, and also a list of the ships and number of lives lost, and among the names of the delegates and Members of Parliament I find my own included. The House, I presume, will believe me when I say that I did not attend the meeting as a delegate, unless being Member for Birkenhead—a shipping constituency—would constitute me a delegate. I have only one word more to say before I sit down. I on the face of them. They are to make good certain deficiencies under various heads, for the financial year ending upon March 31st, 1885. When the Order for Committee of Supply is read, I shall, therefore, leave the Chair without Question put.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ARMY SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1884-5—MILITARY OPERATIONS IN EGYPT AND BECHUANALAND.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir Arthur Otway, I have not been able to form any opinion, beforehand, as to the character of the discussion which is likely to take place on the Supplementary Estimate for the Soudan Expedition, which I am about to move. I own that I cannot tell whether that discussion is likely to turn upon questions of a political character, or upon questions of a military character, or upon both. In those circumstances, I think it would be most convenient, as I and my hon. Friends on this Bench will have an opportunity, if necessary, of addressing the Committee again, that I should make a comparatively short statement in proposing the Vote, reserving for a future opportunity, should it be necessary, any explanations which may be subsequently required. Well, Sir, I think it is not necessary, for my purpose this evening, to go back further than the Vote of Credit of £300,000, which the House granted at the beginning of the month of August last. Instructions were immediately given to the General Officer commanding in Egypt upon the passing of that Vote of Credit, and those instructions will be found in Parliamentary Papers (Egypt), No. 35, at No. 18 of that Blue Book. The Committee will see that those instructions were given solely in the sense of preparation for the movement of troops to the Soudan, if it should become necessary, and that they did not cover any orders or any movements of troops of a hostile character. The Government were of opinion, at that time, that the conditions which they had on more than one occasion stated to the House as those only under which they would consider themselves entitled actually to send an Expedition to Khartoum were not entirely satisfied, and that the contingency had not arrived in which they were absolutely convinced that, adhering to those pledges, it would be necessary to send a force beyond the frontier of Egypt. But the instructions which were sent were of such a character that no time would be lost, if it should be at any subsequent time decided that such an Expedition should be despatched. Well, Sir, the instructions, as I have said, which were sent are contained in No. 18 of Blue Book 35. I ought, perhaps, very briefly to refer to what the principal instructions were. They included a certain increase of the Force of Her Majesty's troops in Egypt. They directed a concentration of troops at Wady Halfa, which was considered the extreme frontier of the Dominion of the Khedive. They directed that as many Nile steamers as was possible, and considered expedient, should at once, during the continuance of the high river, pass up the First and Second Cataracts. They also included that provision should be made for supplementing the means of local river transport, by the provision of boats to be made in England, and to be sent out to Egypt. They also included provision for a considerable number of stores in England, and the despatch of those stores to Egypt; and they further directed that arrangements should be made for collecting large quantities of stores at Wady Halfa, where the troops were to be concentrated. They also directed that arrangements should be made for a corps of Canadian boatmen, and a certain number of Kroomen from the West Coast of Africa—men who were considered to have great experience of the navigation of small craft of the description proposed to be sent out from England, either in rapid rivers or in rough water. They also included measures for putting the Egyptian railway, both from Cairo to Assouan, and also portions of the railway which pass some of the worst portions of the Cataracts, in a better state of repair, and the reorganization of a small amount of land transport, in addition to the water transport to which I have referred. I think the Committee will see that those instructions, although they did not contemplate any immediate actual movement of troops of a hostile character, were such as to provide for the undertaking of such a movement without incurring any more delay than if the actual orders for such a movement had been given at the time. One of the first questions which we had to decide, after obtaining the Vote of Credit from the House, was the choice of route to be adopted in the event of an Expedition being sent. The main reasons for the choice of the route selected—that of the Nile Valley—are also stated in the despatch to General Sir Frederick Stephenson, to which I have referred. The principal reasons which influenced the Government were these:—If the alternative route by Suakin to Berber had been adopted, it would have been inevitable that any advance of troops by that route would have been accompanied by severe fighting with the tribes with whom we had already been in collision, and with whom the Committee is aware we had no desire to find ourselves again in conflict, if the objects we had in view could be secured without resorting to such means. In addition to this, the movement of a considerable body of men from Suakin to Berber, in the face of a determined and fanatical enemy, whom there was every reason to think we should meet, would have been one of very considerable difficulty. No doubt, the force which Osman Digna had concentrated in the neighbourhood of Suakin might have been disposed of without considerable difficulty in the early spring of the year; but the most difficult portion of the march would have been the latter portion of it—across an almost absolutely waterless desert, which has never been traversed except by small bodies of troops at one time. That would have presented great difficulties to the passage of a large force; and at that time it was, and still is, a perfectly unknown quantity what might have been the amount and character of the force which would have to be encountered at the further destination of the march. The number of the enemy that might have been found in opposition to our troops in the neighbourhood of Berber was unknown; and if that number was considerable it would have been a matter of great difficulty to have brought up, simultaneously, a sufficient force to make it a safe operation to attack the force we might have found ourselves in conflict with. In addition to these circumstances, the expenditure which would have been incurred in providing for the advance from Suakin to Berber would have been, probably, much larger than the Committee is now asked to grant, or is likely to be asked to incur, in respect of the Nile route. For the reasons which I have stated any force despatched from Suakin to Berber must have been a force of considerable strength in order to meet any possible combinations likely to be met with at its destination at Berber.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Has the expense been estimated at all? The noble Marquess speaks with great confidence about the expense.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I cannot give the noble Lord details; but I will give him the reasons why we think it would have been a very heavy expense indeed. The force must have been, as I say, one of considerable size; the means of transport, and the means of keeping up communication for the whole of the force, must have been great. No doubt, the Suakin and Berber route had been used in past times by the Egyptian Government for the transport of small bodies of troops; but that was at a time when the country was in a quiet and peaceful state. But no attempt to transport a large body, simultaneously, across the desert has been made. I do not say that if it were a question of moving troops, in time of peace, from Egypt to Berber that the Suakin and Berber route might not be the most economical as well as the quickest; but, taken into consideration with the fact that we had decided upon moving a large force simultaneously across a desert of that description providing the force on march with the water necessary, not only for the men, but also for the animals accompanying it, the amount of land transport which would have been required would have been enormous. And when the noble Lord asks me for an estimate of the expense, I say it is almost impossible for me to furnish it, so great must have been the difficulty of providing the necessary quantity of transport animals and of stores needed for their maintenance. Before I leave Suakin I should like to say, for reasons previously stated, and also because it would be extremely imprudent to abandon an alternative route which it might be necessary in certain eventualities to make use of, that preparations for putting the Port of Suakin in a state to receive troops or stores have been continued, and are being continued at the present moment. The Marines and the Egyptian troops which have occupied that port have had an extremely arduous and severe time during the whole of the past summer, having been constantly attacked by the force under Osman Digna. It is only due to General Fremantle, the General Officer commanding there, to Major Chermiside, acting as Governor of the place and Political Officer—who has kept up the communications in the neighbourhood during the whole of the time—to say that the Marines, under the command of General Fremantle, and also the Egyptian troops, have acted in a manner which has called forth the highest approval of the officer commanding in Egypt, which the Government have recognized, and which I am sure the Committee will recognize also. Besides the objections to the Suakin and Berber route, it occurred to us that there are advantages of a positive character in favour of the Nile route. It was at that time necessary, independently of any advance in the Soudan, to take some measures to restrain a certain agitation which was beginning to exist in Upper Egypt, owing to the reports which we received of the advance and successes of the Mahdi, which might have caused a certain amount of excitement among the Natives, and which might have led to serious consequences. It would have been necessary, therefore, under any circumstances, to have advanced troops further up the Nile, and to have strengthened the position then held by our troops. At the same time, it appeared that an advance by the Nile might have the desirable effect of strengthening the position of the Mudir of Dongola, and enabling him to hold the town and Province of Dongola for the Egyptian Government, which might be a matter of great importance in the event of any further operations being undertaken in the direction of Khartoum. Up to that time very little had been known either as to the disposition and character of the Mudir of Dongola himself, or of the resources that he was able to command for the maintenance of his position. Major Kitchener at that time, however, had been in the neighbourhood of Dongola, and he sent full Reports to the Government as to the state of affairs there; and though the Government had previously entertained a totally different opinion, it appeared, at the time I am speaking of, that a demonstration of support to the Mudir might enable him—as it has enabled him, in fact—to maintain his position and to hold the town and Province of Dongola without any fear of attack from the Mahdi or any of his partizans. No doubt, the difficulties of the Nile route were very great. The Report of which I am speaking was a very elaborate as to the Nile, and the difficulties and character of its navigation. That Report, which was examined by the Military and Naval Authorities in Egypt and at home, led us to form the opinion that, considering the limited amount of the resources of river transport which existed on the Nile, it would be impossible to transport by those means only a sufficient force, certainly to reach Khartoum in the course of the present winter. There could be no doubt that it might be possible, relying on those resources only, to send a moderate force as far as Dongola. There was no reason to think, but, on the contrary, there was every reason to doubt, whether, relying on such means only, it would be possible to take even such a force beyond Dongola so as to be able to go beyond that point as far as Khartoum if necessary. Lord Wolseley, from the time that this came under the consideration of the Government, had entertained the idea that an advance by the Nile might be made to a great degree independently of the local means of transport, by the employment of boats to be constructed in this country and sent out to Egypt, of a character similar to those which he had himself employed on the small Expedition which took place some years ago in North America—an expedition known as the Red River Expedition. Well, I consulted various officers, besides Lord Wolseley, who had taken part in that Expedition with him. I placed before them all the Reports upon the River Nile, and on the means of transport which existed upon that river; and I endeavoured to obtain their opinion as to whether an advance up the Nile, relying, in a great degree, for the means of transport upon boats of this description, would be a practicable operation. The opinion which I obtained from those officers was so favourable as reasonably to satisfy me that the operation was one of a practicable nature.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT : Will the noble Marquess state who were the officers consulted ?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : The hon. and gallant Member must be perfectly aware that there were officers available who had taken part in the Red River Expedition with Lord Wolseley. There was not only Lord Wolseley himself, but there were General Buller, General McNeil, Colonel Alleyne, and Colonel Butler. These were the officers chiefly consulted on the subject. They had taken part in the Red River Expedition, and they were unanimously of opinion that the operation was a practicable and a feasible one.

MR. ONSLOW : I am sorry to interrupt the noble Marquess. He has given the names of the officers who recommended the Nile route. Will he also give the names of the officers who recommended the Suakin and Berber route ?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : I am stating, Sir, what were the reasons which induced me to think the Nile route practicable. I have not the least objection to state—and I shall have occasion to state if the hon. Member will not interrupt me—the opinions that were entertained on the subject by officers in Egypt. As I have stated, considerable doubts were expressed in Egypt as to the practicable character of the proposal to employ small boats of this description in the transport of the Expedition. Officers in Egypt, who had done everything that was in their power to meet our views, who had carried out with great energy all the instructions that had been given to them, and who, I do not feel the slightest doubt, would have carried out in the same way any further instructions that might have been sent to them, appeared, in our opinion, to entertain—probably from not being acquainted with the exact nature of the measures proposed to be taken—doubts as to ours being the best plan. It appeared to us that while they were prepared, with the resources at their command, to place a considerable force—perhaps a force larger than we considered at that time necessary—at Dongola, relying solely on the steamboats for means of transport, they had not formed in their own mind, and did not appear able to form, any definite plan of operations by which, in the event of the necessity occurring, that force, or any larger or smaller force, could be successfully transported beyond Dongola as far as Khartoum, should that be requisite. We thought, therefore, considering the difficulty of explaining by means of correspondence, and still more by means of telegraphic correspondence, the exact nature of the views entertained here, that it would be desirable, both in justice to the officers who had recommended this operation, and to the officers on the spot who felt a doubt as to the possibility of carrying it out, and also in the interest of the successful carrying out of the operation itself, that the responsibility for its execution ought to be placed in the hands of the officer who had been principally concerned in recommending it. Accordingly, without disparaging in the slightest degree either the ability, or the energy, or the goodwill of Sir Frederick Stephenson and his Staff, we thought it desirable that the responsibility of the Expedition should be confided to Lord Wolseley, who recommended it, and felt perfectly confident of success in carrying it out. Well, up to the time I am referring to, nothing had been done except the making of certain preparations. I was asked by an hon. Member the other day in the House at what time the actual decision was arrived at by the Government to send the Expedition. I gave the date of August 23 as the time when the first order was given for the movement of the troops beyond the Egyptian Frontier at Wady Halfa. The reason for that order being given will be found in Blue Book No. 35, to which I have already referred. The silence and uncertainty as to the position of General Gordon in Khartoum still continued; the time within which any operations for his relief could be undertaken was rapidly shortening; and it appeared to me desirable, in the uncertainty that prevailed relating to General Gordon's fate, that the actual advance of the troops to a position nearer to Khartoum than Wady Halfa had become necessary. It also appeared to Her Majesty's Government that the position of Dongola was menaced, and that the reports of the successes of the Mahdi at Berber and other places made it possible that the Mudir of Dongola might not be able to maintain his position there longer, unless he was supported by some active assistance from Egypt. The order was, therefore, given on August 23, as will be found in the Blue Book, to despatch, as soon as possible, Mounted Infantry from Wady Halfa to Dongola. That order was followed on the 26th by another directing the despatch, as soon as possible, after the Mounted Infantry, by any means available, of a battalion of Infantry from the same place. These troops are now in Dongola. One battalion of Infantry is there at this moment, together with 400 of the Mounted Infantry; and another company, which is now on its way, will be there in a day or two. Lord Wolseley has now determined, as soon as possible, to concentrate a force of about 2,000 men—or somewhat in excess of 2,000—at a place called Debbah, which is considerably higher up the river than Dongola; and he has given his opinion that if he should find that the attitude of the tribes is such as he has every reason to believe it is, and as he anticipates he will find it to be, it will be in his power to advance that force, or the greater portion of it, as a mounted force across the desert, to Khartoum, if necessary, in advance of any considerable movement of Infantry. In the opinion of Lord Wolseley, the Camel Corps, composed of drafts from a number of different regiments, will be particularly suitable for that operation, and in his opinion it may render the advance of any considerable force from Dongola unnecessary. In fact, one of the advantages the Government claim for the plan of operations which has been adopted is that it is, to a certain extent, an elastic one. It provides, in our opinion, the means of sending a considerable and a sufficient force, if it should be necessary, of somewhat between 5,000 and 6,000 men the whole distance by river, which, in the opinion of our military advisers, will be a sufficient amount of force to meet successfully and overcome any resistance that is at all likely to be offered. On the other hand, that very considerable operation might be converted, if circumstances prove favourable, into one of a much smaller character such as I have indicated—namely, the sending of a much smaller but sufficient force of Mounted Infantry, across the desert, which would accomplish the object in view with much greater rapidity, and render it possible that the rest of the troops would not be necessary. Without going into the details of the progress that has been made, I may say that the recent information which we have received, both publicly and privately, from Lord Wolseley tends to show that he has confidence in the soundness of the plan which he has adopted; and, in fact, he still holds the opinion that it would not have been possible, by any other means than that of the small boats sent out from this country, to have absolutely secured the possibility of making an advance to Khartoum with a sufficient force during the present winter. As to the object of the expedition, the instructions which were given to Lord Wolseley have been published in No. 35 of the Egyptian Papers, towards the end. The primary object of the expedition is, as it has always been, and was always meant to be, the relief of General Gordon. I wish that we could add that we have still any hope that it might also secure the relief of Colonel Stewart; but I fear, from the additional information which has been received since a Question was last asked in this House on this subject, that there is now very little hope that Colonel Stewart was not among the party which appears to have been treacherously murdered by an Arab sheikh near a place called Merawi.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Can the noble Marquess give the Committee any information with respect to Mr. Power?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: We have every reason to think that Mr. Power was also of that party. When the Question was asked in this House, I expressed the deep sense that the Government entertained of the gallantry with which Colonel Stewart had undertaken that expedition, and of the manner in which, as far as our intelligence enables us to judge, he seconded the efforts of General Gordon during their long imprisonment in Khartoum. But while the primary object of the expedition was the relief of General Gordon, Lord Wolseley has received full instructions which do not preclude him from taking any steps in his power to establish and leave behind him at Khartoum and in that district a settled form of Government. On the contrary, instructions have been given to him which entitle him to take such steps, if he should find that there are any practicable steps that can be taken in that direction. Thus, in fact, the two objects of his mission—the relief of General Gordon and of Khartoum, and the establishment of a settled form of Government in the district—are connected together. The facility of reaching Khartoum, and the possibility of relieving General Gordon, may depend very much, indeed, upon the arrangements which may be made beforehand for announcing to the people the establishment of some form of Government in the district after General Gordon shall have left. At the present time it is premature to anticipate what arrangements it may be in the power of Lord Wolseley to make. He is on the spot, and is, therefore, better able to form an opinion than we can as to what arrangements should be made. All I can do is to assure the Committee that this consideration is fully present to the mind of Lord Wolseley, and that he fully understands that the greatest possible triumph which he could achieve—a triumph very much greater than that of any victory he could gain, or any successful march he could accomplish—would be the making of such political arrangements as would enable the object of his mission, and of General Gordon's mission as well, to be successfully accomplished without the necessity of fighting at all. As to the amount of these Estimates, it is very true that we have very considerably—very greatly—exceeded in our preparations the Vote of £300,000 granted by Parliament in August last. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, in moving that Vote of Credit, did not pledge the Government to the expenditure of that exact sum; and he carefully refrained from saying that it was based upon any Estimates that were then produced for definite measures or definite preparations. What, in our opinion, that Vote of £300,000 did was to make it incumbent on the Government to make such preparations as, in our opinion, would enable us successfully to discharge our obligations to General Gordon, which we have repeatedly admitted we have incurred. Of course, the principal responsibility for the making of the preparations which were necessary, after the Vote of Credit was passed, has devolved upon me; and, undoubtedly, from the very beginning of the preparations, I have felt that responsibility. From the moment these preparations were taken in hand they were found to assume very considerably larger proportions than had been anticipated. But, as I said before, I feel that the expenditure on an expedition of this character is one which may be kept within certain limits, although I should not like to pledge myself to the exact sum now asked for as one that will absolutely cover the cost to be incurred in the present financial year. Still, I apprehend that it will represent, within reasonable limits, the demand likely to be made. We have endeavoured to avoid the almost incalculable military expenditure which would have been incurred if it had been necessary to make provision for a land transport in connection with an extensive expedition across the desert. The expenditure upon a river expedition, such as is now in progress, is to a very great extent initial. It consists principally in the provision of boats, and measures of the nature I have described. The employment of boats allows the expenditure to be incurred to be tolerably accurately ascertained within certain reasonable limits. What I wish to impress upon the Committee is that the Estimate is not likely to be exceeded. Although it professes only to provide for a period which falls within the present financial year, I do not think the Committee need be under any apprehension that they will be led into any totally unforeseen expenditure, such as was incurred, under circumstances somewhat similar, in the Expedition to Abyssinia some years ago. The main cause of that was the great cost of the enormous amount of land transport required. I believe that at one time, in order to move a force, which was not an excessively large one, to Magdala, it was necessary to employ for the purpose of transport a number of animals exceeding 50,000. When we take into consideration the weight of artillery, of ammunition, and of provisions which have to be carried in connection with a military expedition, it becomes a matter almost impossible of calculation to say what limit of expenditure may be reached. But, as I have said, we have every reason to hope that within reasonable limits we shall be able to confine our expenditure to the sum we now ask Parliament to grant. I am quite aware that when the matter is discussed by the Committee it may require further explanation. As it will be in our power to offer any explanation in reply to any questions that hon. Members may desire to put, I will not delay you further than by moving the Vote. I beg to move that a Supplementary Estimate of £1,000,000 be granted for the Expedition to Egypt.

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

COLONEL STANLEY: Of course, I do not rise for the purpose of debating this Vote, nor do I think there is any desire on the part of those sitting on this side of the House to offer any opposition to it. The noble Marquess, perhaps unconsciously, took rather an apologetic tone in reciting the dates on which certain steps for effective action in connection with this Expedition were taken. All I can say is that this House must be strangely altered if it, or any but a very small minority of it, would grudge the money required, or even double as much, if it were necessary, for the purpose of extricating from his perilous position the gallant man who has been shut up so long in Khartoum. The noble Marquess has stated that the Vote passed by the House in August last was preparatory. That, I think, has been understood all along. It was for the purpose of preparing for an increase in our force in Egypt, and it was to deal with what the noble Marquess, making use of a noticeable expression, described as an Expedition which was to go beyond the extreme limits of the Egyptian Dominions—namely, Wady Halfa. I understand, Sir, that there will be other opportunities of raising the question of the general policy of the Expedition, as far as the limited retention or evacuation of Khartoum is concerned; and as I do not intend to criticize in detail the arrangements made for the Expedition, it will not be necessary that I should trouble the Committee with more than a very few remarks. The concluding observations of the noble Marquess would seem to indicate that there will be other and, not unlikely, more than one opportunity of further discussing this and other questions on this subject, when the Expedition has been further advanced. It is clear that the noble Marquess looks upon the Estimate of £1,000,000, although it is the sum which appears in the present Estimate for the expenses of the present Expedition, as a hypothetical statement only of its probable cost, although he very properly guarded himself by expressing a reasonable hope that that sum would not be exceeded. With regard to the question of the two routes, there would be, perhaps, a little delicacy in examining that question very fully. Everyone who has read the Papers must do justice, which the noble Marquess himself did not fail to do, to the honourable manner in which General Sir Frederick Stephenson, although on the spot, although having apparently ample means of obtaining local information, and although clearly holding the view that another line would have been preferable, has, nevertheless, cordially accepted the position in which he has been temporarily placed, and has acted loyally, as no one who knew him would doubt, under Lord Wolseley, who has now, for the time being, superseded him. As regards Lord Wolseley's special qualifications for conducting an Expedition such as this, I think no one who knows his career will deny them. If he has fallen back upon the traditions of his earlier exploits, and has preferred the arrangement of ascending the Nile by boats, instead of taking that or a similar route by land transport, it must be admitted that his experience in former times fully justifies him in the very strong view which he appears to have taken all along in preferring that mode of conveying the troops over any other. As the noble Marquess has very truly remarked, transport, undoubtedly, has always been, and probably always will be, a weak part of our Service; and the difficulties are enormously increased in countries where, as in this case, the alternative would be to carry almost everything by animal transport. It is also the case, as the noble Marquess has said, that a large portion of the expenditure and of the difficulties, although formidable, may still be regarded as initial. I trust the anticipations of the noble Marquess may turn out to be correct, and that the general plan on which this Expedition has been started may prove successful in its outcome and in its fulfilment. The noble Marquess seems, however—I do not know if it is in consequence of any doubt in his own mind—to have suggested an alternative. So far as I understand the noble Marquess, it appears to be a question whether, after all, it may not be necessary to depart from the general lines of the Expedition, and to make a dash with a smaller number of men, in order to effect the object in view. I cannot help thinking that these observations are, to some extent, corroborated by some of the Papers issued with regard to Egypt in the inclosures in No. 35, particularly that dated 31st of July, in the last despatch of General Gordon to Sir Evelyn Baring. It is there clearly indicated that in a very short time from then the question of Khartoum would become a most urgent one. Everyone knows the gallant spirit with which General Gordon has met his difficulties; and, writing on the 31st of July, he says—

“River begins to fall, in, say, four months. Before that time you must either let the Sultan take back the Soudan, or send Zebehr with a subsidy yearly.”

It is, therefore, perfectly clear that General Gordon based his hopes upon one of two contingencies. He has no hesitation in saying that one or other of them cannot be postponed until a long date; and no one who knows him will doubt that his own efforts will be sustained as long as it is possible to continue them. I would point out the difficulty which is also indicated in General Gordon's letter—he clearly contemplates either that you must allow the Soudan to be handed back into what he calls the Sultan's hands, or it must be taken over by Zebehr, with a yearly subsidy. Perhaps these are matters which would be better dealt with at a more convenient opportunity, when we are less hampered by the actual details of the Vote before us, and when the larger questions which are not raised by the Vote itself may be more effectively dealt with. There is one point, however, upon which I desire to touch, and it is this—It is perfectly clear, from what the noble Marquess did not say and from the instructions given by the Government to Lord Wolseley in the Paper I have cited, that Her Majesty's Government have distinctly and definitely made up their mind to abandon all the garrisons South of Khartoum to whatever fate they may meet with. I think it will be an advantage to the Committee to know from the Government whether they have distinctly made up their minds, and whether they will refuse, under any circumstances, to afford these garrisons any assistance; whether, in fact, they will hold to that paragraph in their instructions to Lord Wolseley, in which they say—

“The position of the garrisons in Darfour, the Bahr-el-Gazelle, and Equatorial Provinces, renders it impossible that you should take any action which would facilitate their retreat without extending your operations far beyond the sphere which Her Majesty's Government is prepared to sanction. As regards the Sennaar garrison, Her Majesty's Government is not prepared to sanction the despatch of an expedition of British troops up the Blue Nile in order to insure its retreat.”

Now, where I want to get an answer from the noble Marquess on this point is partly in reference to an expression of General Gordon, in the same letter I have already cited of the 31st of July, and partly in reference to the answer the noble Marquess may give in respect of any future debate. It is perfectly clear, from his letter of July 31st, that General Gordon had no idea of abandoning any of the garrisons in the Soudan, of which he considered himself in charge. He clearly anticipated opening up the road to Sennaar, and he also clearly expected that the Equatorial and Bahr-el-Gazelle Provinces would be relieved later on. These appear to be the conditions on which alone he is himself prepared to abandon Khartoum. He says somewhat earlier in his letter—

“It is a sine quâ non that you send me Zebehr; otherwise my stay here is indefinite.”

And here it is that I want to ask upon this Vote, whether the noble Marquess is prepared to say that, under all circumstances, willing or not willing, General Gordon is to be relieved, and the Expedition is then to retire, having only communicated with General Gordon, or whether they are prepared to take a stronger course, and oblige him to give up that position which he holds, apparently, in his own view, in the interests of humanity and order? The noble Marquess told us that there were some hopes of the Expedition leaving something of the nature of a satisfactory Government behind it. It is perfectly clear that, in General Gordon's view, that is not a matter that could be dealt with, certainly not satisfactorily, in a very short space of time. There is a good deal of sarcasm in the final paragraph of his letter, in which he says—

"My sole desire is to restore the prestige of the Government in order to get out garrisons and to put some ephemeral Government in position in order to get away."

I think the Committee has a right to know, clearly, in what position the Government and Lord Wolseley stand with reference to this relief of Khartoum. I know I am touching upon delicate ground. If General Gordon had been holding only a military office in the service of the Sovereign, Lord Wolseley being the Commander-in-Chief of the Expedition, there could have been no doubt as to his position. But I want to know how far Her Majesty's Government have left operative, and how far they have cancelled, the previous commission given to General Gordon, at the instance of Her Majesty's Government, by the Khedive? Unless there are other instructions which cancel it, it will certainly raise a question of some delicacy, if not of doubt. As regards the principal details of this Expedition, all we can do is to express our cordial hope that it may not be, like too many other measures of Her Majesty's Government, however good in its conception, too late in its execution. We trust that the time may not be past when what they are aiming at is possible and can be effected. I gather from the language of the noble Marquess that although he has some sort of feeling that the Expedition may return during the winter, he is not sure that its return may not be protracted beyond that time. I think there would be a great feeling of relief—although, of course, I do not wish to press the noble Marquess for any military details which may be undesirable—but I think there would be a general feeling of relief if the noble Marquess were able to say that upon the calculations Lord Wolseley, his Staff, and the War Office officials have made, the Expedition, as far as it has gone, is fairly up to date; that it is at the place where it was expected to be at a given time, or as near as it may be. There is an impression, whether rightly or wrongly I know not, that, owing to the unaccountable delays and difficulties which have been interposed, the Expedition is not as far forward as it ought to be. I am not prepared to challenge this, for we have not, as far as I am aware, any positive statements on the subject resting on official documents since the Expedition was decided upon; but I trust the noble Marquess will endeavour, as far as possible, in any answer he may give later on in the evening, to remove the natural anxiety which is felt on that point. I do not think it necessary, myself, to prolong this discussion further. As the noble Marquess has admitted, the details of the Expedition comply more with Parliamentary Forms than afford any real basis for a discussion which would be of any practical good. I can only conclude, as I began, by expressing the hope, not only on behalf of one side of the House, but of every Party in the House, as well as of the country generally, that the Expedition, however halting may have been its conception, and however late it may have been commenced, will, nevertheless, meet with success in its main object—the relief of Khartoum, and the establishment, if possible, of something more than what General Gordon calls an ephemeral Government.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: The noble Marquess, in moving the Vote, said, he was in doubt whether it would be attacked on financial, political, or military grounds. I have no wish to attack it on military grounds. I have very little doubt that the Government have taken the best military advice in their power according to their lights. Nor have I any wish to attack it on financial grounds. I believe that if you go into these Expeditions you must go into them thoroughly; and if you go into them thoroughly you must spend a considerable amount of money upon them. The only criticism I will make upon the financial point is that, although Her Majesty's Government are only asking for £1,000,000 to-day, I am very much afraid that in the course of a few months they may come down to the House again and ask for more. But it is upon political grounds that I attack the Vote. I want to know why we are called upon to vote money for the Expedition at all; and I will quote the noble Marquess himself as the authority why we ought not to vote this money. The Committee will remember perfectly well the statement made to the House by the noble Marquess on the 3rd of April in this year, when he used these words—

“General Gordon left this country with a most distinct and clear understanding, repeated over and over again by himself, that the mission which he was going to undertake was one which he was prepared to undertake with such resources as he might find on the spot; and he distinctly understood that it was not a part of the policy of the Government in despatching that Expedition to risk having to send a fresh Expedition for the relief of Khartoum or any similar garrisons.”—(3 Hansard, [286] 1515.)

That was a distinct and straightforward statement of policy such as the noble Marquess always made when he had to deal with any question; and, therefore, I, for one, was intensely surprised when, a few months later, on the 5th of August, the noble Marquess and his Colleagues came down to the House and asked for £300,000 as a sort of preliminary promise that Her Majesty's Government might have the money if they felt themselves called upon to send out an Expedition. At that time they were not certain that an Expedition would be sent, but they got the money; and I, for one, felt certain that if they got it they would spend it. Now they come down to the House and ask for £1,000,000 more for this Expedition. What is the object? Why should we spend it? We are told that it is to get General Gordon away from Khartoum. I have no doubt, as the noble Marquess has said, that Colonel Stewart and his companions are already beyond the reach of aid; but I believe that General Gordon can get away from Khartoum whenever he likes. I have very little doubt in my own mind that he can get away if he pleases. What has he done since he went there? Let us go a little into this matter, because I want to discuss it solely upon political grounds. We were told in the Speech from the Throne, when we assembled last January, that General Gordon was sent—

“To report on the best means of giving effect to the resolution of the Khedive to withdraw from the Interior of the Soudan.”

The country, I believe, heard of that mission with great approbation, and even with enthusiasm, because it was believed that General Gordon was going out there to assist the Soudanese to get rid of the abominable and corrupt Egyptian Government who had for so many years oppressed them and ground them down. I went last year to a lecture at the Geographical Society in order to hear a great African traveller. I remember that he explained his experiences in the Soudan long ago, and he said that wherever the Egyptian Government held sway in the Soudan there they found misery, wretchedness, and oppression; but wherever the Soudanese people governed themselves there was comparative comfort. When I heard the noble Marquess talk about the possibility of General Gordon being able to establish a civilized form of Government at Khartoum I could not help thinking how much better it would be to leave them alone. As we understand, General Gordon merely went out on an errand of enfranchisement to set the people of the Soudan free from the corrupt influences of the Egyptian Government. He went to enfranchise the Soudanese just as Her Majesty's Government at home have been engaged in enfranchising the agricultural labourer; and he carried in his pocket a Firman from the Khedive announcing to all the chief Notables and people of the Soudan the evacuation of the country by the Egyptian troops, and informing them that in future the Soudan would be left to them, and to rulers to be appointed from among themselves. If I am not wrong—and I hope the noble Marquess will correct me if I am—General Gordon never published that Proclamation. As I understand, he had a Firman to that effect from the Khedive, giving liberty to these wretched people; but he never promulgated it among them. I do not know why, but I fancy the reason was that he was afraid to place in the hands of the Mahdi a weapon that would make him more popular with those who hated and detested the rulers under whom they had been living, and who regarded the Mahdi as the only exponent of the wretchedness and misery of the people, a man, also, who professed the same religion—because in that country religion and politics are united. General Gordon, having in his pocket that Proclamation telling the people of the Soudan that they were to be free, never took the trouble to publish it; and, instead of emancipating them, he has been busily engaged in shooting them ever since he has been there, and calling them rebels. Even Her Majesty's Government call the Soudanese rebels. I want to know who are they rebelling against? We sent Gordon there to declare that the Egyptian Government, so far as the Soudan was concerned, was at an end; and now we propose to shoot down the Soudanese because they are rebelling against the very Government we are going there to upset. It is a melancholy state of things to find a country like England engaged in such a work. What is the argument in favour of this Vote to-night? The only reason for it, as far as I can see, is that Gordon is a Christian hero, and therefore we are bound to go and rescue him. No doubt General Gordon is a most heroic man. As far as I know General Gordon's character, he is a man who is absolutely fearless; he has no fear of death, and no regard for money or for gain for himself. These are among the highest qualities any man can possess; but I do not think that the course pursued by General Gordon, heroic as it may have been, has been such as to make the people of that country very much in love with our Christianity, because General Gordon has been associated, in regard to the course he has taken, in the minds of the people of the Soudan, with the Egyptian Government, who are merely a set of men steeped in deceit, oppression, cruelty, and slaughter. That is the idea of Christianity which the people of that country must have had given to them by General Gordon's proceedings. I am afraid they must think that the Christianity of this country is very much a sham, and they must take the same view that Lord Wolseley did of all this fighting. I should like to quote to the Committee a passage which is very honestly put by Lord Wolseley himself in his Soldier's Hand Book. He says—

"As a nation we are bred up to feel it a disgrace to succeed by falsehood; we will keep hammering along with the conviction that honesty is the best policy, and that truth always wins in the long run. These pretty little sentences do well for a child's copy-book; but the man who acts upon them in war had better sheathe his sword for ever."

That is a very honest statement, indeed, and I hope will command the attention of my hon. and gallant Friend who is just going out of the House (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). I object to the money of the people of this country being expended, and very likely thousands of lives sacrificed, in going out nominally to rescue a man who I do not believe requires to be rescued, and who, as far as I understand, has disregarded the instructions with which he was sent out, and brought discredit on the country by the policy he has pursued. On that ground, when you, Sir Arthur Otway, put the Question from the Chair, whoever may support me, I shall say "No" to this Vote, and take a Division upon it. I wish that the Government would mend their ways upon this Egyptian Question. It is melancholy to see the amount of trouble the Government have got into, and all because they have deserted their own principles. As to the story of their going to Egypt for the sake of the Egyptians, nobody believes that tale. We went there for the sake of money, and nothing else, and that is the policy of the Tory Party. It was only to-day that I read, in the leading organ of the Tory Party, this statement about all this fighting—

"Trade follows the flag, and the flag follows the sword. This was the political gospel of Lord Beaconsfield."

It is also the political gospel of my hon. and gallant Friend who is to get up after me. ["No!"] I, for one, certainly think that it is, and it appears to me that it is a gospel of selfishness, a gospel of cruelty, and a gospel I am sorry to see Her Majesty's Government prepared to follow out. The Liberal Government should set their face against this; not follow the example of their opponents, but return to the righteous course.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELLOT said, on rising to make a few remarks upon this important Vote, he would express regret at not seeing in his place the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, who, however, he expected would not be long absent. There could be no doubt that the greatest interest existed in the country with regard to the fate of General Gordon; nor could there be a doubt that for a considerable time past it had been felt that the tenure by General Gordon of Khartoum had been a most precarious one, even if it still existed; and it had been the belief generally adopted by the large majority of his fellow-countrymen that no effort ought to be spared by Her Majesty's Government to effect General Gordon's relief. It had also been hoped that that gallant man, Colonel Stewart, might have been relieved; but, as had happened so often before, and had happened, he feared, again, the Government had been too late to save a valuable English life. Were they too late now to save the life of General Gordon? He would venture to say that when this question came to be understood and discussed throughout the country, should Khartoum have fallen, and should General Gordon's life have been sacrificed, the Government would be called upon to state their reasons—and those reasons would have to be clear—why they had not taken the proper steps and precautions for preventing that calamity. He believed that the gravest mistake—the gravest mistake in the interests of this country, in the interests of Egypt, and in respect of that pledge which they had given to Egypt was made, when the Government refused—positively declined—to send a force, under General Graham, from Suakin to Berber, which might have led to the relief of Khartoum. What had happened? On the 15th of May his hon. Friend the Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) asked the Secretary of State for War—

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

“Whether General Gordon was informed of the intended withdrawal of General Graham's force from Suakin to Cairo, and his opinion asked as to its expediency; and, if so, what answer General Gordon returned; and, whether General Graham was asked if an expedition to Berber was feasible in March, and, if so, what was his reply?”

To that Question the noble Marquess answered that he did not think they would have been justified in asking General Graham's opinion, seeing that General Stephenson had not thought fit to sanction the march. Now that the noble Marquess had again taken his place, he would ask what was General Stephenson's opinion, and upon what authority did the noble Marquess go when he made the reply just referred to? It was very important that the Committee should be reminded at that point what the opinions of General Stephenson and Sir Evelyn Baring were. In the first place, it was true that on the 5th of March General Stephenson held a different opinion to that which he afterwards held; it was an opinion totally different from that which he subsequently gave through Sir Evelyn Baring, after he knew the whole of the circumstances of the case. The noble Marquess had just said that Lord Wolseley was much better able to judge of his position than he (the Marquess of Hartington) could be at home; and he would like to ask him how it was that General Graham was not in a better position to judge of the circumstances of the case and of the friendly tribes in the neighbourhood of Suakin than the noble Marquess, who was at the time sitting in Downing Street? Now, on the 5th of March, General Stephenson telegraphed from Cairo (Egypt, No. 12, 1884, Despatch No. 212) to the Secretary of State for War, as follows:—

“Graham telegraphs suggesting that Gordon Pasha be asked if he would recommend force under Graham operating on line Suakin-Berber; if so, how far would he be prepared to co-operate? Baring tells me that Gordon attaches importance to this route being opened. Baring has asked Gordon to what extent Hassan Khalifa could co-operate from Berber. I am not prepared to recommend Graham's force marching to Berber, owing to scarcity of water on road. I strongly recommend that Graham be instructed to attack Osman Digna without delay, now supposed to be 10 miles from Suakin.”

That was on the 5th of March, and on the 6th of March the Marquess of Hartington telegraphed as follows to Major General Sir Gerald Graham—

“Yours 5th forwarded by General Stephenson. Operations at considerable distance from Suakin not to be undertaken.”

But in the same Blue Book there was an extract from a telegram from Sir Evelyn Baring to Earl Granville, received on the 16th of March, which said—

“It has now become of the utmost importance not only to open the road between Suakin and Berber, but to come to terms with the tribes between Berber and Khartoum.”

That was the first answer; what did the second answer from Sir Evelyn Baring to Earl Granville say? (Despatch No. 301, received by telegraph, March 24)—

“I believe that the success gained by General Graham in the neighbourhood of Suakin will result in the opening of the road to Berber; but I should not think that any action he can take at or near Suakin would exert much influence over the tribes between Berber and Khartoum. Unless any unforeseen circumstances should occur to change the situation, only two solutions appear to be possible. The first is to trust General Gordon's being able to maintain himself at Khartoum till the autumn, when, by reason of the greater quantity of water, it would be less difficult to conduct operations on the Suakin-Berber road than it is at present. This he might perhaps be able to do, but it, of course, involves running a great risk. The only other plan is to send a portion of General Graham's Army to Berber, with instructions to open up communication with Khar-toum. There would be very great difficulty in getting to Berber; but if the road were once open, it might be done by sending small detachments at a time. General Gordon is evidently expecting help from Suakin, and he has ordered messengers to be sent along the road from Berber to ascertain whether any English force is advancing. Under present circumstances, I think that an effort should be made to help General Gordon from Suakin, if it is at all a possible military operation. General Stephenson and Sir Evelyn Wood, whilst admitting the very great risk to the health of the troops, besides the extraordinary military risks, are of opinion that the undertaking is possible. They think that General Graham should be further consulted."

Next in order of time came that Question of his hon. Friend the Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) to which he had referred; and he would be glad to know on what plea the noble Marquess rested the answer which he gave to it at the time, when he knew that General Stephenson and Sir Evelyn Wood did think it possible for General Graham to march from Suakin to Berber, and that General Stephenson recommended him to apply for information to the only man who could give information on the subject? What did the noble Marquess do? He declined to apply to General Graham, and that, in his judgment, showed that the Government had predetermined that there should be no advance from Suakin to Berber. He believed that the noble Marquess must have known, and did know, that this was the only reliable chance of relieving General Gordon. Would the noble Marquess give an answer now to the Question asked by the hon. Member for Eye with regard to the proposal of General Graham? General Graham had made two proposals, after the battle of Tamanieb, to the noble Marquess. In his Despatch (No. 272) he telegraphed thus to the Secretary of State for War—

"The present position of affairs is that two heavy blows have been dealt at rebels and followers of the Mahdi, who are profoundly discouraged. They say, however, that English troops can do no more; must re-embark and leave the country to them; to follow up these victories and bring waverers to our side we should not proclaim our intention of leaving;

but rather make a demonstration of an advance towards Berber, and induce a belief that we can march anywhere we please. I propose, therefore, making as great a show as possible without harassing troops, as Medical Officers report they require rest. A strong battalion, with regiment of Cavalry, advances to-morrow to Handuk, and from thence a reconnaissance will be made along the Berber road; this road, Suakin-Berber, passes through country occupied by various tribes from Suakin; Handuk, Otas, and Sibil are the Fadlab, whose Sheikh, Mohammed Ali Bey, is friendly, but has given no active support hitherto. He undertakes to accompany the troops in their advance to-morrow, and may be useful. He was formerly the vekil, or agent, of Sheikh Hamad Mahmoud, of Mousiah tribe, the Khalifa or Governor of the road, and conducted all bargains with camel drivers. The road from Sibil to Aariab lies in country of Amrar tribes. Their head Sheikh, Hamad Mahmoud, just mentioned, is with rebels through the greater part. The sub-tribes of Amrar are still loyal. From Aariab to Berber the road lies in country of Bishareen, and must be dealt with from Berber. Reports of pilgrims state that an Egyptian garrison holds Obak; desirable to obtain from Berber attitude of Bishareen, and how far road is open. Gordon should communicate to you for my information; he can find out as to road and tribes, and should endeavour to open road and send people across."

That was General Graham's first proposal, and the second was very like it. It would be found in his despatch to the noble Marquess (No. 277), dated Suakin, March 18, which ran thus—

"Gordon Highlanders, with 19th Hussars and Mounted Infantry, have marched to Handuk, and are now in telegraphic communication. The force is under General Stewart, accompanied by the Sheikh of Fadlab tribe; Osman Digna is reported at Tamanieb with 2,500 followers, many of whom are reported as wavering, and to have sent to friends in Fadlab tribe, who have advised them to come to Handuk for protection from Osman. Stewart has instructions to conciliate and work with friendly Sheikh; also to reconnoitre and report. An advance to Sibil, 50 miles on Berber road, could be made with 2,000 men; 300 more camels would, however, be required, and preparations would take five days. Troops very healthy."

Now, he said, that after such statements as these it was perfectly possible for the noble Marquess to have ordered an advance upon Berber from Suakin. Had that advance taken place, Berber would not have fallen, because, as hon. Members knew, the Mudir of Berber was prepared to march out some 50 or more miles to meet the advancing force which General Gordon thought was coming; so that the march over that part of the road without water would have been accomplished by Egyptian troops from Berber. The noble Marquess knew all that; but the Government were determined to do nothing, nor would they have done anything since but for the outcry of the people of this country, who demanded that, at any cost, Gordon should be relieved. Then he would ask whether it would not have been wise and prudent to have consulted so distinguished a man as General Sir Gerald Graham, as to what he considered to be the best and wisest course? The noble Marquess had stated that he did not want to have another action. But was he more likely or not to have another action, having left Osman Digna and his force unbroken and undispersed, during the whole summer and autumn, in the neighbourhood of Suakin? Had General Graham's march to Berber taken place, that force would never have collected again. Had General Graham been consulted and that march sanctioned, he was convinced that General Graham would have done his duty successfully. The noble Marquess seemed to think that some point of etiquette would have been involved in consulting a junior General. But if it were wise to send a junior General to Suakin at all, surely it would have been wise to have consulted him when he was there. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) believed that General Graham would have been prepared, at the most reasonable cost, not only to have placed outposts, but to have maintained and opened the road to Berber, which would have remained the trade route of that part of the country. Was it a light thing that a road of that kind should be abandoned? The noble Marquess knew that it was not, and he knew that there was a possibility of their having to advance from time to time further from Suakin. The Government were going to improve the harbour at Suakin; and, if he was not mistaken, a large quantity of rails had been landed there; and the idea was floating in their minds to have a railway between Suakin and Berber; but, although nothing would tend more to civilize the country, they would probably not go to the expense until it was too late for the railway to be of any use. [A laugh.] The noble Marquess laughed; but if he were on the spot, he would find it desirable to have that railway constructed in the interest of Egypt, which, he said, the Government had so much at heart. To judge by the way in which they had acted, it did not seem that they had that interest at heart very strongly, notwithstanding their declarations. He repeated that nothing would be more beneficial, especially for protection, to Egypt, than a railway between Suakin and Berber. But the Government had done absolutely nothing up to the time at which they came down for a Vote of Credit—that was to say, just before the end of the last Session. The noble Marquess had very good-naturedly said to him at the time, in reply to a Question—"You have now got your answer, and I hope you are satisfied with it." It was satisfactory then. But the £300,000 asked for by the Government was but as a drop in the ocean, if they were going to do what they now professed. He undertook to say that Khartoum would have been relieved by General Graham at a very small cost, whereas now the expense would be simply enormous, and time alone would show whether the Expedition would succeed. But this the Government knew—that they had embarked on a most difficult and dangerous operation, even if the force under General Lord Wolseley was not attacked. He would not pretend to say what was the chance of that; but supposing it was attacked, and suffered a reverse, on what were they going to fall back? Let the Committee consider the distance of their base from Khartoum, and judge what the consequences of a reverse would be. He ventured to believe that the Government had taken this step out of consideration to public opinion; not because they wished to take it, for they had stated that it was not their view or wish that General Gordon should be relieved, but that he should escape from Khartoum in the best way he could. General Gordon, a man who had always shown and proved himself to be most tenacious of the honour of his country, had been sent out for the purpose of relieving the garrisons in the Soudan; but they were now told that the instructions of Lord Wolseley were that those garrisons were to be sacrificed, an abandonment which, if it took place, would constitute an indelible disgrace to the country. Whenever General Gordon asked for help or relief, when he said he was suffering and unable to hold out, no notice was taken of his appeal. God grant that the Expedition might not be too late! But he was afraid that the question was one on which there was room for much doubt. The noble Marquess had not said one word as to what the Government intended to do in the event of Khartoum having fallen. That was a question of considerable interest, and one on which he and his hon. Friends would like to have some information. Did they mean to allow the Mahdi to take possession of Khartoum, and was slavery to be allowed to continue in the Soudan, as it had done in years gone by? It was the Government who, by proclaiming, in season and out of season, that they were going to abandon the Soudan, had been the destruction of the country. Never had a more reckless course been taken by any Government than this declaration of the abandonment of the Soudan before the garrisons had been withdrawn in safety; and he believed that if it culminated in the fall of Khartoum, and the destruction of General Gordon, no censure had ever fallen on a Government heavier than that which he hoped the people of the country would pass on those who had been the cause of that calamity. Did the Government mean to hand over the whole of the Soudan to the Mahdi? If that were so, Egypt would be left open at any moment to the attacks of those hordes which would come down upon her from the Soudan, a condition of affairs that would be as dangerous to the country as it would be disgraceful to the Government. But he believed the people would speak out on this question. They were watching with the greatest anxiety what the Government were now doing in Egypt, when, up to the present, they had done nothing but upset all that was good without substituting anything in its place. It was high time that there should be no longer two masters in Egypt; nor could the country be properly governed by dummies directed from Downing Street. Her Majesty's Government must assume the responsibility which events had cast upon them, disguise it as they might; and, having assumed it, they would be bound to take care that order reigned in Egypt, although we might be kept there for many years to come.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that not being a military genius, ready at a moment to explain how the campaign ought to be conducted or not in Central Africa, he should not intrude his views upon the Committee as to whether they ought to have gone to Khartoum by Suakin or by the Nile, because he objected to their going there at all. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken asked the Government what it was they intended to do if the Expedition were too late to save General Gordon. But was not the hon. and gallant Gentleman aware that an answer had been given to that again and again? Had not the Prime Minister told them a long time ago that the sole object in the Soudan was to "rescue and retire?" They were to rescue the garrisons and General Gordon, after which they were to retire without mixing themselves up with the internal affairs of the country. When the noble Marquess, the Secretary of State for War was introducing this Estimate, he had said something about establishing a settled form of Government in the Soudan. That, he would point out, was a scheme entirely novel, and also contrary to the pledges given to the House when the preliminary Vote of £300,000 was asked for. It was then understood that the leader of the Expedition would solely and simply endeavour to bring back with him General Gordon, and, if possible, the garrisons; but there was not one word said about establishing any form of settled Government in the Soudan. If the noble Marquess simply meant that if Lord Wolseley reached Khartoum, he was, in order to prevent the disorganization of all society there, to gather together some of the notabilities of the town, he should be glad to hear that that was so; but if he meant that they were going to establish some settled form of Government in the Soudan, that would be a very different business to what was understood by the House as being in view when the money was voted last Session. Had General Wolseley never communicated with the Mahdi? There was no doubt that many communications had taken place between that personage and the Mudir of Dongola; they had French Ministers as well as merchants receiving despatches every day of what was taking place at Khartoum; and yet it seemed that no efforts were made to convey to the Mahdi, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, that if he would only allow General Gordon and the garrison at Khartoum to retire they would have nothing more

to do with the Soudan. He had asked the question several times in the House already, but had never been able to get a reply as to whether they had entered into any communication with the Mahdi. They knew very little about what was going on at Khartoum. All they knew was that General Gordon was in a position of great and exceptional difficulty. It was almost impossible to criticize General Gordon's actions; but, at the same time, it was well to bear in mind the report which was published the other day by Colonel Duncan as to the passage through Assouan of persons leaving the Soudan. In that report it was stated that men, women, and children—the wives, children, and servants of the different employers—were leaving the country; and then Colonel Duncan went on to say it would be remarked that there were exceedingly few soldiers passing through the town. The reason of that was that General Gordon, who was sent out to relieve the garrisons—to get the garrison out of Khartoum—had called in all the troops in the neighbourhood, and had told them that they must not leave, but must rally at Khartoum. He (Mr. Labouchere) only mentioned these facts because it was desirable that they should be borne in mind. They heard the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) talk about a settled Government in Khartoum. He (Mr. Labouchere) did not think any of the hon. Gentlemen with whom he usually acted desired that if Lord Wolseley was able to get the garrison away from Khartoum the gallant General should delay one moment, or spend any British blood or money in order to establish a settled Government in Khartoum, or the Soudan, or to wage war against the Mahdi. He intended to follow into the Lobby his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). He quite admitted that if an Expedition was sent out it must be paid for. He remembered that last Session the Prime Minister said he asked for a small preliminary Vote as a matter of principle. He (Mr. Labouchere) understood that by assenting to that small preliminary Vote the House assented to the proposal to send out an Expedition. But why should they pay for it at all? Why not Egypt pay for it, or, rather, the Egyptian bondholders? It was admitted that the Soudan was execrably governed by

Egypt. The Egyptian Government sent out, against our wish, Hicks Pasha to bring the Soudan once more under the control of Egypt. At the time we protested against Hicks Pasha being sent out. Hicks Pasha, however, went to the Soudan, and he might have withdrawn with the Egyptian garrisons; but he tried to re-establish the Egyptian Government there, and the consequence was that he and his army were destroyed. The garrisons remained in the country, and the Egyptians could not do anything to relieve them. It appeared the Egyptians were not very great men at fighting, and so they asked us to aid them. We sent General Gordon to aid them; but when General Gordon arrived in Cairo he accepted the post under the Khedive of Governor of the Soudan. The position, therefore, of General Gordon was that of Representative of the Khedive at Khartoum. Although we were, perhaps, right in sending men out to rescue General Gordon because we were, to a certain extent, responsible, yet it was obvious that it was the Egyptian Government who ought to pay, and not we, the cost of the Expedition to get the Egyptian garrisons and General Gordon, who was the Egyptian Governor of the Soudan, out of the country. It was said that Egypt could not pay her debts. No illusion was greater than that. For centuries Egypt had been the great granary of Europe, and it was possible for Egypt to pay the cost of its administration, and have a surplus for such an Expedition as the present. It was well known why Egypt could not now pay its debts. The reason was to be found in the fact that the greater portion of the Revenue of the country was diverted for the benefit of the bondholders. The Revenues of the country were mortgaged to the bondholders; and, therefore, the bondholders should pay for the defence of the country. He was entirely opposed to the Expedition; but he especially supported his hon. Friend (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) that night, upon the ground that they ought to call upon Egypt to pay the expenses. They might make an advance of money if necessary; but then they ought to put it down as a debt owing by Egypt to us. He could well understand an advance being made; but he could not understand why, whenever a question of this sort arose, no matter what Government was in power, it was always said—"Oh! let the British taxpayer pay." There were many people in England who wanted money, and to whom money would be of the greatest benefit. The Irish wanted money; the shipping trade was in distress; indeed, there were hundreds of ways in which, if they had got these millions to throw away, they could expend them with far more benefit to the country than in expending them in the Soudan, expending them not even for the benefit of the Soudan or Egypt, but for the benefit of the Egyptian bondholders, who were simply usurers, and who, if he had his way, would not get 1s. interest for the money they had advanced.

Mr. GREGORY shared the regret which had been expressed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) that the Government did not take advantage of the operations against Osman Digna to relieve Khartoum by the Suakin and Berber route; and, speaking with great diffidence to military authorities, he thought it would have been better if the Suakin-Berber route had been adopted for the present Expedition. From something which fell from the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington), he could not help thinking that the question of expense had entered a little more than it ought to have done into the consideration of this matter. He trusted that that was not the case, because he felt that the principal object of the Expedition was the relief of General Gordon. It was all very well to say it was desirable to communicate with Dongola, and with the tribes along the course of the Nile; but the principal and main object which they ought always to have had before them in undertaking the Expedition was the release of General Gordon from the difficult position in which he was placed. Again, there was another matter which ought to have entered into their consideration, and that was the establishment of a permanent Government at Khartoum. He held that it was impossible to maintain a permanent Government there unless communication were kept up between it and civilization, and he did not see that by taking the route up the Nile they had opened up that connection in any degree. He believed that if they had taken the Suakin and Berber route they would have opened a new line of communication, or made practicable the old line of communication, by which constant intercourse could have been maintained with Khartoum and the Soudan. He feared that in consequence of the route Lord Wolseley had taken it would be impossible for them to establish a permanent Government at Khartoum, and thus bring about a better state of things.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that as his views on this subject were generally in accord with those of his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), he need not repeat what the hon. Baronet had said, and said with much greater force than he (Sir George Campbell) could. At the same time, he did not think that it would be worth while to divide on the Vote. He and his hon. Friend might take this salve to their consciences—that they had throughout protested against the policy which had made this Vote necessary. It was to be remembered that in the summer the Prime Minister proposed a Vote of £300,000 for the Expedition to Khartoum. The right hon. Gentleman called it a Vote of principle; and he avowed that the Vote was meant to commit the House and the country to the Expedition. He (Sir George Campbell) dissented from the Vote, because he believed it amounted to a sanction of what he believed would be a long bill. Still, he felt that the House and the country was committed to the matter, and that he and his hon. Friend had done their duty by protesting against the proposed expenditure. He did not like the tone of the speech of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington). The noble Marquess was very straightforward and honest; he could not bring himself to tell them that the Vote now proposed would be sufficient for the Expedition. He (Sir George Campbell) considered that the Government were bound to do their utmost to face clearly the expenditure and risks they were now incurring. The noble Marquess had very fairly told the Committee that they might have to pay more; but the Government ought at the present moment to place before the country an Estimate of the expenditure which would in all probability be incurred. He thoroughly believed that the noble Marquess was a prudent administrator, and that Lord

Wolseley was a skilful and economical General, and that this Expedition would not be characterized by the enormous wasteful expenditure as characterized the Expedition to Abyssinia. At the same time, he could hardly credit that this great Expedition into the heart of Africa would be carried out for the expenditure now before the Committee—namely, £1,600,000 in all. If in the ordinary course of the Expedition the present Estimate were to be greatly exceeded, considerable blame would attach to Her Majesty's Government for not putting the thing fully before the country. He confessed that the present Estimate appeared to him to be exceedingly low. Although he had great confidence in the noble Marquess at the head of the War Department, he had great misgivings, especially after the expressions which fell from the noble Marquess himself, that the Estimate would be exceeded. He was also anxious to know how the money was to be raised. He was aware that the country was occupied upon other matters, and that it did not pay much attention to this question; and as long as it was a question of voting the money and borrowing it from the Money Market, the country would not pay very much attention to it. They were bound, however, when they did undertake Expeditions, to pay for them out of their own pockets; and if another 2*d.* in the pound was to be added to the Income Tax the country would soon become alive to the importance of the Expedition and the risks they were undertaking. He thought very great credit was due to the Government for the courage they had displayed in resisting the attempts made by the Opposition to induce them to send an Expedition into the heart of Africa at the hottest and most unfavourable time of the year. [Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: No, no!] The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) and his hon. Friends were at one time continually urging the Government to send an Expedition to Berber at the beginning of the hot weather; and he maintained that Her Majesty's Government showed great courage in resisting the pressure put upon them to send out such an Expedition. If an Expedition had been sent out as hon. Gentlemen opposite desired the sacrifice of life amongst Her Majesty's troops must have been enormous. General Gordon had been able, up to the present—throughout the hot weather—to maintain himself at Khartoum, and had not yet been captured. In his opinion, Her Majesty's Government had been extremely prudent in the instructions they had given to General Wolseley, for they had limited his Expedition as far as possible. He thought the Government were right in saying distinctly that General Wolseley should not go beyond Khartoum to relieve any garrisons there might be there. He (Sir George Campbell) protested against the things said by hon. Gentlemen opposite when they talked about sacrificing these garrisons. They talked as if the garrisons must necessarily be massacred. There was no reason to suppose that they would be massacred. There was no reason to suppose that the Mahdi would not receive them with open arms, as he had done other garrisons. He (Sir George Campbell) sincerely hoped they would, somehow or other, find their way to their own country; and, if necessary, he should be glad to contribute towards their ransom. He did not think, however, there was the smallest reason to assume they would be massacred if they showed a disposition, as others had done, to join the Mahdi. But when General Wolseley got to Khartoum Her Majesty's Government must make up their minds what was to be done with the place. If they could not find a capable Government at Khartoum they must make up their minds to pack up their baggage and come away. If it should happen that Khartoum was left without a settled Government they might regret it, but they could not help it; it was not their business to govern Khartoum. As regarded General Gordon himself, he (Sir George Campbell) could hardly imagine that General Gordon, a British officer, holding Her Majesty's commission, would refuse to leave Khartoum. If he did he must resign Her Majesty's commission, and then they would be no longer responsible for him. If he was in a fit state to exercise his own judgment, and desired to stay at Khartoum, his wish ought to be gratified, but upon such terms that they would be free from all responsibility as regarded him. He (Sir George Campbell) trusted that Her Majesty's Government would adhere firmly to the instructions they had given to Lord Wolseley, and that as they had undertaken it they would bring the Expedition to an end as speedily and as cheaply as possible.

Mr. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, he did not think that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had recommended a very English, or noble, or honourable policy. Now, the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) stated what most Members of the Committee could entirely agree with. The hon. Baronet told them that his great wish was that the Government should mend their ways and stick to their principles. But it had occurred to him (Mr. Stanley Leighton) to ask himself what were the principles of the Government? Not the principles, surely, of his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), for his hon. Friend severely criticized them. Unfortunately, no one knew what the principles of the Government were. This Expedition was the latest, but he was afraid it was not the last Expedition which would go from this country to Egypt. It certainly seemed to him that the Committee ought to extract from the Government certain guarantees before it allowed a Vote to pass which would add another to the millions of pounds which had been spent by this Government on this Egyptian business, and would place a number of lives in jeopardy without, possibly, any corresponding advantage being reaped. The guarantees which it appeared to him the Committee were bound to demand were a recantation of those foolish declarations which were contained in the words of the Prime Minister, "Rescue and Retire," and in the statement of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) that they should quit Egypt in six months. The inevitable course of events had already reversed the policy of the Government; but the Committee ought to demand a recantation in words also of the foolish expressions to which he had referred. The policy of advance and retreat, or, in other words, the policy of war and peace, at the same time must be abandoned. If the Peace Party had had their way, every drop of English blood which had been shed in Egypt during the last four years might have been saved, besides millions of money. If, on the contrary, the Government had chosen to follow a distinct and honourable and straightforward course of advance they would have reaped great advantages; and most, if not all, of the blood which had been shed would have been saved, and the country would have been some millions the richer. The Government had not followed either the one or the other course; but they had tried to perform the absolutely impossible task of going two ways at the same time. He was glad that the hon. Baronet (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was going to divide, because it was proper that the positions of the Government and of the Peace Party should be clearly defined. If the Government were to have the support of the House of Commons that night they must break with the Peace Party. For the sake of peace they must oppose the Peace Party. There was no middle course open any longer. They were now, for the seventh time in three years, responsible for a Military Expedition. - First of all, there was the Expedition of General Hicks; then Lord Alcester's; then Lord Wolseley's first Expedition; then General Gordon's; then General Baker's; then General Graham's; and now there was Lord Wolseley's second Expedition. ["And Lord Northbrook's!"] No; Lord Wolseley's. ["Lord Northbrook's!"] Oh, yes; he would come to that by-and-bye. These were the seven Military Expeditions for which they were responsible in three years. But the Government were not content with Military Expeditions; they had sent out an equal number of Civil Expeditions, which had also cost a great deal of money. They had sent out in turn Sir Rivers Wilson, Sir Edward Malet, Sir Auckland Colvin, Sir Evelyn Baring, Mr. Edgar Vincent, the Earl of Dufferin, and the Earl of Northbrook. Seven Civil Expeditions in addition to seven Military! All in three years! Who would they send next? He did not like to ask the question without suggesting some practical answer. The only other person left to be sent to Egypt was the Prime Minister himself. Why should not the right hon. Gentleman spend the winter season in Grand Cairo? The winter was pleasant, and it would be better for his health to be there than campaigning amidst the snows of Mid Lothian, or catching colds at chaotic railway stations. The idea of Government by Missions was a new one. Unfortunately, it had failed.

Sir George Campbell

How many more failures were they to witness? He had forgotten to mention the most questionable of all the Expeditions for which the Government were responsible—he meant the Expedition of Admiral Hewett and Mason Bey, the object of which was to incite a host of Abyssinian savages to invade the Soudan. The Government, he was well aware, by their obstinate refusal of information on the subject, were themselves ashamed of it. That Expedition, too, had failed. The only amends which the Government could make to the country would be now, at the eleventh hour, to separate themselves entirely from those hon. Gentlemen who belonged to the Peace Party—separate themselves at once and for ever. For himself, he should not take any part in the Division. He should like those who supported the policy of the Government, and them alone, to be responsible for the imposition of this new tax on the country.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he had listened with some surprise to the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) when he had stated that it was impossible to send an Expedition to the relief of Khartoum by way of Berber in March last. It was not accurate to say that in that month the hottest weather prevailed. It was true there was excessive heat in the Soudan for a few days in the middle of March of this year; but such abnormal weather prevailed also in more Westerly countries. It was succeeded by many weeks of temperate weather. The troops might have suffered somewhat; but, according to the highest military authorities both on the spot and in this country, it was perfectly possible for General Graham, after his two great victories over the Arabs, to have sent a small Expedition along the Berber road mounted either on camels or horses. The moral effect of such an Expedition after Graham's successes would have been quite sufficient to have insured the opening of the road to Khartoum, and the safety of that town. They had General Gordon's own word for it; for about the period in question the gallant officer had distinctly stated that the presence of 200 British troops at Wady Halfa would be quite enough to cause the whole of the operations of the rebels in that part of the Soudan to collapse. As to the other statements of the hon. Member, he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) could hardly congratulate the Government on their candid friend. The hon. Baronet had told them that the Government trusted to the chapter of accidents, and that in that chapter the Mudir of Dongola had turned up. But in this chapter of accidents some other things, less pleasant, had "turned up." Berber had fallen, and 5,000 people had been sacrificed. Khartoum had been besieged, numerous battles had occurred, and many lives had been lost; Lord Wolseley's Expedition had been despatched—an Expedition which had already cost close upon £2,000,000, and with regard to which the Government might esteem themselves fortunate if they escaped with no further expenditure than another £2,000,000. Such had been, and was likely to be, the result of the policy of the Government in trusting to the chapter of accidents. It did not appear to him (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) that this policy had proved particularly fortunate. As to the proposal before the House, this was the 19th £1,000,000 the Government had wasted in Egypt. The first campaign cost England and India £7,000,000; the present Expedition had already cost close on £2,000,000; and the cost to Egypt of the intervention and blundering of the Government in Egypt had been, at least, £10,000,000. In addition to this enormous expenditure, the Government were responsible for the loss of from 40,000 to 50,000 human lives; they had allowed slavery and slave dealers to obtain a hold over a vast country from which it had been practically banished; and if they abandoned Khartoum, they would, as Sir Evelyn Baring and General Gordon had warned them, cause the slave traffic in its most horrible forms to prevail throughout the Soudan. Moreover, they had set the whole of Europe against them. The Great Powers were now protesting against their policy. And now Parliament was discussing the opening and initial cost of the third serious campaign which had been undertaken in Egypt. The Government, in carrying out their Egyptian policy, had employed—as they had told the House—all the best men they could lay their hands on, from the Earl of Dufferin to General Gordon. They had called these persons to their council, but had treated them all with contempt. They had received their counsel from time to time in regard to the various details of their action in Egypt, but had refused to derive any benefit for themselves or for Egypt from the employment of these distinguished men. This Expedition of General Wolseley was practically the fifth epoch in their Egyptian policy; and the country was now paying this £2,000,000, in addition to all the other sums which it had paid before, simply and solely in consequence of the delay of the Government—their inability to foresee, decide, or to act in any of the crises in which decision or action would have been of avail. They had rejected every suggestion that General Gordon made to them; they had refused him all the assistance he asked for—the 200 troops at Wady Halfa, the five English officers, Zebehr, Indian troops at Berber, the advance of Graham's Army, the 2,000 Turkish troops. All his suggestions had been contemptuously rejected, and the Government had done absolutely nothing except send him insulting messages, practically charging him with a change of his pacific policy, and unjustly rebuking him in his perilous and critical position. Surrounded and cut off as he was, and—as the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) had admitted that night—suffering a long imprisonment in Khartoum, in the greatest danger, by day and by night, Ministers had the effrontery to tell General Gordon they could send him no military force to undertake offensive operations. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) would call the attention of the Committee to the extraordinary discrepancy between the statements of Her Majesty's Ministers—and it was a point worthy of note, strictly bearing upon the Vote under discussion—with regard to the position of General Gordon last March, April, and May, and the facts of the case known at that time and since confirmed. On the 8th of April the Prime Minister said—

"General Gordon is under no inability to leave the Soudan at the present moment."—(3 Hansard, [287] 39.)

On the 21st he said—

"The position of General Gordon is, so far as we know, a position of security;"—(Ibid. 141.)

On May 1 he said—

Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett

"There is no military danger at the present moment besetting Khartoum."—(Ibid. 1059.)

And all the time the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Members knew that Gordon's forces had been defeated, and that the General was besieged by fanatical hordes and in great peril. They had had Mr. Power's despatches and General Gordon's own warnings. General Gordon, in his despatches, said plainly that he had remained in Khartoum because the Arabs had shut him in. The Prime Minister must have known that Gordon was in imminent danger. Between April 16 and May 7 eight different attacks were made on Khartoum; and it was no wonder that when Gordon got the insulting and offensive despatches of April 23 and May 1, he replied in those burning words which would not be soon forgotten by the English people—

"I leave to you the indelible disgrace of abandoning the garrisons."

In his recent despatches, just published, General Gordon emphasized the same reproach—

"If the rebels kill the Egyptians their blood be on your heads."

The most remarkable incident was the fall of Berber. The Government were warned of the peril all through April. So anxious were the Egyptian Ministry, Sir Evelyn Baring, Nubar Pasha, and the Khedive about Berber, that they all urged that relief should be sent. Although the Government were told these things throughout April—although in the early part of the month despatches reached them stating that Berber was in imminent danger of falling, the Prime Minister found himself able, on the 24th of April, to inform the House and the country that so far as he knew there was no risk of Berber sharing the fate of Sinkat. That was a most extraordinary inaccuracy—he would not say deliberate inaccuracy—for the Head of the Government, in possession of the information it was known he had at that time, to have been guilty of. The Government were advised and urged to do what they could to assist Berber. Sir Evelyn Baring told them that if Berber fell, General Gordon's position would be worsened, and yet they found the Premier declaring that he did not believe the fall of Berber would seriously affect Khartoum. Berber held out for some weeks, and troops could easily have been sent there from Assouan by way of Dongola or by the desert. General Gordon had said the effect of Berber having been saved would have made Lord Wolseley advance by the Nile to Khartoum "a mere picnic." He added these words—"According to all accounts, 5,000 men were massacred at Berber;" and, with a touch of irony, he concluded with—"All is for the best." The hon. Baronet had congratulated the Government on having come across the Mudir of Dongola. That was a mistake. It appeared to him (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) that the Government had not come across the Mudir of Dongola, but that the Mudir of Dongola had come across them. The Mudir had been ordered by the Egyptian Government, under the direction of the British Cabinet, to abandon Dongola in June; and it was only because he refused to abandon the great Province, which was the key of Egypt, that the Mudir was in his present position, and that Lord Wolseley's force was able to advance even at the slow rate at which it was advancing. Here he would say a word as to the instructions issued to Lord Wolseley. They were of a most extraordinary kind, loose and self-contradictory, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) had stated the other day. The instructions were such that the Government could quote them in support of two directly opposite policies in the future, if they desired to do so. In one place they told Lord Wolseley to establish a Government at Khartoum if he could, and in the next sentence they told him that such a Government would have to rely solely on its own strength. That everybody knew was impossible. They could not at present establish a suitable Government at Khartoum which could rely absolutely on its own strength. They had tried to make such an arrangement as that in Zululand, and they failed. Everything fell to pieces as soon as British supervision was withdrawn. If the Government had honestly wished to maintain good government and order in the Soudan, they would have authorized Lord Wolseley to give General Gordon, or some other competent British official, such support as to have enabled him to establish a Government and to have maintained it until it became efficient. Did the Government really mean to incur the indelible disgrace of abandoning all the other garrisons? Were these garrisons, who had held out loyally and gallantly, confident that they would be relieved, to be deliberately abandoned to massacre and slavery. The instructions to Lord Wolseley said they were to be abandoned. Was that the policy of the Government? Were the men who had been confident that some relief would come to them to be given over to the fate of Tewfik, the people of Berber, Colonel Stewart, and so many others? Had the Government, when they stated that any rule established south of Wady Halfa would have to rely solely upon its own strength, taken the trouble to read the information collected by Colonel Stuart-Wortley in the course of his recent gallant ride across the desert? It was clear from the latest information that Dongola was a most important position for the defence of Egypt; and if that place were abandoned the position at Wady Halfa would be perfectly insecure. In fact, if they abandoned Dongola and Khartoum, unless Egypt was to be handed over to anarchy and ruin, there would be a recurrence of these Nile Expeditions every two or three years. He would now very briefly sum up what he believed was desired by the great majority of the thinking public in this country who had examined this question, and who took a real interest in the influence of England and in the welfare of Egypt. He sincerely believed that very many Liberals, if not the great majority of them, together with almost the whole of the Conservative Party, desired to see a settlement made with regard to Egypt and the Soudan such as he would venture to suggest to the Government and to the Committee. In the first place, he believed it to be necessary that a thorough British supervision should be established over Egypt for a number of years—for a sufficient length of time to reform the administration and to make its effect felt throughout Egypt. In the second place, he thought that the people of this country wished to see General Gordon authorized, and furnished with sufficient support to enable him to restore order and peace and freedom to the great districts extending between the

when, by reason of the greater quantity of water, it would be less difficult to conduct operations on the Suakin-Berber road than it is at present. This he might perhaps be able to do, but it, of course, involves running a great risk. The only other plan is to send a portion of General Graham's Army to Berber, with instructions to open up communication with Khar-toum. There would be very great difficulty in getting to Berber; but if the road were once open, it might be done by sending small detachments at a time. General Gordon is evidently expecting help from Suakin, and he has ordered messengers to be sent along the road from Berber to ascertain whether any English force is advancing. Under present circumstances, I think that an effort should be made to help General Gordon from Suakin, if it is at all a possible military operation. General Stephenson and Sir Evelyn Wood, whilst admitting the very great risk to the health of the troops, besides the extraordinary military risks, are of opinion that the undertaking is possible. They think that General Graham should be further consulted."

Next in order of time came that Question of his hon. Friend the Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) to which he had referred; and he would be glad to know on what plea the noble Marquess rested the answer which he gave to it at the time, when he knew that General Stephenson and Sir Evelyn Wood did think it possible for General Graham to march from Suakin to Berber, and that General Stephenson recommended him to apply for information to the only man who could give information on the subject? What did the noble Marquess do? He declined to apply to General Graham, and that, in his judgment, showed that the Government had predetermined that there should be no advance from Suakin to Berber. He believed that the noble Marquess must have known, and did know, that this was the only reliable chance of relieving General Gordon. Would the noble Marquess give an answer now to the Question asked by the hon. Member for Eye with regard to the proposal of General Graham? General Graham had made two proposals, after the battle of Tamanieb, to the noble Marquess. In his Despatch (No. 272) he telegraphed thus to the Secretary of State for War—

"The present position of affairs is that two heavy blows have been dealt at rebels and followers of the Mahdi, who are profoundly discouraged. They say, however, that English troops can do no more; must re-embark and leave the country to them; to follow up these victories and bring waverers to our side we should not proclaim our intention of leaving;

but rather make a demonstration of an advance towards Berber, and induce a belief that we can march anywhere we please. I propose, therefore, making as great a show as possible without harassing troops, as Medical Officers report they require rest. A strong battalion, with regiment of Cavalry, advances to-morrow to Handuk, and from thence a reconnaissance will be made along the Berber road; this road, Suakin-Berber, passes through country occupied by various tribes from Suakin; Handuk, Otas, and Sibil are the Fadlab, whose Sheikh, Mohammed Ali Bey, is friendly, but has given no active support hitherto. He undertakes to accompany the troops in their advance to-morrow, and may be useful. He was formerly the wekil, or agent, of Sheikh Hamad Mahmoud, of Mousiah tribe, the Khalifa or Governor of the road, and conducted all bargains with camel drivers. The road from Sibil to Aariab lies in country of Amrar tribes. Their head Sheikh, Hamad Mahmoud, just mentioned, is with rebels through the greater part. The sub-tribes of Amrar are still loyal. From Aariab to Berber the road lies in country of Bishareen, and must be dealt with from Berber. Reports of pilgrims state that an Egyptian garrison holds Obak; desirable to obtain from Berber attitude of Bishareen, and how far road is open. Gordon should communicate to you for my information; he can find out as to road and tribes, and should endeavour to open road and send people across."

That was General Graham's first proposal, and the second was very like it. It would be found in his despatch to the noble Marquess (No. 277), dated Suakin, March 18, which ran thus—

"Gordon Highlanders, with 19th Hussars and Mounted Infantry, have marched to Handuk, and are now in telegraphic communication. The force is under General Stewart, accompanied by the Sheikh of Fadlab tribe; Osman Digna is reported at Tamanieb with 2,500 followers, many of whom are reported as wavering, and to have sent to friends in Fadlab tribe, who have advised them to come to Handuk for protection from Osman. Stewart has instructions to conciliate and work with friendly Sheikh; also to reconnoitre and report. An advance to Sibil, 50 miles on Berber road, could be made with 2,000 men; 300 more camels would, however, be required, and preparations would take five days. Troops very healthy."

Now, he said, that after such statements as these it was perfectly possible for the noble Marquess to have ordered an advance upon Berber from Suakin. Had that advance taken place, Berber would not have fallen, because, as hon. Members knew, the Mudir of Berber was prepared to march out some 50 or more miles to meet the advancing force which General Gordon thought was coming; so that the march over that part of the road without water would have been accomplished by Egyptian troops from Berber. The noble Marquess knew all

that; but the Government were determined to do nothing, nor would they have done anything since but for the outcry of the people of this country, who demanded that, at any cost, Gordon should be relieved. Then he would ask whether it would not have been wise and prudent to have consulted so distinguished a man as General Sir Gerald Graham, as to what he considered to be the best and wisest course? The noble Marquess had stated that he did not want to have another action. But was he more likely or not to have another action, having left Osman Digna and his force unbroken and undispersed, during the whole summer and autumn, in the neighbourhood of Suakin? Had General Graham's march to Berber taken place, that force would never have collected again. Had General Graham been consulted and that march sanctioned, he was convinced that General Graham would have done his duty successfully. The noble Marquess seemed to think that some point of etiquette would have been involved in consulting a junior General. But if it were wise to send a junior General to Suakin at all, surely it would have been wise to have consulted him when he was there. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) believed that General Graham would have been prepared, at the most reasonable cost, not only to have placed outposts, but to have maintained and opened the road to Berber, which would have remained the trade route of that part of the country. Was it a light thing that a road of that kind should be abandoned? The noble Marquess knew that it was not, and he knew that there was a possibility of their having to advance from time to time further from Suakin. The Government were going to improve the harbour at Suakin; and, if he was not mistaken, a large quantity of rails had been landed there; and the idea was floating in their minds to have a railway between Suakin and Berber; but, although nothing would tend more to civilize the country, they would probably not go to the expense until it was too late for the railway to be of any use. [A laugh.] The noble Marquess laughed; but if he were on the spot, he would find it desirable to have that railway constructed in the interest of Egypt, which, he said, the Government had so much at heart. To judge by the way in which they had acted, it did not seem that they had that interest at heart very strongly, notwithstanding their declarations. He repeated that nothing would be more beneficial, especially for protection, to Egypt, than a railway between Suakin and Berber. But the Government had done absolutely nothing up to the time at which they came down for a Vote of Credit—that was to say, just before the end of the last Session. The noble Marquess had very good-naturedly said to him at the time, in reply to a Question—"You have now got your answer, and I hope you are satisfied with it." It was satisfactory then. But the £300,000 asked for by the Government was but as a drop in the ocean, if they were going to do what they now professed. He undertook to say that Khartoum would have been relieved by General Graham at a very small cost, whereas now the expense would be simply enormous, and time alone would show whether the Expedition would succeed. But this the Government knew—that they had embarked on a most difficult and dangerous operation, even if the force under General Lord Wolseley was not attacked. He would not pretend to say what was the chance of that; but supposing it was attacked, and suffered a reverse, on what were they going to fall back? Let the Committee consider the distance of their base from Khartoum, and judge what the consequences of a reverse would be. He ventured to believe that the Government had taken this step out of consideration to public opinion; not because they wished to take it, for they had stated that it was not their view or wish that General Gordon should be relieved, but that he should escape from Khartoum in the best way he could. General Gordon, a man who had always shown and proved himself to be most tenacious of the honour of his country, had been sent out for the purpose of relieving the garrisons in the Soudan; but they were now told that the instructions of Lord Wolseley were that those garrisons were to be sacrificed, an abandonment which, if it took place, would constitute an indelible disgrace to the country. Whenever General Gordon asked for help or relief, when he said he was suffering and unable to hold out, no notice was taken of his appeal. God grant that the Expedition might not be too late! But he was afraid that the question was one on which there was room for much doubt. The noble Marquess had not said one word as to what the Government intended to do in the event of Khartoum having fallen. That was a question of considerable interest, and one on which he and his hon. Friends would like to have some information. Did they mean to allow the Mahdi to take possession of Khartoum, and was slavery to be allowed to continue in the Soudan, as it had done in years gone by? It was the Government who, by proclaiming, in season and out of season, that they were going to abandon the Soudan, had been the destruction of the country. Never had a more reckless course been taken by any Government than this declaration of the abandonment of the Soudan before the garrisons had been withdrawn in safety; and he believed that if it culminated in the fall of Khartoum, and the destruction of General Gordon, no censure had ever fallen on a Government heavier than that which he hoped the people of the country would pass on those who had been the cause of that calamity. Did the Government mean to hand over the whole of the Soudan to the Mahdi? If that were so, Egypt would be left open at any moment to the attacks of those hordes which would come down upon her from the Soudan, a condition of affairs that would be as dangerous to the country as it would be disgraceful to the Government. But he believed the people would speak out on this question. They were watching with the greatest anxiety what the Government were now doing in Egypt, when, up to the present, they had done nothing but upset all that was good without substituting anything in its place. It was high time that there should be no longer two masters in Egypt; nor could the country be properly governed by dummies directed from Downing Street. Her Majesty's Government must assume the responsibility which events had cast upon them, disguise it as they might; and, having assumed it, they would be bound to take care that order reigned in Egypt, although we might be kept there for many years to come.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that not being a military genius, ready at a moment to explain how the campaign ought to be conducted or not in Central Africa, he should not intrude his views

upon the Committee as to whether they ought to have gone to Khartoum by Suakin or by the Nile, because he objected to their going there at all. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken asked the Government what it was they intended to do if the Expedition were too late to save General Gordon. But was not the hon. and gallant Gentleman aware that an answer had been given to that again and again? Had not the Prime Minister told them a long time ago that the sole object in the Soudan was to "rescue and retire?" They were to rescue the garrisons and General Gordon, after which they were to retire without mixing themselves up with the internal affairs of the country. When the noble Marquess, the Secretary of State for War was introducing this Estimate, he had said something about establishing a settled form of Government in the Soudan. That, he would point out, was a scheme entirely novel, and also contrary to the pledges given to the House when the preliminary Vote of £300,000 was asked for. It was then understood that the leader of the Expedition would solely and simply endeavour to bring back with him General Gordon, and, if possible, the garrisons; but there was not one word said about establishing any form of settled Government in the Soudan. If the noble Marquess simply meant that if Lord Wolseley reached Khartoum, he was, in order to prevent the disorganization of all society there, to gather together some of the notabilities of the town, he should be glad to hear that that was so; but if he meant that they were going to establish some settled form of Government in the Soudan, that would be a very different business to what was understood by the House as being in view when the money was voted last Session. Had General Wolseley never communicated with the Mahdi? There was no doubt that many communications had taken place between that personage and the Mudir of Dongola; they had French Ministers as well as merchants receiving despatches every day of what was taking place at Khartoum; and yet it seemed that no efforts were made to convey to the Mahdi, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, that if he would only allow General Gordon and the garrison at Khartoum to retire they would have nothing more

to do with the Soudan. He had asked the question several times in the House already, but had never been able to get a reply as to whether they had entered into any communication with the Mahdi. They knew very little about what was going on at Khartoum. All they knew was that General Gordon was in a position of great and exceptional difficulty. It was almost impossible to criticize General Gordon's actions; but, at the same time, it was well to bear in mind the report which was published the other day by Colonel Duncan as to the passage through Assuan of persons leaving the Soudan. In that report it was stated that men, women, and children—the wives, children, and servants of the different employers—were leaving the country; and then Colonel Duncan went on to say it would be remarked that there were exceedingly few soldiers passing through the town. The reason of that was that General Gordon, who was sent out to relieve the garrisons—to get the garrison out of Khartoum—had called in all the troops in the neighbourhood, and had told them that they must not leave, but must rally at Khartoum. He (Mr. Labouchere) only mentioned these facts because it was desirable that they should be borne in mind. They heard the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) talk about a settled Government in Khartoum. He (Mr. Labouchere) did not think any of the hon. Gentlemen with whom he usually acted desired that if Lord Wolseley was able to get the garrison away from Khartoum the gallant General should delay one moment, or spend any British blood or money in order to establish a settled Government in Khartoum, or the Soudan, or to wage war against the Mahdi. He intended to follow into the Lobby his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson). He quite admitted that if an Expedition was sent out it must be paid for. He remembered that last Session the Prime Minister said he asked for a small preliminary Vote as a matter of principle. He (Mr. Labouchere) understood that by assenting to that small preliminary Vote the House assented to the proposal to send out an Expedition. But why should they pay for it at all? Why not Egypt pay for it, or, rather, the Egyptian bondholders? It was admitted that the Soudan was execrably governed by

Egypt. The Egyptian Government sent out, against our wish, Hicks Pasha to bring the Soudan once more under the control of Egypt. At the time we protested against Hicks Pasha being sent out. Hicks Pasha, however, went to the Soudan, and he might have withdrawn with the Egyptian garrisons; but he tried to re-establish the Egyptian Government there, and the consequence was that he and his army were destroyed. The garrisons remained in the country, and the Egyptians could not do anything to relieve them. It appeared the Egyptians were not very great men at fighting, and so they asked us to aid them. We sent General Gordon to aid them; but when General Gordon arrived in Cairo he accepted the post under the Khedive of Governor of the Soudan. The position, therefore, of General Gordon was that of Representative of the Khedive at Khartoum. Although we were, perhaps, right in sending men out to rescue General Gordon because we were, to a certain extent, responsible, yet it was obvious that it was the Egyptian Government who ought to pay, and not we, the cost of the Expedition to get the Egyptian garrisons and General Gordon, who was the Egyptian Governor of the Soudan, out of the country. It was said that Egypt could not pay her debts. No illusion was greater than that. For centuries Egypt had been the great granary of Europe, and it was possible for Egypt to pay the cost of its administration, and have a surplus for such an Expedition as the present. It was well known why Egypt could not now pay its debts. The reason was to be found in the fact that the greater portion of the Revenue of the country was diverted for the benefit of the bondholders. The Revenues of the country were mortgaged to the bondholders; and, therefore, the bondholders should pay for the defence of the country. He was entirely opposed to the Expedition; but he especially supported his hon. Friend (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) that night, upon the ground that they ought to call upon Egypt to pay the expenses. They might make an advance of money if necessary; but then they ought to put it down as a debt owing by Egypt to us. He could well understand an advance being made; but he could not understand why, whenever a question of this sort arose, no matter what Government was in power, it was always said—"Oh! let the British taxpayer pay." There were many people in England who wanted money, and to whom money would be of the greatest benefit. The Irish wanted money; the shipping trade was in distress; indeed, there were hundreds of ways in which, if they had got these millions to throw away, they could expend them with far more benefit to the country than in expending them in the Soudan, expending them not even for the benefit of the Soudan or Egypt, but for the benefit of the Egyptian bondholders, who were simply usurers, and who, if he had his way, would not get 1s. interest for the money they had advanced.

Mr. GREGORY shared the regret which had been expressed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) that the Government did not take advantage of the operations against Osman Digna to relieve Khartoum by the Suakin and Berber route; and, speaking with great diffidence to military authorities, he thought it would have been better if the Suakin-Berber route had been adopted for the present Expedition. From something which fell from the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington), he could not help thinking that the question of expense had entered a little more than it ought to have done into the consideration of this matter. He trusted that that was not the case, because he felt that the principal object of the Expedition was the relief of General Gordon. It was all very well to say it was desirable to communicate with Dongola, and with the tribes along the course of the Nile; but the principal and main object which they ought always to have had before them in undertaking the Expedition was the release of General Gordon from the difficult position in which he was placed. Again, there was another matter which ought to have entered into their consideration, and that was the establishment of a permanent Government at Khartoum. He held that it was impossible to maintain a permanent Government there unless communication were kept up between it and civilization, and he did not see that by taking the route up the Nile they had opened up that connection in any degree. He believed that if they had taken the Suakin and Berber route they would have opened a new line of communication, or made practicable the old line of communication, by which constant intercourse could have been maintained with Khartoum and the Soudan. He feared that in consequence of the route Lord Wolsley had taken it would be impossible for them to establish a permanent Government at Khartoum, and thus bring about a better state of things.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that as his views on this subject were generally in accord with those of his hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), he need not repeat what the hon. Baronet had said, and said with much greater force than he (Sir George Campbell) could. At the same time, he did not think that it would be worth while to divide on the Vote. He and his hon. Friend might take this salve to their consciences—that they had throughout protested against the policy which had made this Vote necessary. It was to be remembered that in the summer the Prime Minister proposed a Vote of £300,000 for the Expedition to Khartoum. The right hon. Gentleman called it a Vote of principle; and he avowed that the Vote was meant to commit the House and the country to the Expedition. He (Sir George Campbell) dissented from the Vote, because he believed it amounted to a sanction of what he believed would be a long bill. Still, he felt that the House and the country was committed to the matter, and that he and his hon. Friend had done their duty by protesting against the proposed expenditure. He did not like the tone of the speech of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington). The noble Marquess was very straightforward and honest; he could not bring himself to tell them that the Vote now proposed would be sufficient for the Expedition. He (Sir George Campbell) considered that the Government were bound to do their utmost to face clearly the expenditure and risks they were now incurring. The noble Marquess had very fairly told the Committee that they might have to pay more; but the Government ought at the present moment to place before the country an Estimate of the expenditure which would in all probability be incurred. He thoroughly believed that the noble Marquess was a prudent administrator, and that Lord

Wolseley was a skilful and economical General, and that this Expedition would not be characterized by the enormous wasteful expenditure as characterized the Expedition to Abyssinia. At the same time, he could hardly credit that this great Expedition into the heart of Africa would be carried out for the expenditure now before the Committee—namely, £1,600,000 in all. If in the ordinary course of the Expedition the present Estimate were to be greatly exceeded, considerable blame would attach to Her Majesty's Government for not putting the thing fully before the country. He confessed that the present Estimate appeared to him to be exceedingly low. Although he had great confidence in the noble Marquess at the head of the War Department, he had great misgivings, especially after the expressions which fell from the noble Marquess himself, that the Estimate would be exceeded. He was also anxious to know how the money was to be raised. He was aware that the country was occupied upon other matters, and that it did not pay much attention to this question; and as long as it was a question of voting the money and borrowing it from the Money Market, the country would not pay very much attention to it. They were bound, however, when they did undertake Expeditions, to pay for them out of their own pockets; and if another 2*d.* in the pound was to be added to the Income Tax the country would soon become alive to the importance of the Expedition and the risks they were undertaking. He thought very great credit was due to the Government for the courage they had displayed in resisting the attempts made by the Opposition to induce them to send an Expedition into the heart of Africa at the hottest and most unfavourable time of the year. [Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: No, no!] The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) and his hon. Friends were at one time continually urging the Government to send an Expedition to Berber at the beginning of the hot weather; and he maintained that Her Majesty's Government showed great courage in resisting the pressure put upon them to send out such an Expedition. If an Expedition had been sent out as hon. Gentlemen opposite desired the sacrifice of life amongst Her Majesty's troops must have been enormous. General Gordon had been able, up to the present—throughout the hot weather—to maintain himself at Khartoum, and had not yet been captured. In his opinion, Her Majesty's Government had been extremely prudent in the instructions they had given to General Wolseley, for they had limited his Expedition as far as possible. He thought the Government were right in saying distinctly that General Wolseley should not go beyond Khartoum to relieve any garrisons there might be there. He (Sir George Campbell) protested against the things said by hon. Gentlemen opposite when they talked about sacrificing these garrisons. They talked as if the garrisons must necessarily be massacred. There was no reason to suppose that they would be massacred. There was no reason to suppose that the Mahdi would not receive them with open arms, as he had done other garrisons. He (Sir George Campbell) sincerely hoped they would, somehow or other, find their way to their own country; and, if necessary, he should be glad to contribute towards their ransom. He did not think, however, there was the smallest reason to assume they would be massacred if they showed a disposition, as others had done, to join the Mahdi. But when General Wolseley got to Khartoum Her Majesty's Government must make up their minds what was to be done with the place. If they could not find a capable Government at Khartoum they must make up their minds to pack up their baggage and come away. If it should happen that Khartoum was left without a settled Government they might regret it, but they could not help it; it was not their business to govern Khartoum. As regarded General Gordon himself, he (Sir George Campbell) could hardly imagine that General Gordon, a British officer, holding Her Majesty's commission, would refuse to leave Khartoum. If he did he must resign Her Majesty's commission, and then they would be no longer responsible for him. If he was in a fit state to exercise his own judgment, and desired to stay at Khartoum, his wish ought to be gratified, but upon such terms that they would be free from all responsibility as regarded him. He (Sir George Campbell) trusted that Her Majesty's Government would adhere firmly to the instructions they had given

Gordon at Khartoum. General Gordon was a Civil Governor, and when those charges had to be met by this country they would be met by a Vote from the Treasury as a Civil Fund, and would not come out of an Army Vote at all.

MR. TOMLINSON asked, whether it was to be understood that on some later date a Vote would be produced for the payment of General Gordon's debts, or what provision would be made for the payment of them? Was Lord Wolseley to pay the debts at his own risk, or what was to be done in regard to them?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER said, that Lord Wolseley had not been instructed upon that point. All these questions were premature, because the Government did not yet know what arrangements General Gordon had made, or what pecuniary liabilities he had incurred. It would be necessary to know that, and to discuss the matter at the Treasury, before a decision was come to as to the form in which the matter would be placed before the House in regard to the settlement of General Gordon's liabilities.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 73; Noes 17: Majority 56.—(Div. List, No. 14.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON rose to move a Vote of £675,000 for military operations in Bechuanaland. The noble Marquess said: I do not know whether it is intended to take this opportunity of discussing the political aspects of the question. If it is, it is not my intention or duty to enter into that part of the subject; and I propose to say very few words in explanation of the Vote which I am about to move. The Estimate which has been placed on the Table represents the sum of money which will be required in the event of military operations, and these on a considerable scale having to be undertaken for the expulsion of the filibusters who have forcibly taken possession of certain territory under our protection in Bechuanaland—that is to say, it is framed on the basis that force, and force to the utmost extent, will be required in order to remove these filibusters. It is not contemplated that the mere preparatory measures which may be taken will have the desired effect; but that force will be necessary, and that the full Estimate will be required in the event of matters coming to extremities. Perhaps it is not desirable that I should enter into minute details as to the composition of the force which we propose to send out on this Expedition. The Estimate is framed on the basis of a force of 1,500 volunteers, who will be supported by an adequate force of Regular troops, the exact composition of which, or the number of Regular troops which will be sent in support of the Volunteer Force, it is, perhaps, not desirable that I should state. The Estimate also provides for the replacing of any Regular troops which may be temporarily withdrawn from Natal or Zululand in order to take part in the Expedition. It is not considered desirable, in the present state of affairs in Zululand, entirely to weaken the forces at present there, or in Natal, but which may be available for immediate service in Bechuanaland. I may say that the Estimate which has been framed is an outside one—at all events, it is outside any sum that is likely to be expended in the present year. It has been framed as accurately as we could, rather upon the basis of the whole sum likely to be expended, under any circumstances, for a campaign which is not expected to last beyond a few months. Of course, if the operations were to close early the whole of this sum would not be expended in the present year; and therefore the Committee may take it that the Estimate is an outside one, and that as regards the present year it will certainly exceed any sum likely to be expended.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I think the Committee will have heard with great satisfaction two statements of the noble Marquess—in the first place, that the Volunteers whom it may be necessary to send will be supported by an adequate number of Regular troops; and, secondly, that in providing that force there is no intention, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, to diminish the force available for the protection of the Zulu Reserve. Thanks to the courtesy of the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley), I hold in my hand a copy of the Instructions issued to Sir Charles Warren. These Papers, however, are not in the possession of the House, and I confess that I have not myself had time to consider them and compare them with other documents on the subject. Therefore, what appears to me and to others whom I have consulted on the matter a fair proposal, which I hope Her Majesty's Government will not be unwilling to accede to, is this—we have no desire to impose unnecessary delay in granting this Vote, believing it to be for necessary purposes; but we do think that some fair opportunity should be given for a discussion of the subject, and if this Vote is to be taken to-night I hope the Government will have no objection to fix some day for the Report next week on which we may have a full and complete discussion.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, he entirely concurred in the view taken by the right hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), who had just spoken; and he would confine the few observations he desired to make to considering the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and showing how their inaction had led up to the expenditure now proposed. He craved the indulgence of the Committee for trespassing upon them on a second occasion; but when he addressed the House a short time ago, the first batch of Papers only had been presented, and he now desired to comment upon this second batch of Papers, and to show how completely the information given in them bore out the views he had then advocated. He had then said that the Boers were led to believe, by our policy of drift and concession, that Her Majesty's Government were either unable, or unwilling, to interfere, and to incur the expense which would be caused by such interference; and that they might deal with the Convention of London as they had dealt with the Convention of Pretoria. And this set of Papers showed that such was their belief. These Papers also showed, as he had feared might be the case, that the Boers were able to taunt the Native Chiefs with their folly in trusting to British promises, and to the protection, although promised, of the British Government. He observed that this had actually taken place, and that Mankoroane was cited by the Boers as the case of a Chief deserted by the British Government. Surely it was a matter of deep regret that our conduct should have been such as to justify the Boers in making this charge. Another point which he had brought forward on the former occasion was that the defence, formerly set up by the Government, that the action of the Transvaal Government must be separated from that of the freebooters, would not be found to hold good in the present case. There could be no question now as to the complicity, or, at all events, connivance, of the Transvaal Government with what had passed in Bechuanaland, and their intention to make a profit out of these outrages against Montsioa. The former batch of Papers showed the recruiting at Pretoria; the publication of N. Gey's Proclamation in The Volksstem, at Pretoria; and though it was true that the Transvaal Government had issued a counter-Proclamation, it was unsupported by any restraining force—and these later Papers showed that no such force was at any time used—and the Boers attached, therefore, the same value to that Proclamation as the Transvaal Government attached to the verbal remonstrances of our Resident, unsupported by any firm action on the part of Her Majesty's Government. This counter-Proclamation was, in fact, as Sir Hercules Robinson pointed out, of no use at all by itself, and was nothing but a mere blind. What else did these later Papers show? One could hardly read them without surprise and feelings of shame at the grievous inaction of Her Majesty's Government in a state of things so fraught with difficulty. Until the 7th of October there was literally no indication of their policy; no advice; no orders were given to Sir Hercules Robinson; and no instructions to warn the Transvaal Government that Her Majesty's Government intended to enforce observance of the Convention, and to protect Montsioa's territory. He would take one date to show that he was justified in that statement. On September 21 the Earl of Derby telegraphed to Sir Hercules Robinson. He would read that telegram to the Committee in a few minutes; but he desired first to point out what information the Earl of Derby had in his possession of the state of things in Bechuanaland when he so telegraphed. In the first place, he had learnt, by a telegram of the 11th of September from Sir Hercules Robinson, that Montsioa had been attacked and defeated, and that, reduced to extremities, he had been forced to surrender himself, his people, and his property, unconditionally, to the Boers. The Earl of Derby must have been aware that, though the surrender was made nominally to the Goshen Republic, yet as that Republic was "under the supervision" of the Transvaal Government, Montsioa's territory was practically annexed by that Government. He had been informed also of the conduct of Joubert, the accredited Agent of that Government, who negotiated this Treaty with Montsioa. By another telegram of the 15th of September, he had been informed by Sir Hercules Robinson that the position of affairs called for "immediate consideration;" that the movements were believed to have been instigated by Transvaal officials; and that there seemed but little prospect of the new Convention being observed so long as it was thought that the Imperial Government did not intend to enforce it; that—

"If it were only believed that Her Majesty's Government meant to insist on the boundaries fixed by the Convention being respected, and the independence of the Natives, whom we have promised to protect, it might be possible, even then, to accomplish those objects without fighting; but to induce that belief it would be necessary to announce the decision firmly, and to make ostensible preparations for fighting."

By a telegram of the 17th of September, Sir Hercules Robinson again pressed for leave to announce to the Transvaal Government that existing engagements would be insisted on, if necessary, by force of arms; and stated that he was still of opinion—

"That if the Transvaal and the freebooters saw that Her Majesty's Government were determined, the difficulties might be arranged without actual fighting."

It would thus be seen by the Committee that Sir Hercules Robinson had made the Earl of Derby fully aware of the grave and increasing difficulties of the case; of the danger of delay and inactivity; and that he had pressed for authority to make some firm and decided representations to the Transvaal Government, which, if made, he thought even then might prevent the necessity of fighting. Now, what was the answer? It would be found in the Earl of Derby's telegram of September 21, to which he had before referred. It was couched in the usual stereotyped form—"Yours 11th, 15th, and 17th receiving careful consideration." Surely, it would not have been too much to expect from the Secretary of State that he should, in such circumstances, and under such pressure from Sir Hercules Robinson, have authorized him to inform the Transvaal Government that this Government distinctly intended to stand by the Convention, and to fulfil their pledges, by force if necessary, to protect Montsioa's territory from the freebooting Boers. But in this telegram of September 21 the Earl of Derby goes on—

"It is desirable that I should have clear expression of Ministers' recommendations, and understand extent of co-operation to be given by Colony on account of trade route and otherwise if active measures taken."

But he would ask, why should Her Majesty's Government have waited to know what the Cape Government were willing to do before returning a decided answer that they were prepared to fulfil their Imperial engagements? In truth, no answer was practically given to these pressing telegrams—in other words, no indication of their policy was given to Sir Hercules Robinson until October 7. What could Sir Hercules Robinson gather from this silence but that Her Majesty's Government had either not made up their minds what line to take, or that they had resolved to pursue the policy of inaction and waiting upon events? What would the Transvaal Government be led to believe when they found no immediate notice taken by Her Majesty's Government of the flagrant violation of the Convention of London? They had telegraphed on the 17th of September direct to the Earl of Derby—"Being implored by Montsioa, took him under protection." The Earl of Derby knew from Sir Hercules Robinson the real state of the case, and the conduct of Mr. Joubert in negotiating this so-called Treaty with Montsioa; but, as he returned no answer to the Transvaal Government to their telegram of the 17th until early in October, what could the Transvaal Government believe but that they had succeeded in passing off their version of the case upon him, and

costly concessions, made at the expense of the British taxpayer. It was much to be regretted that the present Cape Ministry had hitherto not carried out the promises made by Sir Thomas Scanlen, and which had involved this country in heavy liabilities. It was said that the Cape could not undertake indefinite responsibilities. But this country had done so on the faith of their representations. It was very hard on the British taxpayer that the cost of a policy in which his interest was so infinitesimal should fall on him, and, in his opinion, Sir Hercules Robinson's communications to the Cape Government had been most judicious. He justly observed that the present obligations were unwillingly undertaken by the British Government at the request and in the interest of the Cape, and under the distinct promise of contribution to the expenses, and of cordial co-operation; and he concluded—

"The Governor feels very strongly that the promise is binding in honour on the Colony, and he will fail in his duty to Ministers if he withhold from them the frank expression of his opinion."

On the 24th of July, and did not appear to have much effect; but it would be seen from the telegram of the 24th of September, that, alarmed by the annexation of Angora Pequena and recent events, the Cape Ministry were now more disposed to fulfil their promises; and he should be glad to hear they had proposed, or intended, to take a grant of money for the purpose? He should be glad to know what steps the Cape Government had taken to give effect to the promise of the 24th of September? He remembered that in July Mr. Upington, Cape Premier, used very strong language in the House of Assembly, and the House itself passed unani- mously in the same sense, and, consequently, the Cape Ministry were bound. This did not commit the Government to any definite course. Had the Government any Vote to the Assembly? Mr. Upington's answer of the 24th of September said that the Cape would be bound by the Imperial Government in the terms de- cided on the 26th of July. He asked—

Mr. Upington then

in its next Session a measure for the annexation to this Colony of the territory on the South-West Border of the South African Republic, now under British protection, provided, first, that such course should meet with the approval of Her Majesty's Imperial Government; secondly, that there be no alteration in the condition of the territory proposed to be annexed which would involve this Colony in responsibilities not contemplated by Parliament at the time of passing the Resolutions referred to in His Excellency's Minute under reply; thirdly, that the Convention of London be ratified by the Volksraad of the South African Republic; fourthly, that no unwillingness be shown to annexation by the inhabitants of the territory proposed to be annexed; and, fifthly, that no demand be made upon this Colony by Her Majesty's Imperial Government for any expenditure incurred in the assertion of British protection up to the date of annexation, and that the territory proposed to be annexed be transferred to this Colony free from debt."

This, then, did not contemplate any contribution to the expense of restoring order and establishing the Protectorate; but only stated that after the Imperial Government had pulled the chestnuts out of the fire the Colonial Government would be disposed to eat them. The necessary expenses were not even to be a charge on Bechuanaland itself; because, by Mr. Upington's conditions, the country was to be handed over free from debt. Practically, therefore, under this arrangement, the whole burden would be thrown on England. He could not believe that our fellow-countrymen at the Cape would approve this; and he hoped they might hear from Her Majesty's Government that the Cape Ministry had reconsidered the matter. For his own part, he must say that he always had grave misgivings as to the policy of assuming a Protectorate over Bechuanaland; and he was glad to see that the Earl of Derby had impressed on the Government of the Cape that it was only in deference to the strong representations of the late Premier of the Cape Colony, and relying on the co-operation of the Colony, that they insisted on securing for the Colony the important provision respecting the trade route. If the Cape Parliament and Government were not prepared to fulfil their promises, they must reconsider the position which they had taken up at great expense in the belief that they were acting in accordance with the strong wishes of our fellow-countrymen at the Cape. The country would also, he believed, support Her Majesty's Government in holding the Transvaal responsible for any ex-

out what information the Earl of Derby had in his possession of the state of things in Bechuanaland when he so telegraphed. In the first place, he had learnt, by a telegram of the 11th of September from Sir Hercules Robinson, that Montsioa had been attacked and defeated, and that, reduced to extremities, he had been forced to surrender himself, his people, and his property, unconditionally, to the Boers. The Earl of Derby must have been aware that, though the surrender was made nominally to the Goshen Republic, yet as that Republic was "under the supervision" of the Transvaal Government, Montsioa's territory was practically annexed by that Government. He had been informed also of the conduct of Joubert, the accredited Agent of that Government, who negotiated this Treaty with Montsioa. By another telegram of the 15th of September, he had been informed by Sir Hercules Robinson that the position of affairs called for "immediate consideration;" that the movements were believed to have been instigated by Transvaal officials; and that there seemed but little prospect of the new Convention being observed so long as it was thought that the Imperial Government did not intend to enforce it; that—

"If it were only believed that Her Majesty's Government meant to insist on the boundaries fixed by the Convention being respected, and the independence of the Natives, whom we have promised to protect, it might be possible, even then, to accomplish those objects without fighting; but to induce that belief it would be necessary to announce the decision firmly, and to make ostensible preparations for fighting."

By a telegram of the 17th of September, Sir Hercules Robinson again pressed for leave to announce to the Transvaal Government that existing engagements would be insisted on, if necessary, by force of arms; and stated that he was still of opinion—

"That if the Transvaal and the freebooters saw that Her Majesty's Government were determined, the difficulties might be arranged without actual fighting."

It would thus be seen by the Committee that Sir Hercules Robinson had made the Earl of Derby fully aware of the grave and increasing difficulties of the case; of the danger of delay and inactivity; and that he had pressed for authority to make some firm and decided representations to the Transvaal Government, which, if made, he thought even then might prevent the necessity of fighting. Now, what was the answer? It would be found in the Earl of Derby's telegram of September 21, to which had before referred. It was couched in the usual stereotyped form—"Y 11th, 15th, and 17th receiving consideration." Surely, it would have been too much to expect from the Secretary of State that he should, in such circumstances, and under such a sure from Sir Hercules Robinson, authorized him to inform the Transvaal Government that this Government distinctly intended to stand by the Convention, and to fulfil their pledges, by force, if necessary, to protect Montsioa's territory from the freebooting Boers. In this telegram of September 21 the Earl of Derby goes on—

"It is desirable that I should have expressed the Ministers' recommendations in a more explicit manner, and to be understood as a guarantee of co-operation to be given by the Colony on account of trade route and otherwise if active measures taken."

But he would ask, why should Her Majesty's Government have waited to know what the Cape Government were willing to do before returning a decided answer that they were prepared to fulfil their Imperial engagements? In truth, the answer was practically given to the pressing telegrams—in other words, the indication of their policy was given by Sir Hercules Robinson until October. What could Sir Hercules Robinson gather from this silence but that Her Majesty's Government had either made up their minds what line to take, or that they had resolved to pursue a policy of inaction and waiting until events? What would the Transvaal Government be led to believe when they found no immediate notice taken by Her Majesty's Government of the flagrant violation of the Convention of London? They had telegraphed on the 17th of September direct to the Earl of Derby: "Being implored by Montsioa, to take him under protection." The Earl of Derby knew from Sir Hercules Robinson the real state of the case, and the conduct of Mr. Joubert in negotiating this so-called Treaty with Montsioa; but, as he returned no answer to the Transvaal Government to their telegram of the 17th until early in October, what could the Transvaal Government believe that they had succeeded in passing their version of the case upon him,

costly concessions, made at the expense of the British taxpayer. It was much to be regretted that the present Cape Ministry had hitherto not carried out the promises made by Sir Thomas Scanlen, and which had involved this country in heavy liabilities. It was said that the Cape could not undertake indefinite responsibilities. But this country had done so on the faith of their representations. It was very hard on the British taxpayer that the cost of a policy in which his interest was so infinitesimal should fall on him, and, in his opinion, Sir Hercules Robinson's communications to the Cape Government had been most judicious. He justly observed that the present obligations were unwillingly undertaken by the British Government at the request and in the interest of the Cape, and under the distinct promise of contribution to the expenses, and of cordial co-operation; and he concluded—

"As the Governor feels very strongly that this promise is binding in honour on the Colony, he would fail in his duty to Ministers if he were to withhold from them the frank expression of this opinion."

That was in July, and did not appear to have had much effect; but it would seem, from the telegram of the 24th of September, that, alarmed by the German annexation of Angra Pequena and other recent events, the Cape Ministry were now more disposed to fulfil their promises; and he should be glad to know whether they had proposed, or would propose, to take a grant of money for this purpose? He should be glad, therefore, to know what steps the Cape Government had taken to give effect to the telegram of the 24th of September? They must remember that in July Mr. Upington, the Cape Premier, used very similar language in the House of Assembly. The House itself passed unanimously a Resolution in the same sense, and yet, subsequently, the Cape Ministry intended that this did not commit the Cape to anything definite. Had the Ministers proposed any Vote to the Assembly, as was urged on them by Sir Hercules Robinson? Mr. Upington's telegram of the 24th of September said that the Ministers of the Cape would be prepared to render the Imperial Government their co-operation in the terms defined in their Minute of the 26th of July. Now, what were those terms?—

"The Cape Ministry," Mr. Upington then said, "will be prepared to propose to Parliament in its next Session a measure for the annexation to this Colony of the territory on the South-West Border of the South African Republic, now under British protection, provided, first, that such course should meet with the approval of Her Majesty's Imperial Government; secondly, that there be no alteration in the condition of the territory proposed to be annexed which would involve this Colony in responsibilities not contemplated by Parliament at the time of passing the Resolutions referred to in His Excellency's Minute under reply; thirdly, that the Convention of London be ratified by the Volksraad of the South African Republic; fourthly, that no unwillingness be shown to annexation by the inhabitants of the territory proposed to be annexed; and, fifthly, that no demand be made upon this Colony by Her Majesty's Imperial Government for any expenditure incurred in the assertion of British protection up to the date of annexation, and that the territory proposed to be annexed be transferred to this Colony free from debt."

This, then, did not contemplate any contribution to the expense of restoring order and establishing the Protectorate; but only stated that after the Imperial Government had pulled the chestnuts out of the fire the Colonial Government would be disposed to eat them. The necessary expenses were not even to be a charge on Bechuanaland itself; because, by Mr. Upington's conditions, the country was to be handed over free from debt. Practically, therefore, under this arrangement, the whole burden would be thrown on England. He could not believe that our fellow-countrymen at the Cape would approve this; and he hoped they might hear from Her Majesty's Government that the Cape Ministry had reconsidered the matter. For his own part, he must say that he always had grave misgivings as to the policy of assuming a Protectorate over Bechuanaland; and he was glad to see that the Earl of Derby had impressed on the Government of the Cape that it was only in deference to the strong representations of the late Premier of the Cape Colony, and relying on the co-operation of the Colony, that they insisted on securing for the Colony the important provision respecting the trade route. If the Cape Parliament and Government were not prepared to fulfil their promises, they must reconsider the position which they had taken up at great expense in the belief that they were acting in accordance with the strong wishes of our fellow-countrymen at the Cape. The country would also, he believed, support Her Majesty's Government in holding the Transvaal responsible for any ex-

ting the marauders tory of the Transvaal
tions. The Republic justly observed, the claim they would have to make on the Republic for the expenses which their neglect had entailed on us would greatly depend on the action they might now take in bringing the offenders to justice. Of course, great allowance must be made for the weakness of the Transvaal Government. Still, he regretted that the representations made to the Transvaal had been treated with unbecoming levity.

For instance, in reply to the remonstrances of the British Resident with reference to the robberies and murders committed by the Boers from the Transvaal, the Transvaal Government wrote as follows:—

"Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated 7th instant. I am instructed to state in reply that his Honour the State President is deeply grieved to hear of the bloody conflicts which have taken place in the Rooi-Grond. His Honour has always considered that the only way to put an end to these troubles is by proceeding in a peace-loving way, and not by violence. The Executive Council will be called together as soon as possible to consider the proposal to send a Commissioner." Of course, it is quite absurd to proceed against robbers and murderers in a "peace-loving way." Again, Captain Bowers mentioned that, so far from attempting to check and punish these atrocities—

"The public enlistment of volunteers at Pretoria had been for some time going on without let or hindrance from the Transvaal Government."

Perhaps they would be told that the Transvaal authorities had not sufficient power to prevent these atrocities. But what did they say with reference to the treacherous imprisonment of Mr. Wright? The Transvaal Government wrote to the High Commissioner—

Sir John Lubbock

"Through the Hon. Mr. R. Rutherford temporarily acting as Consular official of England at Pretoria, this Government has been informed that the Volunteers of Rooi-Grond, under cover of a flag of truce, have taken prisoner Mr. Wright, Assistant British Commissioner in Bechuanaland. While taking cognizance of this, I have the honour to acquaint your Excellency that this Government have no doubt that both the Special Commissioners who have been sent off will know how to adjust this matter also."

They did not express the slightest contrition, or make any apology; and, so far from disclaiming responsibility, they firmly stated that their Commissioner would be able to "adjust this matter."

He confessed that he read that letter with much pain. He did not, however, wish to attach too much importance to what might be merely an unfortunate selection of words. He was glad to see, in a subsequent despatch of the 6th of September, that the Transvaal Government promised that it would—

"Adopt all possible measures for preventing the subjects of the Republic within the Transvaal territory from organizing predatory expeditions against those who are under Her Majesty's Protectorate in Bechuanaland, and declares anew that it is prepared to co-operate in a friendly spirit with Her Majesty's Government for maintaining peace and tranquillity in those regions."

Of course, none of them doubted the success of the Expedition which was about to be undertaken; but they could not but ask themselves what was to happen when the object of the Expedition had been achieved. If it was not worth while for the Cape Colony to interfere in this matter and co-operate with us, surely it was not worth our while to carry this matter any further. He could not say we had any legal obligation to protect these people indefinitely. What was to happen if we expelled the marauders? As long as Native Chiefs were prepared to give farms of 4,000 acres to every volunteer who came for a year's service he was afraid we must expect that there would be disturbance in South Africa. He observed from the Papers that the Colonial Governments were continually saying that this, that, and other must be paid for out of Imperial funds. There was a great fallacy in the expression "Imperial funds." The fact of the matter, unfortunately, was that there were no such funds as Imperial funds. What was meant when they talked of "Imperial funds" was that the English taxpayer must pay for the Expeditions. We were all anxious to co-operate with the Cape Colony, and do everything reasonably in our power to promote their interests; but it was impossible for us to go on voting and spending million after million for wars in all parts of the world. The Committee had already that evening voted one very large sum for a war in the North of Africa, and they were now called upon for another very large sum in South Africa. While he was not prepared to oppose this Vote, he was very much concerned about the Protectorate of Bechuanaland. He was very glad indeed to see the despatch of the Earl of Derby on page 76 of the Blue Book, in which the noble Earl warned the Cape Government that they must not expect that we should go on indefinitely in this course. We had undertaken this Protectorate in deference to the strong representations made to us by the Cape Government, relying, at the same time, upon the co-operation of that Government. He was pleased to find that at a meeting recently held in the Cape Colony the Colonists seemed much more disposed to co-operate with the Mother Country in a generous and liberal spirit than the Government had hitherto done. He believed that if the matter was placed before them that would be the general feeling of the Colonists. We were most anxious to co-operate with them in every respect, and promote, as far as possible, the prospects and well-being of the Cape. Still, he thought the Colonists must realize that if they were not prepared to come forward and co-operate with us in this matter, we should then be obliged to reconsider the position we had taken up in Bechuanaland, a position which we took up very reluctantly, and only in deference to what we believed to be the strong wishes and the interests of the Cape Colonists.

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY said, he was glad to understand from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire Sir Michael Hicks-Beach that it would be more convenient to the Opposition to take a discussion on this Vote, if necessary, on the Report, which he Mr Evelyn Ashley was in a position to say would be taken on Thursday next. He should not have risen to say anything had not the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) made some observations to which he felt bound to reply. The hon. Baronet said that Mankoroane had found out that he must not lean on the protection of England. As a matter of fact, neither Mankoroane, nor Montsioa, nor any other Chief, had any claim or right to say they were under the protection of England until England declared the Protectorate. There was no sort of Treaty with them, so that their right to rely upon the protection of England dated only from the time the Protectorate was proclaimed, and that was in the early portion of this year. Then the hon. Baronet devoted a good deal of time to complaining of the delay from the time the Government first heard of the action of the Transvaal Government till the telegram of the 7th of October. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) supposed he had cleared up that point. Certainly he went into some details to show, what the hon. Baronet omitted to show, that the Government were requested by Sir Hercules Robinson to withhold their answer, and that the remainder of the time was devoted to telegraphic communication with the Cape, that they might know what the views of the Cape Ministers were, and what the exact state of things was before they arrived at a final decision. He hoped the hon. Baronet remembered what the final decision involved. It involved war with the Transvaal as a Government, and therefore he did not think Her Majesty's Government took too long a time to consider what form the demand should assume. As a matter of fact, all they could have done was to have anticipated all their proceedings by one fortnight, because it must be borne in mind that the action the Government had taken with regard to the Transvaal Government was then and was now apart from the action to be taken with reference to the free-traders. Then the hon. Baronet complained of the Government's want of attention, and as an illustration said that they gave no answer to the telegram of the 13th of October, in which Sir Hercules Robinson asked them to give instructions as to additional police. The answer to that was simply that they did reply that Mr. Rhodes was to wait for instructions. The whole condition of affairs was changed since then. At that time there was a question of 400 additional police; but,

of police was not

 d. He (Mr. Evelyn ) had already called attention to spatch of the 22nd of October, high Sir Hercules Robinson was rized to communicate with the avaal Govern- ment to that effect.
 w only one v l further as to what from the l Baronet the Member for the Univer of London (Sir John Lubbock) about happened about Mr. Wright was that he was induced under a flag of truce to put himself in the hands of the freebooters. As soon as Sir Hercules Robinson heard of the occurrence he communicated with the Transvaal Government, and they sent out M. Joubert —they certainly used the very odd expression "to adjust the matter," which his hon. Friend had commented upon; but what was meant was that they would put the matter right—but before M.
 Joubert arrived at the frontier, Mr.
 Wright had got away and the matter was determined. Reference had been made to Mr. Bethell. Well, the position of Mr. Bethell's case was still under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; but it was not by any means so simple as hon. Members imagined. They had received a communication from Cape Town, in which it was said that it was not possible for the Government to make any demand, because they had no power to try the murderers, inasmuch as the murder was not committed in either the Transvaal or British territory. The Government, however, had consulted their own Law Officers, and he thought that by their aid it would be possible to overcome some of the legal impediments in the way, and, if so, the Government would make a demand to the Transvaal Government for the surrender of the murderers. One word merely as to what his hon. Friend (Sir John Lubbock) said about the co-operation of the Cape Government. With a great deal of what the hon. Baronet said he cordially agreed, and he recalled what he said last Session in the debate upon Transvaal affairs, as to the duty of British subjects out there to exert themselves more to assert and support and maintain the British connection, and not to leave everything to the Imperial Government.

 He thought, however, that in the meetings held and speeches recently made at the Cape, there was good proof that the British subjects would in future be willing to co-operate with us and take some trouble and risk to maintain British influence and the British connection. He was certain Her Majesty's Government fully shared the feelings of the hon. Baronet upon the question of the co-operation of the Cape Government. No doubt, the Ministry of Sir Thomas Scanlan was much more ready and willing to actively co-operate with us than the present Ministry. When he was over here, Sir Thomas Scanlan held out a great prospect of real and cordial co-operation; but, as the hon.
 Baronet was no doubt aware, between the dates of Sir Thomas Scanlan's interview with Her Majesty's Government and the signing of the Convention and the arrival of Sir Hercules Robinson and Mr. Mackenzie at the scene of action, there was a change of Ministry, Sir Thomas Scanlan went out and the new Ministry came in, and certainly the new Ministry had not acted quite so cordially with us as Sir Thomas Scanlan's Ministry did. He (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) was far from saying that the new Ministry did not intend to co-operate with us; in words they had undoubtedly done so, and he trusted they would be found to do so in their actions. They certainly had great sympathy with the Dutch population; but their Representatives had now gone to Bechuanaland on the distinct understanding that if they could succeed in obtaining that which was indispensable by their own efforts, we would not employ force. If, after a reasonable time had elapsed, it was found they could not by their own efforts succeed, force would be employed. His hope and belief was, however, that they were so impressed with the value of the British connection that even if we had to resort to arms we should not find them fail us on this occasion.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND said, he did not rise for the purpose of unnecessarily prolonging the discussion which had taken place on this Vote; but he felt that it was necessary for him in the discharge of what he considered to be a duty in opposing the Vote to explain, as briefly and as satisfactorily as he

could, the reasons why he most certainly should record his vote against the application of so much money to the purpose for which this money was now being asked. He was sorry that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) did not remain in his place after he had proposed this Vote, because he (Mr. W. Redmond) would have liked to have noticed how the noble Marquess took the remarks which fell from the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) and from the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock). The noble Marquess said very distinctly, and he (Mr. W. Redmond) was very glad to hear it, that this money was to be applied to the purpose of punishing some freebooters in South Africa. Now, it would be very satisfactory not only to the Members of the House, but to the people of the country, who, of course, were the most interested parties in the voting of a large sum of money for war purposes, to have some guarantee from the Government that this money would not be devoted to any other purpose but the punishment of marauders who had perpetrated outrages in South Africa. Certainly, the tone of the speeches delivered by the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) and his Friends upon the Opposition side of the House in the debate upon South African affairs which took place some time ago was altogether different to the tone which had been adopted to-night by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War. While the noble Marquess proclaimed it to be the sole intention of the Government to make war upon the freebooters, undoubtedly the tone of the speeches proceeding from the Conservative Benches with reference to the South African Boers might be interpreted to mean that the Opposition wanted Her Majesty's Government to use this money not so much for the purpose of punishing the freebooters as for the purpose of actually initiating another war with the Transvaal Republic. The whole tone and tenour of the speeches delivered in the debate raised some time ago by the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) and his hon. Friends was that of bitter hatred and resentment against the Boer Republic; and he (Mr. W. Redmond) felt it his duty, as an independent Member of the House—independent so far as he cared very little for the interests of Parties in the House, and so far as the interests of Great Britain in South Africa troubled him very little—to raise his voice in protest against the tone of the speeches and the actions of certain hon. Gentlemen in the House, who had spoken really for the purpose of exciting in the country a war feeling against the Boers, who were a young people, if he might use the term, but, after all, a brave people, who had nobly fought for their liberty, and who, in winning it, had beaten the Imperial soldiers of this country. Every one of the speeches which were delivered in the discussion which was the result of the Motion of the hon. Member for Midhurst displayed a characteristic which was extremely contemptible in the people of this country—namely, the characteristic that whenever or wherever the English people were beaten in fair and open fight, as they were undoubtedly beaten by the Boers, it was their invariable custom to lose no opportunity of maligning and of slandering the people who had beaten them. He noticed that in the speeches which came from the Conservative Benches, prompting Her Majesty's Government to take the action they were about to take, very little indeed was said with reference to the action of the freebooters alone; but it was imputed, all through the speeches of Conservative Members, that the freebooters were acting, if not with the actual support, certainly with the silent sanction of the Transvaal Republic. The hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst, in his speech that night, again insinuated as much—indeed, he had said absolutely that if the freebooters were not receiving the actual countenance of the Boer Republic, they were receiving the silent co-operation of that Republic. He (Mr. W. Redmond) asserted, with all the responsibility which attached to his words as a Member of the House of Commons, that he did not think there ever was a more unfounded or more unworthy accusation hurled against the people of any country than the charge which had been made against the Boer Republic, that they countenanced these freebooters. In the speeches which had been delivered he noticed there was not one particle of proof to support the statement that the Transvaal Republic was responsible for booters. One of the Majesty's Government the action which he were about to take, all, a British officer, hands of these men. Bethell, personally he officer had met with ; but the language ell's death was de- in the House was altogether in- ate and misleading. He remem- d that, in one speech delivered from position Be nes, it was insinuated r. Bethell had been foully mur- ed, and that his death was due in- irectly, if not absolut...

action of the Transvaal Republic. It was contemptible, it was child-like, for English Members to rise in the House of Commons and to speak in such a way of the death of Mr. Bethell. How did Mr. Bethell die? He was heading a party of men who were to make an attack upon the people who killed him. ["Oh, oh!"] He was killed in action.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: He was wounded, and while on the ground he was killed in cold blood.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, that Mr. Bethell was mortally wounded in action. If he (Mr. W. Redmond) remembered rightly, the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) stated most distinctly, in the debate which was raised upon the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland), that Mr. Bethell had received his death-wound before he was actually killed. What he (Mr. W. Redmond) asserted, without fear of contradiction, was that Mr. Bethell met his death in an action, that he was heading an armed party, and that most undoubtedly, if he had not been killed, he would certainly have killed some of the people he went to attack. If, therefore, hon. Gentlemen sifted the case, and looked at it in an unprejudiced and a matter-of-fact way, they found it amounted to this—that Mr. Bethell, a British officer in a foreign country, whose people were not at all enamoured of British rule, and whose people were not at all impressed with the desirability of that rule, met his death in an action he was taking against the people. It was said that Mr. Bethell had been foully murdered, that he had met his death at the hands of the Boers, and it was insinuated also that the Boers were barbarians. There was no adjective too strong to use against the Boers in the course of the debate to which he had already referred. The Boers were assassins and everything that was bad, because, some time ago, their marksmen proved they could shoot better than the British soldiers. The Boers beat the British troops at Majuba Hill, and the memory of that defeat was rankling in the breasts of Englishmen; and what it was desired to do was to initiate a war against the Boers under the guise of an Expedition against the freebooters.

posed Expedition was unworthy of the Government, and it was contemptible that Conservative Gentlemen like the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) should, by violent speeches against the Boers, by their unlimited abuse of the Boers, endeavour to create a war feeling in the country and to ultimately compel the Government to take action against the Boer Republic. It was utterly indefensible that hon. Gentlemen who probably would never, by any chance, place their own lives in danger should come down to the House and, in an irresponsible sort of way, do their best to bring war upon the heads of the people in South Africa, and to cause the blood of the soldiery of this country to be shed, and millions of the treasure of this country to be spent, in a most unprofitable war. In support of the statement that Mr. Bethell met his death at the hands of the Boer Republic, it had been said that the Boer Republic had refused to deliver up the so-called murderers of Mr. Bethell. That was put forward as a reason why the Government should take strong action against the Boer Republic; but such an argument was so child-like that it was with surprise he heard it used in the House. So far from encouraging the action in which Mr. Bethell met his death, the Boer Government had, by Proclamation, declared that it was their desire that the people of the Transvaal should not take the action suggested; and as for the charge that the Republic refused to give up the murderers of Mr. Bethell, it had not yet been proved, and he did not think there had been any attempt to prove, that they even knew who the murderers were. If some English gentleman—let them suppose the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) himself—were to go upon an expedition to Spain, and there met his death at the hands of some freebooters or robbers, and if the Government of Spain were wholly ignorant of the men who caused the hon. Member's death, and they were to say so, and if they refused, as undoubtedly they would have to refuse, to give up the murderers, would this country go to war with Spain? In this case, it was desired by hon. Gentlemen that we should go to war with the Transvaal Government because they would not deliver up to the British authorities the men who killed a British officer, and who were totally unknown to the Government of the Transvaal. Again, the attack upon Montsioa was declared to have been the direct outcome of the action of the Transvaal Government. He would refer the Committee to one brief paragraph in the first Blue Book issued with reference to the affairs of the Transvaal—words from a despatch from Sir Hercules Robinson to the Earl of Derby. On the 26th of June, Sir Hercules Robinson said—

“Rutherford telegraphs that the Transvaal Republic are issuing strong Proclamations prohibiting burghers to take part in hostilities against Montsioa.”

And yet they had it stated by such Gentlemen as the hon. Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) that the Government of the Transvaal were responsible for these hostilities. Such statements as that would go forth to the people of this country, who did not take the trouble to read the Blue Books themselves, and who trusted for their information on Colonial and Foreign affairs to the representations of persons like the hon. Baronet. The English public would accept the statement that the Transvaal Government was responsible for the attack on Montsioa, whereas the truth of the matter was that so far from conniving in the attack on Montsioa, the Government of the Transvaal went to the trouble of issuing a Proclamation warning the citizens of the Transvaal to have nothing at all to do with it. Did the Committee not see that Her Majesty's Government, in taking action, and in sending a force to South Africa, were altogether following the advice they received from the Conservative Benches? He recollected that in the course of one of the debates they had had on this question, it was strongly urged that it was no use sending Sir Charles Warren to the Cape, unless they sent him backed up with a goodly force of British troops. Her Majesty's Government had, to some extent, taken the advice of Gentlemen like the late Lord Mayor of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler), who, in the debate to which he (Mr. Redmond) had referred, had delivered a most sanguinary and ferocious speech, which he certainly was surprised to hear from the lips of that hon. Member, having regard to the character which he possessed for geniality and good nature. If Her Majesty's Government had altogether taken the advice of the Opposition, they would have sent quite as large a body of troops to South Africa to make war on the Boers as they were sending to the Nile to relieve General Gordon—in regard to which Expedition Her Majesty's Government had been again led by speeches coming from Conservative Members. To listen to some of these speeches, it would appear as though there could be no hope of settling the affairs of South Africa without sending a large military force out there. Again he would quote a few words from the first Blue Book bearing on the affairs of the Transvaal. The late Lord Mayor of London had said that Sir Charles Warren should be accompanied by a large force of British troops. No doubt, the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst—although he had not heard him say it—had also recommended that a large force should be sent. [No, no!"] Well, if the hon. Baronet had not said so directly, he had indirectly. At any rate, several hon. Gentlemen on that (the Conservative) side of the House had recommended in plain language the employment of a large force, and Sir Charles Warren had gone out with 40 officers. But while they had hon. Members on the Conservative Benches—most of whom, he believed, were in some way connected with the Military Profession, and, therefore, not altogether averse to times of war, which were times of promotion and general gain for people belonging to the Army—recommending that a large Expedition should be sent out to the Cape, and while the people of England, reading their speeches, were led into the belief that a large force was necessary, what did they find Mr. Mackenzie saying—the action of the freebooters. One of the reasons why Her Majesty's Government were urged to take the action which he was sorry to say they were about to take, was, that Mr. Bethell, a British officer, met his death at the hands of these men. Speaking of Mr. Bethell, personally he was sorry that that officer had met with so lamentable an end; but the language in which Mr. Bethell's death was described in the House was altogether inaccurate and misleading. He remembered that, in one speech delivered from the Opposition Benches, it was insinuated that Mr. Bethell had been foully murdered, and that his death was due indirectly, if not absolutely directly, to the action of the Transvaal Republic. It was contemptible, it was child-like, for English Members to rise in the House of Commons and to speak in such a way of the death of Mr. Bethell. How did Mr. Bethell die? He was heading a party of men who were to make an attack upon the people who killed him. ["Oh, oh!"] He was killed in action.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: He was wounded, and while on the ground he was killed in cold blood.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND said, that Mr. Bethell was mortally wounded in action. If he (Mr. W. Redmond) remembered rightly, the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) stated most distinctly, in the debate which was raised upon the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland), that Mr. Bethell had received his death-wound before he was actually killed. What he (Mr. W. Redmond) asserted, without fear of contradiction, was that Mr. Bethell met his death in an action, that he was heading an armed party, and that most undoubtedly, if he had not been killed, he would certainly have killed some of the people he went to attack. If, therefore, hon. Gentlemen sifted the case, and looked at it in an unprejudiced and a matter-of-fact way, they found it amounted to this—that Mr. Bethell, a British officer in a foreign country, whose people were not at all enamoured of British rule, and whose people were not at all impressed with the desirability of that rule, met his death in an action he was taking against the people. It was said that Mr. Bethell had been foully murdered, that he had met his death at the hands of the Boers, and it was insinuated also that the Boers were barbarians. There was no adjective too strong to use against the Boers in the course of the debate to which he had already referred. The Boers were assassins and everything that was bad, because, some time ago, their marksmen proved they could shoot better than the British soldiers. The Boers beat the British troops at Majuba Hill, and the memory of that defeat was rankling in the breasts of Englishmen; and what it was desired to do was to initiate a war against the Boers under the guise of an Expedition against the freebooters. The proposed Expedition was unworthy of the Government, and it was contemptible that Conservative Gentlemen like the hon. Baronet the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) should, by violent speeches against the Boers, by their unlimited abuse of the Boers, endeavour to create a war feeling in the country and to ultimately compel the Government to take action against the Boer Republic. It was utterly indefensible that hon. Gentlemen who probably would never, by any chance, place their own lives in danger should come down to the House and, in an irresponsible sort of way, do their best to bring war upon the heads of the people in South Africa, and to cause the blood of the soldiery of this country to be shed, and millions of the treasure of this country to be spent, in a most unprofitable war. In support of the statement that Mr. Bethell met his death at the hands of the Boer Republic, it had been said that the Boer Republic had refused to deliver up the so-called murderers of Mr. Bethell. That was put forward as a reason why the Government should take strong action against the Boer Republic; but such an argument was so child-like that it was with surprise he heard it used in the House. So far from encouraging the action in which Mr. Bethell met his death, the Boer Government had, by Proclamation, declared that it was their desire that the people of the Transvaal should not take the action suggested; and as for the charge that the Republic refused to give up the murderers of Mr. Bethell, it had not yet been proved, and he did not think there had been any attempt to prove, that they even knew who the murderers were. If some English gen-across 6,000 miles of ocean. All they asked was for leave to live in that land of their adoption without the interference of the Parliament of this country. Of course, it might be said that there was no intention of making war on the Transvaal Republic, and that the Expedition was only for the purpose of punishing the freebooters. He would call the attention of hon. Members to debates which had taken place in years gone by—debates before the Zulu War was initiated. He remembered the cheerful way in which hon. Members had spoken of it, describing it as a "raid," and the Zulus as "a people who only required to be punished." In that way Great Britain had gradually drifted into a war with that great savage race—a war which resulted in some of the most ignominious disasters to the British arms that the whole history of the country could afford. So he said that day. If the Government interfered at all—if they went even to the fringe of the Transvaal Republic—they would ultimately bring about a war with the Boers, who were an unoffending people. They would plunge this country into debt and misfortunes of every kind. He thought himself perfectly justified, therefore, in lifting up his voice in opposition to the Vote that night; and he believed he was only speaking the sentiments of many people in the country when he said that there was no necessity for an Expedition to the Transvaal. Let them look at the war from a purely Colonial point of view. What was the trouble? In the Cape Colony some 80 per cent of the people were of Dutch descent. Taking all the Cape populations together, they were Dutch in sentiment and Dutch in blood. There were some British subjects there who had suffered from raids made by Dutch freebooters. The British Colonists were not able to defend themselves against the inroads of their Dutch neighbours. Very well; what did these British subjects ask for? They sent home to a Government 6,000 miles away for Generals, officers, and troops to punish the men who had invaded their territory, and to save them from further invasion. It was all very well to comply with that request once in a way; but the question hon. Members had to ask themselves was—"Are we prepared for all time in the future to keep a large garrison of British troops in South Africa?" He did not think that even the most Conservative Member in the House—the Gentleman who had most warmly declared himself in favour of this Expedition—would rise in his place and say that he would like to see South Africa permanently garrisoned by British troops. He did not believe there was any intention on the part of the Government despatching the Expedition to do anything of that kind. He did not believe there was any such wish in the breasts of the Conservative Members urging them to take their present action. But let this be remembered. They had had a war with the Boers. The Boers had beaten them. They patched up a peace, and came away. As soon as their troops were withdrawn, what happened? Why, some Dutchmen—irresponsible men, not accountable to the Transvaal Republic, but still Dutchmen—crossed the border, and attacked British Colonists; and now, for the second time within a few years, they were sending out a General and troops to defend the British Colonists against the Dutch. It would be admitted very readily that if the English Colonists were not able to defend themselves without assistance in South Africa against anyone who might attack them, the sooner the Dutch claimed ascendancy in South Africa the better. They could not be always sending out troops, and backing up the English Colonists against the Dutch; and unless they made up their minds to keep up a large permanent Force in South Africa, they would have to give way. Send out the Expedition; beat the Boers, or let the Boers beat them. What would be the result? They might restore peace, and drive the freebooters back; but how long would that peace last? What guarantee had they that, when their troops had been withdrawn, the Dutch would not again attack the British Colonists? The real view to take of this question was this—to let the people who were strongest be uppermost. They might suppress for the time being the march of the Dutch towards ascendancy over these Colonies, but they would only be able to suppress it for the time being. When their troops were withdrawn, the Dutch would again make inroads. Sooner or later, the Dutch element would prevail in South Africa; and that part of the objected to anything which might do that, not because he wished to save this country from expenditure or from blood, but simply because he did not wish to see a brave people like the Boers, who had fought for their liberty and had gallantly won it, pressed down and rendered helpless for a time by the brute force it was in the power of the British Government to bring to bear on them. He had no sympathy with the present Government, nor with any of their policy. He had no more sympathy for their Colonial policy than he had for their policy with regard to his own country; but he would say that one of the best actions perpetrated by a Minister of the Crown in that House for some time was when the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. Gladstone) declared that it was the intention of the Government not to proceed farther with the war against the Boers. The right hon. Gentleman recognized the fact that the Boers had beaten the British Forces.

He recognized that it would be impossible to prop up British authority in the Transvaal always by British soldiers.
He withdrew the troops. He (Mr. W.
Redmond) did not say that the right hon. Gentleman in so doing had been acting magnanimously. He did not say that he was actuated by any other motive than a conviction that sooner or later British ascendancy would have ceased in South Africa. The conclusion of the War with the Boers was a good thing; but it would be a bad thing for the people of this country and the Government, if out of this Expedition which was being sent to the Cape a fresh war should arise against the people of the Transvaal Republic. Once more he wished to have it on record—[Laughter.]

It was all very well for hon. Members to laugh. He knew well enough that his words would have very little weight in that House against the opinions of English Members; but he was sure that if this Expedition did result in war between this country and the Transvaal, it would be satisfaction to the people of the Transvaal to know that there were a number of Members in the English House of Commons who were totally opposed to anything which could embroil this country with them. It would be satisfactory to the people of the Transvaal to know that every time they struck for the liberty of their country and trust back the English troops, as they did at Majuba Hill, the news was received with gratification by a great many Members of the House. He wished to speak purely on behalf of the people of the Transvaal. Let the English Government spend all their money; but as long as he was sitting in the House representing a people who were struggling for liberty themselves he should never fail to raise his voice to defend, so far as it might be within his feeble power, the liberty of any people who had fought so nobly for their freedom, and whose freedom he was very much afraid was threatened by the bloodthirsty suggestions of the Conservatives in the House of Commons.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said that when the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) was speaking on the last Vote, he had asked hon. Gentlemen opposite, “Would you establish a British Empire in the heart of Africa?” The noble Marquess repudiated any such intention; and, that being so, it was a very extraordinary thing that the Government should now be bringing forward a Vote to do that very thing in South Africa —to establish an Empire, or, at any rate, a Protectorate in the heart of South Africa. If this money did not mean the maintenance of a Protectorate he did not know what it meant. He was afraid they were in for another big job—another big war. He shared the hope of the noble Marquess that possibly there would be no occasion to use force to drive the freebooters out of Bechuanaland. He still hoped that peace might be maintained, or that the war, if there was one, might be a cheap one.

He very much disliked that Her Majesty's Government thought it necessary to ask the taxpayers of the country for £725,000 for another war in the heart of Africa to establish something like dominion there. It was very much the old story of embarking originally in a small war, which, spreading by degrees, further and further, ultimately developed into a great one. At first it was said that the difficulty in Bechuanaland could be overcome by the employment of 100 policemen; but Mr. Mackenzie had never been supplied with 100 policemen. By enlisting every blackguard he could get he could only muster 30 men; then he had a difficulty in providing them with horses. After obtaining a number, on examination he found them all lame but four. When, ultimately, the horse difficulty was overcome, it was found that there were no arms. In the end Mr. Mackenzie went out without any policemen at all; and the result was that as he was found by the people against whom he was sent hardly worth attending to, he was not much respected. This was the way the war might develop into a big affair. Again, he must enter a protest against this war as being an unnecessary one. It was a conflagration started by the Press of this country, and he was afraid that the few poor Radicals below the Gangway would be unable to stop the devouring flame, and that the money asked for would be voted. If the Government were determined to carry on these hostilities, with what object did they do it? Was it to establish a Dominion in the heart of Africa; if not, what was it for? Was it to protect the Natives? If it were to do that, they would be bound to stay in the heart of South Africa and establish a Dominion there. They should not enter into the war without being prepared to fulfil their obligations. He liked to see Natives protected—he had spent best part of his life in the work of protecting them—but he did not wish to go too far, and that was what he was afraid the Government would do. Let them make up their minds what they were going to do. Would they not abandon the Natives to their fate? If there was one thing more clear than another it was that the whole upshot and issue and result of this war, when they had conquered, had possessed themselves of this territory, and had paid the piper, would be that they would find they had only been taking the chestnuts out of the fire for the Cape Government. It was perfectly clear from the Blue Books that the arrangement was that when they had made the path sufficiently clear for the Cape Government, they would take the matter out of British hands. If that was so, where was the protection of the Natives—that for which they were supposed to have undertaken the war? He had not brought down the Blue Books, or he could have quoted passages to show the view of the Cape Colonists. The Cape people said—"We are annexing this land; it is for our young men." Well, if that were so, and they were incurring this large expenditure and entering into this war for the purpose of handing over this territory to the Cape Colonists, they would be entirely failing in the object with which they had undertaken the war. That was one of the things which could not be denied. Then, the Government were not only sending out their own troops, but it appeared that they were also enlisting a large body of irregulars. Notices were published stating that young men who wished to join the irregulars in the Transvaal were to apply to certain authorities in a certain place, and he wished to know who was to pay permanently for this irregular corps which was to be enlisted and sent out to South Africa? Apparently, the war was to be one of sentiment and not one for the protection of the Natives. He believed it to be promoted in a great degree for the purpose of having a slap at the Boers. A large number of people in this country had rankling feelings in regard to their late war with the Boers, and were anxious that they should revenge themselves upon them for the defeat they had sustained. After the very pathetic account they had had of Mr. Bethell's death, he hoped that no technicality would be allowed to stand in the way of executing justice. But, at the same time, he hoped that the authorities would not come to any conclusion without sufficient evidence. What was the worth of such evidence as had now been obtained? They had the story of one Native, which read much more like the incidents of a novel than anything in real life. The man shammed death, heard all that passed, recognised all the people, and then ran away and told a story which made him out to be

As he had said before, he did not say this because he had any interest in British operations in South Africa. He did not speak from a British point of view, but because he wished it to be left on record that he had protested against any action on the part of the Government or the House which would plunge the country into war with the Transvaal Government. They had the story of one Native, which read much more like the incidents of a novel than anything in real life. The man shammed death, heard all that passed, recognized all the people, and then ran away and told a story which made him out to be a very heroic person indeed. He (Sir George Campbell) would not say that the story was not true—it might possibly be true; but he had seen far too much of such story-telling not to be somewhat suspicious of it. Thousands of such tales were set abroad during the Indian Mutiny, and they turned out to be totally untrue. Did the Government believe a story of that kind? If they did, let them bring the people accused of the murder to justice. It was the same sort of thing in regard to other stories like that of killing a little child, and matters of that kind—they did not rest upon any substantial evidence whatever. He must say that he entirely sympathized with all that had been said by his hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) with regard to the tyranny of the Colonists over us. It used to be the case that we tyrannized over the Colonies; but now the times had changed, and the Colonies tyrannized over us instead. In the Native administration, in the Cape wars, and in everything else, it was they who tyrannized over us. We had to pay upon all occasions, and it was they who reaped all the advantage. That had always been the result of these wars, and it would be the result of this one; and, therefore, he would say to the Government—"Be calm; do not act without evidence. Do not rush into a war until there is really occasion for it." The hon. Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) had told them a good deal about the injustice done to Native Chiefs; but he (Sir George Campbell) thought the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) had answered that point very clearly. These people were not under our protection until the present year. What was the injury done to Mankoroane? He had not lost an acre since the Protectorate; and it had been found that his place was nothing but a nest of thieves. There was a vivid description by the Imperial Commissioner of the state of things there, and of the multitude of thieves, and Mankoroane had himself been told of it, and had been threatened with condign punishment if he did not put a stop to it. This was the case of our particular friend who was said to have suffered so much. As to the case of Montsioa, the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Holland) had referred to some dates; but he had not referred to the 12th of May last, when Montsioa attacked the Boers and burnt their houses. The Boers thereupon declared war against him, and that war was being carried on now. He (Sir George Campbell) did not defend the Boers. He had no doubt that they were very high-handed, and that they had presumed much upon our abstention; but what had we to do with this affair in the heart of South Africa? He did not see why we went out of our way to extend our protection to these people in this year of grace. No doubt, Her Majesty's Government were driven to it; but he thought we had acted foolishly, and that we should take an opportunity to wash our hands of the business. He would be glad to go to a moderate expense in order that we might do so. We might establish our position in South Africa on a much more satisfactory basis than could be found by projecting ourselves into the heart of the country.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the Committee had just seen the wilds of Scotland and the wilds of Ireland shaking hands across the floor on this subject. The debate must have been extremely gratifying to the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), who had heard in the views put forward a reductio ad absurdum of his own opinions and of those of his Friends on this question. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Sir George Campbell) had asked what was the object of this Expedition. Well, its object was to do two things—to maintain our solemn Treaties, and to protect our allies; and if a nation, great or small, could have worthier objects than those, he would leave it to the hon. Gentleman to discover them. This was not a question of the defence of the Boers against aggression on the part of the British Empire or of British Colonists; and he would remind the hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. Redmond), who had spoken with so much fluency on this subject, that these Boers, whom that hon. Gentleman regarded as people rightly struggling to be free, were nothing more than a very cruel and tyrannical dominant class in South Africa. The cry of "Majuba Hill" was no answer to this statement. The Boers were not the mild and amiable people imagined by the hon. Gentleman—they were not even the best of the Dutch population in South Africa; but they were the outcasts of that population. When slavery was abolished in the Cape Colony, they "trekked" away into Natal in order that they might maintain their right to enslave their fellow-men; and when it was abolished in Natal, they "trekked" away across the Vaal, into the Transvaal, in order still to maintain their tyranny over human beings; and they now kept hundreds and thousands of unfortunate Natives in practically a state of slavery, denying them ordinary human rights. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) seemed to listen to this statement with considerable impetuosity, which might with advantage be restrained. But he did not know that it was very necessary to analyze that hon. Gentleman's characteristic views on the subject, because the hon. Gentleman had been publicly repudiated by his Colleagues. (Mr. Courtney: No, no. He begged the hon. Gentleman's pardon; but it was the fact that the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies had publicly repudiated the opinions of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) in that House, and had stated that that hon. Gentleman spoke only for himself when he enunciated his extraordinary views. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) repeated that the Boers were a tyrannical, oppressive, slave-driving caste in South Africa, and that they were denying human rights to 800,000 Natives who were more or less under their rule. These Boer freebooters had attacked and maltreated their neighbours in what they called Stellaland and the Land of Goshen, and had been practically encouraged by the Dutch of the Transvaal. They had stolen Montsior's land and massacred his people; then the Transvaal Government started up and annexed him, and had to be compelled by the action of this country to renounce that operation. He would like now to make a few observations with regard to statements made in that House by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain). That right hon. Gentleman was a Member of the Government which was now, in 1881, asking that House for close upon £750,000 for an Expedition to maintain Treaties which he and his Colleagues promised that House in 1881 should be enforced. The right hon. Gentleman was responsible for this Vote—as responsible as any Member of the Cabinet. And yet it was he and his Party who, by their action in 1881 and also in 1878-9, were the persons who were really responsible for the necessity of this Expedition. They were the persons who paralyzed Imperial action in 1880 and 1881. It was the influence of the President of the Board of Trade in the Ministry that enabled that feeble splutter of a Radical agitation, in 1881, to unnerve our action. (Mr. Chamberlain: There was no Liberal Ministry in 1879.) He was quite aware of that; but he was speaking of the right hon. Gentleman's action in 1881. It was the right hon. Gentleman's influence then which enabled a feeble splutter of agitation, coming from the Radicals below the Gangway, to direct the policy of the Cabinet, and which forced the Government to accept the defeat and humiliation of Majuba Hill, to have the national honour and authority unvindicated, and to submit to the Convention. It was the action of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade which paralyzed our Imperial power, and prevented us from obtaining those securities which would have rendered this Expedition wholly unnecessary. The right hon. Gentleman had invented one or two statements for the benefit of that House which were absolutely without any proof whatever. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the Natives in the Transvaal had greatly benefited by the Boer rule, and had increased under it. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) traversed that statement, and he challenged the right hon. Gentleman to any proof. In spite of the very superior countenance which the right hon. Gentleman just now assumed, he challenged him to give proof. There were the Representatives of all the Native populations in the Transvaal, who in 1881, went before our Commissioners, and begged and implored that they might not be sent back under the tyranny of the Boers. So strong and unanimous was their evidence that the High Commissioners did not venture to face them in person, but sent their Secretary to hear the complaints. Every Chief within and around the Transvaal uttered his indignant protest against being handed back to the oppression of these Boers, who, the right hon. Gentleman had dared to state, were popular among the Natives.

The Blue Books which contained these damning facts were carefully suppressed for months, so that at that time Parliament and the country knew nothing of what was going on. It was absolutely contrary to the fact that the Natives, either in or out of the Transvaal, had benefited by the Boer rule. What was the treatment of Mapoch, an unoffending Chief on the borders of the Transvaal? He offered to come to the relief of our hard-pressed garrison at Leydenburg. After the Convention he was set upon by the Boers, his fort blown up by dynamite, and he himself condemned to hard labour for life, because he dared to defend his liberty. His people were compelled to go into practical serfdom, being forced into indentures under the Dutch farmers. How had Mankoroane and Montsion been treated by the Boers, in violation of Treaty and because they were our friends? These were the Boers, of whom the right hon. Gentleman spoke so highly. There was one other thing that had been said by the right hon. Gentleman. He had talked of a great union of the Dutch in South Africa against the British Empire. The right hon. Gentleman remarked that he would not venture to say that the might of the British Empire might not be able satisfactorily to cope with such opposition; but he thought it would prove to be a bitter and costly struggle. Was there ever a more ridiculous statement than that? They had heard nothing of the union of the Dutch element until the surrender and retreat of the British Ministry in South Africa. It was their surrender and retreat which gave the impetus to the Africander movement. The only danger of the Dutch element superseding the British element was the danger which might be caused by the present Government itself. By dealing in a weak and powerless fashion with South Africa, they might render it necessary for a stronger element to rise and do that which British influence under the present Administration had proved itself incapable of doing. It was Her Majesty's Government who had stimulated Dutch action in the Cape, and it would only be their weakness that would encourage it. However, he congratulated the Government that they were willing at last, after allowing thousands to be massacred and whole racés to be ruined, to take tardy steps to retrieve the honour of the country and to discharge their bounden duty, so long neglected. He congratulated them on the course they were now taking; but he contended that we were paying a heavy price for this long delay. Just as in the case of General Gordon, in which we were paying over £2,000,000 in November, when £200,000 would have sufficed in February or March, so we were having to pay £750,000 in South Africa now for what two or three years ago would only have cost £3,000 or £4,000 for providing an efficient border police. Thus was a ten-fold cost imposed upon the British people by the long and disastrous inaction of Her Majesty's Government in Egypt and South Africa.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that one of the delusions which he was under at the last General Election was that he supposed the Liberal Party were fighting against Jingoism, and that if they succeeded there would be an era of peace throughout the world. They really could not meet in that House at any time of the year, or for any purpose, without the Government coming forward and asking for money for some war. They had met there now to discuss in a friendly and amicable way a little local question about the franchise, and immediately the Government came forward to ask for £1,500,000 for North Africa, and nearly £1,000,000 for South Africa. It was really time that they ought to put their foot down and protest against all this expenditure, in South Africa especially. At one moment the Government were going to war with the Boers; at another they were going to war with the Zulus. At one time they were taking up the cause of some friend of the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster); and at another they were dealing with a Chief with an impossible name who had offended that right hon. Gentleman. What did they know of these people? There were not half-a-dozen Members of that House who even knew how to pronounce their names. Were hon. Members aware that they would find it stated in the Blue Book as a positive fact that one of the allies of the right hon. Member for Bradford—one of these most interesting gentlemen—was actually called "Bloody Nose?" He (Mr. Labouchere) had read it in the Blue Book. Did any hon. Gentleman know anything at all about that remarkable man Montisoua or Montsoia?—he really could not say which it was. He did not pretend to know anything about these people himself; but what he did know was that one month after another, and year after year, they were called upon, for some absurd cause or another, to spend all this money. They were either against Montisoua or Montsoia, or some equally eminent personage, and unless they absolutely put a stop to it they would never get any further. The Cape Government would never spend anything in the matter—they were not such fools. They declined to spend a penny. They said—"If there are a quantity of silly people thousands of miles off who are ready to engage in this sort of thing for our sake—who will come to the Cape and spend money on contracts for our benefit—we will encourage them to do it. We will let them have these Expeditions, and we will always furnish them with an occasion." It would always be found that between barbarism and civilization there was a sort of debatable ground where the noble savage and the bush-whacker would fight and quarrel together; and if they went on taking the part of one against another they would never get to the end of it. He would like the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) to inform the Committee why so much money was asked for. Last Session they were told that they were likely to engage in a most important Expedition which would involve military operations, and yet only the sum of £320,000 was asked for. It was not pretended that they were going to war now. Why, then, were they asked to vote £725,000? No doubt, the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) would tell them he was not going to spend it all. But he, Mr. Labouchere, did not like to trust the Government with so much money for these purposes. When once they had got the money they generally managed to spend it. A smaller Vote should, he thought, have been proposed. When they were told that the money was merely to be put into the hands of the Colonial Office in case they might find occasion to go to war at the Cape, they should meet that at once by saying—"Tell us specifically the smallest sum you will require." When they were asked for almost £1,000,000, they ought to refuse it.

Mr. WARTON said, it had been arranged between the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) and the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) that the debate was not to go on that night, but was to be deferred to the Report. It was not his (Mr. Warton's) intention to go into the affairs of Bechuanaland; but, as a matter of usage and right, he claimed this opportunity of making a most decided and solemn protest against all these proceedings. The Vote now submitted was an invasion of the Rules and Standing Orders of the House. It purported to be a Supplementary Estimate, and the heading described it as the further amount required to meet the deficiency caused by the additional expenditure arising from the Expedition to Bechuanaland. But that was an altogether inaccurate description. There had been no additional expenditure caused by the Expedition to Bechuanaland; and what the Committee were really asked for was not a Supplementary Estimate, but a Vote of Credit. It was too bad for the Government to be trying to evade the Rules of the House in this barefaced way. This was a Vote of Credit for money the amount of which was not yet fixed, and it was really such and nothing else. The object of the Government was perfectly clear—they wished to prevent any Motion being made on the Question that the Speaker do leave the Chair. Some might say that was a matter of no consequence. He was not saying whether it was or was not; but the Government had been calling this Vote a Supplementary Estimate, and refusing to call it a Vote of Credit, and by acting in that manner they had prevented hon. Gentlemen from bringing forward Motions. One hon. Baronet might have had an Amendment saying that there ought to be contributions from the Boers; another might have desired to put forward an Amendment saying that the money ought to be defrayed partly by the Cape Government. These different views might have been advanced had a fair opportunity been given to any Member who desired to place such an Amendment on the Paper. But the proceedings that night were even worse than that, because if the first Vote was really in the nature of a Supplementary Estimate, as perhaps it might be, the Government were now taking a Vote of Credit and linking it on with the other; and now that the Speaker was out of the Chair, the Chairman of Committees had to put a Vote which was really a Vote of Credit. That sort of thing was trifling with the Committee. A Vote of Credit should be kept by itself. He only desired to assert the rights and privileges of the House in this matter. He would not enter into a discussion of Bechuana-land affairs, because the debate on that subject was to come on later.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): In reply to the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down, I may, perhaps, be allowed to refer him to the hon. Baronet who sits near him, the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland), from whom he will learn that the strongest objection has always been entertained by the Committee of Public Accounts against Votes of Credit, unless absolutely necessary. The Rule as to a Vote of Credit is—that it is only asked for when it is impossible to apportion the total amount among the Votes. So far as the Treasury is concerned, a Vote of Credit is far more convenient than a Supplementary Estimate, as it gives much more latitude in appropriating the amount to particular Votes. Therefore, it is not with any object of the kind mentioned by the hon. and learned Gentleman that we have made this a Supplementary Estimate. As I have said, where it is possible to divide the expenditure under the different heads of Account, it is the well-known Rule of the House that we should ask for a Supplementary Estimate, and not for a Vote of Credit. The only object we had was to carry out the Rule of the House, and we certainly had no desire to shirk a preliminary discussion.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he was afraid it was not very satisfactory to see the way in which the money of the nation had been dealt with that evening. In the last Division there was a very small Vote; and now that an Estimate was proposed for the initiation of a new war, the Committee was thinner than it was before. They were told, of course, that they were to have more information, and that the discussion should come on afterwards; but he ventured to think that the House of Commons was really losing its power and control over the question of the initiation of a new war in South Africa. He did not doubt, for one moment, that a plausible case might be made out as to what had happened in South Africa. The further they extended their territory Northward, Eastward, and Westward in that Continent, no doubt they would come more frequently into contact with savage races; and it was inevitable that the Cape Colonists would always be anxious for new enterprizes. Reference had been made, in the course of this short debate, to the attitude of the Cape Colonists, and to the general indisposition shown in the Colony to contribute any portion of the expenses, or to accept any real responsibility for these misunderstandings. What the Cape Colonists were wanting in this case was what they had always wanted, and that was the squandering of British taxes by the million. Nothing fructified the soil of South Africa so much as the expenditure of the hard-earned taxes of the British taxpayer. He remembered that they were engaged in a very expensive undertaking not very long ago. The Colonial Office impressed upon the Colonists that some contribution should be made towards the enormous expenditure undertaken for the benefit of the Colony, and he remembered that the reply was that they were prepared to contribute a few hundreds of thousands of pounds; but even that offer was coupled with an impossible condition. He anticipated that it would be so in this case, and that this country would be encouraged by the Colony if the House allowed the proposed expenditure to be made. For his own part, looking to the position of Her Majesty's Government on this question, the first mistake they had made was, in his opinion, the sending out of Mr. Mackenzie. Doubtless, Mr. Mackenzie was a man who knew a great deal of South Africa, and his advice might, therefore, have been considered as of some value; but the misfortune was that from the very outset he took a position which he (Mr. Illingworth) could not but regard as one-sided and anything but judicial; and he must say that as an administrator and an official, who was to be backed up by an armed force, the selection of Mr. Mackenzie was about the worst that could have been made. To turn a returned missionary into a fighting man was about the very worst act Her Majesty's Government could have made themselves responsible for. He desired, at this juncture, to make an appeal to right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench. He would remind them that, in the case of the war in Egypt, Her Majesty's Government had sent out their Expedition, in the first instance, for a small and specific object, which was the removal of Arabi from the position of influence and power he had occupied in that country; and it was understood that, this being done, they would have to incur no further expenditure either of life or money, but should immediately withdraw without any difficulty, compromise, or humiliation. But what had actually been the case? He thought that the lesson taught by the last two or three years of intervention in Egyptian affairs ought to make Her Majesty's Government exceedingly careful before entering into what was now recommended to the Committee as only a small undertaking. He could not but ask himself this question—what was it that was asked for only a short time ago? The Committee would remember that it was then proposed to send a small body of police, not a military force at all—to the scene of the late disturbances in Bechuanaland, and it was then considered that the expenditure of a few thousands of pounds ought to have been sufficient for the maintenance of the Treaty. But what happened? Why, the very next step taken by the Government was to propose that no less a sum than £750,000 should be voted for the purpose of sending out a large Force to South Africa. The Government ought to tell the Committee plainly what the undertaking of this Expedition really meant. It could not be for the purpose of doing the work intended to have been performed by the few hundred police who were asked for in the first instance; that a sum of £750,000 was to be voted at the present moment by that Committee. He also should like to have an answer to the question why it was that so large a Force was to be sent out? It must really mean that instructions were to be sent out to the Officer in charge of the Force now being equipped that there would be as much discretion permitted to him as was accorded to the Admiral of the Fleet at Alexandria, so that no one could tell, when he had left their shores, how far this country might become involved. He must confess that he looked with considerable alarm at the course Her Majesty's Government were taking in the matter of this Military Expedition. There could be no doubt, although there might have been some exaggeration on the point, that there was very general distress prevalent in this country, which would probably be greatly increased should there be a hard winter. "Hear, hear!" The cheers with which that statement was received from the other side of the Committee were altogether misplaced; for whenever anything was proposed in the shape of military expenditure, their objection always was that the amount to be voted was not large enough, while it was only hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on that (the Ministerial) side of the House who were the champions of economy and the humble petitioners for some mitigation in the amount of the taxes that were levied on the people. He was extremely sorry that Her Majesty's Government had found it necessary to ask for this enormous sum of money. His regret was even greater at finding that, although they were asked for the Vote that night, the instructions that were to accompany the employment of the money were to be given to the House subsequently. He thought the House would be abandoning its functions by yielding up their purse strings under such circumstances. He should have infinitely preferred the postponement of the Vote until the House had been put in possession of the instructions, because the House of Commons was at that moment asked to endorse blindfold the policy of the Government in the administration of that large Vote. He confessed that in regard to questions involving these large military undertakings, when they had again to go before the country, they would be only too liable to be confused by the administration passed on the Predecessors in Office of the present Government for wantonly or negligently entering upon war. He could not help saying that he should feel it his duty, as he had done in the case of the Egyptian War, to vote against the first step that was now proposed to be taken. He had not voted in the Division on the last Vote, because he had entered his protest against it at the outset, and left the responsibility to those who had recommended it. But as this was a new departure, and as the Committee was asked in the name of humanity to enter on an Expedition involving the expenditure of blood and treasure, in which he saw inconsistency, he felt bound to vote against against it.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I cannot pass without observation the remarks which have just fallen from my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth), the more so because, upon the whole, I can say that I sympathize very much with the spirit in which those remarks have been made. I am not at all ashamed to say that the feelings with which my hon. Friend contemplates this expenditure, and the possible results of it, are fully shared by Her Majesty's Government. I do not myself think that the highest courage was shown by the bluster which has been manifested in the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett), who seems to enter on a war of this kind with a light heart. On the contrary, I think that those show the truest courage who recognize the facts of the position, and who, if they do ask the House to make sacrifices, do so with full knowledge.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the Committee an instance of the bluster he speaks of?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford has said, and in that I cannot agree with him, that this is a new departure, and that it is a critical stage in the proceedings that the House of Commons is asked for the first time to take a course which he regrets. I think, Sir, that a brief review of the circumstances will suffice to show that this is not the case. The whole of the trouble comes originally from the annexation of the Transvaal. When we found that that annexation had been made under a misapprehension of the wishes of the people of the Transvaal, we did not hesitate, although we knew that our motives might be misrepresented, to retire, in the middle of the war in which we had engaged, from the position we had taken up. We thought on that occasion, and therefore could not hesitate to express our opinion, that the Boers were in the right, and we were in the wrong. That being so, we retired from what we thought was a false position. No doubt, a course of that kind, which was somewhat unusual—though not on that account the less honourable or the less dignified—was open to misapprehension, and I think it quite possible that the intentions and the spirit and the objects of Her Majesty's Government were misapprehended, certainly by hon. Members on the other side of the House, but also by the Boers themselves. At all events, we found that at a later stage the Boers were not so ready as we could have wished to carry out the agreement into which they had entered, and to co-operate with us in securing a proper protection for the Natives, for whom we were bound to care. The difficulties in that case arose in part from the imperfect nature of the Convention we had made. That Convention was never represented as a permanent and final arrangement, and Her Majesty's Government were quite willing to reconsider it in the light of subsequent experience. We made, on the occasion of the second Convention, great concessions to the Boers. We made them without the least hesitation—and we are not at all ashamed of them—in every case in which we thought the Boers had good reason to ask for an alteration. But, at the same time, Her Majesty's Government maintained their original position that there were certain obligations which they could not set aside, and we were glad to find that the Boers themselves accepted those obligations, and once more agreed with us. They agreed solemnly that they would join with us in protecting the Borders, and in securing the Chiefs outside the Borders from the aggressions of filibusters and freebooters. After that Convention was made—in fact, almost immediately afterwards—it was broken—broken in the spirit, not in the letter. I do not allege that against the Boers; but the freebooters came from the Boer territory into that of our allies, whom we had declared we would protect, and the Boer Government were either unable or unwilling to prevent it. Now, I say, we have arrived at a new position, in which we are able to say the Boers are wrong, and we are right; and, under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government have no more hesitation in maintaining their obligations than they had on a previous occasion in yielding to the demands of the Boers. When we thought the Boers were in the right we yielded; and it is now, because we think we have our quarrel just, that we ask the House of Commons to take the course we propose. We now say that we have, in accordance with the Convention—the last of these Conventions—made with the Boers, in accordance with the conditions which have been accepted by the Boers themselves—established a British Protectorate over that territory. That British Protectorate has been invaded, and that is a thing which it is absolutely impossible for any nation, with anything like a feeling of self-respect, to submit to. Therefore we say we will maintain the obligations into which we have entered. Well, Sir, I stated on the last occasion, and I now say again, I do not wish to conceal from the Committee my own opinion that this is a serious business. Nor do I wish to conceal from the Committee that there are circumstances and contingencies which we cannot lightly contemplate; but I also say that it is our business to do everything in our power to render these contingencies improbable. My answer to the hon. Member for Bradford and those who think with him, and who ask "Why do you require so large a sum?" is, because if we are to avoid the possibility of these contingencies, if we are to prevent a conflagration from arising and spreading and becoming dangerous, it is necessary that we should employ a very large force in order that we may show we are in earnest, and that we have the means, and are going to use them, for the purpose of carrying out the intentions we have expressed. Large as is the sum we are asking from the Committee and the country, it will, I think, be cheaply expended if it finally settles this difficult question, and prevents the possibility of demands very much larger, or the possibility of much more serious contingencies which might otherwise arise. If we did not go to that country—and we are now dealing with the filibusters alone—with an overwhelming force, we may be sure that they will have friends in the Boer territory and elsewhere who would be tempted by our weakness to join them, and the matter would go from a small start to a very large affair. I confess that, in that case, I should look to the future with the greatest anxiety. I am not going to say that the future is free from anxiety even now; but I do say that the true wisdom in a small matter consists in treating it as an important thing, and in not being shy to ask the House of Commons to give us all the support we require. To a certain extent I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford in what he has said regarding the Colonists. My hon. Friend has spoken of wars undertaken at the entire expense of the British taxpayer for the benefit of the British Colonists, who do nothing. Speaking from a responsible position, I cannot accept so strong a view.

MR. ILLINGWORTH: I did not say altogether in the interests of the Colonists; but they are always ready to fan the fire.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I should be sorry to misrepresent my hon. Friend; but I do not see a great deal of difference. But I was saying that, to a certain extent, I agree with him. I think we are entitled in this matter to call on our fellow-subjects at the Cape for their hearty co-operation; and if their hearty co-operation is at this juncture withheld from us, it will change the aspect altogether. There are at least two matters that are involved in this question. In the first place, there is a question which chiefly concerns the Cape Colony, and that is the protection of the trade route into the interior of Africa, which is threatened by these filibusters. If the Cape Colonists do not give Her Majesty's Government their hearty co-operation, the aspect of that question, at all events, will be entirely changed, and it might well be that this Government, or some future Government, would say to the Cape Colony—"If you will not co-operate with us in a matter which so entirely affects your interests, we shall leave you to deal with it as best you may, and you cannot call on us, at the expense of the British taxpayer, to support you." Then, there is the second question, and that is our personal obligation to the Native Chiefs. That is a personal responsibility which we cannot devolve upon anyone else. What we have undertaken for ourselves we must carry out ourselves. In doing this we have a right to ask for the cordial co-operation and support of the Cape Colony, and I hope, therefore, under all the circumstances, we may confidently expect it. I admit that that support has not been rendered quite so freely as Her Majesty's Government have been entitled to hope and expect; but, at the same time, I believe that when it is understood at the Cape that Her Majesty's Government are determined to do all that properly belongs to them, our fellow-subjects there, having regard to the enormous interests which they have at stake, will not be wanting when called on to render their part.

Mr. CALLAN said, he was glad for once to be able to agree with the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth). He was quite sure that to-morrow, when the country read the report of that discussion and analyzed the Division Lists of that evening, it would view with disgust the professions of a large body in that House, and would stand amazed at the conduct of those chivalrous Radicals who followed out the noble maxim that "Those who fight and run away, may live to fight another day." If he was not mistaken, one of them, the hon. Member for Bradford, had carried out that precept. He would, however, ask the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) not to press the matter to a Division, which would only have the effect of delaying the Business for some time, and of compelling officials like the Secretary to the Treasury to swallow in Office all the declarations they had made when out of Office, while it would put to the test such chivalrous and patriotic Gentlemen as the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings), the hon. Member for Stalybridge (Mr. Summers), and others, who, while holding themselves forth to the country as paragons for economy, found it more convenient, in view of impending events, to retire to the outer Lobby when the Division was called. For his own part, he preferred to be clubbed with the Irish Members, as on the recent occasion when a Division was called for by the Radical Members, every one of whom retired at the last moment, and left the brunt of the battle with 17 Irish Members, not one of the Radicals upholding by his vote the principles he had enunciated.

Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, the right hon. Gentlemen the President of the Board of Trade had described him as having spoken in a spirit of bluster. He challenged the right hon. Gentleman to quote a single word from his remarks that would justify that assertion. The statement was like the right hon. Gentleman's affidavits the other day—it was a pure invention. The right hon. Gentleman had now told the Committee that Her Majesty's Government had retired from a false position, and that their conduct was honourable when they ran away from the Boers three years ago. The false position from which they had retired was this. By their factious electioneering speeches, they had encouraged the Boers to rebel; they had rejected the demands of the Boer Envoys who were sent over in 1880 to ask for terms of concession; when the Boers broke out in rebellion, they promised to vindicate the authority of the Queen; they allowed three sanguinary battles to be fought in the Transvaal; they sent a gallant General with reinforcements to put the Boers down. When their troops had been badly defeated, the very Ministers who had caused the war, ordered the battles to be fought, and promised to vindicate the national honour, discovered that the guilt of blood lay upon them, and they ran away and surrendered. That was the conduct which the right hon. Gentleman had, forsooth, described as honourable! The fact was, that the right hon. Gentleman was in a false position. He was responsible, more than any other Minister, for the troubles and disgrace that had fallen on this country in connection with South Africa. The present large Vote was rendered necessary in order to discharge their personal obligations to the Chiefs Montsioa and Man-koroane, who had, ever since 1881, been constantly attacked and plundered by the Boers, and the duty now so tardily acknowledged was just as obligatory on the right hon. Gentleman during the last three years as at the present moment. The country would remember the right hon. Gentleman's conduct in the past, and would not forget that the Ministry which had caused the greatest dishonour the British name had sustained, even during the last four disastrous years, now, in its fifth year of Office, was willing to reverse its policy of the past, and to inflict on this country a very heavy expenditure, which the exercise of timely precaution and courage might easily have averted.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 78 : Noes 31 : Majority 47.—(Div. List, No. 15.)

NAVY SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES. 1884-5. MILITARY OPERATIONS IN EGYPT AND BECHUANALAND.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £324,000, be granted to Her Majesty, for certain Navy Services, to meet Additional Expenditure arising out of the Military Operations in Egypt, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1885."

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he thought that this Vote needed some explanation. The Committee had already passed one Vote on account of the operations on the Nile; but he believed that a very considerable portion of the sum now asked for was for the operations at Suakin. He trusted the Secretary to the Admiralty would be good enough to say how much of this money was on account of Suakin?

Sir THOMAS BRASSEY said, he was unable to state precisely how much of this Vote was to be placed to the Suakin operations, but it provided for the whole body of Marines employed in Egypt. He believed the total amount of extra pay was £1,500.

Mr. LABOUCHERE asked if he was correct in saying that the whole of this money was expended on extraordinary expenses owing to the Expedition to Egypt?

Sir THOMAS BRASSEY said, the charge for medical service embraced a considerable amount of expenditure for Suakin.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, in that case the Committee ought to have some further information. They were called upon to pay a large sum of money for no one knew what or why, and they were right in calling upon the Government for an explanation. Some months ago, the country had undertaken, for reasons best known to the Government, the defence of the Port of Suakin, and a large number of persons had been murdered in the neighbourhood, whom they chose to qualify as rebels. But surely the Government had discovered in the quarrels in South Africa and on the Nile a reason for not persisting in the utter folly of retaining Suakin. He wanted to know what possible object there could be in defending that place against Osman Digna and the tribes around it? They chose to say that they held Suakin for the Egyptian Government, and as there was no reason why they should do so, it was for the Egyptian Government to meet these expenses, and no one else. Perhaps someone would tell the Committee what object there was in holding Suakin, which was a miserable place! The harbour was very bad, and he believed that the men there had to be put on board ship and brought back again to Suakin, where those who remained were attacked every night by the Arabs; there was also a great deal of mortality at the place. They had been told that one object was the prevention of slavery in the Soudan; but he did not believe that that doctrine would be held now, because it was well known that the slaves were brought down to the little creeks along the coast and not to Suakin. They could be brought down in one night to these places, whence signals were made, and the cargoes then landed. Therefore, he said that neither they nor the Egyptians had anything to gain by the occupation of Suakin. This senseless policy had already led to the expenditure of £300,000, and now they were called upon to expend more money. Were they, every time that Parliament met, to be asked for money to defend this place? Unless these questions were answered very clearly, he thought the Committee ought to divide against the Vote.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the question of the occupation of Suakin was fully discussed last Session, when, he believed, no exception was taken to it.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said, he had taken exception to the occupation, last Session.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the question as to the permanent occupation of the seaport was a very fair one, and was a matter for the Government further to consider. Whatever might be the ultimate opinion of the House as to the permanent occupation of the port, the garrison there could not be withdrawn at the present time.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked if the Marines at Suakin, being British troops on Egyptian territory, the Government received the Capitation Grant from the Khedive's Government?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, the Marines at Suakin were not on the same footing as those employed in Egypt.

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Amendments made.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. John Redmond.)

MR. TOTTENHAM said, he objected to the third reading, on the ground that several hon. Members interested in the Bill were absent.

MR. WARTON said, he believed it was not usual to take two stages of a Bill of such dimensions at one Sitting.

MR. PARNELL asked if the objection of a single hon. Member was fatal to the Motion of his hon. Friend?

MR. SPEAKER said, that was not so. The question was for the decision of the House.

QUESTIONS.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1876—PAYMENT OF SCHOOL FEES.

Mr. SALT asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether, inasmuch as Section 10 of the Education Act, 1876 provides that the payment of school fees may be made by the Guardians by reason of the poverty of the parents, and also provides that payment shall not be made on condition of the child attending any public elementary school other than such as may be selected by the parent, it is legal for the Guardians of the Poor to order a parent, when making application for payment of school fees, to send the children to a Board School, the parent not desiring to do so?

Mr. MUNDELLA: I think there can be no doubt that the choice of the public elementary school at which the child attends rests with the parent; and it is, therefore, not legal for the Guardians to order the attendance of the child at a school objected to by the parent.

MADAGASCAR—THE FRENCH WAR
SHIP "BOURNESAINT."

Dr. CAMERON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any Report has been received as to the circumstances under which the French war ship Bourne saint, disabled while engaged in belligerent operations against Madagascar, was allowed to refit at Port Louis, Mauritius?

Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: The Bourne saint was allowed by the Governor of the Mauritius to be repaired at Port Louis, under the advice of the Procureur General, who is Colonial Law Adviser, and who said there would be no breach of neutrality, as the vessel had put in for repairs, and was not taking in war-like stores or increasing her armament.

We, however, referred the matter to the Foreign Office for their consideration.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)
ACT, 1882—COMPENSATION FOR MALICIOUS BURNING—CASE OF PATRICK HANLEY, OF ASHBROOK, CO. ROSCOMMON.

Mr. O'KELLY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will direct the police authorities to make a Report on the circumstances attending a claim for compensation made by Patrick Hanley, of Ashbrook, county Roscommon, in regard to alleged malicious burning; and, whether Hanley has on former occasions made similar claims which, on examination, proved to be groundless?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Hanley's claim is now pending, and I cannot interfere with regard to it. I am informed this is the only claim he has made.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)
ACT, 1882—WARRANTS—EXTRA POLICE
AT RATHCLOONEY, CO. CLARE.

Mr. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the townland of Rathclooney, county Clare, is charged with the cost of extra police stationed at Spencil Hill, some miles away; if these police have been stationed there in consequence of the murder of a man named McMahon, which occurred near Spencil Hill, in August last; if Rathclooney is in another parish from that in which the murdered man lived, and if two intervening townlands are not charged with the tax; and, if so, for what reason; and, if he will state upon what grounds the whole of the parish in which the murdered man lived is exempt from the Police Tax, while portions of an adjoining parish are compelled to contribute to it?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: In consequence of the murder of M'Mahon, an extra police force is stationed at Spencil Hill to afford protection and prevent further outrage. The townland of Rathclooney, about one and a-half miles distant, is a part of the district taxed, which is that believed to be responsible for the murder and for the concealment of its perpetrators. One intervening townland—not two as alleged—is exempted, because it contains the houses and farms of the murdered man's widow and immediate relatives. The remainder of the parish is not included, because it is outside the usual area of taxation.

MR. KENNY: Is it not a fact that the land exempted from this tax is ground held by landlords, and is not that the reason that the Crown do not wish to tax it?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have already stated the reason.

REGISTER OF PATENTS, GREAT BRITAIN—SUPPLY OF INDEX FROM 1877 TO PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE (IRELAND).

MR. SEXTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, What department is responsible for the failure, since 1877, to supply to the Public Record Office, Four Courts, Dublin, the Annual Index to the Register of Patents applied for and granted in the United Kingdom; and, whether the indices in question will be now supplied?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that his right hon. Friend had asked him to answer this Question for him. The Act of Parliament required all these specifications to be enrolled; but that statutory obligation had not been extended to indexing. The omission since 1877 had been accidental, and would be at once remedied. His right hon. Friend added that copies of the specifications had been sent to Trinity College, Dublin, and also to the National Library, Kildare Street, where they could be seen free of charge.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)—LOANS TO RAILWAYS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, What were the dates, amounts, and rates of interest of the loans given by the Irish Board of Public Works to the promoters of the Sligo, Leitrim, and Northern Counties Railway; who are the sureties for the prescribed payments by the Company on account of principal and interest; when the last payment by the Company on account of principal or interest was made; and, what is now the total of principal and interest in arrear?

MR. COURTNEY: A single loan to this Company of £100,000 was sanctioned in February, 1879. The rate of interest was 5 per cent up to June 30, 1883, when, in common with other railway loans, it was reduced to 4 per cent. Seven gentlemen interested in the district made themselves sureties for the payment of the interest, the principal being secured on the undertaking in the usual way. The Company have paid nothing since September 23, 1882, and the arrears of interest due from the sureties are £15,300, while £10,000 of principal is also due.

LUNACY LAWS—SCOTCH AND ENGLISH JURISDICTION—CASE OF THOMAS HARRISON.

DR. CAMERON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that Thomas Harrison, an escaped inmate of Cheadle Lunatic Asylum, Manchester, has made his way to Glasgow with a view to having his mental condition publicly investigated under the safeguards afforded by Scotch Law; whether it is true that, in 1882, Harrison escaped from the same asylum, and, reaching Scotland, brought his case before the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire; and that, while the case was pending, two attempts were made to seize Harrison, and carry him back to Cheadle; whether the first attempt was frustrated through the intervention of the judge before whom Harrison's case had to be brought; and whether, in spite of this warning, Harrison was a few days later (on June 15th 1882) kidnapped in Glasgow, and carried out of Scotland in defiance of Scotch Law; whether he is aware that, in 1882, the authorities declined to prosecute Harrison's abductors, on the ground that reports from Cheadle after his recapture showed him to be a lunatic; whether he is aware that, on the present occasion, certificates of Harrison's sanity signed by four medical practitioners, and all dated within a month past, have been sent up to the Lord Chancellor; and, whether, as Minister for Scotland, he can give any assurance that Harrison will be protected against any repetition of the attempts made with impunity in 1882 to abduct him from Scotland in defiance of Scotch Law?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): I have been asked by my right hon. and learned Friend to answer this Question. We are informed by the Superintendent of the Manchester Royal Lunatic Hospital, from which Mr. Harrison has escaped, that he is now in Glasgow. We have, of course, no means of information as to his object in going there. The facts with respect to Mr. Harrison's escape and recapture in 1882 are, I believe, correctly stated in the Question. Mr. Harrison appears to have been recaptured by some artifice or deceit after the legal period for reclaiming the custody of his person as an escaped lunatic had expired, and after proceedings taken before a magistrate with that object had failed. I am of opinion that his recapture at that time was not legal nor justifiable by the law of Scotland. With reference to the communication made to the Lord Chancellor, I am informed by his Lordship that if Mr. Harrison is a Chancery lunatic, which, according to our information, he is, any application as to his residence or otherwise must be made to the Lords Justices sitting in Lunacy, and cannot be dealt with extra-judicially by the Lord Chancellor. If Mr. Harrison is in Scotland, he will have the same protection as any other citizen, and if his liberty is invaded, he will have the same legal remedies.

DR. CAMERON: What I wish to ask is, whether Harrison will, in the present case, be protected?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): As I have already stated, according to our information, Harrison was recaptured by something that looked like artifice or deceit. Of course, if he is a sane man, as the Question implies, he will know how to take care of himself.

DR. CAMERON: What I say is, that he was taken out of Scotland illegally and locked up, and how can he possibly have any remedy after he is locked up?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Of course, after the man is brought across the Border, his remedy must be had in England.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to give Notice that I shall ask, on a future occasion, Whether it is not the fact that the Judge before whom he was brought wrote to the Lord Chancellor specially protesting in the matter; and I shall ask why his abductors were not prosecuted?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): The two persons who persuaded him to go with them were not within the jurisdiction of the Scottish law after they had gone.

MOROCCO—FRAUDULENT CLAIMS OF ENGLISH SUBJECTS AGAINST NATIVES.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the inquiry which he promised in last July into the alleged fraudulent claims preferred by English subjects against natives of Morocco has been held, and with what result?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Inquiry has been made into the alleged abuses in connection with the claims of British subjects against natives of Morocco and the misconduct of a British official. These charges have been proved to be in some instances well founded, and the inquiry has led to the dismissal of the official implicated. El Arbi ben Abdulaziz has been released, and Her Majesty's Minister has been instructed to insist on a searching scrutiny of the claims of British subjects before any money is paid to the claimants. The attention of Her Majesty's Minister had already been called to the alleged state of the Moorish prison at Dar al Baida, in which the debtors were confined, and the alleged cruel treatment of the prisoners detained therein. He has caused a strong remonstrance to be addressed to the Governor, who, however, denied the truth of the allegations. The matter, however, will not be allowed to drop.

MR. W. J. CORBET inquired whether there were any Papers which the noble Lord could lay on the Table?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I cannot undertake to present the Papers without consulting the Secretary of State.

EDUCATION (IRELAND)—HOURS OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION IN NATIONAL SCHOOLS—CASTLEGARDEN SCHOOL, CO. DOWN.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any Correspondence has passed between the Education Office, Dublin, and the manager of the school where it is alleged a Commissioner of National Education, the Rev. Hugh Hanna, took part in religious exercise at a time not set apart for that purpose in the school time table; and, whether he will consent to lay upon the Table of the House Copies of the Minutes of the Board, or of the Sub-Committee, in reference to the occurrence in question, with all Correspondence relating thereto?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have obtained, as I intimated I would, a statement from the Rev. Mr. Hanna, and also a further Report from the Commissioners of National Education. The hon. Member's original Question by its terms indicated no case of which the Commissioners had any official knowledge. It is now assumed that he intends it to refer to incidents which occurred nearly a year and a-half ago at a meeting held in a school-house at a place called Castlegarden, in the county of Down. Some correspondence did at that time pass between the Commissioners and the manager of the school, but the facts as regards that meeting do not support the allegations made with respect to the Rev. Mr. Hanna; and in justice to that gentleman I must enter into the matter at a length which I fear will be a trespass upon the time of the House. The Castlegarden vested school-house was completed and an opening meeting held in June, 1883. To that meeting Mr. Hanna was invited by the manager. The Bishop of the diocese occupied the chair. As Mr. Hanna reached the platform a hymn was given out. Mr. Hanna knew nothing of the intended programme beyond the fact that he was expected to give an address on popular education, which he did. This is the only ground for the allegations made with respect to Mr. Hanna. He did not cause a hymn to be sung, and was in no way responsible for it. The school was not in operation at the time, and did not come into operation for six weeks afterwards. The assembly was not one of scholars and teachers, but was a mixed gathering of residents in the neighbourhood. Mr. Hanna was never, as suggested in the Question, called to account for his share in the proceedings, and his name was never mentioned in the correspondence between the Commissioners and the manager of the school. That correspondence turned on the infraction by the manager of the Commissioners' rules as to the improper use of a vested school-house—that is a school-house built with the aid of the Commissioners. The manager relied upon the fact that his old school-house was non-vested, and that the new house had at the time never been used for school purposes. His breach of rule was a technical one, and the Commissioners agreed to take no further notice of it. Mr. Hanna was not responsible for it. The Commissioners do not think there is any ground upon which such a correspondence should be laid on the Table.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)— MOVILLE COUNTY COURT.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware of a Memorial from the magistrates and merchants of Moville, asking His Excellency to grant a County Court sitting in Moville; if His Excellency declined to grant the request of the Memorialists; if he is aware that the inhabitants of the Session district of Moville are taken a distance of forty or fifty miles to have their legal business conducted, and to smaller towns; and, if His Excellency has any objection in stating his reasons in withholding the privileges granted to other towns?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The hon. Member for the county of Donegal (Mr. Lea) will perhaps allow me to answer at the same time the Question No. 16, which he proposes to put to my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General. I have not been able to ascertain that precisely such a Memorial as that referred to by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) has been received since the year 1871. At that time the matter was fully considered by the then Lord Lieutenant and the Privy Council, who did not feel themselves able to comply with the prayer of the Memorial. Several Memorials have been recently received from the county of Donegal, including three from Innishowen, relative to additional places for Quarter Sessions. They have been referred to the County Court Judge for report, and will shortly come before the Privy Council.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE NEW ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. BARRAN asked Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been called to the statement made at Leeds on Monday last by the Town Clerk of that borough, showing that great public inconvenience and loss resulted from civil and criminal causes arising in the West Riding being tried at York instead of at Leeds; whether he is aware that, at the present Assizes, no fewer than 64 out of a total of 101 prisoners entered for trial were from the West Riding; whether he will state on whose advice and authority the arrangements for the Assizes were made; and, if, in view of the whole facts of the case, he will use his influence to prevent such unsatisfactory arrangements being made in the future?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the arrangements had been altered by the fact that the number of Assizes held during the year had been increased, and it was impossible to get Judges enough to attend at every town. If these causes were tried at Leeds instead of York, there would probably be the same complaint from the former district. The Lord Chancellor, however, intended to confer with the Judges upon the subject.

EDUCATION (IRELAND)—NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether an Irish National teacher, desiring promotion to the second division of first class, must first satisfy his head and district inspectors that his school is in a highly efficient state, and then score not less than 55 per cent. in an examination on what are known as the "A papers;" whether a teacher desiring promotion from the second to the first division of first class must satisfy the inspectors that his school is in a still more highly efficient condition than in the former case, and must subsequently score not less than 65 per cent. in an examination on the identical "A papers" specified above; whether it is the fact that a teacher in the second class, who scores 65 per cent. or over in the "A papers" on his first examination in them, is kept in the second division of first class, and if he seeks to reach the first division of first class must not only satisfy the inspectors of the higher efficiency of his school, but must also, not sooner than the following year, pass another examination in the same class of papers (A) in which he has already scored a percentage high enough to qualify him for the first division; and, whether, in the case of such a teacher, the Board will dispense with the second examination, and in the year succeeding the first examination promote the teacher to the first division, provided he satisfies the inspectors as to the efficiency of his school?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The facts as to the necessary conditions of promotion are as stated in the first three paragraphs of the Question, and the Board of National Education could not consent to make the change suggested in the last paragraph. The two divisions of the first class are in reality, though not nominally, distinct classes having different rates of pay; and the fundamental principle of the different examinations is that every change of salary should be brought about by examination.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the Treasury will sanction the payment to Irish National School teachers of the second moiety of results fees in cases in which the manager of the school, or any other person interested in public education, would advance the deficiency between the amount of local support contributed and the second or contingent moiety of the results fees?

Mr. COURTNEY: There is some uncertainty as to the word "advance." If we are to understand it to mean the final payment, I have to say that the Commissioners of National Education think the suggestion in the Question, so understood, may properly be adopted under certain safeguards; and if they and the Irish Government make a representation to the Treasury in this sense, I do not foresee any difficulty in agreeing to it.

IRELAND—THE ROTUNDA, COOMBE, AND PITT STREET HOSPITALS, DUBLIN—COMPOUNDING OF MEDICINES.

Mr. PATRICK POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that there is no duly qualified compounder of medicine in the Rotunda Hospital, the Coombe Hospital, or the Pitt Street Institute, Dublin?

Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This is not a matter in which the Government have any direct responsibility or control. As, however, each of the two hospitals named receives a small sum out of the Parliamentary Vote for Hospitals and Infirmaryes, I deemed it right to let the Hospital Authorities know that this Question would be asked, and I find that in each case there is an arrangement with an eminent firm of dispensing chemists for the compounding and dispensing of medicines, and that in the few intern cases at the Rotunda Hospital where medicines are necessary, they are made up under the supervision of the master and the assistant physician. I cannot supply any information as to the Pitt Street Institute.

RAILWAYS (METROPOLIS)—THE DISTRICT AND METROPOLITAN RAILWAYS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he is aware the District and Metropolitan Railways do not now work on the block system, and that the trains are exceedingly unpunctual; if so, whether he will use his influence to remedy the above complaint?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, replying in the absence of the President of the Board of Trade, said, that the Metropolitan and District Railways had been provided with instruments for working their lines on the block system, and the Board of Trade had every reason to believe that these lines were now worked on that system. There had been no time to communicate with the Companies since the Question had been put down on the Paper. No complaints had been received as to their unpunctuality; but even if they had been received, the Board of Trade had no power to interfere with the actual working of the lines.

MR. FIRTH asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that since the month of September these Railway Companies had sold to the public no time tables, so as to avoid liability?

[No reply.]

MR. BIGGAR gave Notice that he would repeat his Question on Tuesday next.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF THOMAS BEHAN, A CONVICT.

MR. LEAHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Irish Government have received

Resolutions from the Town Commissioners of Naas, Newbridge, and Athy, in the county of Kildare, expressing their firm belief of the innocence of Thomas Behan, convicted and sentenced to penal servitude for arson at Newbridge, in said county, and requesting the case to be further inquired into; and, if any steps will be taken to further investigate his case?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The resolutions mentioned were received, and the matter is at present under the consideration of the Lord Lieutenant.

WESTMINSTER HALL (RESTORATION).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he understands that the Committee appointed to examine plans for the restoration of the exterior of Westminster Hall, laid bare by the abolition of the Law Courts, has power to deal with all plans for becomingly utilizing the available space, and is not confined to questions of archæological architecture?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, he had no desire to limit the inquiry in any way. It would be open to the Committee to examine any plans they might think it fit to consider.

EGYPT—REPRESENTATIVE INSTITUTIONS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will now produce the Report on the tentative working of representative institutions in Egypt, which he last summer obtained from Sir Evelyn Baring; and, if it is true, as stated in the public prints, that the Egyptian Government has just ordered arrears of Taxes due from Natives to be rigorously exacted, but has suspended the House Tax on Foreigners?

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the telegram of The Times of November 12, in which it is stated that the Egyptian Government had determined to collect taxes in arrear, amounting to £180,000, and that, where payment is refused, crops, cattle, and land will be seized; and, whether, if so, seeing that the professional experts stated in their Report to the recent Conference that the fellahs, far from being able to pay arrears of taxation, are already in the hands of usurers, owing to their having been obliged to borrow to meet the requirements of the State, on account of the fall in the price of produce, Her Majesty's Government contemplates informing the Egyptian Government, that, so long as order and the rule of the Khedive over the fellahs are maintained by a British Army of Occupation, such a system of seizure and eviction cannot be permitted?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: A Report on the working of the representative institutions in Egypt has been received from Sir Evelyn Baring, and will be laid before Parliament. The Egyptian Government has been compelled to suspend temporarily the new law for the collection of house tax owing to the difficulties encountered in putting it into operation. The law will be amended. A Circular was issued at the end of July by the Ministry of Finance ordering the payment of arrears of taxes, but it referred to the deficiencies of the rich landowners who were in a position to pay, and the Circular had very good results. No information has been received of the description mentioned in The Times of November 12. The whole question of finance being at present under consideration, I cannot enter into the matters raised by the second half of the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) within the limits usually assigned to an answer.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: When will Sir Evelyn Baring's Report be circulated?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: It will be circulated in the next set of Papers on Egyptian affairs. If there be any great delay, which I do not anticipate, I will see whether arrangements can be made for laying this Report separately on the Table.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Will the noble Lord undertake that the Report will be presented during the present Session?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I do not know I can undertake that it will be laid on the Table during this Session; but I will see that it is circulated before next Session.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Are we to understand that no further Egyptian Papers are to be laid on the Table during the present Session?

EGYPT—THE SLAVE TRADE.

MR. W. M. TORRENS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What steps have been taken by the present Khedive of Egypt to carry into effect the stipulations of the Convention of 4th August 1877, made between the British Government and Ismail, late Khedive of Egypt, for the suppression of the Slave Trade, the period having expired after which the kidnapping and sale of persons into slavery was to have been prohibited?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The best answer I can give is to say that Papers will be laid on the Table next week. They will contain all the information asked for, and will show that steps have been taken which, I think, he will recognize as being effectual.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—WHITEGATE, CORK COUNTY.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that about a year ago the Constabulary at Whitegate, county of Cork, received information that Colonel Thackwell, a resident in that district, had attempted the life of one of his servants with a revolver; and, whether any entry of the information was made in the barrack journal; and, if so, why Colonel Thackwell was not prosecuted?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have no information on this subject, and as I received no Notice of the Question, I have not had opportunity to obtain any. If the hon. Member will be so good as to put his Question down again, allowing time for a reference to the county of Cork for inquiry, I will be happy to answer it.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF BRYAN KILMARTIN.

MR. SEXTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, acting on the precedents in the cases of Galley and Habron, the Government will propose to grant compensation to Bryan Kilmartin, of Arran Island (lately released from penal servitude, his innocence being established), in consideration of the injury to his health, and the loss to his wife and children, resulting from a half-year's imprisonment awaiting his trial, and nearly two years' penal servitude?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have inquired into this matter and find that the subject has received attention. I myself have no official cognizance of the facts; but the conclusion arrived at by the Irish Government is, that they do not feel themselves at liberty to comply with the prayer in the Memorial with reference to the case of Kilmartin. To do so would involve a departure from the general rule, which shows that the granting of compensation in such cases is extremely rare, and that such granting compensation has been confined to cases in which there is no doubt of the innocence of the person whose case is considered. The release of Kilmartin took place upon the ground that there was doubt of guilt; but it would be a complete alteration of the prevailing and, I believe, unvarying rule if compensation were given in cases where there is only doubt of guilt. I ought to say that the cases referred to, of Galley and Habron—of which, however, I have no official knowledge—were cases in which there was no doubt of their innocence.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether Kilmartin received a free pardon or was released on a ticket-of-leave; and if not on a ticket-of-leave, on what basis is it to be said that there is a doubt of his innocence?

[No. reply.]

MR. SEXTON: I will endeavour, on a future occasion, to convince the right hon. Gentleman and the House that there is no rational doubt of the innocence of Kilmartin.

INTESTATE, &c., ESTATES (IRELAND)— ESTATE OF THE LATE MRS. HELEN BLAKE.

MR. SEXTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with regard to the estate of Mrs. Helen Blake, late of 4, Earl's Terrace, Kensington, deceased, intestate, What is the amount of the annual rent received from the real estate, and what is the amount of the personal estate, and how it is invested and applied; why, in view of the fact that the "card" found among the papers of the deceased lady (admitted to be in her handwriting), in which she described herself as "daughter of William L. Sheridan, Esq. of Baltimore, U.S.A. and Galway, Ireland," the Treasury did not advertise for heirs in the Galway papers; in what respect Mr. William P. Sheridan, of Galway, failed to satisfy the Chief Clerk in Chancery of his relationship to the deceased; if, considering the fact that no register of marriages in the Catholic Church in Ireland was kept at the beginning of the present century, the Lords of the Treasury will insist on legal proof of the marriage of the parents of Mrs. Helen Blake being produced with reference to the claim of William Patrick Sheridan; and, whether, and in view of the statement in the "card," already quoted, and of the representation made to Her Majesty in favour of the claim of William Patrick Sheridan, by the Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, the Protestant Bishop of Tuam, the Catholic Bishop of Galway, the High Sheriff of Galway, and other distinguished persons, the Lords of the Treasury will afford to the said William Patrick Sheridan any further information contained in the papers of the late Mrs. Helen Blake, and will institute an inquiry to satisfy themselves as to whether his claim has a just foundation?

MR. COURTNEY: I have been requested to answer this Question. The net annual value of the real estate in the case of Mrs. Blake is about £1,000. The net amount of the personal estate was about £93,000, of which about £19,000 went in intended legacies, and the remainder is retained by the Crown. The advertising in such cases is directed by the Court, and the Treasury have no control over it. But this case was so widely known that there was every opportunity for anyone to apply who thought they had a claim, and, in fact, very many did so, including W. P. Sheridan. The Court had before it the piece of paper described as a card when ordering the advertisements. The case has been decided judicially, and we have no knowledge of the reasons for the decision nor any power to vary it. Any person wishing to reopen the question should take legal advice and act accordingly. So far as any discretion was left us by the order of Court, we have carefully investigated the various applications with the best legal advice at our command, and have come to the conclusion that no one has established, even approximately, any claim to be related to the deceased. If W. P. Sheridan had established any prima facie case he would have been entitled to see all the papers; but he has not done so.

MR. SEXTON said, he would call attention to the matter on a future occasion.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked was there any information in the hands of the Treasury which had not been given to the public—any information that had been kept concealed?

MR. COURTNEY: I do not think it would be judicious to answer that Question.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I would ask the hon. Gentleman, is he aware that the Indian Government publish a register, giving all the information in their possession respecting cases of intestacy, and whether there is any reason why similar information should not be given in this country?

PARLIAMENT — QUESTIONS TO MINISTERS.

MR. ROUNDELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, considering the abuse to which the practice of putting Questions to Ministers is being brought, he contemplates making any proposal for a change in the system?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, that before the right hon. Gentleman answered the Question, he should like to ask him whether his attention had been drawn to the fact that in a list of 28 Questions, two only stood in the names of Conservative Members, while 17 were by Irish Members, and nine by Liberal Members, and whether he had noticed that that was by no means an unusual proportion?

MR. SEXTON said, he would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he had considered that if the Irish had a Parliament of their own they would not have to ask any Questions in that House?

MR. GLADSTONE: Perhaps if we were so much entertained with all Questions as we have been in relation to this one, we might be more disposed to spend a considerable fraction of our time upon them, as undoubtedly we do. I do not propose to enter into any controversial matters; but I may say in relation to this question that the inquiry made by my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Roundell) is an indication of the sense which prevails in what I may call the non-Questioning part of the House that there is considerable danger in this direction; but I think it better, however, to avoid saying anything which might be construed in the nature of a censure. I think we must feel that the conduct of Members cannot be judged simply by any reference to the number of Questions put. We must have regard to the urgency, or what they deem to be the urgency, of the topics contained in them, and therefore I am very far from presuming to censure or to say anything which may be interpreted in the way of censure. But, generally, this subject is undoubtedly deserving of consideration—it ought to be a comprehensive consideration, and could not be dealt with by the Government off-hand and in an isolated manner. That would be my answer to my hon. Friend, whom I thank very much for calling my attention once more to the subject. Perhaps I may say a word on my own behalf in regard to Questions. A practice has sprung up—I am not complaining of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) or anyone at all—but a practice has sprung up of late years of putting to the First Lord of the Treasury Questions which are purely Departmental. If I may say so, there are several objections to that practice. I am compelled sometimes to ask the Representative of a Department to answer for me; I am conscious that this appears to be discourteous, and I resort to it with reluctance, and only when I find it necessary; but I do not like to do it, because it has a discourteous appearance, and yet it is a matter of absolute necessity. Then I may say, particularly at times of unusual pressure in the House, that this practice prevails, and the House will readily understand that at a time of unusual pressure it is extremely difficult to do justice to Questions which do not come within my own notice as First Minister of the Crown. And, lastly, that being so, I am not able to do them as much justice in many cases as would be done if they were put directly to the responsible Minister. There is, I know, a vague impression, perhaps even in this House to some extent, and largely among the general public, that the Prime Minister constitutes a sort of tribunal of appeal from the decisions of Chief of Departments. That is not a principle in our system of Government. There is not, generally speaking, any such appeal at all except in relation to the Treasury, and that, therefore, is peculiar. These Questions rather have a tendency to encourage the belief that there is such an appeal. I beg, again, to say, Sir, that I make no complaint of anyone with regard to Questions of this class; at the same time, I may suggest that it would be for the public convenience if they could be limited, and I believe it would be for the benefit of those who put them.

AFRICA (SOUTH)—ZULULAND.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether over 10,000 Zulus have perished in civil war since the restoration of Cetewayo; whether the Boers have invaded Zululand, and annexed more than 3,000,000 acres of the most fertile portion of that Country; whether Usibepu, a chief friendly to England, has been driven from the territory assigned to him by Sir Garnet Wolseley, and his people massacred and ruined; and, whether, in view of such great suffering and the destructive warfare that still continues, the time has come for the British Ministry to restore peace to Zululand?

MR. GLADSTONE: I will simply answer the Question by saying that it is not the opinion of the Colonial Department with regard to the two first heads of this Question that the statements of the hon. Gentleman can be verified; they look upon them as going very far indeed beyond the facts. That is as to the two first heads. As regards Usibepu, there is no doubt that he has been driven from his dominions; but with respect to the causes of his having been so driven, this constitutes a matter of controversy upon which we are not prepared at the present time to give a positive opinion. With regard to the last Question, I can only say that the attention of the Government is being directed to the condition of Zululand with the view of considering the question whether at any time their obligations of honour or policy are involved in an interference. The moment they see that the time for such interference has arrived they will deem it their duty to make it known to the House; but, of course, the hon. Member will see that they cannot arrive at such a decision at the instance of any hon. Member. Fresh information arrives from time to time that may tend to throw fresh light upon the facts, and it will then be our duty to consider as well as we can what decision we ought to arrive at.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I understand the right hon. Gentleman to traverse the statements contained in my Question that 10,000 Zulus have perished since the restoration of Cetewayo, and that the Boers have recently annexed or divided among themselves 3,000,000 acres of the most fertile portion of that country. I beg, therefore, to give Notice that on the first opportunity that offers I shall bring proof of these facts before the House.

MR. GLADSTONE: Perhaps I ought to say with regard to the first of these Questions—whether the Boers have annexed 3,000,000 acres—I am not disposed, according to the information we possess, to question the statement made by the hon. Gentleman; but the question that arises is as to the manner in which the land was acquired. We shall not be able to admit the contention of the hon. Member as to the means of acquisition of the land. The figure I cannot admit is the number of 10,000 Zulus alleged to have been killed.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)—GENERAL GORDON.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he had any information to give to the House with regard to General Gordon?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir Evelyn Baring telegraphed to-day, at 10 minutes to 2, from Cairo, that Colonel Swaine, Military Secretary to Lord Wolseley, had telegraphed as follows:—

"After consulting with Sir Charles Wilson, I may assure you that no such rumours regarding General Gordon's death are even breathed here. We entirely discredit them. Major Kitchener's messenger from General Gordon has arrived at Debbah with a long letter from General Gordon and four Arabic cipher letters."

SIR JOHN HAY: Is that from Dongola?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Yes. The date of General Gordon's communication is not given.

NAVY—H.M.S. "ACTIVE"—BURSTING OF A GUN.

MR. CARBUTT asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the report in The Times of to-day was correct, that one of the guns of the Active had had the muzzle blown off; whether this accident was due to the defective system of rifling; and, whether that unmechanical system of rifling was the same as in the new 43 and 100-ton guns which were sent away from the manufactory without one of the guns being properly tested?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, that the official Report was to the effect that, while firing yesterday from one of the 6-inch breech-loading guns of the Active, the gun broke at about five feet from the muzzle. A preliminary investigation had been arranged to take place to-morrow at Portsmouth. It would be premature at present to assign any cause for this accident. He was happy to say that nobody had been injured.

MR. CARBUTT inquired if the rifling were the same as the system adopted in the new guns that had been made?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, that he could not answer technical Questions without Notice.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY asked if this particular gun was manufactured at the Royal Gun Factory, Woolwich?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: That, I think, was not the case.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE EGYPTIAN POLIOY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I wish to put a Question to the Government as to the progress of Public Business. As we are neither in possession of the information which has been received from Lord Northbrook, nor in possession of the financial proposals of the Government with regard to the Vote of £2,000,000 which has been taken with regard to the Egyptian operations, we are not in a position satisfactorily to discuss the Egyptian policy of the Government. I think it would be the most convenient course that we should wait for the financial proposals of the Government instead of making a separate Motion. Therefora, I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he proposes to take Ways and Means on Monday, and to make his financial proposals?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): Yes, Sir; I propose on Monday, in Committee of Ways and Means, to make certain financial proposals.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (SCOTLAND)—MUTILATION OF SHEEP IN THE ISLAND OF LEWIS.

MR. MUNRO-FERGUSON asked, Whether the Lord Advocate's attention has been called to two cases of mutilation of sheep in the Island of Lewis, one in the month of June last, and the other on the 4th November; and, whether any steps in the matter will be taken by the authorities?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): I am familiar with the first case referred to by my hon. Friend. The circumstances were very peculiar. After careful consideration, it was decided that there was not sufficient ground for a criminal prosecution, whatever ground there might be for a civil action at the instance of the owner of the sheep. The second case has not yet been reported; but I shall cause inquiry to be made in regard to it, and it will be duly considered.

LUNACY LAWS—ESCAPE OF AN ALLEGED LUNATIC.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a report in the newspapers of the escape of an American gentleman named Bruce, formerly a Baptist minister, from the Brookwood Lunatic Asylum, where he had been confined; also whether Mr. Bruce has not made every effort to bring his case before the authorities, and has even gone back to the asylum to prove his sanity; and, whether the Home Secretary will inquire if the Lunacy Commissioners have had their attention called to the matter, and what steps he proposes to take?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that he had no knowledge of the case, except from what had been stated by the hon. Member; but he would inquire into it.

EGYPT (FINANCE, &c.)—LORD NORTHBROOK'S REPORT.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I beg to ask whether the Prime Minister can tell us now, and, if not, I shall repeat the Question on Monday, when he expects to be in possession of Lord Northbrook's Report, and when he will be able to make a communication on the subject to the House?

MR. GLADSTONE: I thought I had stated on Tuesday last that I hoped to be able to make a communication on that subject on some day in next week.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: On Monday?

MR. GLADSTONE: No; I do not think on Monday.

NOTICE OF QUESTION.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.

MR. W. H. SMITH gave Notice that on Thursday he would ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he would take steps to expedite the printing of Parliamentary Papers, having regard to the fact that on two recent occasions Parliamentary Papers had been published in the newspapers 24 hours before they were in the hands of Members of the House?

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

CROFTERS AND COTTARS (SCOTLAND).
RESOLUTION.

MR. MACFARLANE, in rising to call attention to the condition of the crofters in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland; and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to give effect to the recommendations of the Royal Commission upon the condition of the crofters and cottars in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, or to apply such other remedies as they deem advisable; and that this House concurs in the opinion expressed by the Royal Commission, at page 110 of its Report, that 'The mere vindication of authority and repression of resistance would not establish the relations of mutual confidence between landlord and tenant, in the absence of which the country would not be truly at peace, and all our inquiries and counsels would be expended in vain,'"

said, he had drawn the attention of the Government to this subject last Session, and had warned them that the situation was becoming serious and grave. He had tried, along with other hon. Friends, to convince the Government of the fact, but without success. Now, it had become quite obvious, not only to the House, but to the whole country, that the situation was exceedingly grave. Armed police and soldiers were being sent into the Island of Skye. They knew that Skye was a place where soldiers came from, and of the best quality too; but this was the first time in modern history that they had been sent there to coerce the people. He hoped and believed that, in spite of the efforts of the Local Authorities to bring about a collision, they would not be successful. In his opinion, those who were nicknamed agitators had succeeded, by their influence, in preventing a collision between the soldiers and police and the people. He trusted that would continue to be so. When disturbances occurred on the same subject—namely, the Land Question—in Ireland, they used to be attempted to be explained on the ground of the religion of the people. Some few people, perhaps, believed that; but the most of those who made the statement did not believe it. As a matter of fact, it was not true; but even if it had been, that explanation was not available in this case, for the people involved in the Skye disturbances—the extent of which had been greatly exaggerated for specific purposes by interested persons—were good, substantial, sober Presbyterians. They were not open to the charge so falsely made against the Irish people. A Member of the Government, the other day, at the opening of the Liberal Club, said that he hoped words of warning addressed to the House of Lords would not be regarded as a menace; but in this case the Home Secretary treated the words of warning as a menace. Indeed, the right hon. and learned Gentleman indulged in many phrases which were so simple that they might have been taken from any penny copy-book. Questions on this subject had been addressed by himself and others to the right hon. and learned Gentleman; but all the answer they could get was a statement of principles which were easy to accept. He readily accepted the principle that law and order should be maintained; but there was another proposition which should be put on a level with that, if not before it, and that was, that law and order should coincide with justice and right. That was not the case here. The Home Secretary said on Tuesday that the Question put to him invited him to express an opinion that there was some palliation or justification on the part of these men for their defiance of the law, and that he could not do so, inasmuch as he thought these proceedings were entirely without justification or extenuation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman added that if there were grievances—putting it as a doubtful matter—there were other means for remedying them. Thereupon he (Mr. Macfarlane) invited him to mention a single instance in which the Civil Law had been defied in the locality in question; and all he could get from the right hon. Gentleman was a vague statement about the general defiance of the law. Commenting on what then passed, The Times of the following day recalled the fact that the Royal Commission had not only begun, but finished its labours, and that its Report had been for months before the world, and said that, while having regard to the Franchise Bill, legislation could not have been fairly looked for, and those interested in the question might be excused for declining to be satisfied with vague official assurances that the matter was receiving the attention of the Government. In regard to the assumption of the Home Secretary that there was no justification on the part of the Skye crofters, he thought that those who looked into the matter would find that there was very considerable justification. He had in his hands the letter of a correspondent of a Glasgow newspaper, of the 10th instant, describing the condition of the tenants where the disturbances had arisen. The writer said that Major Fraser was not long in possession of his estate when he believed in the large sheep-farming system; and, of course, the crofters, with their small holdings, were looked on as in the way, and were treated accordingly—townships, in many instances, being altogether deprived of their pastures. Along with this, the rents were raised considerably, and a few years afterwards were raised again, while in 1879 or 1880 the rents were doubled. This last rise was considered a special hardship, as it took effect at a time when the price of live stock fell very low, and when most of the crops, which had been partially secured, were blown into the sea. When these facts were brought before the factor and the landlord as an argument against the increase of rents, the factor told the crofters that this was one of the risks which they had to calculate in taking land. The increase ranged from 200 to 300 per cent. In 1871 the Major's rental was £6,250, and in 1881 it was £7,486, showing an increase of £1,236. The people were not consulted in the raising of the rents, but were simply told that the rent would be so-and-so; and if they were agreeable good and well; and if not they must clear out as quickly as possible. This was only the testimony of a newspaper correspondent; but he could also refer to an authority that he thought would not be questioned—that of a minister of religion in the locality, the Rev. Donald M'Phail, Free Church minister at Kilmuir. This rev. gentleman was far from being a partizan, and, indeed, was in very bad odour with the crofters on account of some dispute that had taken place during these disturbances. This gentleman stated that he was a personal friend of Major Fraser, and that since the Major came into possession of the estate the Free Church community had enjoyed far more freedom than existed before. He had been a minister in Skye for 30 years, and 10 years at Kilmuir; and he expressed the fear that, in the present circumstances and mood of the population of the Island, a little more strain and a little more agitation would soon land them in a state of wild confusion. He went on to say that he had observed a gradual sinking of the people into deeper poverty during the last 10 years, and that they were becoming yearly less able to pay their way, and more displeased with their circumstances. This gentleman stated that the taking of the hill pasture from the crofters had greatly added to their discomfort, and said that if things remained as they were, there seemed to be no remedy for this gradual sinking of the people except by their dying out. The official table of the number of decrees of removing from holdings in the Island of Skye between 1840 and 1883 inclusive showed them to have affected 6,960 families. Taking each family at five persons, a total of 34,800 persons had been affected by these decrees of removal, and this at a cost to them of £3,480. The gentleman who was factor in Skye described how necessary these notices were in order to obtain rent, and in the management of an improving estate. In these 43 years the number of summonses of removing amounted to very nearly twice the whole population of Skye. It had never been stated—at least, he had not heard it so stated—that these people were unwilling to pay rent; and if it was necessary to issue these summonses of removal so often, it followed that the people were unable to pay their rent. He inferred from that that the rent was more than it was possible for them to earn. If anyone would just go down to the Western Isles, and look at the place, they would see, what everybody there knew, that the rents were paid from the fishing, and not from the holdings. He asked hon. Members to consider what that meant to the people of Skye, and to consider what was the state of the Land Laws under which it could take place, that there should be notice to quit to the whole population twice over in 40 years? In regard to the Island of Lewis, he had the statement to the Crofters' Commission of the Free Church clergyman of one of the parishes—a gentleman who was born in Lewis, and whose recollection of the Island went back for 70 years. The clergyman, in his statement, contrasted the present state of the population with their state 60 years ago. Then the people were in a condition of comparative comfort, with ample land and hill pasture, whereas now poverty and want largely predominated. Increase of population could not be the cause of the immense difference in the condition of the people. The present population of 3,489 was only 448 more than it was 60 years ago. This was so, in the face of the large increase of the value of the fishing industry since 1831. How, then, arose the unfavourable condition of the people now? It arose from large reaches of pasture land being taken from them and put into sheep walks and deer forests. That was done without a decrease in the rent of the crofters, and with, in some cases, an increase. The rev. gentleman, in his statement, also described the evils resulting from absentee landlords, and referred to the large sum of money spent by the late Sir James Matheson in the Island. Much of the sums, it was stated, had been spent in mere experiments, which would lead to no permanent good. Had part of the money so spent been applied to the improvement of the crofters' dwellings, and in making piers and harbours for the development of the fishing industry, the result would have been that the welfare of the people would have been very different from what it was. The whole tenour of the management, they were further told, had been rather to discourage than encourage the crofters. Were it not for the fishing, the crofter population could not subsist. The soil in possession of the large farmers was by far the best in Lewis. It was taken from the crofters and given to these large farmers. This was done without the crofters having got any compensation or consideration for what they had done to improve it. So much for the statement of this Lewis gentleman; and he thought he had quoted enough to show that these people had a grievance. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) had told them that if they had grievances there were other ways of redressing them. He should like to know what ways there were except agitation? He knew of no law in this, or any other country, that had ever been remedied except by agitation. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman said—"Yes, but not by breaking the law;" and he also said so. He had no wish that the law should be broken; and he hoped the Home Secretary would to-night make such a statement as to the intended action of the Government as would give no further excuse for opposition to the law. He hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would make such a statement as would disarm violence. The people had been holding out their hands praying for redress, but could get none. It was stated by the Government that the subject was under consideration; but no time was indicated when the people might expect to obtain redress. They never asked, nor desired, nor expected that the Government would bring in a Land Bill for Scotland during this Autumn Session; but he wanted the right hon. and learned Gentleman to give an assurance which would satisfy the people that something was going to be done when the Government had time to do it. The right hon. Gentleman said, "Am I to yield to violence?" or, at all events, he indicated something of that kind. The violence which had occurred would not, he hoped, be put forward as an excuse for any delay in this matter on the part of Her Majesty's Government. He did not wish to minimize the difficulty of dealing with this question; but a beginning would have to be made, and the sooner it was made the better. That there was a necessity for remedy he could quote many other authorities to show; but he had only taken two samples dealing with the Islands of Skye and Lewis, and they confirmed him in his opinion that there was an absolute necessity for a change in the Land Laws of Scotland. That that was so was asserted by the Commission of the Government. It was asserted by public opinion. The Government themselves had admitted it, yet nothing was done. He wanted to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether he could see his way to make a statement that when the Franchise Bill and the other measure intimately connected with it were disposed of, he would deal with this question seriously? If the House should pass his Resolution, it would be accepted by these people as a promissory note. The Home Secretary could not give them a note payable on demand; but perhaps he would put upon it some approach to a date with reference to the time when he would deal with this question. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would do that, he believed, even far as things had gone, the turmoil and excitement in the Islands of Skye and Lewis would quickly subside, because unless these were peaceable people they would not have remained quiet so long. He wished hon. Members could go down and see for themselves the condition in which these people lived. They were huddled together in dwellings resembling pigsties, they were half suffocated with smoke, and they were covered with dirt. Dukes and Earls and great landlords seemed to think that these people were kept there by some law which could not be changed, and that the people were fore-ordained to live in these places. Why, English gentlemen would be ashamed to see their dogs in such places. Highland chiefs and Highland lairds made good use of these people whenever they wanted them to assist in robbing others; but as soon as that game was at an end the people were cast off, and those who fought for and bled for the chiefs and lairds, fools as they were, were cast aside to live as best they could. Many of the lairds were so ashamed that they had not the face to live among these people, but left behind them some hireling to screw out of these poor people every farthing which could be got. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution which stood in his name.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, he had great pleasure in seconding the Resolution. The question divided itself into two parts—one the present condition of Skye, and the other as to the question generally. He hoped he might be allowed to make special reference to the state of Skye at the present moment. It had been said the Motion was in the nature of censure upon the Government. He did not think so; and if he had thought so he would not be in the position of seconding it. He thought, on the contrary, the Government would be only too glad of the opportunity of satisfying not only the Highlanders, but the civilized world, that the circumstances of Skye were such as required the placing among a lot of inoffensive people armed soldiers and sailors. They knew nothing of the grounds which had prompted the Government to accede to the request of the Local Authorities to send an armed force. All they knew was that the hon. Member for the County of Inverness (Mr. D. Cameron) placed on the Paper, on the shortest Notice, a Question last week, in which he asked the Home Secretary whether he had received intimation that there were movements in Skye of a lawless character, and what the Government intended to do? Next night the Home Secretary made a statement that he had received intimation of lawlessness, and that the Government were prepared to take measures to support the law. As soon as he (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) had an opportunity he put a Question to the Home Secretary, asking for the communications which the Local Authorities had sent requesting an armed force, and also the reply of the Government agreeing to such a proposal. What was the answer he received? The Home Secretary made a very civil reply; but it was one which put him for the time being entirely out of court. The right hon. Gentleman said as negotiations were going on he could not give any information; but the information, to be of any use, ought to have been given at once, so that they might know what they were about. Under these circumstances, he thought they were entitled to look with some suspicion on the application made by the Local Authorities. Who were the Local Authorities who made this demand? They were a self-elected body. They had no shadow of popular representation, and they had no responsibility whatever. The Commissioners of Supply—landlords of £100 value and upwards—were the ruling body in the county. They numbered about 100, and yearly devolved their duties on a Police Committee, which consisted of about 12 members. These 12 members had the whole authority of the county. They could do as they thought proper; but they had no responsibility whatever, unless such as was due to supervision by the Home Secretary or the Lord Advocate. Who were the officials who took part in this state of matters? The Sheriff and the Procurators Fiscal. The Sheriff was non-resident, and could know very little of what was going on. And who was the Procurator Fiscal? Well, in the case of Inverness County, although he was a gentleman for whom he had great respect, by that unhappy state of matters, whereby such officials were allowed to take other business, this gentleman held the position of agent for a great number of landlords in Inverness County. He believed he was not wrong in stating that in the Police Committee the Procurator Fiscal was agent for one-third or one-fourth of the members of the Committee. He had not the slightest fault to find with the Procurator Fiscal for the county of Inverness; but the public might come to the conclusion, rightly or wrongly, that his interests were to some extent mixed up with the landlords' and proprietors'. There was another under Procurator Fiscal in the Island of Skye. He was not, so far as he understood, agent for any landed proprietors; but, unfortunately, he was also in the unhappy position of not being paid by salary, but by business done; and it was inevitable there might be a tendency to think that cases might be trumped up which would not be if the Procurator Fiscal were an independent man, paid by fixed salary. In looking over the official statistics for the county of Inverness for 1883, he observed a very significant fact with regard to the number of people apprehended. There were apprehended and taken up on criminal charges in that year 384 people. Of these, there were not tried, 42; acquitted, 53; undisposed of at the end of the year, 4; convicted, 285. What was the result? Of all the people apprehended in the county of Inverness during the year 1883, 20 per cent were not tried at all, or were acquitted. He was afraid they could come to no other conclusion than that there were mischievous efforts to trump up cases. With regard to the general question, as far as he knew, all that the people of Kilmuir did was to turn back 10 policemen sent from Inverness—for what purpose? Not to keep order, for there had been no disorder. The people had met, as they had every right to do, to discuss the conduct of certain individuals who had given evidence before the Commission; and really, if they did use some strong language with regard to those individuals, he thought it not altogether unjustifiable. A certain individual named Urquhart was at this moment in possession of the lands of 43 crofters, containing more than 150 souls; and the consequent shiftings, removals, and evictions had taken place from these lands within the last 30 years. Could it be supposed that the people had no feelings on this matter? He did not justify anything that was illegal; but he felt that a great deal could be said for his fellow-countrymen in their unfortunate position. With regard to this very property, it was well known that the rental of the crofters had been increased three times over within the last 30 years, and the proprietor had been obliged to reduce, or temporarily abate the crofters' rents, by nearly 20 per cent. He was in great hopes that the Home Secretary or the Lord Advocate would be able to make a satisfactory statement on this question. The words of the Resolution of his hon. Friend were written by the noble Chairman of the Commission (Lord Napier and Ettrick), after a great deal of thought and consideration. They knew that certain expectations were raised by the issue of the Commission, and by the evidence taken before it; but they were afraid that, like many other Commissions, nothing would come of it, and that the end might be worse than the beginning. Therefore, they put these pregnant words into their Report in order to warn the Government of what was likely to take place, and that a police force, which might be necessary in certain contingencies, would be of no use in a permanent settlement of the question, unless beneficial legislation were adopted. One of the chief grievances of the crofters was that they had not sufficient land, although there was plenty of land for them if it were properly distributed. A factor of the Duke of Sutherland had told him that in parts of Sutherlandshire they would not be bright unless the population were diminished by one-half. When it was known that there were in that county nearly 1,250,000 acres, with but 23,000 people, the absurdity of this was evident. There were splendid glens and straths in the Highlands which at one time were under cultivation, and which might profitably be given to the people. The same state of things existed in Skye and the Long Island. But there were other matters to complain of. One was the question of deer forests. When this subject was before the House last Session, he made some observations with regard to deer forests. In order to have a unanimous Report of the Commission on the subject, he had agreed not to interfere with the existing deer forests. But with new forests the Commission were unanimous. But had the formation of deer forests come to an end? In the last debate he had pointed to a property of 20,000 acres on the West Coast of Inverness. It was then a sheep farm, running down to the sea, and it had been advertised for sale as a proper subject for a deer forest. That was bad enough; but not far from that locality there was another large farm now in process of being afforested, great part of which ran down to the sea. This was running directly against the indications of the Commission that no new forests should be made, at least under a certain altitude. Who was the person who was running in the teeth of the recommendations of the Royal Commission? No less a person than Her Majesty's Representative for the county of Inverness. The evils of deer forests were becoming intolerable. The largest deer forest in Scotland, covering nearly 200,000 acres, was occupied by one man; and he at this moment had actually taken out a process of interdict against a poor man living on the shores of Loch Duich, because a pet lamb had strayed 60 yards into the forest. Was not that intolerable? He had made these observations in no hostile spirit towards the Government; but he would not have acted on the Commission, and would have considered he was appointed under false pretences, unless he had been satisfied that the Government were in earnest in their desire to rectify those matters which were complained of in the Highlands. In that view, he hoped the discussion to-night would strengthen the hands of the Government, and not be one of which they would have any reason to find fault.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to give effect to the recommendations of the Royal Commission upon the condition of the crofters and cottars in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, or to apply such other remedies as they deem advisable; and that this House concurs in the opinion expressed by the Royal Commission at page 110 of its Report, that 'The mere vindication of authority and repression of resistance would not establish the relations of mutual confidence between landlord and tenant, in the absence of which the country would not be truly at peace, and all our inquiries and counsels would be expended in vain,'"—(Mr. Macfarlane),

—instead thereof.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have no doubt that many Members of this House wish to express their opinion on this subject. At the same time, I have no doubt it may be convenient that at an early period I should make the observations on behalf of the Government that I have to make on the Motion of the hon. Member. I have no ground to complain in any way of the speeches that have been made by the Mover and Seconder of this Motion, or of the spirit and terms of the Motion itself, in which I generally concur. There is only one thing that I would desire to explain with reference to what the hon. Member who made this Motion has said of the expression I used, that the violations of the law had no justification or extenuation. Perhaps I should have been more accurate if I had confined myself to the first word, and said they had no justification, because the word extenuation is a word of more doubtful meaning. With reference to the whole of this question, all that I can say is, that I stand in a rather different and a more difficult position with reference to it than either of the hon. Members who have addressed the House. With the official responsibility that I have in this matter, hon. Members in the House will feel that I am not free to say all that I think, because I must exercise a certain amount of reserve. But I think I am not acting inconsistently with my duty in this matter in saying what is known to the hon. Member who made this Motion, that the persons on whose behalf he speaks have long had my deep personal sympathy. I know these West Highlands well. I doubt whether there is anybody in the House who knows Skye better than I do. I have spent my leisure time for nearly 20 years mostly upon its shores and its bays; and all I can say is, that I have a deep sympathy and regard—I might almost use stronger terms—for the people who inhabit them. They are a people distinguished remarkably, as I think I once observed before at Glasgow, by a mildness of character which seems to belong to the climate in which they live. They have a high-bred courtesy in their demeanour; they have a kindness towards all who have dealings with them that is singularly attractive. I, for one, therefore, approach this question certainly not in any spirit of harshness or of rigour. All I can say is, that though there are painful duties connected frequently with the Office which I hold, I have never exercised a duty which I considered incumbent upon me with more personal regret than when I felt myself under the obligation to send a force to support the Local Authority in that part of the country. The hon. Member who has just sat down—though I do not think the hon. Member who made the Motion took that view of the subject—seemed to question whether there had been any disturbance in Skye at the time, and whether there was any occasion for the interference of the Government. If anybody who has read the reports in the public Press, I should have thought it was almost unnecessary to offer any evidence on that subject. What took place was this—A certain condition of things existed in Skye in which individuals were menaced in the pursuits of ordinary life—a condition of things of which recent times we have unfortunately become too familiar. I will not go into many of the details of petty outrages which have been taken place. The hon. Member who has just spoken referred to a case which I have just referred to a small force of police being sent to Skye, where it was intimated at a meeting of the crofters that three individuals—I abstain from mentioning names—were to be forcibly carried to the meeting to demand explanations of their conduct—I think there is no man in the House who will justify such a proceeding as that—whereupon the Police Commissioners thought it necessary to strengthen the Police Force in Skye. That is a thing entirely within the competence of such an authority; and I should be extremely surprised if in any part of London I was informed that there was a certain district requiring a larger Police Force for my rights to increase that force were questioned. What happened? That extra police—I think there were some men—were sent to give protection to the people in Skye. As soon as they arrived at Portree, a large number of people used certainly very violent proceedings, turned them back, and said they would not allow them to come into the country. Now, I think there is no man who would not admit that that is a condition of things which it is impossible to tolerate. Well, the information that reached me was, that there was a special animosity there against the police. That, to my mind, is a very grave symptom indeed. It is a symptom which deserves, I venture to say, the attention of all classes of the community, and of the proprietors quite as much as any other class; because I am the first to state and to feel that the employment of the Naval and Military Forces of the Crown in keeping peace in this country, or in any way aiding the civil authority, is in itself an immense evil. It is one to which I am most reluctant to resort, and never would do so unless I was convinced that it was absolutely necessary. The preservation of peace, and the exercise of the civil authority, ought to be carried out by the Civil Force, which is the police; and happily in this country, although cases do occasionally occur where the police, not being sufficient, military support has to be given to the police, I take it to be a maxim, subject to very few exceptions, that the Military and Naval Forces ought never, if it can possibly be avoided, to be used for that purpose. And, accordingly, when a few years ago there were disturbances in Skye, and I was pressed by the Local Authorities to send military there, I told them of my reluctance, and declined. I am speaking in the presence of my hon. Friend, if he will allow me to call him so, the Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. D. Cameron), whose counsel I naturally sought upon a question of that character; and he agreed with me that that ought to be postponed to the latest possible moment. Accordingly, the military were not sent to Skye two years ago. I confess it was with the greatest reluctance that I came to the conviction that if this were left to the police alone there would be such a powerful and violent resistance as would probably lead to a very dangerous breach of the peace; and I believe that is the opinion of every man acquainted with that district of Scotland. Well, under these circumstances, I came to the conclusion that, upon such an occasion as that, to exhibit weakness was no kindness to the people of Skye; and, thinking it necessary that order should be preserved, it was essential that it should be preserved in a manner that did not invite or admit of conflict, and I think that was at once a humane and a prudent view to take of the case. Now, at the same time that I speak of what occurred in 1882, the Government showed that they were not insensible to the consideration that there were grievances to be redressed, and that there were inquiries to be made. I can assure my hon. Friend who has last spoken that when I, on behalf of the Government, appointed the Commission, of which he was so valuable a Member, it was with the fullest intention that the Commission should bear practical fruit. Therefore, we acted in that respect with a spirit that, while the law ought to be sustained, at the same time every grievance that could be demonstrated ought also to be redressed. Well, now, Sir, there has been a good deal of exaggeration, I think, about this state of things. There has been a great amount of sensational reports. I received a telegram only yesterday, which, although it was not very complimentary to me, and was very strongly on the side of the crofters, I thought contained a great deal of good sense. It said—"If it were not for the agitators and the newspaper reporters, we should get on very well." Of course, there is a habit of picking up every flying rumour, whether it is well founded or not, and then it gets into print—and people have a habit of believing that everything that gets into print is the truth—and the result is that a great many unfounded statements receive a credit that they do not deserve. But I think there is no doubt—and the House will take this from me without my going into great detail—that there is a very serious condition of things existing in Skye and the West Highlands generally, and I do not think it will be in the least disputed by the hon. Member who has made this Motion. Now, I say alone this hostility towards the police, this determination not to show to them that obedience and that respect for law and order which is common in other parts of England and Scotland, is in itself a very serious symptom. When it comes to this, that in some parts of Skye and the Highlands the police have to be sent to execute the ordinary processes of the law, that is in itself a very serious condition of things. At the same time, I say it is very necessary that all classes of the community—and I include in that the Police Committee of the county of Inverness—must understand that the Government cannot undertake to aid the police permanently by military force. And a state of things must be established in which the police shall be able to maintain the public peace, and execute justice within their own territory. The Government make it clearly understood that in giving this support to the police it is as a subsidiary force, and not as a principal force, in the execution of the law. In my opinion, nothing can be greater proof that there is something which requires a remedy than when you are obliged to employ a military force. Now, I join with the hon. Member who has made this Motion in the hope and the belief that there will be no conflict in Skye. There is one phrase which I am sure the hon. Member dropped in the heat of the moment, and which he would not wish deliberately to repeat—that the Local Authorities or anybody else desired to provoke a conflict. I believe that is a statement which is without foundation. If it were true, it would be a most serious state of matters. I believe nobody desires to provoke a conflict; but there are persons who have rendered, in my opinion, great services in preventing a conflict, whose influence I ought to acknowledge, and they are men who, from their profession, were bound to exercise such a duty—the ministers of religion in Skye. In a meeting which took place, and which is reported in The Scotsman of yesterday, I find, first of all, the Rev. Mr. Macdonald, the Free Church minister from Inverness, exercised his influence most beneficially in advising the people to abstain from any breach of the peace. I find also the gentleman to whom the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane) has referred—the Rev. Mr. McPhail, of the Free Church of Kilmuir—used his influence in a speech which he made on that occasion; and I have also read a speech from the Rev. Mr. Davidson, of the Established Church at Stenschohl, one of the disturbed districts, and I have a telegram from him to say that he was satisfied that the people would be tranquil. I will ask leave to read the observations which he made, for they are short, and I think they highly deserve attention—

“He stated that prior to his being settled at Stenschohl, two and a-half years ago, there was not a single man in Skye who was more opposed to the Land League, and for months after entering on his duties as minister of the district he had but little belief in the crofters’ grievances. He soon, however, began to see that the state of matters existing in that parish was such that he could not but sympathize with the people. He could not consistently ask the people to stop their agitation to secure a remedy for their grievances; but he solemnly impressed upon them the danger of offering resistance to the police, and bringing themselves under the correction of the law. He had been present at some of their meetings, and he could honestly say that the speeches were moderate, and that the business was conducted in the most orderly way. He was fully acquainted with the men who were considered the leaders of the movement, and he could say that they were among the most respectable men on the Kilmuir estate.”

I think that statement is a most weighty

one, and one which is extremely worthy of the attention of the proprietor of the Kilmuir estate. And, Sir, that spirit of conciliation having been shown on the part of the ministers of religion, who have sought by their influence to allay the spirit of excitement and to prevent a conflict, I confess it was with very deep regret that I received this morning a newspaper which was forwarded to me—The Nairnshire Telegraph—reporting a speech of Major Fraser, which is couched in an extremely different spirit. He says repressive measures will be required to be used, and he did not know that another week would elapse before these would be used; and he hoped, when justice was done, all dissensions would pass away. I also hope, when justice is done, dissensions will pass away; but I hope that Major Fraser puts the same construction on justice that I do in these matters. I wish, at the same time, to have it clearly understood that this force which is sent to support the police is sent for the preservation of the public peace, and that if that support so given to the police were to be used for the purpose of oppressive measures, which would not and could not otherwise be employed, to use it as a cloak or a shield for such a purpose would be a gross abuse of that support. It is not intended to cover these notices of removal of which we have heard—things which, I think, are deeply to be regretted—notices of removal which are served, not for the purpose of being enforced, but for the purpose of keeping up a condition—I do not know whether I should call it “suspension,” or whatever term I should employ. These notices of removal seem to me to be a source of irritation which is not to be justified at all. That there exists in these districts extreme poverty, in some parts borne for many years with extraordinary patience, I think everybody who is acquainted with those districts must be aware. There is one subject to which the hon. Member for Carlow referred, in some of the evidence that he read, in which I very much agree with him. Some people say—“Oh, the remedy for this is emigration.” Well, Sir, in my opinion, emigration is a very poor remedy indeed. I have myself no sympathy with a policy which improves a country by getting rid of its people. To my mind that is the policy of despair.

It is like the old medical treatment of Sangrado, who cured all diseases by blood-letting; but, after all, blood is the life of the body, and the people are the life of the country. I, at all events, do not accept the policy of making a solitude and calling it political economy. No doubt the Scottish are people who have shown great qualities for emigration. A great part of the Empire of England, which covers every sea, is due to their intelligence and to their energy. Under Lord Chatham they played a great part in the conquest of Canada, and they still, by their industry, support and extend the greatness of that Colony. The history of Scotsmen in India is famous, and in New Zealand, also, there is a Scottish Colony of great prosperity and eminence. But that is, or ought to be, in my opinion, a voluntary emigration. I am entirely against pressing people out of their own country, and, least of all, such people as the West Highlanders. These people are remarkable—and I know them well—for their passionate attachment to the soil upon which they live. I have myself always thought that those beautiful lines in which one of the greatest masters of human nature—Goldsmith—described the history of the Swiss peasant were singularly applicable to the Highlanders of the West. I may be permitted to remind the House of those lines—

"Dear is the shed to which his soul conforms, And dear the hill which lifts him to the storms;
And as a child, when scaring sounds molest, Clings close and closer to his mother's breast,
So the loud torrent and the whirlwind's roar
But bind him to his native mountains more."

I believe that a policy which is founded upon tearing these men from their soil is not the remedial policy which is the best to be applied in these cases. I believe that you ought to find means for these people, so attached to their country, to live in their country. But that is a very difficult problem. It will be asked how? Well, there were times when they did live in the country in comparative happiness and prosperity; and, therefore, the problem is not insoluble in itself.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL: Kelp.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Well, there was not a great deal of kelp in the inland Highlands of Scotland, and yet there were a great many people who lived there. I think the hon. Member for Wigtonshire will have to study the history of the Highlands a little more closely before he comes to the conclusion that kelp is the solution of the problem. The Royal Commission has collected a great deal of valuable materials, and it has made some important suggestions; but one great difficulty in dealing with this question is, that I do not find that all the suggestions, or even the most important, of the Royal Commission have met with general acceptance from any quarter, or even from the friends of the crofters themselves. This is a very ingenious project for the creation of the communal system; but in all the discussions that I have heard since that project was announced by the Commission I find extremely little approbation. Even in the resolutions of the Land League itself it has been only faintly alluded to. All the proposals that I have seen accredited by the friends of the crofters have been a great deal more in the direction of the Irish Land Act than in the direction of that particular recommendation—extremely ingenious, but more theoretical than practical—of the Royal Commission. When it is asked in some quarters that the principles of the Irish Land Act should be applied to the West Highlands, I have to observe that the condition of the West Highlands, as I understand them, and the evils that exist there, are not of precisely the same character as those which were dealt with by the Irish Land Act in Ireland. There is not the same competition for land. I will speak directly about the question of there not being land enough. There is not in the West Highlands of Scotland that same competition of tenant against tenant which had led in many cases to great over-renting in Ireland. I do not say that there are not cases of over-renting in the West Highlands—that is certainly not the general character of the grievance which has been alleged; nor, according to my knowledge of the matter, is there the same prevalence of eviction that took place in Ireland; and, therefore, the evils in the Highlands are not the evils of over-renting nor eviction which took place in Ireland. And, therefore, if the two principal evils do not exist—at least to the same extent—and if the evil is not the same, it would not appear that the remedy would be identical. What is complained of, and what was complained of by the hon. Member in his Motion, is the want of more land. Well, in a certain sense, I suppose everybody wants more land if he could get it. I have no land, and I suppose many people in that position would desire to have it; but that is not the sense, no doubt, in which the hon. Member uses it. I confess that when you come to such a question as that, the evils and the difficulties, and, even if those were superable, the danger of compulsory legislation upon such a question appears to me to be extremely great. They may be necessary; but nobody can doubt that they are an evil in themselves; and, therefore, upon this point I would venture to take this opportunity of making a very serious and earnest appeal to the proprietors of the West Highlands themselves. They have very great facilities for dealing with this question. I speak in the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. D. Cameron), whose speech that he made last June I am sure very strongly impressed the House. And no difference of political opinion upon other questions would prevent me acknowledging the great benefit that I have derived from my hon. Friend in all these difficult questions as they have arisen. The number of proprietors in these districts is extremely small. That, in itself, I should call a great evil; but it does offer great facilities of coming to some understanding as to what would be the best to be done in these circumstances. I think in the Outer Islands, in the Long Island, I doubt whether there are six separate proprietors altogether. When you come to Skye the number is very few—proprietors of any magnitude at all. When you come even to the mainland the number is not considerable. Certainly, there are no people who have more reason to desire to see this question settled than the proprietors of the West Highlands. It is certainly not their interest to raise a great land question in Scotland; and there are great reasons, it seems to me, also, why they should be prepared to make—I will not say great sacrifices, but moderate sacrifices, to settle this question. They must remember, in the first place, that there is a very remarkable feature in the history of the land in the West Highlands. There has been in it a sudden growth of rental which has never been equalled anywhere else, I should think, within the course of the last century, and even still more of the last half-century. If you think of what the Highlands were long before the introduction of sheep farming, you will find that estates which were worth hundreds, or perhaps only tens, are now worth thousands. In those times, and not so very long ago—almost within the memory of living man—those great tracts of hill yielded no profit at all to the proprietor. Lord Malmesbury, in his Memoirs recently published, states that in his own recollection any man could go and shoot where he liked without paying anything, or almost anything, at all. But before the question of shooting arose, you must remember there was the question of grazing; and I do not think it would be untrue to say that 100 years ago in the West Highlands all these people who are now crofters, and were, in fact, the population of the country, had practically their grazing upon the land, just for the same reason that in Lord Malmesbury's recollection a man could shoot because it was not worth anybody's while to prevent it. The chief of the clan, or the proprietor, did not object to his clansman turning his black cattle on the hill any more than he objected to a man shooting; on the contrary, it was an advantage to the proprietor, who got something from him. No doubt, it was a rude state of life—a life, as appears from Burton's History, not of high civilization, but of great comfort. We read an account of it—perhaps the most accurate account—an account to which Scott gave an air of romance in Waverley—in The History of the Highlands. It there appears that the chief, or proprietor, and the clansmen lived together, certainly in a rude state, but in a state of comparative comfort. Then, however, came the great and sudden growth of the wealth of the Highlands by the introduction of sheep-farming. I do not complain of sheep-farming. The Duke of Argyll, in an article in The National Review, has gone a considerable length into that, for the purpose of showing that it is of a great economical advantage. Well, so far it gave an immense increase to rent. Men who had hundreds before found themselves in possession of thousands a-year of rent. I am afraid that within the last year or two that account is more unfavourable than it was. That undoubtedly was the history of the transformation. What happened after that? After the sheep farm gave an enormous increase to the rent of the proprietor—an increase without absolutely any expenditure on his part—there was possibly never a better instance of the unearned increment except that which I am going to mention. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Belgrave Square.] I will not dispute with the noble Lord in that peculiar hostility to Dukes which he always displays. I was only referring to the great windfall which came to the Highland proprietors. Then close upon the sheep-farming came the grouse-shooting rent, which was often, I believe, equal to the sheep-farming rent; therefore, the proprietor found himself in possession of land which rose within a generation from being worth nothing at all to an enormously increased and valuable rental. In more recent years, in my own recollection, there was found a still more valuable thing than the sheep farm and the game rent, and that was the deer forest, over a great part of the county of Ross and a considerable part of the county of Inverness, in the place of both the sheep rent and the game rent. Well, what was the result of that? The result was that, while the rent value increased, the grazing of these people disappeared. The Duke of Argyll, in his article in The National Review, says that it was not only the high hills that were necessary for the sheep, but also the low hills, in order that the sheep might have their wintering. But, then, what became of the black cattle of the crofter and the tenant? Unfortunately, there was not that softening influence which, happily, in England, softened the harsh outline of proprietary rights. Recollect what happened in this country. There was a population even more humble in its condition, more subject in its lot, than the crofter of the West Highlands, and that was the old villein of socage tenure in England; and what happened to him? He had rights of usage of this character, rights which certainly in their origin were not distinguishable in law, rights which were never enacted by any Statute, but which were consecrated and crystallized and secured to him by the spirit of the Common Law of England. What happened to them was described by the rough, masculine, and liberal language of the great Common Law lawyer, Sir Edward Coke, who said that—

"In Saxon and Norman times these copyholders were subject to their lords' will; but now they stood upon a sure ground, and waited not their lords' displeasure."

That is a curious and very interesting chapter of law. It is one of those fortunate circumstances which have gone to create the safety of the social system of England. In modern times we have had another example of the operation of the law sustained by the action of Parliament. It was a work and a policy that was mainly conducted by the man whose loss we have recently had occasion to deplore—by Mr. Fawcett. The work which he began, and which I and many others did our best to aid him in—in the prevention of the inclosure of commons—was a highly useful work. It prevented the absorption in single hands of all the common lands, which would have placed the mass of the population under disadvantage, and which was sure to have created discontent. Now, Sir, I say that all these considerations seem to me to point to a remedy which I cannot help thinking that the patient might administer unto himself to a great degree. Now, just consider what would have happened if, when these large tracts of land were being turned into sheep farms or into deer forests, yielding, as they did, an enormous increment of rent, there had been a more moderate use of these powers—if, while thousands of acres were taken for these purposes, a few hundreds had everywhere been reserved for the small population of these Highland glens—why, it would not have destroyed the system of sheep-farming at all. It would have been perfectly possible to have kept a moderate area which would have been sufficient for this population. They never could have covered the whole of these hills. That, it seems to me, is a thing which might very reasonably and well have been done. We have heard in this debate, and evidence has been given, of townships losing the hills which they had before. Why should townships lose the hills? I have never heard of them having refused to pay rent, except under the influence—I was almost going to say of pardonable excitement. But why, if a reasonable rent and a fair rent be offered them, should not these people have the accommodation which might make to them the difference between penury and comparative ease? It is quite unquestionable that it has led in a great degree to the change in the condition of the crofter in the West Highlands. What has become of the crofters' black cattle? There is no doubt that they can look back to a time, which they remember themselves, or of which they certainly had a tradition from their fathers, when they had this land, on which they had black cattle, and which, having lost, they have been confined to that little spot in the strath which, when potato disease comes or a bad season, is totally unable to sustain their existence.

Well, is there not room in this matter for a very reasonable settlement? I appeal to my hon. Friend (Mr. D. Cameron), who knows this matter very much better than I do; and I ask him, considering how few hands this land is in, how reasonable might be the settlement of a question like this? I ask you to consider whether in each locality it would not be possible to apportion to these people a single hill in their immediate neighbourhood? That might deduct, say, £20, or £30, or £50, from the rent of a great sheep farm; but is not that a settlement of a question like this, which is worth while making if it can be done? Sir, there is no doubt whatever—from the reason that I have already stated—there have not been those modifications, those temperamenta, as it is called by the lawyers, of the naked right of proprietorship in Scotland which arose under the Common Law in England. It is because civilization in Scotland in earlier times was ruder. ["Oh, oh!" and laughter.] I am ready to acknowledge how much more rapid, comparatively, the advance has been, and I thought the contrast would be agreeable. But from some cause or another the question of the bare proprietorship of land in Scotland is presented in a more raw and more harsh form in its legal aspect, certainly, than it is in England. I believe this to be a correct statement. Well, then, I have endeavoured to indicate that there are methods by which these people and the Government, in the task which is justly imposed upon them, may be greatly aided by a wise and prudent generosity on the part of the landlords themselves. There are immense difficulties in compulsory legislation, although I do not say it may not be necessary. The real truth is, that in all these cases the innocent bear the burden of those who are most to blame. A single landlord who exercises his right unfairly and harshly brings discredit and injustice upon many who deserve no blame at all. That I believe to be the case, to a great extent, in the West Highlands of Scotland. I believe it would be very unfair and very unjust to say that the landlords in the West Highlands are unjust or harsh to their tenants. That there have been instances in which things have been done that could not be approved I am not here to deny; but I believe at this moment that by far the best, by far the wisest thing that could be done, would be that the landlords, who are few in number, and have, therefore, greater facility for acting together, should take into consideration what can, and what ought to be done, to heal a sore which, I am sure, they must feel as desirous as anyone to close; for it is their interest, above all, that it should be closed, and that the Government, co-operating with them in so much of it as requires legislation, may form some scheme which will remove the discontent that everyone must deplore. I only make these suggestions because I am quite sure if they were acted upon they would be a very useful contribution to the settlement. However, that may or may not be the case; but in answer to the appeal which has been made to me by the hon. Member who has made this Motion, I desire most distinctly to state that the Government are fully conscious of the responsibility that belongs to them—the responsibility of endeavouring to find some adequate remedy for the state of things which is disclosed in the Report of the Royal Commissioners. They have always accepted that responsibility. They appointed the Royal Commission to aid them in discharging the responsibility, and it is their intention to discharge it. Now, I understand the object of the hon. Member for Carlow to be to appeal to me to give an assurance that this question was intended to be seriously taken in hand, and that at an early period. He spoke of a date. Of course, he did not mean a particular day or month; but I have an answer to that appeal. I have to say that it was not necessary for these unhappy occurrences in Skye to have taken place to have satisfied the Government of the necessity of at once dealing with it; and if the House will accept from me—for I hope I have spoken in no unfriendly spirit of the subjects of this discussion—in no unfair spirit either towards the crofters or the proprietors—if the House will accept from me the assurance that I have given of the responsibility which the Government feel and which they are prepared to discharge—I hope that under these circumstances the hon. Member will not feel it necessary to press his Motion, which, I believe, only states a proposition that everybody accepts.

MR. D. CAMERON said, that as he had had previous opportunities of expressing his views on this matter he would not detain the House at any length. The wording of the Resolution involved, as the Home Secretary had observed, a principle which every Member of the House must accept. If, however, he had not listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Carlow, he should be compelled to say that some tone of censure might be discovered in the Resolution. The idea seemed to be that the Government had failed in their duty in not taking active measures for legislating on this subject at an earlier period. In spite of the emphatic declaration of the hon. Member that this was not so, he could not help feeling that there was, on the part of the hon. Member and his Friends, a belief that the Government, if they had been so inclined, might have taken earlier steps to legislate on the subject. It was not for him to act as a defender of the Government; but he must remind the hon. Member of the exact state of affairs. Last Session was taken up with one important measure, which swamped all others; and it was impossible to suppose, even had the Home Secretary made up his mind as to the proper form legislation on this matter was to take, that time could have been afforded for the purpose. As to the present Autumn Session, the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane) had himself admitted that it was impossible to pass an Act of Parliament at this period. Then, in regard to the ordinary Sitting of the House in February next, the House could hardly require anything beyond the declaration of the Home Secretary that the Government distinctly intended to bring forward some measure. He would like to ask hon. Members, who talked so glibly of bringing in Land Bills, if they had ever considered the gravity of the question; if they had ever seriously contemplated what a Land Bill meant; if they had ever put pen to paper and endeavoured themselves to draw up a Bill such as would meet even their own ideas? To take thousands of crofters, steeped in poverty, holding wretched holdings, mere patches of land, and to transform them into a body of tenants—small tenants, certainly; but still tenants—with some hope of improving their condition, and of becoming eventually prosperous and contented farmers, was a work which appeared to him of no small magnitude. He would point out two difficulties which met them on the very threshold of the question. One of them was not noticed in the general Report of Lord Napier's Commission, although he himself, in a Memorandum printed with the Report, had dwelt upon it; and that was the difficulty of settling the area over which any Bill relating to this matter should extend. Was the area to extend over the whole of Scotland, or was it to be confined to the Highland districts properly so called? If it was to extend over the whole of Scotland, it must necessarily omit certain provisions in parts of the Highlands where remedies were most required, because these provisions would, if applied to other parts in the South, create such confusion between the relations of landlord and tenant, and such dislocation of existing practices, as would render the new state of things insupportable. Such a measure, so far as he knew, had never been asked for, and was not required in the South. On the other hand, if they limited the area to the Highlands, they were certain to create a great amount of discontent in many portions of the rest of Scotland where small tenancies existed, and where they might also expect some relief. There was another difficulty, perhaps a still more important one. How were they to deal with the poorest and most wretched class of all, the landless—he might almost say the homeless—class of squatters and cottars, whose condition was one of misery to themselves, and the cause of an additional amount of poverty among the

crofters where they found themselves placed? He could not say that these difficulties were insurmountable; but they were very grave, and what he feared was that those who were demanding immediate legislation had not faced them. As to the disturbances which had lately occurred, he trusted, from the last Report that had been received, that they would come to an end without any serious conflict. If he were asked, however, whether the proceedings adopted by the hon. Member for Carlow, and those who acted with him, had in any way added to the disorder that prevailed in Skye, candour would compel him to admit that it had. It was true it was reported in the newspapers that the hon. Member for Carlow had sent a telegram to those who had deforced the police, begging them on no account to break the law. But when he noticed the Questions which were showered upon the unfortunate Home Secretary and the Lord Advocate the other day, he could not help asking himself what effect those Questions would produce on the people in Skye who had disobeyed the law. The hon. Member for Carlow pressed the Home Secretary again and again on the subject of what he called civil breaches of the law. Everyone knew that the Highlanders, and especially the men in Skye, were amongst the most law-abiding races in the world. It was not a question of the breach of the Civil Law, but special agrarian outrages, which the police were sent to quell, in doing which they were deforced by the people. That was fully explained by the right hon. and learned Gentleman in answer to the Resolution. He was bound, therefore, to express his deliberate conviction that if peace were happily preserved it was not in consequence of, but in spite of, advice tendered by the hon. Member for Carlow. But it was possible the hon. Gentleman might turn round and say—"Well, you are a landlord; you support the Government where there is any question of coercion; but when the Government bring in a measure of reform to bring about a better state of things—in short, a Land Bill for the Highlands—you will then probably oppose them with all your might." That was not so. If at that time he had the honour of a seat in that House, he should accept the invitation just made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman in the spirit in which it was made, and do all in his power to assist the Government in passing such a measure, even although its provisions might go further than what he himself might consider expedient. He should only ask for two conditions—first, that such a measure would really benefit the crofters; that it would provide some kind of security of tenure to the most deserving and industrious; and that it would provide a mode of adding to their holdings, which was the one point on which everyone in the Islands agreed was an absolute necessity. The other condition which he hoped to see fulfilled, although he would not insist so strictly upon it, was that the Government should not confine their efforts alone to a Land Bill, but take into consideration the unanimously expressed desire on the part of the Royal Commission that other remedies should be forthcoming. He was far from saying that everything recommended in the Report should be carried out. That was impossible; but he did think a beginning might be made in one branch of industry—that of the fishing, to improve the piers and harbours of the unfortunate people of the West Coast, and thus enable them to prosecute the fishing industry with greater success than they had hitherto been able to do. While he had expressed his grave doubts as to the effect of much that had been done by the hon. Member for Carlow and others, he in no way impugned their motives. He believed their object was an honest desire to do good to the people; but he entreated them to lay aside suspicion of the landlords, and co-operate with those who might not hold the same extreme views, but who had the welfare of their common countrymen at heart, so that by the union of all parties, in the interest of the Government, who would have to introduce a Bill, of the landlord, who would have to make some sacrifices of the tenants, who, he trusted, would reap some benefit, and the sympathizers of the crofters in all parts of the world, some solution might be arrived at which would restore contentment to the crofters and add to the welfare and happiness of the whole population.

Mr. PICTON: Mr. Speaker, in addition to the diffidence usually felt by a new Member in asking the indulgence of the House for the first time, I am haunted by a fear lest it should seem presumptuous in a Member for a Midland constituency to say anything whatever about a question affecting the population in the extreme North. But if any excuse is needed, my apology must be that the people of the constituency I represent (Leicester) are profoundly interested in the fortunes of the crofters. And, indeed, if I may venture to refer to my own experience, I may say that having been brought into close contact with millions of the labouring classes in the East of London, in Manchester, and in Liverpool. I have reason to know that this question, affecting, in the first place, the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, is very extensively regarded as only a special instance of a much larger issue. The hon. Member for Inverness (Mr. D. Cameron), to whose wise and weighty words we have all listened with respect, sees many difficulties in the way of any solution. But, after all, the hon. Member has not mentioned any difficulty that is insuperable, or even any difficulties greater than those already overcome in the Sister Island. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary spoke with deep sympathy of the sufferings of these unfortunate crofters; but what we wanted to hear from him was his idea of the practical remedy to be applied; and, while I recognize the limitations necessarily imposed by the responsibility under which he spoke, I confess I was disappointed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not give us more substantial ground for hoping that something effectual would be done to relieve the sufferings of these poor people. The right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed inclined to leave the whole remedy to the charity of the landlords. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: No, no.] But he also told us that there were circumstances in the South which softened the harshness of the outlines of proprietary rights, and that these circumstances did not exist to the same degree in the North. Well, if the landlords in Scotland are more unsympathizing than the landlords in England, I cannot help saying that I pity the poor tenants who are committed to their tender mercies. The right hon. and learned Gentleman gave the House some interesting information about the change which took place centuries ago in the tenure under which copyholders held their land. He spoke of this change as happy and beneficent, and this precisely because, in consequence of the change effected, the copyholders received fixity of tenure. Surely, if fixity of tenure is good for copyholders, it may turn out also to be good for ordinary tenants. In fact, the interest I have in this question arises from the belief that the principles involved manifestly affect not a few Islanders, but the whole Kingdom, for the core of the difficulty presents only a special case of an evil that is more and more widely condemned—I mean the absorption of the land by the few to the detriment of the many. In the Report of the Royal Commission, I find it stated on page 14 that in four parishes there are 30 occupiers, forming less than 1 per cent of the population, who hold two-thirds of the whole area of the land. Now, if anyone regards that as a natural and fitting arrangement, I confess I cannot understand him. How did the land come to be thus concentrated in the hands of so few occupiers? The cause is that it has been monopolized by a very few owners, and that they have found this arrangement more profitable to them than a wider diffusion of occupancy. But how did these few owners come into possession of their power? This is not a mere theoretical or unpractical question. It is often said, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman has hinted as much this evening, that the fact of possession must be accepted as final. Nevertheless, in the case of the crofters it is not possible entirely to reject the moral aspect of the question. If we have endeavoured to unite law and equity in Judicial Courts, surely it would be a very poor thing to insist upon separating them in the High Court of Parliament. Now, in the course of the debate, reference has been made to the fact that old tenures subsisted to a later period in the Highlands of Scotland than elsewhere. The clan system, we are told, existed down to 1745, and the rights of Chieftains, under this system, were very different from those of landlords in the present day. I am aware that Charters were granted to loyal Chieftains, and that legal arrangements were made by which old rights were changed into those of modern landlords. I am aware also that, as we are often told, estates have since that time frequently changed hands by sale, and it is argued that the moral claims against the former Chieftains cannot be urged against the present territorial owners. But it is not denied that, whatever may be the case with the owners, the tenants and peasantry are of the same race, inheriting old traditions and family claims. Now, what I contend is, that the new owners ought to regard themselves as subject not only to the legal conditions of modern ownership, but to the moral claims and conditions prevalent in the society of the district where their estates exist. The Commissioners say on page 8 of their Report, that—

"Claims on the part of tenants to security in their holdings cannot now be seriously entertained."

But to this proposition they make a curious exception. They say on page 9—

"It is difficult to deny that a Macdonald, a Macleod, a Mackenzie, a Mackay, or a Cameron who gave a son to his landlord 80 years ago, to fill up the ranks of a Highland regiment, did morally acquire a tenure in his holding, more sacred than the stipulations of a written covenant. Few will hold that the descendant, in possession, of such a man should even now be regarded by the hereditary landlord in the same light as a labourer living in a Lowland village."

There seems to me to be something of the glamour of military romance about this passage. Surely, if the existing tenant has a claim to security of tenure, because his grandfather or great grandfather fought under a former possessor of the estate, ancient custom and the necessities of life constitute a more general and also a stronger claim. It appears to me that the tendency of the Report, in spirit if not in the letter, is to support such claims as these; and it is precisely their refusal now that is the occasion of threatened disorders. Sir, there is no arguing with misery; you must either relieve it or crush its complaints by violence. In the year 1880 a very similar state of things existed on a much larger scale in Ireland. At that time, the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), while refusing all legislation, advocated the widest application of charity to the needs of the Irish tenants. But the Government, at that time, said, "No; we want justice, not charity;" and they brought in the Compensation for Disturbance Bill. Of course, that measure was not passed. In the present state of our Legislative

Institutions, no large measure of justice ever is passed on the first time of asking. But, at any rate, the Bill showed the mind of the Government; and from the debate of that time I might quote many passages from authoritative speeches strikingly applicable to the case before us. The Home Secretary, indeed, has urged that there is no parallel between the two cases. But what he meant plainly was—that there is no parallel in details. It is impossible to deny that there is, at any rate, this general similarity—that in both cases we have a distressed tenantry who cannot live on their holdings; and in both cases the main reason is that the Land Laws work in an oppressive manner under conditions not suitable to the life of the present day. In 1880 the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) congratulated himself and the country that the Land Act of 1870 had gone so far as to establish the principle not only in Ulster, but out of Ulster, that the tenant had some right in his holding. And he added that—

"Without such a clause Ireland would by that time have required to be governed by Martial Law."

Well, the crofters are suffering quite as acutely as the Irish tenants ever did; and, undoubtedly, unless some remedy is forthcoming—a legislative, not a charitable remedy—there are dark days in store both for those people and the Government of the country. If the question of property be raised, I may, perhaps, be allowed to remind the House of certain wise words spoken by the Prime Minister, when discussing the rights of landlords in Ireland on July 5, 1880. He said—

"The principles of property are vital to the welfare of the State. They are at the very base of the social system; but, notwithstanding these great and fundamental truths, it is not less true that there are occasions when, not merely necessity calls upon you to modify the extreme application of those principles, but when the introduction of modifications are the best and the only means by which you can effectually preserve the principle of property itself."—(3 Hansard, [253] 1657.)

These words seem remarkably applicable now. I do not deny the legal rights of the landlords; but I maintain that some legislative changes are necessary—if these rights are to remain worth having—to make them consistent with the happiness of the people who live upon the land. The circumstances are so pressing that I could wish the Ministry were willing—or rather, perhaps, that the working of the Parliamentary machine had enabled them—to bring in some suspensory measure analogous to the Compensation for Disturbance Bill, in order that a stop might be put to the cruel evictions continually referred to in the Report of the Royal Commission. But if that is impossible, surely the Government need not object to the passing of this Resolution. It is an exceedingly moderate one, and yet it would be effective as a record of the opinion of the House. It would give great satisfaction to the poor people concerned, and would, I believe, go farther than hordes of police and fleets of gunboats to keep them in quietness and hope. Sir, the time is coming when this House reformed, and resting upon a much broader electoral basis, will hear much more of the question of land tenure. It is a question on which passionate convictions are held by the multitude—convictions which will find vent in demands for very drastic reforms. And, I believe, that not merely the fortunes of the crofters will be affected by the attitude assumed by the House on the question before us, but that it must influence for good or evil the mood and temper of all the millions who are soon to receive so great an accession of political power.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he must congratulate the hon. Member who had just sat down on the ability which characterized his first speech in that House. It was interesting not only from its ability, but also because it claimed to represent the views of large portions of the population, and to be the harbinger of violent changes in the Land Laws of England and Scotland. But he regretted that the hon. Member cherished feelings against the landlords of this country which were certainly not founded on a profound knowledge of the subject; and he feared that if land legislation in the future was to be founded on the ideas expressed by the hon. Member, it would not proceed on very sober or rational lines. The hon. Member lamented the absorption by a few individuals of large tracts of land. He, too, regretted it likewise, that there was not a larger number of freeholders in the country, not because he thought that peasant proprietors would necessarily, or even probably, be a prosperous class, but because, undoubtedly, there was a political danger in the concentration of land in a few hands. The hon. Member seemed to suppose that the landlords of the country were occupied in remorselessly adding house to house and field to field. The real fact was, as everyone knew, precisely the reverse. The landlords of England and Scotland desired nothing more than to find purchasers for the land which they already possessed. He desired to point out the extraordinary attitude which the Home Secretary had taken up on the question with which the House was more particularly dealing, when they reflected what the Government were doing at this moment in Ireland. The Home Secretary denounced the practice of collecting rents by armed force; but what were the Government doing in Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary denounced emigration; but, again, he asked what were the Government doing in Ireland at this moment? Why, they were acting in Ireland precisely as the right hon. Gentleman said he never would consent to act in Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that it was merely political economy run mad which objected to emigration. But if he had read the Report of the Royal Commission with the attention which he ought to have bestowed upon it, he would see that this was not a question of political economy, but a question of arithmetic, and a very simple question too. They had a certain population to deal with, and they knew the amount of ground required by a family to enable it to live in comfort on its holding. Divide the acreage by the number of families, and let them see, in the case of many of the Islands, whether the quotient was equal to what was required. He did not see how the right hon. Gentleman could refuse to assent to the proposition that there were large tracts in the Highlands which could only be adequately dealt with if, in addition to whatever else they did, they, at all events, promoted emigration. Nor was it fair or just to represent the distress existing in the Highlands at this moment as the result of large sheep farms, because the distress existed in places where there were no large sheep farms. It existed in places where almost all the good arable soil, and most of the hill pasture, was in possession of the crofters. The hon. Member for Carlisle had said that in the Island of Tyree a great part of the land was divided into large holdings. That, like many of the statements that were made in connection with this question, he was sorry to say by people of responsibility, was untrue. The large farmers in the Island of Tyree had 5,700 acres of the hill pasturage, and of the soil that could be tilled they had about 300 acres. The small tenants of the Island had of the hill pasturage 10,300 acres, or nearly double what the large farmers had, and of the land which was capable of being tilled they cultivated 3,700 acres, or more than 10 times the amount held by the large farmers. He listened with regret to some of the attacks made by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Pictou) on some of the landlords in the Highlands. No doubt, there were individuals here and there in this class, as in every class of society, who did not do their duty; but he thought it might fairly be claimed for the Highland landlords that they had, on the whole, as far as lay in their power, managed their properties less on strictly commercial principles, less with a view directly to their own profit, but more with a view to the happiness and the material well-being of those with whom they were connected than any other class of the community, be that class what it might. The recent Commission had examined, or rather had swallowed wholesale, the case of the crofters; but the case of the landlords had never been examined, and until it was examined no judgment could be passed against them without cruel injustice. The question was, however, What was to be done? He did not profess to have a remedy; but he thought it important to point out what the real difficulties of the problem were. What, then, was the Crofter Question? What was a crofter? A crofter was practically a labourer with a very large allotment, who lived in the very worst climate for agricultural as opposed to pastoral purposes in the world. He had hitherto been obliged to eke out his farming by labour, or his labour by farming—whichever way they liked to put it—and in those parts of the country where overcrowding existed, and where there was insufficient employment, it was absolutely necessary that the man should go afield and seek work elsewhere, either by fishing or otherwise. How was this state of things to be cured? They could not cure the existing evil by merely increasing his holding, even in those cases where that could be done without evicting some of his neighbours. That would do no good unless they increased his capital. Spade labour required, indeed, but little capital; but then spade labour could never be productive or profitable in the Highlands. A very competent witness from Skye, in giving evidence before the Commission, said it paid to import oatmeal. The House could not have a more suggestive statement than that, because oats were the one form of cereal crop which it was supposed could withstand the Highland climate. Spade labour, then, being out of the question, how were they to increase their holdings for pastoral purposes without at the same time increasing their capital? In those districts of the country where distress existed at this moment, the poor people complained that they were in debt to the shopkeeper and the moneylender; and by what machinery and from what source, he asked, did they propose to provide the indebted population with the additional capital necessary to increase their holdings and to stock their land? When he mentioned that there were upwards of 140 inches of rainfall in Skye in a year, the House would see that spade labour, by which the peasant proprietor earned his living, was absolutely out of the question. It must be by pastoral industry, therefore, and pastoral industry, he repeated, required capital, which the people had not. If the British taxpayer chose to provide £300 capital for each family, he should, of course, as a Highlander, be glad to see it done; but would any responsible Government in this country dare to maintain that the position of the crofters on the West Coast was so peculiar that they, among all the distressed populations of the United Kingdom, were to be provided for out of the pockets of the taxpayer? If that was not done, what was to be done? He was afraid that the Government, listening to monitors like the hon. Member for Leicester, might say—"There is great discontent, there are outrages, disturbances, real distress and poverty, and we must do something. What can we do? We cannot subscribe large sums of public money, because the taxpayers will not allow it; we will give these people fixity of tenure or an Irish Land Bill, something that, if it does no good, will, at all events, hurt no one but the landlord." Fixity of tenure would, he believed, be a very serious matter, not for the landlord, but for the tenant. He failed to see how people, who were not evicted, and were not rack-rented, would be benefited by a measure whose only object was to prevent eviction and rack-renting. What they suffered was from neither of those scourges, but from the scourge of poverty; and no mere manipulation of the Land Laws, however drastic, could, he feared, do the slightest good to these poor people. If any man was weak enough to suppose that by buying out or turning out the landlords, or destroying their interests in the estates, any advantage would accrue to those poor men, he made a most melancholy mistake. In one of the Islands at this moment where distress was both acute and chronic, the whole rent had for many years been devoted by the proprietor in aid of the people. He feared that no sudden and miraculous improvement could be produced in this state of things by any human means, least of all by Act of Parliament; they must look to the gradual operation of increased education, improved means of communication, the spread of the English language among the people, and the desire for greater comfort inducing them to emigrate to ameliorate their lot. These were the slow but sure means which would provide a remedy for the present condition of the Highlands. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had spoken of the former condition of those people as if they had once lived in plenty and prosperity in their Highland glens. He dissented altogether from that view. Those who really knew anything of the matter knew that the "plenty and prosperity" of the right hon. and learned Gentleman were fine words for chronic starvation. Nothing was more remarkable than the fact that as rents had increased so was the increase of prosperity in a large part of the Highlands. He admitted freely that there were parts of the Highlands where the state of the population was perfectly shocking, and where the dwellings, the poverty, and the misery of the people were such as to drive them almost to anything that pretended to be a remedy; but that did not by any means represent the whole of the Highlands. There were large tracts in Ross-shire, Argyshire, and Perthshire, where the prosperity was equal to anything to be found in any other part of the country. In these more prosperous parts of the Highlands, partly by emigration, partly by sheep-farming, partly by improved methods of agriculture, partly by the inflow of Southern wealth, the even layer of chronic misery which once overspread the whole of those glens had now disappeared. The Government, he understood, meant legislation; but what precise form their legislation was to take, he could not gather from the Home Secretary. But one request he would most earnestly press on them. Let them not legislate for show. Let their legislation not be merely contrived to satisfy the people of the big towns, who were not concerned in that matter, but such as should have regard to the welfare of the people who were concerned. Let it not be of that sensational kind which would gratify men like the hon. Member for Leicester, but rather such as would slowly, perhaps, but effectually and permanently, raise the condition of the poverty-stricken dwellers on the West Coast and in the Islands of Scotland.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that he had, like his right hon. Friend (Sir William Harcourt), a strong sympathy with these crofters. Anyone who had spent any portion of his time in the Western Highlands and Islands amidst a scenery unsurpassed, perhaps, in the whole world for beauty, must have had his soul stirred with the sight of dwellings that were for the most part utterly unfit for human habitation. Who did not know the look of the miserable cabin—house it could not be called? Who did not know the look of the listless figure leaning against the gable end? Why was the Highlander, who was energetic enough when met in Canada, so listless and unoccupied when they saw him on hiscroft? It was the surroundings of his home that had brought the man down. It was the confinement of his home that brought him down. He had not got occupation for his arms. He had got no hope of a better life. These things were not too strong to say of him; but when they came to speak of a remedy, difficulties met them on every side. It was not so easy a task as the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) thought. He confessed that, although he was glad that the Government proposed to take up that matter, and to take it up at an early date, he could not hope for very much from legislation. They might give the crofter security of tenure; they would stereotype him in his poverty. They might give him more land, as the hon. Member who seconded the Motion suggested; but how was he to find capital to stock it? He knew of one instance in a district where he had long resided in which the proprietor, anxious to ameliorate the condition of the crofters there, offered to them, at a very low rent indeed—a rent which they themselves would admit to be exceedingly liberal—a large sheep farm which was very close to them, and which they had longed and asked for. The men were anxious to take the farm; but he was sorry to say they were, at any rate a month ago, unable to take any part of that farm through the want of necessary capital. How, then, were they to get over that difficulty of the want of capital? He did not think it was quite an insuperable difficulty. He agreed with the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) that they could not ask the taxpayers of the country, poor as many of them were, to find a large sum of money per family to ameliorate the lot of the crofters; but it was here, he thought, that there was a ray of light if they could only get the reasonable co-operation of the proprietors. He confessed he looked on the action of the proprietor with more hope than he did on any law they could pass, for this reason—that they could not, by a stroke of the pen or by passing any Act of Parliament, suddenly raise the whole mass of the crofters, and make them prosperous. What they could possibly do was so to legislate that they might raise those among them who were most capable of rising, and that the most thrifty crofters might have a better opportunity of getting larger holdings. That was the way in which, he thought, they must look to solve this difficulty. It was not by a sudden elevation of the whole body of crofters, but by a gradual process of lifting those who were capable of rising out of their present condition; and by lifting these they would give hope to those who were behind, and those who were behind would see that thrifty habits and industry might raise a man out of the condition of the average crofters, and put him in a better and more prosperous state. His right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary had fired a very heavy gun against any idea of emigration. He could not go with the right hon. Gentleman the full length of what the House understood him to say. No doubt, migration was better than emigration where it was possible, and he would never suggest emigration if he thought that the condition of a man could be bettered at home; but if there was no chance of that—if the difficulties in the way of it were insuperable or appeared to be insuperable—then, if the man himself was anxious and willing to go where his relations and his fellow-countrymen had already gone and prospered, for his own part he would encourage that man to go. That was the principle which had all through governed those who had taken an interest in Irish emigration. To take another point, there was the question of fishing. How were they going to legislate for that? They were told that more harbours and piers should be provided. That was a very good thing; but how came it that the East Coast fishermen came round to the West Coast, and took the fish from under the very noses of the starving crofters? Something might be done by a little forethought as to the storage of salt and such matters; but they could not make the lot of a crofter who had to depend upon arable ground anything but an intolerable one in the West of Scotland. The climate was against them, even if the land was theirs in abundance. The hon. Member for Hertford had said that more oats might be grown. But as a rule the crofter did not eat the oats he grew; in most cases they did not ripen, and they were grown chiefly for the cattle. The climate was wanting, and the crofter had to depend really upon three things—pasture, fishing, and what labour he could get elsewhere. It was all very well to say that the crofters had been squeezed out and sent down from the centre of the country to the shore. But there was no comparison between the lot of a crofter who lived away from the coast on fair land and that of one who lived on worse land, but with fishing close to his door. He did not advise that the crofter should be left to the charity of the landlord. He should be very anxious to see the Government take any steps which they could to help the crofters; and if they had the security of the landlord, he should be prepared to go as far as to vote for any measure which would enable the landlord to acquire money, at a moderate rate of interest, for the sake of improving the condition of the crofter. He could not go further than that. He was very unwilling to burden the public with loans of that kind; but he believed that unless something of that kind were done it would be found almost impracticable to get the crofters into larger holdings. The landlord might be willing to offer the land, but the crofter would be utterly unable to take advantage of it, even if he was in a condition of having security of tenure. He could not see any great danger to the State or the Exchequer if they had the security of the landlord. Whether the landlord would be, in many cases, willing to burden himself with such a debt he was unable to say. He most cordially endorsed the appeal made by the Home Secretary. In the first place, in endeavouring thus to ameliorate the condition of the crofter, it was necessary to pick out those who would be able to make their living there. That was a thing which Government could not do; only persons intimately acquainted with the locality, with the varying circumstances of the locality, and with the men themselves, could carry this out. A landlord who was acquainted with these details would know who could be trusted with an advance of capital. With reference to the landowners themselves, he was astounded that, being so few in number as they were, and willing as many of them were to make efforts in the right direction, they had not met together for the purpose of taking some joint action in the matter.

MR. CAMERON: Is the hon. Member sure that they have not done so?

MR. WHITBREAD remarked, that he had, at all events, seen no public mention of their having done so. In the meantime this agitation was growing. What were they waiting for? Were they thinking of sheep-farming, or did they think that they were going to put the whole of the land under forest? He would not go into the question of how far public opinion would tolerate such action; but he thought that there were solid reasons against it. In the first place, deer did not multiply quickly, and the making of a forest was a slow process; and, secondly, there was only a limited number of men who were wealthy enough to afford to give extravagant prices for forests. If the landlords allowed this agitation to go on without taking any collective action to meet the condition of affairs, he feared that the line which separated what was reasonable from what was wild and unreasonable would soon be blotted out; and he thought that they would have themselves, and themselves alone, to blame if, at some future time, legislation of a very drastic, and not of a very useful, character was passed in that House—legislation which was now utterly unnecessary, if now the proprietors themselves would meet and, after careful consideration, take collective action in the way of ameliorating the condition of the crofters.

MR. MUNRO-FERGUSON said, that so soon after his admission to the House he would not have trespassed on its indulgence had it not been for the vital importance which was attached to the Land Question in the Highlands. His second plea for extenuating circumstances was that he wished to make public a telegram which he had received in regard to the disturbances in the Hebrides, which had, from the reports in the newspapers, been considerably exaggerated. He received a telegram some three days ago, which he handed to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate, on the subject of these disturbances in the Island of Lewis, and since then he had received another which he had been requested to read to the House. It was—

“A large and enthusiastic public meeting of inhabitants of Lewis indignantly repels the untruthful and misleading reports of lawlessness in the Island in The Scotsman of last Monday. Contradict these reports in House; they are used for the purpose of damaging the crofters with the Government.”

He might say, on behalf of the people of his constituency, that they recognized the difficulties of the Government in dealing with this question in consequence of the position of the Franchise Bill. But while he recognized those difficulties fully, yet he could not help saying that any further delay on the part of the Government in dealing with this question would be fraught with the greatest danger. The Government, in short, must do something at the earliest possible moment. Besides the ordinary reasons for attending to the Report of the Royal Commission, which recommended very sweeping changes in the existing law, there were special reasons to be considered. In the first place, the Highlanders were an imaginative and impulsive people. He had found, in the course of land management in the Highlands, as compared with the Lowlands, that if a contract was to be arranged between a proprietor and a tenant, the decision should be given at once, and the work carried through at as early a date as possible, because if that were not done the one contracting party brooded over the cause of delay, and attributed all sorts of reasons as to the other contracting party; and so it would be with the action of the Government. They would have the people brooding over their wrongs, which would not decrease under that process until the matter was taken in hand and, so far as possible, remedied. Another reason he had for pressing the Government not to delay taking the matter in hand was the outside influence which was brought to bear upon the crofters, and which was not always of the best description. He ventured to say that a speech from the Home Secretary, or a few words from the Prime Minister, would be a better and healthier remedy for the Highland fever than the reckless statements of professional agitators. It was to be regretted that, although the crofters had the sympathy of everyone who had inquired into their case, it had not been accompanied by a just proportion of practical and sound knowledge of the case. Here they had a very grave social problem to tackle—one of the most dangerous that he thought lay before them. The question was a very grave one, and it was quite as serious in all its parts as the Land Question in Ireland. The Land Question was too big a one for a private Member to tackle; and that was why he wished to see the Cabinet turn its attention and resources in that direction. In respect to these disturbances in Skye, while he fully recognized that it was the first duty of the Home Secretary to restore order in that Island—and that action, he believed, had met with the general approval of the House—yet he could not help thinking himself that a Royal Proclamation would have been better before resorting to sending an armed force. This agitation could never have been aroused amongst a deeply religious and loyal people without a strong reason; and that agitation would not subside until the cause had been considered by the House, and it had applied a remedy. There was one other point alluded to by the hon. Member (Mr. Picton), who suggested that a Suspensory Act should be brought in. If there was to be any delay in dealing with this matter, he thought it would be well worth the attention of the Cabinet whether a Suspensory Act should not be brought in, because if it had no other effect it would tend to pacify the people. He thanked the House for the kindness with which it had received his few remarks. He was well aware of his own deficiencies, both in youth and inexperience; but he had studied this question with the utmost earnestness. What he wished, above all other things, to impress upon hon. Members was that this was a question of the first importance, and not one of secondary rank.

MR. WARTON maintained that contracts with regard to land ought to be fulfilled, and he protested against another Land Act being passed for England and Scotland. Principles were being advocated that, if carried into effect, would deprive the landlords of all their rights, and he was sorry that the Home Secretary should go as far as he had done in support of those principles. It seemed to him that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had almost forgotten the lessons taught by the Irish Land Act of 1881—a measure which he (Mr. Warton) foresaw was doomed to failure. There was plenty of room in the world for all its inhabitants to exist in prosperity, and it was absurd to attempt to overpopulate any particular parts of it. The real remedy for the state of things which was now complained of was emigration; but they could not apply any enduring remedy by taking away the property of the landlord and giving it to the tenant.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, nobody could have listened to the debate without feeling that the crofters had much reason to be satisfied up to a certain point. Much sympathy with them had been expressed, as well as a general desire to provide a remedy, as far as possible, for the existing state of things. The Home Secretary had said much that was very satisfactory to himself (Mr. Dick-Peddie) and to his hon. Friends who took an interest in this question; but there was also a great deal lacking in the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman of what they most desired to hear. While he showed a just appreciation of the character of the crofters, he left them very little satisfaction in anything he promised on their behalf. After recognizing in strong and forcible language many of the evils under which the crofters suffered, he proceeded to tell the House in what direction he looked for remedy; and, so far as he (Mr. Dick-Peddie) could find out, the only thing he indicated that would be of any benefit was the duty of the proprietors to do something for the crofters. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had appealed to the benevolence of the landlords, and to their sense of what was right, but still more to their fears; and he (Mr. Dick-Peddie) should regard the latter appeal as more likely to be successful than any other, for while he well knew that Highland landowners generally were kind and considerate, those of them whose conduct had given rise to the present agitation were not likely to be much moved by appeals to their humanity. Further, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had promised that the subject would very soon receive the attention of the Government. Last Session a similar promise was given, in almost stronger terms than to-night; but nothing had come of it. Still, a slight advance had taken place in the attitude of the Government since 1882, for on that occasion, when the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Macfarlane) brought forward his Motion for the appointment of a Commission of Inquiry, the Lord Advocate appeared entirely to ignore the fact of there being any claims on the part of the crofters at all. The Lord Advocate then said—

"It appears to the Government that there has neither been in the statements made in the House to-day, nor from the information of which they are otherwise in possession, any sufficient ground for taking such a serious and unusual step as to appoint a Royal Commission such as that which is now asked for."—

(3 Hansard, [273] 779.)

Last year, when the Government were asked to give effect to the Report of the Commission, they met the demand by a mere evasion on the ground of the difficulties of legislation. He thought it was impossible that the crofters would settle down to bear the evils of their lot unless they got not merely a vague promise, but a serious indication that the Government intended to deal in some definite direction with the evils from which they suffered. He could not help contrasting the attitude of the Government with the attitude of the hon. Member for Inverness (Mr. D. Cameron), a most respected Highland proprietor, who had spoken of the crofters in terms of warm sympathy, and who last year indicated in no vague terms certain directions in which he thought immediate legislation should take place. That hon. Member had suggested the provision of piers and harbours, the cutting down of the high education rate in the Highlands, and a system of loans which would enable the holders to stock the land now occupied as deer forests, and, lastly, to make it compulsory on the landlords to give 30 years' leases, with full compensation at the end for improvements. These were very valuable suggestions, especially as coming from a Tory landlord, and a Gentleman who knew the Highlands as well as any man could know them. He, therefore, thought the Government might be encouraged to set about devising some definite measures. The Home Secretary had read to the House an extract from a speech by the Rev. Mr. Davidson. He did not know where the right hon. and learned Gentleman had got the report; but he held in his hand an extract from The Daily Mail, Glasgow, in which he found the language attributed to the rev. gentleman to be much more emphatic in favour of the crofters than that which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had quoted. Mr. Davidson said—

"When he began to see the sufferings of the people, he became convinced, as any impartial person must be convinced, that the system"— that is, the crofter system—

"must be viewed with reprobation. The system of tyranny and oppression was so studied and refined that it had been reduced to an art."

He wished to ask the House whether men in the position described by the rev.

gentleman could be expected to remain silent? He felt there was too much truth in that rev. gentleman's statement, and that there existed an evil which called for immediate remedy. The hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) spoke of some parts of the Highlands where the population were more prosperous than the peasantry of any part of the United Kingdom; but these were the parts where there only remained the shepherd, the gamekeeper, and the ghillie. These crofters were told two years ago that they had no grievance. In the following year these grievances were acknowledged by a Royal Commission. Last Session they had a discussion on the Report of that Commission, in which the Home Secretary promised legislation; but nothing had been done, and now they felt that they were being trifled with. They knew that the Irish peasants had gained great advantages—not because they were more entitled to them than the crofters, but because they were stronger and more numerous. The crofters were a small body, peaceable, and well ordered; and he believed the statements in many newspaper reports of their proceedings had been exaggerated. They had been bearing with a patience, which no other persons in this Kingdom could equal, hardships which the more they were considered the more grievous they were found to be. He trusted that the result of this debate would be to induce the Government more boldly to face this problem, and, notwithstanding its difficulties, to feel that there was nothing in the way of legislation, after the Reform Bill had passed, which more demanded their attention than this question of the crofters of Skye and Lewis.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL wished to explain an interjectional remark which escaped him during the interesting and eloquent speech of the Home Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was speaking of the condition of the crofters at the present time as compared with the condition of their predecessors, and gave the House to understand that the condition of the crofters now was not so good as it was in former times. His own experience thoroughly bore out the correctness of the picture which the right hon. and learned Gentleman drew; but other causes had been at work to the deterioration of the comfort of these small holdings, and among those causes, especially in maritime districts and in the Isles, he thought there could be no question that the great change which had come over the industry of the manufacture of kelp had not been one of the least. When he interjected the word "kelp," he by no means meant to indicate that he considered "kelp" a panacea, and that if the industry were restored they could thereby remedy the evils that existed; but there was no doubt the manufacture of kelp was in times past a profitable source of income to a class of people who could ill afford to dispense with it. The speakers in the debate had generally spoken in support of the Motion of the hon. Member for Carlisle; but there were one or two considerations which presented themselves in connection with it that had not yet been set before the House. He came from a district of Scotland in which, not very long ago, the crofters' system was in full swing. It had passed away, and with it had passed undoubtedly a great part of the rural population. They had in their hills in the Lowlands traces of the townships which the Royal Commission recommended should be re-established and confirmed in the Highlands. The small villages on the hill sides were now objects of interest to the anthropologist and archaeologist; but they had completely passed away from rural society. Would the South of Scotland, he asked, be any better if, at a former period, the old state of things had been stereotyped and confirmed? Should they be better now if the crofters who 100 years ago occupied the bleak hills of Galloway and Dumfriesshire were still settled upon the miserable holdings; or were they not infinitely better off, and were not the people who had gone to other parts of the world better off, than if they had remained upon those bleak hill-sides? Nobody who knew that part of the country could doubt what the answer would be. Landowners lived in palaces; farmers lived in what used to be landowners' houses; and the labourers, in their turn, lived now in houses which were infinitely better than the houses of 100 years ago. Was there, or was there not, in such a state of things any reason for congratulation or satisfaction? He said most decidedly there was. If legislation had been undertaken such as was proposed by the hon. Member (Mr. Picton) and others of his school in that part of the country 100 years ago, they should have been infinitely further back on the road of progress than they now were. It had been admitted on all hands that the question was full of difficulties, but that the difficulties were not insuperable. They were met at the outset of the Report of the Commission by the warning that they were not to take everything "at the foot of the letter," but that in judging of the validity of much of the evidence they should do well to bear in mind that depositions were made from hearsay, memory, or popular tradition, even where they were not tinged by resentments or passions of the hour; and in addition to the causes of infirmity which would apply to miscellaneous testimony not given on oath, they had the fact that the progress of the Commission was anticipated by agents enlisted in the popular cause. He remembered that in the last Autumn Session, two years ago, the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane) asked him, as a Scottish Member, to sign a requisition for a Royal Commission to inquire into the grievances of the crofters. He declined, saying he did not approve of "round robins," whereupon the hon. Member for Carlow said he was wrong, and further observed—"Mark this; we will take care that this subject shall not rest, and you will hear plenty of it before another year." Who was the "we?" He presumed the "we" referred to the hon. Gentlemen from Ireland with whom the hon. Member for Carlow usually acted. ["No, no!"] At any rate, he considered that the "we" certainly included the remaining Irish Members; and he was struck by the fact that in last August a most singular phenomenon manifested itself in the Western Islands. A steam yacht arrived laden with senators, and senators not of the same caste—the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane), the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), and his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). He regretted very much that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham was not in the House, and he hoped that the hon. and learned Gentleman would take an early opportunity of disclaiming, at all events, a portion of the sentiments and utterances that were attributed to him. It certainly was with dismay the Members of the Conservative Party read one morning in their newspapers the utterances that were attributed to his hon. and learned Friend, whose abilities and resource had made him conspicuous in the House, and who was also conspicuous in another way, because on the very last occasion of his appearance in Scotland he was the accredited official of the Central Constitutional Association in London, for the purpose of Party organization in Scotland. In a hurried interview before the debate began, his hon. and learned Friend had thanked him prospectively for giving the opportunity of refuting these speeches. According to the report in The Scotsman, the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), who was introduced by Professor Blackie as a Tory with common sense, advised the electors not to be tied to any one Party if they wanted Reform, but to form a party of their own. He deprecated the idea of a landlord being a suitable Member for them, and was proceeding to criticize Mr. Ferguson's speeches when he was interrupted by the meeting. What his hon. and learned Friend said was this—that owing to the presence of the hon. Member for Waterford and himself on the same platform their utterances were by the reporter confused. He must say it seemed strange that his hon. and learned Friend had taken no opportunity since then of repudiating statements so utterly at variance with those usually professed by the Party with whom he had been in the habit of acting, and to whom he certainly owed some degree of consideration. He could not believe that his hon. and learned Friend would be willing to tarnish his reputation for political sincerity merely because he happened to find himself dans la meme galere with the hon. Member for Carlow. There was one thing he should like to say with reference to the present state of thecrofting population in the West Highlands—Was it so very much worse in the present than it was in the past? Of course, they had a mass of evidence taken before this Royal Commission, which contained a narrative of suffering, of indigence, and of poverty. But it was not an altogether unmitigated picture.

It was because he wished really that this question should be satisfactorily dealt with that he urged upon hon. Members not to expect any Utopian solution of this problem. Let them not aim at too much if they had truly at heart the interest of the crofters, whom they all loved and honoured for their character, for their demeanour to strangers, and for the part they had borne in the history of their country. Let them be content if they could devise for the crofters some reasonably comfortable and healthy mode of existence. They could not expect more. They could not expect ever to be in affluence, because the very elements were at war against them; and he for one—if the discussion to-night were not altogether barren, if it led the present Government, or any succeeding Government, to undertake this matter and deal with it satisfactorily—if it led to the amelioration of the hard circumstances which were endured by these brave people—then he should say this night had not altogether been spent in vain.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, it was remarkable that the elements were only against the poorer classes of the rural districts and never against the landlords. The elements were always advanced when any explanation was needed of the condition of the farmer or the labourer. He did not regard this as an exclusively Scotch question. It was merely one phase of the great question which was becoming the most burning question throughout the country. It now came forward in a manner which touched the sentiment and conscience of the nation, because it was allied to intense suffering. The debate would carry very little comfort to the crofters. But it would add a great deal to the force of the agitation in Scotland and England. Those connected with the territorial interest had admitted the evils and dangers which existed, but they had no remedy. It would be the large towns that would settle this question. The eyes of the toiling millions who were suffering socially and in every way from the Land Laws would take this question in hand, and the landlords, when the time came, would have cause to regret that they had not agreed to something reasonable in time. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had, it appeared from his speech that night, no remedy to propose for the present state of things in the Highlands, and hon. Gentleman on both sides of the House had declared how difficult it was to find a remedy; but they were even then engaged in the discussion of a Report which contained a remedy. Was the Commission which drew up that Report intended to be merely an insult to the poor people whom it affected, or was it intended to have some practical result? That Commission had now presented a Report which was eminently practical in its character, and it was now to all intents and purposes ignored by the Government. He thought the Government were shirking a responsibility which would become greater and greater as it went on. They were teaching the multitude that they would get no reform unless they made themselves disagreeable. The Home Secretary had admitted the evils, but he had no statesmanlike remedy; he had sent a force and not a remedy, and had by so doing assumed a responsibility which he would find, on reflection, a very solemn matter. Could not an Act of Parliament afford a remedy? Had not Acts of Parliament secured a remedy in many cases similar to this? The Home Secretary had expressed a hope that the proprietors would do something. The right hon. and learned Gentleman also read a speech by Major Fraser, from which he could draw little hope that the remedy he was suggesting would be realized; but when did landlords in the history of this country or any other country do anything to ameliorate the condition of the poor connected with the land except in the face of a revolution or in fear of it? These troops were despatched at the instance of a self-elected body—of a non-resident Sheriff, and of a Procurator Fiscal, who was the agent of the landlords. They found in Skye the same old story they found in Ireland—namely, the manufacture of outrages by the class who called on the Central Government for troops. The Commissioners in their Report pointed out that the crofters had in many cases been confined within narrow limits on inferior and exhausted soil, and that they had been subjected to arbitrary augmentations of rent. They also complained that the land had been used to too great a degree for sporting purposes, and that the crofters had been compelled to pay for the peat, heather, and grass which they required for thatching their dwellings. Another of the crofters' grievances was that they were refused the right of pasture on the hills. In his opinion it was intolerable that while a certain section of the people who derived their incomes from the agricultural industry lived in palaces, the tillers of the soil, who were the real farmers, should lead a miserable existence, doing a maximum of labour, and securing in return only a minimum of comfort. He held that the work of the labourer was as worthy of consideration as the capital of the employer; but he despaired of inducing the territorial classes to accept that view. The question must be fought out between the agricultural labourers, the urban workmen, and the moneyed classes.

DR. CAMERON said, the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had disappointed him. It was a distinct retrogression from the speech he made last Session. He then told the House that the Report of the Royal Commissioners was under the consideration of the Government, and that they had no time to deal with the chief matters in it, but that there were departmental and administrative changes that might at once take effect—going more or less in a jocosé spirit into what might be done at once. Well, nothing was done. The Departments had been pressed to do something, and they did nothing. This Session the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not repeated what he said last Session. He had, however, again told them that the Report was under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. He had made a very conciliatory speech on the subject of land tenure in general, had made a long quotation from Coke, and had told the House that the only thing definite that he could say was—that if the landlords would consent to give up a hill here and there, all things would go well. Was there ever a better illustration of the Eastern story of the fruit seller who went about crying out—"In the name of the Prophet—figs!" The mountain had been in labour and the result was this ridiculous mouse. The first portion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech referred to the present state of things in Skye, and the second, so far as it went, to the Report of the Royal Commission. As to Skye, they were told that there was no law in Skye, and it was necessary to send police and military there. Talking about no law in Skye was an old story. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had quoted from the statement of the Rev. Mr. Davidson, of Stenscholl, who sent a paper to the Commission, in which it was said, on behalf of the crofters, that there was no law in Skye. As to the Government action in the present state of things, they had been told about some outrages. The Home Secretary had been pressed by an hon. Member opposite to say what these outrages were, and the reply was "all kinds of outrages." He (Dr. Cameron) had inquired minutely, and he could not hear of any outrage worth mentioning. There had been a threat to bring certain persons before a meeting; but the fact of the matter was that no action was taken on that threat, and even the threat was denied. He was told that some windows had been broken and some spades hidden; but these things had been taking place for a long period of time. The reports were to the effect that there had been half-a-dozen of these trifling affairs over a considerable period. They were denied by the crofters themselves, and those who were said to have been threatened had also denied that there was any truth in the statements. The most serious affair that was alleged to have taken place was the burning down of a peat stack, with the object of coercing the owner to join the Land League. The agitating crofters were credited with this. It appeared, however, that the owner of the stack was a member of the Land League long before the destruction of his property, and he openly declared his belief that the stack was burned accidentally. He (Dr. Cameron) did not question the right of the local authorities of Inverness-shire to send 10 policemen to Skye at the time they did; but he questioned the judiciousness of their sending down such a small force if the state of matters were so bad as they were reported to be. He did not think there was violence used in getting the policemen out of the place. If there was, it was of the slightest description. He did not, however, defend that. Now that a greater police force and military were being sent at the expense of the nation, what he had to say was that if on every occasion of this sort the Government sent police and military in strong force on application, they would have pressure brought to bear on them on many occasions. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary said that it was his determination not to allow this military force to cover the serving of eviction notices. The serving of eviction notices was constantly a cause for resistance. It was a most unpopular thing; and if the military were not to give support in connection with it where support was needed, it was extremely injudicious to make such a declaration, for by making it the Home Secretary might be more responsible for resistance to eviction notices than all outside agitators. He trusted the present dispute would be settled with more discrimination than previous disputes—such, for instance, as the Braes and Glendale cases. Unless Government behaved in a more sensible manner than in those two cases, and distinguished between criminal and civil administration, any action on their part was likely to do a precious deal more harm than good. As to the second part of the Home Secretary's speech, the logical consequence of the Home Secretary's quotation from Coke on the advantages of permanence of tenure would have been the enunciation of a proposition for the greater security of tenure for the crofters of Scotland. That was what had been demanded by every authority on the subject, what had been recommended by everyone who had reported on the subject for years. Seeing that he had these authorities to support him, and the extract which he had quoted to back him up, why did not the right hon. Gentleman give some promise to give some little effect to the logical conclusion of what he said? Instead of doing so, all he told them was that the landlords were much concerned in the matter, and that probably, if they put their heads together, they might agree as to what ought to be done. The whole thing arose out of the close monopoly of land that existed in Scotland. All the mischiefs that were complained of arose out of this very close monopoly. That monopoly was closer than any in England or Ireland. Under 100 persons owned one-third of Scotland, and under 300 owned one-half of it. It was in the Highlands that the largest estates were. This monopoly in the possession and management of the land of the country was the source of all sorts of tyrannies—that was not too strong a word. In the evidence given before the Royal Commission examples were given of certain proprietors or their agents who would not let fish taken by the crofters be sold to anyone but themselves, and at their own price too, and where these poor people were not at liberty to sell their cattle unless they paid the whole price to the factor. It was proved that men were compelled to give so many days' labour; and that upon absenting themselves they were obliged to pay half-a-crown for every day absent, whereas the stipulated daily wages was only one shilling. Evidence was given as to extra rents having been put upon houses in order that a monopoly of shopkeeping might be kept up, and of a great number of other acts of oppression resulting from the same monopoly, and that monopoly was kept up in the case of Scotland by a law which was at variance with the law of the country. It compelled the subdivision of personal estate. Now, it appeared to him (Dr. Cameron) that if it was desirable to prevent the accumulation of any form of property in a few hands, the property that should be so dealt with was heritable property. They were told that there was no plan before the House. There was a most distinct plan before the House—that embodied in the recommendation of the Royal Commission. The right hon. Gentleman dismissed as with a wave of the hand the proposal as to townships as a suggestion that no one cared for. Why, the township proposals appeared to the Commission, and Lord Napier, the Chairman, in particular, as the most valuable feature in the Report. It was proposed by Lord Napier as the only means of giving security of tenure to the smaller classes of occupiers. What he proposed was that in communities enjoying the pasture of certain land in common, it should not be in the power of the landlord to reduce it; but, on the contrary, power should be provided for the increase of the area where possible. Such communities were also to have the right of gathering peat and seaweed for the manure of the land, and they were to have the power of compelling the landlord to make fences and roads at their joint expense; and it was further provided that when those townships became overcrowded there should be a legal machinery for securing their extension. It was proposed that new townships should be made with Government assistance. The Commission proposed to establish judicial rents, with a 30 years' improving lease and compensation for improvements, and the right of new leases. In his speech last year, the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) said it was a great pity that the Commission had gone only to places where the crofters were badly off, and had not gone to where they were well off. Well, the Commission did go to where the crofters were well off. They went to Orkney, where they found a class of men known as the "Lairds of Harray," a colony of peasant proprietors who occupied Harray and an adjacent Island. There, even on such small holdings as four and five acres, they discovered an improved husbandry, as good farming, in fact, as was to be found in Mid Lothian, and that when such land came into the market it fetched sometimes as high a price as 40 years' purchase. Now, contrasting them with the poor crofters of the Western Isles, the difference was seen to consist in the security of tenure in the one case, and its absence in the other. The recommendations of the Commission also provided that ejection for arrears should not take place unless the arrears reached a certain amount, and that arrears over a certain number of years should be irrecoverable. Now, those were very thorough-going recommendations, and taken together, would doubtless go very far to effect what was wanted. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary did not say anything about security of tenure. The Commissioners also made recommendations on the subject of education which were most important, for in many of those Highland parishes the education rate amounted to a second rent. Again, on the question of deer forests, which was a crying evil, the Commissioners made a specific proposal, and also in reference to commons; but nothing had been done, or was proposed to be done, by the right hon. Gentleman to give effect to those recommendations. The right hon. Gentleman himself had acknowledged that the commons were being taken from the people by the landlords. In past times the most flagrant injustice had been done to the poor of Scotland by the lawyers carrying out the doctrines of feudalism with regard to common lands, and where the process was still going on it should be checked. The Commissioners made recommendations for the saving of commons which had not yet been occupied. Surely the Home Secretary might take that work in hand, and deal with it right off. The Commissioners further recommended increased postal and telegraphic facilities. He (Dr. Cameron) should do the Post Office the justice to say that that was the only Department that had done anything in following out those recommendations of the Commissioners. The Commissioners recommended the erection of a light at Stromeferry; but even that had not been done. But the greatest injustice of all had not been dealt with, and that was the administration of justice. According to evidence given before the Commission, on a certain estate in Skye the factor undertook to settle all disputes, and anyone who appealed against him to the Sheriff got a notice to quit. The Procurators Fiscal were either practising solicitors, dependent for their practice on the gentry or the larger farmers, or the land agents of the gentry. The result was that the poor did not believe that they got fair play; in fact, it was notorious that justice was not evenly administered. Members of the present Government had, when in Opposition, voted against Procurators Fiscal engaging in private practice; but in Office they had not found a remedy. [The hon. Member then proceeded to instance cases in which sheep belonging to crofters, upon straying on tacksmen's land, had been cruelly mutilated, and contrasted the impunity with which such outrages had been practised with the outcry raised over the mutilation of animals during the Irish Land League agitation. And he pointedly asked what would not have been the outcry raised if those mutilations had been done by the crofters on the landlord's or tacksmen's sheep, instead of by the big men upon the crofters' sheep?] There was one thing at least which might be done by the Government, and that was the administration of justice on an even keel. But that was not done. A gross violation of public law was committed even in the streets of Glasgow in the case of the man Harrison who had escaped from a lunatic asylum, about whose case he

(Dr. Cameron) had asked a Question in the earlier part of that Sitting. Contrast the apathy of that case with that wild zeal for the vindication of the law that sent a Sheriff and Fiscal and Chief Constable to the Island of Rousay, in one of Her Majesty's gunboats, to hunt up a schoolboy suspected of penning a threatening letter to a landlord. If some of the money spent in sending those troops to Skye were applied to even a partial removal of the grievances of the people, it would do much good, at least as giving the people an earnest of the desire and the intention of the Government to do something for them. He himself would undertake, with a fraction of the money squandered on Bechuanaland and such other objects, to successfully carry into effect those recommendations of the Royal Commission, which would give comfort and satisfaction to the people. The speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary would go down to Scotland either as a message of peace or of war—of peace, if it was speedily followed by acts; but as a message of war, if nothing was done, and it was allowed to end, like too many Ministerial promises affecting Scotland—in mere empty wind.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that the Resolution could not be disconnected from the general land system of the country. There were villages in England that enjoyed common rights over common pastorage, and it might be asked—"Why should they be excluded?" The recommendations made by Lord Napier would amount to the establishment in this country of a land system corresponding to that of Russia in its leading features. If the Resolution had simply proposed the adoption of the recommendations of the Commissioners, he could not have supported it; but his difficulty was removed by the fact that the Resolution asked the Government to consider the grievances of the crofters. He (Mr. Arthur Arnold) would ask whether it was the intention of those who supported those recommendations that there should be different Land Laws for different parts of Great Britain? [An hon. MEMBER: Ireland.] Ireland was not a part of Great Britain, and the circumstances of that country were wholly different; and the passing of the Irish Land Act, although, in his judgment, it was a wise and necessary step, had certainly tended to separate the two countries. But he should be asked what was to be done? His hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) had referred to the very small number of landowners in Scotland. He (Mr. Arthur Arnold) found that 12 owners owned nearly a quarter of the whole country; 70 owned nearly half; 330 owned two-thirds; and 1,700 nine-tenths. That showed the real difficulty of the question, and it was to that aspect of the case that attention should be directed. He should advocate to the crofters the application of the principle of compensation to sitting tenants for their improvements. He should also be glad to see an increase of the number of peasant proprietors, although that portion of the United Kingdom was not the most suitable for peasant proprietary. But he would not support any attempt to force such a system, which, to be satisfactory, must be a natural growth.

MR. RAMSAY said, that having had some experience of the district where these disturbances had occurred, he felt bound to express his sympathy with the poor crofters; but his principal object in rising was to take exception to what had been said by the Home Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to ignore the fact that there were parts of the Highlands where the population was so dense that it could not be supported by the land. Take the Island of Lewis, for example. The area of Lewis was about 400,000 acres, and there was a population of between 25,000 and 27,000, and the rental of the agricultural portion of the Island was not more than £10,000 or £12,000—the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane) said £20,000; but he (Mr. Ramsay) was of opinion that must include the rental of Stornoway, which had no more to do with the agricultural parts of Lewis than London had to do with the agriculture of Middlesex—therefore, taking five as the average number of a family, and dividing the Island among them, each would have an area equal to £2 or £2 10s. each. It was absurd to suppose that any family could subsist upon such a plot of ground. He agreed with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary in thinking that migration would be preferable to emigration if it were possible; but the formation of the townships at the expense of the State could not be seriously considered. No sensible man would say that the crofters should be removed by the Government from Skye, and settled in the fertile fields of East Lothian. It was easy to indulge in vague declamation against all landlords; but what would be thought if the same rule were applied to the owner of a factory who dismissed 300 or 400 of his workmen, as manufacturers often did, without thinking any more of them? There were, no doubt, bad landlords, as there were bad employers; but if it had not been for men who had no interest in land going to Skye to agitate, he did not think there would have been any occasion to use force.

LORD COLIN CAMPBELL said, that he must congratulate the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane) on having brought this question a second time—and this time not inopportunistically—before the House. When hon. Members holding the views of the hon. Member, and actuated by the spirit which stirred him in an uncommon degree, and with a force which he was not always able to subordinate to the rules of civilized argument, confined themselves to vague declamation on public platforms, from which they breathed threatnings of slaughter against the whole landlord class without exception and without discrimination, and when, by their inflammatory harangues, they incited the people to a dangerous agrarian revolt, he thought it became a question how far the forms of Constitutional Government were adequate to bring them to task. It was desirable that they should be made to substantiate the allegations which they spread recklessly abroad; and therefore it was satisfactory when they had the courage to bring their charges and their accusations to the test of argument and discussion in that House. But he had been very much disappointed with the speech of the hon. Member for Carlow. He found one great difficulty in dealing with the hon. Member, and that was his singular character of duplicity. [Cries of "Order!" and interruption.]

MR. SPEAKER: That is not a term which should be used in this House by one hon. Member to another hon. Member. I hope the noble Lord will withdraw that expression.

LORD COLIN CAMPBELL said, he was sorry he had used any expression which was out of Order. He could only assure the House that it was not his intention to make use of any expression which was unseemly; and he certainly, therefore, would withdraw it. Hon. Members might remember to have seen a picture of the Great Napoleon, which, if looked at from a certain angle, showed a common animal, a certain domestic quadruped, a harmless and innocent creature. If the picture was looked at from another angle they saw the "scourge of Europe." The hon. Member for Carlow had used language in the House which certainly could not be described as immoderate. When he heard the softness of the hon. Gentleman's tones, and observed the suavity of his manners, he had some difficulty in recognizing the wolf swathed in so much sheep's clothing. He would begin by making one admission, for which he hoped the hon. Member would duly credit him. He was not one of those who, falling back on the hard lines of political economy, could see in this question all morality, all respect for property, all love of law and order on one side only, and that the side of the landlords, and on the other only an incorrigible and lawless peasantry. He thought there had been much in the system pursued towards the Highland peasantry since the Rebellion of 1745 which had been hard and harsh, of doubtful policy and of dubious right, and which, if they took a narrower and lower ground, had been unwise from a merely commercial and pecuniary point of view. But he confessed that he had not attained that degree of discipline—or perhaps he should say of strength of mind—as not to feel tempted, at least, to swerve so far as to disguise his opinions when he found the war of controversy carried on with a reckless and implacable hostility towards the whole landowning class in Scotland. It was scarcely in one's power not to be swayed, to a certain extent, when one found the class to which one might happen to belong being attacked in a manner which must be regarded as dangerous to the public peace and unjust to the individuals, and when one saw the whole controversy fought with weapons which he, for one, would be ashamed to use. There was one feature of this agitation in connection with the grievances of the crofters, which he thought separated at once the Land Question, as it appeared now in Scotland, very broadly from the Irish Land Question. He thought it was true to say that it was an agitation not directed against excessive rents—that there was not in the Highlands of Scotland rack-renting at this moment. He knew that there were exceptions to this rule; but the verdict of the Commissioners in their Report was a distinct acquittal of the landlords on the score of rack-renting.

[Mr. MACFARLANE: Except in Kilmuir.]

Very well, except in Kilmuir. But did those exceptions justify the condemnation of a whole class? The hon. Member for Carlow and his friends had, however, accused the landlords of greed, rapacity, selfishness, and cruelty. [Mr. MACFARLANE: Where did I use those words?] In your public speeches. Indeed, the hon. Member had revelled in the language of the professional demagogue. But, putting him aside, it was true to say that the contention of moderate men was, not that the landlords had been wanting in humanity, not that they had been rapacious and cruel, but that they had acted upon mistaken doctrines of political economy with respect to their Highland estates and the conversion of the land into large sheep-farms. Now, they were bound to remember that this was not a new controversy, but the revival of a very old one. He did not know of any facts or circumstances which had occurred to bring that question forward except the advent in the Highlands of Scotland of a very opulent man of the name of Wynans and the passing of the Irish Land Act of 1881. If they needed to be reminded of that, let them notice that this question was not brought up by one of the Scotch Members who were presumably the most interested in it, but by an Irish Member of Scottish extraction. But it was an old controversy indeed; and he would ask the House to bear in mind that round it had gathered a great mass of literature. The hon. Member for Carlow had not been able to cite a single fact, or found a single argument, that added strength to the position taken up by a host of writers and thinkers, beside whom, if the hon. Member would pardon the remark, his own efforts and effusions appeared Liliputian indeed. But it was not a controversy which had been fought out by the people on the one side and the landlords on the other. There had been no hard line of severance between the two sides which had taken part in this matter; and it should be remembered that it was a Highland landowner who wrote by far the ablest work extant on the Highlands and the management of Highland estates—namely, Colonel Stewart, of Garth—a work which he believed none could read without admiration, and which had brought the conviction to very many minds that the system of management of Highland estates, as pursued at the beginning of the century, was wrong in principle and pernicious in its effects. Neither should the work of Lord Selkirk, also a Scotch landlord, be forgotten in connection with that subject. It was a work which had a powerful effect in directing public attention to the condition of the Highlands, and to the subject of emigration. But, far as these writers went in support of popular contentions, could even their authority be cited in support of the proposition that the Highlands had undergone changes with respect to the agricultural population, such as no other country had experienced? He had heard with some surprise the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary indirectly compare the case of the Highland crofters with that of the English copyholders, who were treated in the manner described in the passage quoted by the right hon. and learned Gentleman from Lord Coke. But he remembered very distinctly a passage in the work of Colonel Stewart, of Garth, in which that writer quoted from the writings of Sir Thomas More, and urged the view that to find a parallel for what was going on in the Highlands, they must go back to what had occurred amongst the agricultural population in England two centuries ago, in the Reign of Henry VIII. The system of engrossing farms in England had led to results which were almost identical in the two countries. Then, again, what had occurred in the Highlands had not occurred solely through the influence or the bad direction of the landlords. There had been changes resulting from economic causes which occasioned great hardship, and it was often not in the power of the landlords either to arrest the one or to alleviate the other. The hon. Member for Carlow had often referred to great fluctuations of population; but had he ever shown those whom he addressed some of the causes for these fluctuations? Now, there was no more extraordinary fluctuation of the population of the Islands than in the period from 1755 to 1795. During that time the population increased by 23,000. There were four causes of that increase — first, the flourishing kelp trade; secondly, the cultivation of the potato; thirdly, the spread of inoculation; fourthly, the non-existence of large sheep farms. But what happened afterwards? The kelp trade declined, and in the middle of this century the potato disease appeared. That had been a great calamity, which it was impossible to exaggerate. It marked the turning point in the economic history of the Highlands; and no one who had not studied the history of that time could gauge adequately the temptations under which the landowners lay to convert their lands into large grazing farms. The hon. Member for Carlow seemed to have persuaded himself that the whole land in the Island of Tyree was in the hands of large farmers. The real state of things was that the crofters possessed double the amount of land held by large farmers, and ten times more than the arable land. As regarded the population of Tyree, in 1750 it had been 1,600; in 1798, 2,416; in 1846, 3,706; and in 1884 it was 2,700. This decrease in the population had been deplored in a previous speech of the hon. Member for Carlow; but he (Lord Colin Campbell) would ask the House to listen to what had been said by a deputation of 900 of the people to Sir John McNeill, who had been sent as a Commissioner. These people had themselves said that since the making of kelp had ceased, and since the failure of the potato crop, they had been in a state of great destitution; and if it had not been for the benevolence of the proprietor and the assistance which they received from the Relief Boards they would inevitably have starved, and that they had neglected to take advantage of opportunities of emigration, trusting to the potato crop. They went on to say that those who advocated the possibility of employing the people on the waste lands were not influenced by motives of philanthropy, and earnestly requested the Commissioner not to credit the statements of those who were inimical to the best interest of the people. That state of things was one which was periodically recurring. He would not deny that the introduction of sheep-farming had been far too hurriedly carried out, and had so brought many and great hardships on the people. But who was to blame for that state of things? The hon. Member for Carlow asked the House to intervene between the landlords and their tenants. But were they to forget what had been the attitude of Parliament after 1745—that it was the one aim of Parliament to abolish what was called the patriarchal system, and to sever all those ties of clanship and of mutual attachment that had held the Chiefs and the people together? Parliament had abolished the hereditary jurisdictions; and only a century had elapsed since Parliament repealed those disrobing and disarming Acts, by which even the wearing of the Highland dress was proscribed, and which Dr. Johnson described as “an ignorant wantonness of power.” That was all that Parliament had done for the agricultural population of Scotland; and he thought he might fairly ask the House to bear this in mind, although he did not intend to allege it as a reason why Parliament should not intervene if legislation was justly called for. It was, however, a reason why Parliament should share the blame, if blame was due. There was one fallacy in what had been said in previous speeches—and which had, much to his astonishment, been repeated to-night, even with the Report of the Royal Commission before them—to which he wished to allude—namely, that the condition of the people was infinitely worse than it had ever been before. The hon. Member for Carlow had quoted the evidence of a reverend gentleman before the Land Commission to prove that the people of Lewis were worse off than in former times; but if he would take the pains to study the question and read the work of John Buchanau he would see that the condition of the people in Lewis and in North and South Uist was far worse in 1782 than it was now. The land was now held directly from the landlord, whereas formerly it had been in the hands of a class of middlemen, under whom the people had been in a condition of the most grinding servitude, but who disappeared. Now, aware of the true situation? It was said in the course they were merely trying to get; but no statement more accurate than that. No of the crofters to so- could be founded on the sag- of the country. The ers said that the average no and material welfare as at any previous poorer classes never against the ex- suffering. It was most important thing should not lose sight of the fact that they had to deal with an agitation which, he said, with all deference, was more purely Socialistic than anything that had appeared in this country since 1798. It was an agitation which was founded on the doctrines of Michael Davitt and Henry George; and they all knew what those doctrines were. It was an agitation the fundamental principles of which were the redistribution and the nationalization of land. Scarcely a day passed without some of the crofters threatening to drive their cattle upon the land of neighbouring farmers, and language had been used inciting the people to outrage. It was a most significant fact that what had been demanded for these people at the beginning of the century no longer satisfied the agitators. In many respects the condition of the crofters had improved. For example, in 1808 Dr. Walker declared that the chief cause of the misery of the crofters was the sub-letting of holdings. He says—

"All the sub-tenants, who are the great body of the people in the Highlands, are tenants at the will of the tacksmen or farmer, and are, therefore, placed in a state of subjection that is not only unreasonable, but unprofitable, both to themselves and their superiors."

Now, in almost every case at the present day, the crofters held direct from the landowners. So much is this the case that the Commissioners say that a crofter, in common acceptance, is an occupier paying rent directly to the proprietor. With regard to leases, there had been a great change; and not only so, but he thought there might be a still greater change; but the truth was that the knowledge that leaseholders were exempted from the benefit of the Irish Act had done very much to discourage the crofters of Scotland from coming forward to demand leases. It was idle to disguise the fact that the main recommendation of the Commissioners was with reference to the creation and extension of townships. He regretted to hear the Home Secretary say that that proposal did not meet with the full assent of those who agitated on this question. The proposals were complicated; but he should not despair of finding a solution in the proposals of the Commissioners, modified to a certain extent. They had been recommended by the Royal Commissioners that a period of an economic crisis had arrived, and in the judgment of the Commission the time was favourable for legislation. He certainly thought that it was an economic crisis which justified, to a large extent, the prediction of those who, 40 or 50 years ago, said that if the landlords of the Highlands were led away by the prospect of temporary gain to convert their holdings into pasture lands, their successors would wish to undo that which they had done. He should deprecate hasty legislation. They should take the greatest care that the proposals which the Commissioners made received the full assent of those on behalf of whom they were made; and to that extent it was desirable to take note of the words of the Home Secretary. The time had certainly come when it was for the interest of the proprietors themselves to consult together; and he hoped that consultation would not be long delayed, and that they would give their earnest co-operation to the Government.

Mr. PRESTON BRUCE said, he did not wish to occupy the time of the House at any great length at that late hour (11.50 P.M.), as he did not claim to possess any special local knowledge of the subject under discussion. Having listened carefully to the debate, he could not help thinking that a good deal of misapprehension, or difference of opinion, existed as to the meaning of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings), and others, had described the speech as amounting to nothing more than an appeal to the charity of the landlords, and as containing no promise whatever of legislation. That was not his (Mr. Bruce's) understanding of the right hon. Gentleman's observations. No, doubt a very marked appeal had been made to the landlords of the district chiefly concerned, and it had appeared to him that the appeal had reference to a particular part of the subject—namely, the necessity which existed in some places for finding more land for the crofters. Everyone must see that there were immense difficulties in the way of providing that additional land, not now occupied by the crofters, through the medium of compulsory legislation. As he had understood the right hon. Gentleman, he had appealed to the landlords to come forward and assist the Government especially in reference to this matter. He had not by any means understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Government did not intend to deal, and to deal speedily, with other parts of the question—such parts, for instance, as the conferring of additional security of tenure upon the crofters in regard to their existing holdings, and also in regard to preventing further encroachment on the lands which they held for the purpose of common pasturage. There were many other parts of the question referred to in the Report of the Commission which he hoped the Government would see their way to deal with, and to deal with speedily. It certainly was his understanding of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech that these subjects would be dealt with next year; and he by no means desired the impression to go abroad that the Government meant to do nothing but merely appeal to the landlords.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: By the indulgence of the House I may say a word. I think I may entirely accept the interpretation put upon my words by the hon. Member who has just sat down, and I had no idea that any other interpretation could have been placed upon them. I certainly did appeal to the landlords of Scotland for two purposes. I thought they might be of great service immediately by removing some of the causes of grievance that exist. I appealed to them, also, that by concert they might be able very much to assist the Government with reference to future legislation; but I added that the Government accepted themselves, independently altogether of any action of the landlords, the responsibility of dealing with this question. These were the words with which I concluded my speech; and I also stated, as I thought quite distinctly, that the Government do accept the responsibility of dealing with legislation upon the subject at the earliest possible time when they are able to do so.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had not intended to address the House, because he was in hopes they would have heard from some Member of the Government that they were prepared to accept the Resolution. He had been led to believe that that would be the case, and he still hoped that it would be so. After the words which had fallen from the Government he did not see how they could resist the Motion.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: We have no desire to oppose the Motion.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he rejoiced that the Motion was about to be accepted; and he would not detain the House longer than to say that, though it did not pledge the Government to particular action, it did pledge them to take action of some kind. That was all they thought the Report of the Royal Commission demanded; it was all that the supporters of the Motion sought. He would only, further, say this. Yesterday the House voted a large sum of money for carrying on two small wars; and he understood that in a day or two they would be called upon to vote another large sum for the building of ships and increasing the efficiency of the Navy. A very small portion of that money would be sufficient to put the administration of justice in Scotland on a proper footing, and get over the difficulty of want of capital on the part of the crofters in Scotland. He hoped the Government would not grudge a small sum to assist the voluntary action of the landlords and tenants in this matter.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, he did not wish to detain the House for more than a few minutes; but he thought it ought to be clearly understood what the Government undertook to do. He wished to congratulate the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane) on the result of the debate. There was a great deal in the speech of the Home Secretary with which they ought to be satisfied. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had expressed strong and generous sympathy with the crofters. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had undertaken that the force now on its way to Skye, if not already there, should not be employed for the purpose of serving notices of eviction against the crofters in Skye; and he (Mr. Barclay) understood that measures had been taken on behalf of the Government to introduce a Bill dealing with the subject if the landlords in the Island did not take some step for the purpose of coming to some accommodation with the crofters. That, he thought, was all that could be expected of Her Majesty's Government; and, for his own part, he was perfectly satisfied with the pledges which had been given. There was one other point on which he should have expected some declaration on the part of the Government, if not from the Home Secretary, at least on the part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate, with whom the matter more particularly rested, and that was the question of some reform in the administration of justice in these Islands. There was no doubt that the people of the Western Islands had great reason to be dissatisfied with the administration of justice. The Procurator Fiscal, and every public officer, with the sole exception of the Sheriff, were more or less in the pay of the landlords. How, then, was it possible, under these circumstances, for the people to be convinced that they were getting justice, and that their interests were attended to with the same certainty as those of the landlords? The hon. Member for Glasgow had referred especially to certain cases where the outrages committed were upon the crofters; and he (Mr. Barclay) had expected to see the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate get up and declare that he, for his part, would take care that the Crown officials should make due inquiry into the alleged cases, and see that equal justice was meted out to the crofters and the landlords. It was to be hoped that the question of the administration of justice would not be neglected. There was one further matter. No doubt the present excitement was due to the expected service of notices for removal on Whit Monday; and he thought that if steps were taken to enforce these notices of ejectment the agitation would enormously increase. It seemed to him that it would be the duty of the Government, early next Session, to bring in some suspensory Bill to allow matters to remain, as far as possible, in their present position until Parliament had time to consider a more general measure for effecting the desired changes in the law.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I did not intend to intervene in this debate, because I thought it unnecessary to repeat what I have had occasion to say more than once in the course of the last Session, and incidentally, in answer to Questions this Session on this matter. With regard to Procurators Fiscal, I should have thought it was understood by everyone taking an interest in the question, and that it would have been unnecessary for me to repeat that since the present Government came into Office they have, in every case where they have had the power, by weight of salary and in other ways, done what they could to obtain the exclusive services of a gentleman for this office; but that is not in their power in every case. I also pointed out before that in very distant localities, where you cannot put one man over an indefinitely large territory, there are questions of efficiency which make it difficult—at least, which make it a very grave question whether you would get the very best services from a man who did nothing else except that one thing. But I am not again going to enter upon a discussion which was so fully gone into before. I thought I had conveyed on previous occasions that the matter was fully in view of the Government, and that, as far as they thought the object in view could be obtained with regard to other considerations of efficiency, they were doing, and would continue to do, their best.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY: Is nothing to be done?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): By legislation? I have already shown what the Government are doing by way of administration. It is another question whether the Government should undertake to present to the House a Bill to revolutionize the system of appointment. I am not in a position at present to promise that. It involves considerations of efficiency, and many other considerations. In regard to the only other matter that I was invited to say a word upon, I should have hardly thought it necessary to say anything, inasmuch as one point was raised in a Question I answered to-day. It would be a total misapprehension to suppose that there was any difference in the justice meted out to one person and another. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) used the expression "mutilation" in regard to something that was done to certain animals. The subject is one it is not very fit to discuss in this House; but the expression used might convey a wholly erroneous impression. I think what was done in this case was something very cruel and very unnecessary; but it avowedly was put forward as a defensive act done to certain animals which got astray. I do not think it is an act that was justifiable; but it is one thing to say it was a crime where animals were straying and had no right to be, and a totally different thing for a man to say it was a defensive measure to guard his flocks. I can quite understand that a very great change in the circumstances under which it was done might have made it so that if the act were repeated it would indicate an element of malice, and take away the element of what may have been precaution—injudicious precaution—and thus bring the act within the range of the Criminal Law, though it would be a peculiar case. I shall certainly take care that the case the hon. Member for Ross-shire (Mr. Munro-Ferguson), whom we are glad to hear to-day, mentions, shall be inquired into. I shall take care to have it carefully examined into in the fullest way; and if it is shown that there is any element of malice in it something shall be done.

Dr. CAMERON said, he should like to know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman would inquire into the allegation of branding sheep in Skye?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Yes; I will do so if the hon. Member will have the goodness to give me some indication as to the place, so that I may know where to send an order.

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to give effect to the recommendations of the Royal Commission upon the condition of the crofters and cottars in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, or to apply such other remedies as they deem advisable; and that this House concurs in the opinion expressed by the Royal Commission at page 110 of its Report, that "The mere vindication of authority and repression of resistance would not establish the relations of mutual confidence between landlord and tenant, in the absence of which the Country would not be truly at peace, and all our inquiries and counsels would be expended in vain."

HOUSE OF LORDS,

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—Poor Law Guardians (Ireland) • (6).

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL — REDISTRIBUTION. MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I beg leave to make a short statement on behalf of Her Majesty's Government. I presume that we are all agreed that the action to be taken this week by your Lordships' House is of vast importance, affecting not merely Party issues, but interests of a national character. There is no question as to the principle of the Franchise Bill. It is understood, and, I believe, not without reason, that your Lordships intend to give a second reading to that Bill. But I am not entitled to assume that this step will terminate the difference between your Lordships and Her Majesty's Government. I do not propose to enter into the merits of this difference. It is sufficient for my present purpose to remind your Lordships that while the procedure adopted by Her Majesty's Government has been supported last Summer, and again this Autumn, by unusually large majorities in the House of Commons, it has been condemned by a majority of your Lordships in this House. I will not now refer to offers which at different times have been made by Her Majesty's Government, and which are generally known as having been rejected. I am not aware of any intimation having come from the Opposition, apart from an intention to reverse in some shape or other the procedure adopted by Her Majesty's Government, and supported by the House of Commons, in order to adopt that which has been favoured by your Lordships. The result is a state of things which, although it may be far from disagreeable to extreme politicians on both sides, is deplored by all moderate men, and, I sincerely believe, by a majority of your Lordships. Under these critical circumstances, I am authorized by my Colleagues to state how we would propose to meet the objections which have been raised by some of your Lordships. To those, if there are such, who may desire to force on an immediate Dissolution I have little to offer. But the case is different with those who desire a settlement—a desire which we claim ourselves, and with which we are quite willing to credit noble Lords opposite, whose objections we honestly desire to meet. I understand that the objections are principally these. Your Lordships think that, although you are ready to support a Franchise Bill, it is dangerous to do so unless you are acquainted with the character of the Redistribution Bill which is promised, and which will affect its working. You are afraid that it may be of a revolutionary character, or, as some have put it, dangerous to the prospects of the Conservative Party. You also fear that there may be no Bill at all, or, at all events, that there may be none till the 2,000,000 new voters have acquired the right of voting. My Lords, I will now proceed to state how, in my opinion and in the opinion of the Government, without sacrificing our own object, we may best meet these objections. Our object is to secure the passing of the Franchise Bill without delay.

We cannot jeopardize it. Your Lordships must be aware that we could enter into no understanding or take any steps as to the immediate introduction or prosecution of a Redistribution Bill, or as to anything connected with it, unless we have a sufficient assurance that we should thus secure our principal object—namely, the passing of the Franchise Bill without delay—that is to say, during the Autumn Session. In that case, I may tell your Lordships that the Bill will come into effect on January the 1st, 1886. If we were sufficiently assured in the manner I have stated, I am not aware of any demand or suggestion that will be made with regard to the procedure affecting a Redistribution Bill to which Her Majesty's Government will not be ready to accede. If we get that sufficient assurance we should be ready to submit the main provisions of the Redistribution Bill—we should be ready to make even the draft Bill a subject of immediate friendly communication before its introduction, and to make every reasonable effort for the purpose of accommodation, and any difficulties in the way of accommodation I think I may say would not come from Her Majesty's Government. We should be ready, if it is possible, and I do not see any impossibility in it, to present a Bill framed in the spirit of that sketch given by Mr. Gladstone in the House of Commons, and which, on the 7th of November, seemed to be received as satisfactory by Sir Stafford Northcote. Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to push that Bill on with all legitimate speed. Mr. Gladstone has informed me that he will be willing to undertake to move the second reading of that Bill simultaneously with the Franchise Bill going into Committee of your Lordships' House. I am afraid that there may be a difficulty about this, because there is an understanding that if the second reading of this Bill is taken on Tuesday, the Committee is to stand for Thursday. Be that as it may, Mr. Gladstone would be ready to move the second reading of the Redistribution Bill in the House of Commons simultaneously with any future stage of the Franchise Bill in your Lordships' House. Her Majesty's Government are prepared to use their utmost efforts to pass their Bill through the House of Commons in the early period of next year. And I am further authorized by them to state that they would consider the passing of their Bill through the House of Commons a question vital to themselves. My Lords, I submit this proposal to the favourable consideration of both sides of the House. I trust that those who so cordially supported us last Session will not think we have retired too much from the exact course of procedure which we had drawn for ourselves. And I do with considerable confidence appeal to the noble Lords opposite to receive this proposition in the spirit in which we have made it. We have made it in a spirit of earnestness and of conciliation, and as tending to settle a difference which every dictate of statesmanship, and, indeed, I may say of common sense, makes it desirable, in the interest of all concerned, should be brought to a final and satisfactory close.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : My Lords, it would not be in accordance with usage that I should express, at the present moment, any opinion upon the proposals made by the noble Earl. I shall confine myself to questions designed to elucidate his statement. I wish to know whether I am to understand that the passing of the Franchise Bill during the Autumn Session is a condition precedent to the proceedings with respect to the Redistribution Bill of which the noble Earl has spoken; and, further, I wish to know whether the agreement between the two sides of the House on the question of Redistribution is a condition precedent to the introduction of the Redistribution Bill in the other House, and within what time he contemplates it possible for such procedure to take place?

EARL GRANVILLE : My Lords, my answer to the first Question is in the affirmative; my answer to the second is in the negative.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR : My Lords, I hope I shall be excused if I add a word for the purpose of endeavouring to supplement the answer of the noble Earl. As I understand it, if in any satisfactory way we have the assurance which we think indispensable, the Redistribution Bill may be laid on the Table of the House of Commons and read a first time as early as anyone can desire. If those communications which we invite, desire, and are willing to enter into, in order to arrive, if possible, at a common understanding as to the material substance of the Redistribution Bill, take place, of course, a reasonable time must be allowed for those communications. If it is thought inexpedient that such communications should take place, and if those who have determined that matter desire us to produce on our own responsibility the Bill which, without assistance, we should produce, that can be done at the earliest possible moment after we have that assurance which is the necessary condition of our proposals.

REPRESENTATIVE PEERS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD WAVENEY, in rising to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that the Prerogative be not interposed to prevent the substitution by Statute of a more suitable form for securing the presence of Irish and Scottish Peers in the House of Lords than is afforded by the existing modes of election," said, that this question dealt with the somewhat anomalous manner in which the ranks of their Lordships' House were recruited from the Scotch and Irish Peerages. He believed that it never could have been intended that one-half, or even more than one-half, of the Members of the Scotch and Irish Peerages should be incapable of entering into the service of the country to which they belonged because they might profess particular political opinions; but though there was a vast and considerable distinction between the two Peerages in many respects, they both had the special defect of representing one Party only, and not the genuine force of national thought. It never should be necessary, as frequently happened under the present system, that the Government of the day should find themselves called upon to summon Peers of undoubted position and merit to their Lordships' House. In his opinion, if an Irishman were worthy of a Peerage at all, he was worthy of being made a Peer of the United Kingdom. The circumstances of the present time, he thought, lent point and force to the consideration of the matter; and, looking at what had taken place in the country during the last three months, he thought something should be done. There had been a vast amount of exaggeration as to popular opinion against their Lordships' House; but he considered that such a moderate change should be made in its constitution as would seem calculated to bring it more into consonance with the present state of public sentiment. There could be no doubt that the elections under the present system resulted in favour of one particular Party; and, therefore, he would propose to substitute for the present system the system of summoning Irish and Scotch Peers as British Peers. He begged to move the Motion that stood in his name.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that the Prerogative be not interposed to prevent the substitution by Statute of a more suitable form for securing the presence of Irish and Scottish Peers in the House of Lords than is afforded by the existing modes of election."—(The Lord Waveney.)

EARL CAIRNS said, that the Motion of the noble Lord was not required, for in connection with Scotch Peerages no such Prerogative existed as the Motion implied. If the House should think fit to alter by Statute the existing law in regard to the election of Scottish Peers, the Prerogative could not be interposed. With regard to Irish Peers the case was rather different; for at the time of the Union a power was reserved to the Crown to fill up, in certain circumstances, vacancies among the Irish Peers in their Lordships' House. It would not, therefore, speaking generally, be regular to interfere by Statute with that power, without presenting an Address to the Crown praying for leave to do so. In 1875, however, an Address was presented to the Crown praying that the statutory power reserved to the Crown in connection with Irish Peers might not be allowed to stand in the way of any legislation on the subject of the election of such Peers to the House of Lords, and the prayer of that Address was granted.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he agreed with what had fallen from his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns). The subject was a very important one; and whenever a proposition was made to the House, submitting any convenient way of dealing either with the subject of the Scottish or Irish Representative Peers, it would, he had no doubt, receive that consideration and attention from their Lordships, which were justly its due. But to proceed by this method of Address was, it humbly appeared to him, for the reasons stated by the noble and learned Earl, quite unnecessary in the case of either the Scottish or Irish Peers.

LORD WAVENEY thought the objections ought not to weigh against his Motion. However, he was willing to have the Motion negatived.

EARL CAIRNS said, he considered that, instead of negativing the Motion, the House ought to adopt the Previous Question.

Previous Question moved.—(The Earl Cairns.)

Previous Question put, whether the said Question shall be now put.

Resolved in the negative.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—HIGHER EDUCATION IN BOARD SCHOOLS.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD NORTON said, he rose to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to a reply made by Mr. Mundella to two deputations from Harborne, one from the School Board asking for the establishment of a higher school, the other from 2,373 ratepayers, deprecating such a charge on their rates—namely, that—

"He assented to the principle that if a majority of ratepayers were against the introduction of higher education it should not be forced upon them."

He wished to ask whether such a principle had been adopted, and under the authority of what Act of Parliament the provision of higher education in any locality depended on a majority of ratepayers being willing to undertake it? He had two reasons for asking this question. First, because the Vice President's answer implied that, wherever a majority of ratepayers agreed to it, a School Board might depart from their authorized work of supplying elementary education to those who wanted it to undertake higher education in a Government groove for the middle class, who would get it more wholesomely by private enterprise, and without robbing the poor of their elementary provision; and, secondly, because such an unauthorized dictum must discourage, by Government and rate-paid competition, the corporate or private undertaking of middle-class schools now largely and more usefully going on. The Government were, apparently, stealing this march upon Parliament, and even technical instruction was lately proposed to be added to their province.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, that if his noble Friend's premisses had been correct he should have had to adopt his conclusion. But his noble Friend was entirely misinformed as to the nature of the case. This was no question of middle-class education. What his right hon. Friend (Mr. Mundella) said referred to higher elementary education, which meant simply education in the higher Standards of the Code—that was, in Standards above Standard IV. His right hon. Friend received two deputations, one from the School Board of the district, and the other from a large number of ratepayers who did not like the proposal of the School Board. It was not a case in which the Education Department could interfere. It was strictly a question for the decision of the School Board itself. The case was this. There was a very considerable deficiency of education in the district; and the School Board proposed to supply it, not in a novel way, but by a course which had been taken by a good many other more important places. They proposed, instead of building a large new school of the ordinary kind teaching children in all the Standards, to erect a school which should be confined to children above Standard IV. They believed that that would be a very great improvement in the education of the district. That district was in the neighbourhood of Birmingham, and there were in it a considerable number of boys who were in Standards above Standard IV. They proposed to collect those boys in a single school, so as to provide a better education for them, and to enable the teachers in the ordinary schools to give their undivided attention to boys below Standard V. It was a mere question of organization. The school district lent itself very easily and conveniently to such an arrangement, because, as he was informed, there would be no child farther than a mile and a-half from the new school, and most of them would be within a mile. It was a mistake to suppose that the plan would lead to increased charge on the rates. On the contrary, by drawing the higher standard children together into one school and giving them a teacher qualified to give them instruction in those Standards, the result would be economical. There was, as he had said, nothing novel in the matter—nothing in which the Education Department could be said to have sprung a mine on Parliament. It was a question for the School Board, and he believed they had come to a wise decision. With reference to a Question which a noble Lord (Lord Stanley of Alderley) had put to him some days ago, he might read the following letter—

"Fulshaw House, Wilmslow, November 10.

"Dear Sir, — With reference to Harriet Straker, whose death is said to have been due to over-pressure at school, I have to state that she attended the above school, but had no home lessons given her this year. If she worked at lessons at home she did it voluntarily, and the work was not shown at school. She was rather dull, and failed in two subjects in Standard I. at the examination in January, 1883, so was again presented in Standard I. at the examination in January, 1884, when she passed in the three subjects, being nine years of age. The mistress was not told that the child was delicate, but the child was kept away from school occasionally for a week. She made 219 attendances during the present year, her last attendance being on Monday morning, August 25. I visited the child several times during her illness, and she was usually more or less unconscious. I do not remember having heard her muttering about her lessons, but once she repeated when I was present a portion of her daily prayers. I believe the child was delicate, at times she was somewhat deaf, and at times had delicate eyes; but as she was, I believe, 10 years old and was only being instructed in the subjects of Standard II. and had no home lessons given to her, it can hardly be considered that her case was one of over-pressure at school, unless, of course, her health was in such a state that she ought not to have been sent to school at all.

"Yours faithfully (Signed)

"W. S. BARNES-SLACKE, M.A., Correspondent of Lindow School.

"P. Cumin, Esq., Education Department."

He thought the noble Lord would see that it was not a case of over-pressure at all.

LORD NORTON asked whether he understood that it was the intention to make the higher schools entirely separate from the elementary?

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, the school was entirely and absolutely within the Code, and therefore elementary.

TREATY OF BERLIN—OUTRAGES IN MACEDONIA.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs,

Whether he had any recent information to lay on the Table of the House respecting the fulfilment by the Government of Turkey of those provisions of the Treaty of Berlin which were directed to secure the good administration of the European Provinces of the Turkish Empire; and, whether, in particular, Her Majesty's Government had any information as to alleged outrages by the Turkish authorities on the people of Macedonia? He was very sorry to have to call the attention of the House, for a few moments, to a very painful subject. He hoped their Lordships would not think that he was in too much haste, or eager to ask the House to plunge again into their old friend the Eastern Question. They had enough on their hands at present in Colonial and foreign affairs and in other directions. But there were certain duties incumbent upon them as a nation and as Members of both Houses of Parliament in respect to obligations into which this country had entered. Whatever had been the differences of opinion which had existed in their Lordships' House as to the circumstances which led up to the Treaty of Berlin, he had been disposed to rest on that Treaty, which he held to be not an unsatisfactory settlement of a very difficult question. At all events, the Treaty supplied certain securities, or professed to do so, for the good government of the European Provinces of Turkey, and also of the Asiatic Provinces. He had always been of opinion that, irrespective of that Treaty altogether, this country and the other nations of Europe had heavy obligations with regard to the people of those Provinces. The Treaty of Berlin put its seal on those obligations, and by a considerable number of Articles it provided, or professed to provide, certain securities for the people of the Provinces. The safety of Bulgaria was provided for by the creation of an autonomous State, while Eastern Roumelia had an administrative autonomy and a Christian Governor General given to it. Then, with respect to the Asiatic Provinces, the provisions were very specific; and he believed that repeated remonstrances had been addressed by Lord Dufferin to the Sultan as to the non-fulfilment of those parts of the Treaty relating to the country inhabited by the Armenians. With regard to the whole of the Provinces in the one matter of religion, the Treaty professed to secure complete religious toleration. But he now came to a clause which was less satisfactory. Eastern Roumelia, Roumania, Servia, and other places had been cut off, and there remained that Western portion of European Turkey, which comprised Macedonia and certain other portions of the country. Article 23 provided that a Constitution should be given to those countries analogous to that given to the Island of Crete. He had not heard anything until lately of the grievous abuses complained of with regard to Armenia and the Asiatic Provinces of Turkey. Many of their Lordships must have been horrified by statements which had appeared in an evening paper on this subject. He should not have brought those statements to the notice of their Lordships had they been anonymous; but they were avowedly the production of a very distinguished man whose name was known in literature all over the world—M. Emile Laveleye. Things really seemed to be almost as bad in the Turkish Provinces of Macedonia as they were before the last Russian War, when the horrors going on in Bulgaria roused the indignation of this country and the world. It appeared that, during the month of July, in one district of Macedonia alone there were 45 murders committed by Turks, and in other parts there were 60 murders. M. Emile Laveleye had given names of districts, names of victims, and names of murderers, and had stated that in some cases the victims had had their noses and ears cut off, the skin of their arms torn away, their eyes pecked out, and had then been cut to pieces. There were nine instances of the most horrible and atrocious murders given by M. Laveleye in the paper to which he had referred—The Pall Mall Gazette. What he wanted to know was, whether this country had Consuls in the district, and whether they had reported to the Foreign Office anything with regard to these alleged atrocities? The Province was near to Greece and to this country, and our sympathy must be more excited than if those outrages were committed in the Asiatic Provinces of Turkey. He hoped the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would be able to assure their Lordships that the eyes of the Government were fixed upon the matter, and that they would take such steps as were necessary to put an end to the condition of things now existing. If these atrocities continued, the Government would have another Eastern Question on their hands, which would be intolerable to the people of this country and to the other European Powers. The Turkish Government rested solely on the guarantee of the European Powers; and it would be high time to put an end to that Government and make the whole of the Provinces autonomous if atrocities were not put down.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I quite agree with the policy laid down by the noble Duke with regard to the Treaty of Berlin. There may be things in that Treaty which may be approved or disapproved, yet it is a great Treaty, agreed in by all Europe; and we have acted as much as possible, and shown we have a wish to act, consistently with the provisions of that Treaty. We have been successful with regard to some of the provisions; but we have been quite unsuccessful as to others. I am quite certain that your Lordships will feel that we could not have had a better Representative for the purpose than Lord Dufferin. He had instructions, which will be continued to his successor, to press, in the manner the most likely to attain the end, for the faithful carrying out of the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin. With regard to the Question of the noble Duke, this country has Consuls in European Turkey, and Reports have been received from them, and I do not think there will be any objection to lay them before your Lordships. With regard to the particular atrocities in Macedonia to which the noble Duke has referred, they are not fully confirmed by the Consuls. On the contrary, Macedonia was reported to be in a better condition than it has been for some time, owing to the present Governor, though the borders of Bulgaria and Roumelia are disturbed. Her Majesty's Government wished to do everything in their power, and they desire that the other Powers will act in concert with them—to carry out all the obligations imposed upon them. I am also bound to state that only five minutes before entering the House I received a communication from the Turkish Ambassador, repudiating very warmly the attacks made upon the Turkish Government who, he said, were extremely desirous to carry out the reforms stipulated by the Treaty.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I have no doubt the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is taking all the measures that can be taken for executing the Treaty of Berlin and securing the happiness of these Provinces. I entirely concur with him that probably no one could have been chosen better fitted and more anxious to see the Treaty carried out than Lord Dufferin; and I think we may rest perfectly assured that, so far as diplomatic action could have the effect of securing the good government of these Provinces, Lord Dufferin would take every measure possible. I rose mainly to point out to the noble Duke that the case of Eastern Roumelia and the case of Macedonia are not so different, in the eyes of the Treaty of Berlin, as he seems to think. For both provision is made for a certain amount of autonomous government. Eastern Roumelia, no doubt the most elaborate, was first taken in hand; an International Commission was issued; and I think Sir H. Drummond Wolff was the Representative of this country; and the provisions that were drawn up with regard to Eastern Roumelia have proved eminently successful. I do not know so much of the provisions that were drawn up for the government of Macedonia; they were drawn up after I left Office; but the noble Earl opposite sent out as the Representative of this country the noble Lord who is now the very able Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. I believe that every precaution was taken to provide for Macedonia an adequate and stable government. What are the causes which prevented the same success following in Macedonia as in Eastern Roumelia? I do not know. Perhaps the country is more mountainous, more difficult to manage, and the bulk of it further from the centre. There is less revenue, perhaps, for carrying out the government. There are one or two remarks I would make upon the horrible details which the noble Duke has brought before us. I think the experience of everybody who has looked into these matters is that, with the lamentable substratum of truth, there is almost in the very horror of these recitals something which leads to exaggeration; and unless these recitals are confirmed by the official authorities at the Foreign Office I should hesitate to give full credit to them in all their details. The other remark I would make is that I am afraid Macedonia is not the only place in the world over which we have influence where terrible cruelties are inflicted. There is, for instance, the Empire of Burmah, which lies on our Indian Frontier, and, as it were, in the hollow of our hand, which by a letter from Whitehall could be brought into order at any moment, and in which there is constant perpetration of horrors on a scale and characterized by an atrocity before which anything which can be related with regard to Macedonia would pale. We cannot accept the doctrine that we are responsible for all these things, because by certain extreme measures it might be possible to prevent them. I would not do or say anything to weaken the appeal of the noble Duke to the Foreign Office, that they would do their utmost to prevent these cruelties and atrocities, and to promote the good government of Macedonia; but I cannot accept the doctrine, which in one sentence the noble Duke seemed to lay down, that we are to shrink from no political measures by which the object he has in view would be attained.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the noble Marquess could not have understood the distinction he made as between Eastern Roumelia and Macedonia. The noble Marquess could not have remembered the exact terms of the Treaty of Berlin, otherwise he would not have said that the same provision applied to both. There was this enormous difference between them. As regards Eastern Roumelia, there was an administrative autonomy and a Christian Governor General. That made the whole difference between it and Macedonia, where there was no such provision. As regarded horrors all round the world, he repudiated the doctrine that they were the same to us as those in Macedonia. His view was that there was no parallel between the horrors of Burmah and those of Macedonia, because we had not guaranteed the safety of the Burmese Government, and were not responsible for its existence.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL — REDISTRIBUTION.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish, Sir, by the permission and indulgence of the House, to make a brief intimation which I think it desirable the Members of the House should have in their possession. A great deal, Sir, has been said with regard to the present political circumstances, or, as it has sometimes been called, "the crisis," about an interchange of views between different Parties, and about the question whether Government ought to introduce a Bill relating to the redistribution of seats before the Franchise Bill can have passed the other House of the Legislature, or even before that House may go into Committee on that measure. Sir, for my own part, with respect to those communications between Parties, I think there is no conclusive objection of a universal character to such communications. Indeed, an interchange of views on certain occasions may, in my opinion—and it is shared by my Colleagues—afford the readiest means of averting serious public evils. A noble Lord (Lord John Manners) has recently stated, in respect to the present political circumstances, that no private or public communications could be held with Her Majesty's Government. I do not wish to hold anyone to an expression which may have been one of inadvertence, and I have nothing to say now in respect of private communications in particular; but, of course, as regards public communications, no one has the power to proscribe or prevent a declaration being made openly in this House. Sir, with respect to the Bill that has recently been before us, and with respect to the settlement of the question of the representation of the people, our object—the object of the Government—is to secure the passing of the Franchise Bill without delay. We could not, consistently with our sense of duty, enter into any understanding, and we could not take any step as to the immediate introduction or prosecution of a Bill relating to the redistribution of seats, or relating to any other particulars connected therewith, unless it were such as to afford us an adequate assurance that we should thereby secure the attainment of our main purpose—namely, the passing of the Franchise Bill without delay, that is to say—that there may be no difficulty as to the sense we attach to the phrase—that is to say, during the present Autumnal Sitting. If that object were gained the Franchise Bill would then come into operation, and take effect for voting purposes on the 1st of January, 1886, and not before. Now, Sir, if we are adequately assured—and I have spoken of adequate measure—if we are adequately assured of the attainment of that object—namely, the passing of the Franchise Bill without delay, in the sense in which I have explained it, then I am not aware of any demand likely to be made in relation to proceedings upon the other measure to which we should not be able to accede. In illustration of this remark—that Gentlemen may understand that it is not used without a meaning—I will specify the three following points, which I particularize because I think they are obvious and of the greatest importance. In the first place, we should be ready either to make the main provisions of our redistribution scheme or the draft of the Bill itself the subject of friendly communication at once and before its introduction, and to make every effort—every reasonable effort—for accommodation in regard to these particulars, or we should be ready, apart from what I have just said, to present a Bill at once to the House conceived in the spirit of that sketch which I made in the House, and which, perhaps, I may best describe by saying that it was one very much noticed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), and one which, as we thought, was favourably received by the right hon.

Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) on Friday evening, I think the 7th of November. That is the first of the three points. The second point is that we should be ready to prosecute the measure with all possible speed, even to the point of moving the second reading simultaneously with the passing of the Franchise Bill into Committee in the House of Lords; or, if any matter of procedure there rendered that impracticable, then simultaneously with any subsequent stage. I do not refer to any proceedings simultaneously with the second reading in the House of Lords; because, first of all, the time is too short to introduce that practically into the question; and, secondly, because we have understood—and the world generally appears to understand as we understand—that the second reading of the Bill is not a contested stage on the present occasion. Thirdly, we are quite willing to make the passing of our Bill for the Redistribution of Seats a vital question for ourselves, and also to use our best efforts to bring it to an issue in the House of Commons early in the coming year. That, Sir, is the substance of the communication I have to make; and I have been authorized by my Colleagues, in a matter of such deep interest, to convey it to the House at the present moment.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, the proceeding of the right hon. Gentleman is an unusual one, and I do not know whether I have any right to make any remark upon it. I will only venture to say this—that I entirely agree with him that questions of this kind ought to be made a subject of public arrangement in the presence of the House of Commons and Parliament. But I am perfectly unable to make any remark upon the suggestions he has made at the present time. They come to me as a surprise, in the form in which they are presented, and I am unable myself to say what is the view which may be taken on the subject. I hardly think that the right hon. Gentleman can expect an answer at the present moment.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have not the slightest intention of making an appeal either to the right hon. Gentleman or to anyone upon the subject. I consider the observations I made, if I may say so, to be in the nature of a prolonged Notice, but not calling upon anyone for reply; and I am sorry if by my manner, or in any way, I have conveyed the idea that I could have expected anything so obviously impossible.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I want to know, Sir, whether I am in Order? [Cries of "Order!"] I merely rise, Sir, for the purpose of putting a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, and not for the purpose of making any remarks upon the statement he has made to the House. We, sitting here, did not understand from the right hon. Gentleman what was the nature of the guarantee which he expected to have from hon. Gentlemen opposite or from the House of Lords in return for which he is prepared to act upon the three courses which he has pointed out. If the right hon. Gentleman will enlighten us on that point, it would give great satisfaction to many of us here.

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot say that I think my hon. Friend is not quite justified in putting that Question. The phrase I used was "an adequate assurance." After all, I am not now speaking of what is to guide the conduct of the Government; and necessarily, from the nature of the case, they must be the judges, under great responsibility—they must be the judges ultimately of the meaning that they would give, for practical purposes, to any phrase of that kind. Such assurances are sometimes conveyed in a form extremely definite, sometimes they are conveyed in a form less definite. Either the acceptance or the rejection of such an assurance would be an act of high responsibility on the part of the Government. My hon. Friend may be perfectly confident that we shall be very desirous not to arrive lightly at any decision upon that question.

Afterwards,

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the statement he has made as to the existence of the Government being at stake on the passing of the Redistribution Bill has reference to the passing of the measure through this House, or through both Houses of Parliament?

MR. GLADSTONE: When I spoke, Sir, I had in view especially the passing of the Redistribution Bill through this House; but I can conceive that a pledge of that kind applies equally to the other House of Parliament.

QUESTIONS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS (IRELAND)—THE RIOT AT PORTADOWN.

MR. T. A. DICKSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What decision the Government have arrived at regarding the continuance of Captain Whelan in the position of a Resident Magistrate; and, if the services of District Inspector Smith are to be continued at Portadown?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The riot which occurred at Portadown on the 22nd ultimo has been the subject of the careful consideration of the Government. I very much regret that my hon. Friend and others should have suffered from the extreme violence of the mob. I further very much regret that the Local Authorities did not come to the determination of having a larger force of police upon the ground on the occasion. The Resident Magistrate, Captain Whelan, is now, and has been for some time previous to this disturbance, in a state of health which quite incapacitated him from discharging the duties of his office, at all events for the time being. He is seriously to blame for not having acquainted the Government with the fact, and having some arrangement made to have a properly qualified magistrate placed in charge of the police. A medical examination will be made of his case, and if it is found that he is not incapacitated for further duty he will be retired on pension. As regards District Inspector Smith, he has been censured for not sending for reinforcements of police upon the second occasion, as His Excellency is not satisfied that so small a force should have been provided for the protection of the persons present. On the other hand, Mr. Smith is to be commended for having taken the control of the police in hand himself while he was temporarily upon a sick bed. Under all the circumstances, the Government does not see any necessity for removing him from Portadown.

MR. T. A. DICKSON: I beg to give Notice that I shall, upon this day week, ask, Whether Captain Whelan has not sent in his resignation?

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—BAILIEBOROUGH PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the attention of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has been drawn to certain proceedings of Justices at Bailieborough (county Cavan) Petty Sessions on the 16th September and the 21st October last; whether, on the former date, two Justices, Robert Gibson and Thomas Chambers, both Protestants, heard a case in which a Protestant named James Jones charged four Catholics named Caffrey, Finegan, Halfpenny, and Ward with waylaying and beating him; and, although it was proved by a witness for the prosecution that Jones had first challenged Caffrey, struck him, and knocked him down, and that a fight had ensued between Caffrey and Jones, the others merely looking on, the Justices sentenced Caffrey to a month's imprisonment with hard labour, and the three spectators to a fortnight each; whether, on the same occasion, the Justices fined the Catholics brought before them for drunkenness ten shillings each, and the Protestants only half-a-crown, even in a case where it was proved the defendant had kicked the police; whether, on the 21st ultimo, Messrs. Chambers and Gibson, Justices, both Protestants, a young man named Keating, a Catholic, charged five men—one of them, James Hunter, a Protestant—with beating him; and, after the complainant had testified against the five men, Mr. Gibson, J.P. suggested to the accused man, Hunter, that he might have held Keating "only to save him," and this suggestion being adopted by Hunter, the evidence of the complainant was rejected, and, on the evidence of Hunter, one of the other men named Gogarty was committed and sent to prison for a month; and, whether the Lord Chancellor will cause inquiry to be had into these proceedings, and will examine the condition of the magistracy in the county Cavan, and particularly in the petty sessions districts of Bailieborough, Shercock, Kingscourt, Mullagh, and Virginia, in which there is not one Catholic Justice of the Peace?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have received from the police authorities a full account of the proceedings at Bailieborough Petty Sessions on the occasion of the hearing of the cases referred to. I am unwilling to trespass upon the time of the House by entering into details of the cases; but I can assure the hon. Member that the result shows no ground for imputing sectarian partiality to the Bench, or for any reference to the Lord Chancellor as to the conduct of the magistrates. As to the composition of the Magistracy of the county of Cavan, it is engaging the attention of the Lord Chancellor; and I may mention that of nine magistrates appointed by his Lordship five are Roman Catholic gentlemen.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—SEIZURE OF ARMS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, With regard to a seizure of arms some time since in a blacksmith's forge at Tubbercurry, county Sligo, whether a person passing under the name of Bartley, who was at that time tenant of the forge, and professed to earn his living as a blacksmith, was in reality a member of the Constabulary Force named Woods; whether Constable Woods had been sent to Tubbercurry by County Inspector James Ellis French, and provided with money, for the purpose of renting the forge, and of assuming a character in which he could provoke offences against the Law by inducing the young men of the district to engage in illegal enterprises; whether Woods is still serving in the Constabulary Force in a certain part of the north of Ireland; and, whether the Executive sanction such a use of the police as that described?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I must not be understood as admitting any of the allegations involved in this Question regarding an individual case when, in the interests of justice and the Public Service, I decline to answer the hon. Member's inquiry. I must, however, distinctly assert that the Irish Executive do not sanction any action on the part of the police intended to induce persons to engage in illegal enterprises.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS—MILTON ABBAS GRAMMAR SCHOOL—THE NEW SCHEME.

MR. MONTAGUE GUEST asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether, having regard to the fact that the scheme proposed by the Charity Commissioners in relation to the Milton Abbas Grammar School at Blandford has been strongly objected to by the inhabitants as well as by the corporation of that town, and moreover that petitions have already been presented to both Houses of Parliament, and that more are in course of preparation against the proposed scheme, it is the intention of the Charity Commissioners to direct an Assistant Commissioner to hold an inquiry respecting the subject matter of the scheme; and, whether they have ignored the objections made by the locality interested in the school, and have submitted the scheme as settled by them to the Education Department?

MR. MUNDELLA, in reply, said, that the scheme relating to Milton Abbas Grammar School at Blandford had not yet reached the Education Department, and the Commissioners informed him that they were now considering the representations made to them by the local authorities. They added that no application had been made to them for any further inquiry.

IRELAND — THE NEW MUSEUM OF SCIENCE AND ART, DUBLIN.

MR. FINDLATER asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the fact that the plans for the Science and Art Museum have, with certain modifications, been approved of by the Science and Art Department, as well as by the Board of Works in Ireland, there is any reason why the Treasury should delay their sanction to the working drawings being prepared, and the contracts entered into?

MR. COURTNEY said, that steps would be taken to commence the foundations that day week.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS OFFICE (IRELAND).

MR. SEXTON asked, If the attention of the Government had been called to the state of the public searching room of the Registry of Deeds Office?

MR. FINDLATER said, that he had upon this Question to call attention to the state of the public searching and reading room; and he would ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If he is aware that serious complaints have been made by those who are compelled to use the present Public Reading Room at the Registry of Deeds Office, Ireland, of the want of space, and of the offensive and unhealthy character of the atmosphere when the room is crowded; and, can he state why, up to the present, nothing has been done to carry out the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners in respect of the improvement and enlargement of this apartment made in their Report on the Office issued so long ago as the year 1880; and, will steps be taken immediately to remedy the existing state of things?

MR. COURTNEY was understood to state that complaints had been received upon this subject, and inquiry was made some time ago as to whether the public search-room could be enlarged; but it appeared this could not be done until the Probate Registry had been removed. This, it was hoped, would soon be done, and plans for the enlargement of the Deeds Office would then be at once considered.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — LOANS TO TENANTS — STATUTORY ADVERTISEMENTS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If he can state why the statutory advertisement published by the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland relating to loans to tenants was inserted in The Leinster Express of Saturday the 8th instant, and not in The Leinster Leader, the Nationalist organ of much more general circulation?

MR. COURTNEY was understood to state that he had been informed that the paper referred to was the only one published in Queen's County, and had as large a circulation as any there. Many similar advertisements for Kildare were published in The Leinster Leader.

COUNTY LUNATIC ASYLUMS—MIDDLESEX COUNTY ASYLUMS—INSUFFICIENCY OF ACCOMMODATION.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been directed to the case of a poor man, whose wife, having been placed four times previously in a public asylum, was on the fifth occasion, in August last, sent by the Paddington Guardians to a private asylum, at an additional cost to him of nine shillings a week, because in the three county asylums of Hanwell, Colney Hatch, and Banstead there was no accommodation; and, whether it is in the power of the Government to take any steps to cause sufficient accommodation to be provided for the afflicted poor?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that his attention had been called to the case referred to in the Question. The inadequate accommodation in the county asylums had been several times brought to the attention of the Justices by the Lunacy Commissioners, and he would do everything in his power to secure proper accommodation being provided. In the particular case in question, the husband of the lunatic would pay no more than if his wife had been placed in a public asylum.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)
ACT, 1882 (WARRANTS)—EXTRA
POLICE, TIMAHOE, QUEEN'S COUNTY.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to impose any tax in respect of additional police upon the district of Timahoe, in the Queen's County, in the absence of any actual offences, and the mere misgivings of the resident magistrate or the local inspector of police?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: As I informed the hon. Member a few days ago, intimidation and "Boycotting" have been largely practised in this district, which cannot, therefore, be said to be free from actual offences. The "Boycotted" persons require extra protection to prevent outrage and further intimidation. It was on these grounds, and not upon mere misgivings, that the district was proclaimed as requiring additional police.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the intimidation and "Boycotting" could be specified, or whether the Report which the right hon. Gentleman quoted from was merely couched in general terms?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I think it is merely in general terms.

CIVIL SERVICE (IRELAND)—PENSIONS, &c., TO MESSRS. CORNWALL AND FRENCH.

MR. GRAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is in a position to give an assurance that any moneys which the Government may give, either by way of gratuity, allowance, or pension, to Messrs. Cornwall and French, will be placed upon the Estimates and submitted to the Vote of this House, and not paid out of any secret fund?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The hon. Member must, I think, be aware that in no case could the Irish Government be in any way concerned in, or responsible for, the grant of a pension to an official of the Post Office Department. So far as I am concerned, I am quite willing to state that no money will be paid out of any secret fund to Mr. French.

INDIA—BURMAH—THE MANDALAY
MASSACRES.

MR. RITCHIE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Government are aware that, during the massacres ordered by the Burmese Government at Mandalay last month, two British subjects, natives of Chittagong and seamen belonging to a steamer owned by an English Company, were amongst the victims, and that these men were at the time being detained in one of the gaols for some petty act of smuggling; whether, if it is proved that British subjects were amongst those murdered, the Government will take any steps to bring King Theebaw and his Government to account; and, whether the Government are aware that a memorial, embodying resolutions passed at a meeting of over 8,000 citizens of Rangoon, has been forwarded to Lord Ripon, Governor General of India, and that this memorial demands from the Government some immediate interference in Upper Burmah that will for the future insure protection to British life and property?

MR. J. K. CROSS: The Government of India telegraphs that they have received no precise information as to the report that two British subjects were among the victims of the Mandalay massacres; but they are making inquires on this point. I learn from the newspapers that a Memorial of the nature alluded to by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets has been addressed to the Government of India; but the Secretary of State has not, as yet, received any communication from that Government on the subject.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND).—MR.

P. N. FITZGERALD AND THE TUBBERCURRY PRISONERS—COMPENSATION FOR IMPRISONMENT.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the cases of Mr. P. N. Fitzgerald and the Tubbercurry prisoners, the Government propose to offer any compensation, considering that several of the men accused have been held for seven months in prison, and all of them for the greater part of that time, and that the families of all of them were, and are, dependent on their exertions for the maintenance of their position in life; and, whether, in the case of Mr. P. N. Fitzgerald, the Government will particularly consider that the charge of conspiring to murder was left hanging over him until his trial for treason-felony had closed in an acquittal, and was then abandoned without any attempt being made to prove it, and that the principal witnesses produced by the Crown to establish the charge for treason-felony were declared, by a special jury of the city and county of Dublin, to be "unworthy of credence?"

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): It is wholly contrary to precedent to compensate persons who have been tried for serious crimes by a jury and acquitted, or as regards whom a nolle prosequi has been entered after a jury had declined to convict others on similar evidence; and there is no reason in the present case for departing from that rule. The bill for conspiracy to murder against Fitzgerald was found by the Grand Jury, as well as that for treason-felony. The Crown could only put him on his trial for one charge. His acquittal on one involved in this case, in the opinion of the Attorney General, the abandonment of the other charge.

MR. SEXTON: I shall endeavour to show cause in the case hereafter.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—THE CORNWALL TRIAL.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether lately a special jury of the city and county of Dublin, empanelled under the provisions of the Crime Prevention Act, returned a verdict of "not guilty" in the case of The Queen v. Cornwall, and appended a rider to the effect that they had been obliged to return the verdict in question because the Crown had not brought forward sufficient evidence to justify a conviction; whether the Crown had available evidence against Cornwall which they did not bring forward; if so, why they withheld it from the jury; whether, further, a special jury of the city and county of Dublin, empanelled under the provisions of the Crime Prevention Act, returned a verdict of "not guilty" in the case of The Queen v. Fitzgerald, and appended a declaration that the principal witnesses brought forward by the Crown were unworthy of credence, and that the corroborating evidence was of a complicated and doubtful character; whether the principal witnesses so denounced by the jury were the informers Moran and Delany; whether Moran will be longer retained in the pay of the Government, and whether the Government have resolved not to make use of him or Delany in any future prosecution; and, whether the cases of any persons convicted on their evidence will now be reconsidered?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The rider that the verdict referred to in the case of "The Queen v. Cornwall" was not in the terms or to the effect mentioned in the first part of the Question. It conveyed no reflection on the prosecution. All available evidence was produced, and no evidence whatever was withheld from the jury. In the case of "The Queen v. Fitzgerald" a verdict of "Not guilty" was returned, the jury in the case considering the corroboration of Moran and Delany insufficient, and declining without more corroboration to act on their testimony. Moran is not in the pay of the Government. No undertaking can be given as to cases that have not arisen. The recent trial furnishes no reason for reconsidering former cases if they existed; but the only case in which Moran was examined was at the trial of Daly at the Warwick Assizes, and any Question as regards that trial should be addressed to the Home Secretary.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he has not passed over the portion of the rider which stated that the principal witnesses were "unworthy of credence?"

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): I dealt with that in stating that the jury declined to act on their testimony.

MR. O'BRIEN: Can the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland say whether the Crown had any arrangement with Delany as to his liberty, or as to any reward, and, if so, whether that arrangement will now be carried out, in face of the verdict of the jury?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): No, Sir; they had no such arrangement.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—MR. D. BODKIN—FEES FOR DEFENDING A PRISONER UNDER THE PREVENTION OF CRIME ACT.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to a correspondence between Mr. D. Bodkin and the Under Secretary, with reference to the fees payable to Mr. Bodkin as junior counsel assigned by the Crown, under the Crimes Act, for the defence of a man named Killeen, charged with the murder of Henry East; whether the fees found due to Mr. Bodkin, in reference to proceedings in the case extending from 29th July 1882, to 14th February 1883, amounting to £32 11s., as per solicitor's schedule of costs, were reduced to £13 13s.; by whom, and on what principle, was the reduction made; is it the fact, as stated in Mr. Bodkin's letter, that counsel assigned for the defence of the Maamtrasna prisoners and others, who were convicted, were paid on a far more liberal scale by the Crown than that laid down in the only case in which there was an acquittal; is it a fact that additional labour was thrown on counsel for Killeen's defence, by the procedure adopted by the Crown solicitor in obtaining a list of the prisoner's witnesses, on pretence of paying their expenses, and then secretly examining them, in the absence of any representative of the prisoner, and using their statements against the prisoner on his trial; and, is it a fact that any difference is made in the scale of fees paid to counsel in cases of conviction and of acquittal?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): The bill of costs furnished by the solicitor for the prisoner in respect of the defence was referred, according to the usual practice, to the Crown and Treasury Solicitor for taxation. The bill, as taxed, amounted to £85 5s., and that sum was paid. No exceptional principle was applied in this case. No difference whatever is made whether there be a conviction or acquittal. The fees measured in the present case were according to the usual scale applied in estimating fees. If the fees allowed in the Maamtrasna case were larger, that fact was not before the Crown and Treasury Solicitor, who judge of each case on its own merits, without regard to the result of the trial. There is no foundation whatever for the suggestion that the Crown Solicitor adopted the procedure suggested in the 5th paragraph of the Question.

MR. O'BRIEN: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman have any objection to give a Return of the correspondence between Mr. Bodkin and the Under Secretary for Ireland upon this subject?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Perhaps the hon. Member will give Notice of that.

PUBLIC MEETINGS—THE RIOT AT ASTON HALL, BIRMINGHAM.

MR. ONSLOW asked Mr. Attorney General, If he will cause inquiries to be made as to the allegation that certain persons, stated to have signed statutory declarations regarding the recent riot at Aston, cannot now be found; and, whether he would advise the Public Prosecutor, in the interests of justice, to use his best endeavours to discover the whereabouts of these individuals, inasmuch as the documents in question are now the property of the House, having been communicated on the responsibility of a Minister of the Crown?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, he had already given the opinion that it was very objectionable for the Government to interfere in any proceedings arising out of electioneering contests. If that rule were a good one to apply, he knew of no place where an exception to it was less required than at Birmingham. He might mention that the two persons who could not be discovered had now been found, and he understood that process had not only been issued but executed.

CIVIL SERVICE (PARLIAMENTARY CANDIDATURE) — SIR WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON.

MR. HICKS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can now state when the notice was sent to Sir W. B. Gurdon, informing him that his candidature for West Norfolk was not compatible with his position as a senior clerk in the Treasury?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS) said, that he saw Sir Brampton Gurdon on the 12th November, and he then communicated to Sir Brampton what he subsequently communicated to the House—namely, that his candidature was incompatible with his official position.

MR. HICKS inquired when the right hon. Gentleman received the first information of his candidature?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS) said, he could not mention the exact date; but he first knew of it some time before he spoke to Sir Brampton Gurdon.

MR. HICKS gave Notice that he would ask the Secretary to the Treasury when he first become acquainted with the candidature.

PUBLIC HEALTH—IMPORTATION OF BUTTERINE AND OLEOMARGARINE—REPORTS FROM FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

MR. MOORE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What steps have been taken to obtain information with respect to the action of Foreign Governments with regard to oleomargarine and other butter substitutes?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Reports have been called for on the subject from Her Majesty's Representatives in the principal countries of Europe. They are in course of preparation, and I hope shortly to be able to lay them before the House.

The Attorney General

IRELAND—THE CORK BUTTER MARKET—THE BYE-LAWS.

MR. MOORE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Trustees of the Cork Butter Market have yet framed the bye-laws for the government of that Market under the Act of last Session; and, whether the Government will see that ample notice is given to all parties concerned before these bye-laws receive the sanction of the Privy Council?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The hon. Member is aware that the Act of Parliament prescribes a limit of six months time within which the Trustees of the Butter Market shall draw up a code of bye-laws. Of that period two months have yet to run. The Trustees have not yet submitted their bye-laws to the Privy Council; but I understand that they have nearly completed a draft code for the purpose. Care will be taken that all proper publicity is given to the matter before the bye-laws are finally sanctioned. The provisions of the Statute on this point seem very explicit, and they shall be duly complied with.

PUBLIC HEALTH — PRECAUTIONS AGAINST CHOLERA.

MR. MOORE asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether any and what precautions have been taken in view of the approach of cholera; whether any instructions have been issued to the local authorities regarding the use and distribution of disinfectants; and, whether it is intended to appoint any medical Commission of Inquiry to assist the Local Government Board if necessary?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Cholera Regulations which define the duties and powers of officers of Customs and Port sanitary authorities in view of cholera being brought by shipping were issued in July, 1883, and are still in force. The Regulations were accompanied by an Explanatory Circular, and by a Memorandum as to "precautions against the infection of cholera" prepared by the Board's medical officer. This Memorandum was reissued in July last. Regulations have also from time to time been issued relating to rags from infected countries. Orders respecting rags from France and Italy are at present in force.

The Board have caused inspection to be made by Dr. Blaxall and Dr. De Chaumont of the sanitary condition of the principal English ports, particularly with reference to their preparedness against cholera. This inspection is to be repeated. Each rumoured case of cholera on board ships coming to English ports has been the subject of inquiry by the Board; and the local sanitary authorities have in each instance, been found to be taking proper precautions against the importation of the disease. The Royal College of Physicians of London, after consulting the Board, have issued a Paper of Advice to the public, dated July, 1884. As regards London, Sir F. Bolton has made special reports to the Board of the state of the water supplies. The Metropolitan Asylums Board have been taking numerous preliminary steps with reference to the provision of hospital accommodation in the event of an outbreak of cholera; and the Metropolitan medical officers of health have been advising the Vestries and District Boards, and taking much counsel with each other as to the most efficient preparations and the best course of action if cases of cholera should appear. The Board are prepared, if occasion should require, to put into force in England the provisions of the Diseases Prevention Act, 1855, and the Diseases Prevention Clauses of the Public Health Act, 1875. If Regulations were issued under those Acts, they would contemplate a serious epidemic and be of a stringent character. It was not deemed requisite to exercise powers under similar enactments when cholera was seriously prevalent in Paris in 1873. As regards the use and distribution of disinfectants, the sanitary authorities have their official medical advisers, and at present there would appear to the Board to be no necessity for their intervention; but they will, of course, be desirous of rendering the local authorities every assistance in their power. The medical officer of the Board, Dr. Buchanan, has had considerable experience of cholera in England, especially during the outbreaks of 1854 and 1865-6; and the Board have the greatest confidence in him and his staff. I may, however, mention that a Committee was formed in 1883 for the purpose of conferring as to cholera. This Committee included, with our own medical officer, Sir William Jenner, Sir Joseph Fayrer, who has had long experience of cholera in India, Sir Lyon Playfair, and representatives of the Foreign Office, the Home Office, the Customs, the Metropolitan Asylums Board, and the Local Government Board. It has not been considered necessary to call the Committee together during the present year; but not long since a conference took place between representatives of the Metropolitan Asylums managers and members of our medical staff and myself to consider the question of arrangements in the event of an outbreak in London. I may add that there is no truth in the rumour prevalent in Paris that there has been any cholera in London, or, indeed, in England.

MR. MOORE: May I ask in what form the Paper of Advice issued by the Royal College of Physicians is published, and where it can be obtained?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have seen a copy of it, and will cause a copy to be sent to the hon. Member; but I cannot speak as to the manner in which it has been circulated. I imagine it has been sent to the various sanitary officers.

IRELAND—CORPORATION OF LIMERICK—EXTRA POLICE TAX.

MR. DAWSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, considering the many local and other questions of detail involved in the Limerick extra Police Tax, the Lord Lieutenant will comply with the request of the Corporation to appoint a Commission to inquire into the merits of the case in Limerick?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I fear I can only refer the hon. Member to my reply to his former Question on this subject, when I stated that it would be impossible for the Government to comply with such an application.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—SHOOTING WITHOUT INLAND REVENUE LICENCE.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Constables M'Carry and Brady, of the Whitegate Police Station, county Cork, frequently shoot rabbits, sea-fowls, &c. without an Inland Revenue Licence; whether the fowling-piece used by them is one which has been given to a resident in the neighbourhood for his protection; whether the constables have for many possession of the prosecuted for a vio-Revenue Act; and, taken by the Com-

of their conduct?

CIVIL SERVICE — INLAND REVENUE APPOINTMENTS—ALLOWANCES FOR AGE.

MR. SEXTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the rule of the Civil Service Commissioners regarding allowances, in point of age, to candidates for appointments in the Inland Revenue is intended to exclude Irish National teachers while favouring clerks in Government offices and members of the Constabulary Force who desire to compete for such appointments; and, if so, will any steps be taken to place the National teachers on the same footing in this matter with other Civil servants of the Crown, by enabling them to qualify for competition for places in the Inland Revenue service by deducting from their actual age any time not exceeding five years which they have spent as National teachers, instead of, as now, debarring them from entering to compete after they have reached their twenty-second year?

MR. COURTNEY said, that National teachers were not allowed the extension of age referred to, because, in the first place, they were not Civil servants; in the next place, their special training did not qualify them for clerical work; and, thirdly, it was not for the public advantage that they should be encouraged to abandon their profession.

ARMY—QUARTERMASTERS—PROMOTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the seven young serjeants who were promoted by favour to lieutenantancies on the 2nd July 1884 can all reach the Pay Department over the heads of 449 meritorious quartermasters; whether quartermasters were eligible for the post of regimental paymaster until the Pay Department was formed; whether 449 out of the 455 quartermasters shown in the Official Army List, dated 17th January 1884, are debarred from entering the Pay Department, and from all substantive promotion; and, whether quartermasters are combatant officers, as stated in the Royal Warrant of 1st April 1884, or non-combatant, as implied by recent statements by the Government?

not intend to take further notice of this proceeding, except to caution them to be very careful not to give any opportunity for accusing them of breaking the law.

MR. DEASY said, the right hon.
Gentleman had not answered the last paragraph of his Question.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN
said, that contraventions of the Inland Revenue Act were matters for the action of the Inland Revenue authorities.

NAVY—TRAINING SHIPS.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Civil Lord to the Admiralty, If he would take into consideration the urgent desire of the people of the Island of Lewis that a training ship should be stationed in the Harbour of Stornoway, where it is said there are 1,000 boys anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity which would be thus afforded to them of learning a valuable profession?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY, in reply, said, the Admiralty could not undertake to increase the number of their training ships. Any person who desired it would receive full information as to joining the Service from the officer of the Coastguard at Stornoway, and if the candidates were properly qualified they would be gladly received.

MR. MACFARLANE asked whether he was to understand from the hon.
Gentleman that the Government were not prepared to carry out one of the strongest recommendations on this subject of the Royal Commission? Had they finally decided not to give effect to that recommendation?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY said, he had already stated that the Admiralty could not undertake to increase the number of their training ships. Train-

Mr. Deasy

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER, in reply, said, that omitting the words, "by favour," the Question might be answered in the affirmative. This was the fifth Question which the hon. Member for Cavan had addressed to Ministers on the subject, and he had uniformly had the same answer. There was another Question on the Paper relating to the same matter for Thursday next. If it were put, he should appeal to the Speaker as to whether the time of the House was to be wasted by the repetition of Questions which had practically been answered.

NAVY—ARMOUR-CLAD CRUISERS.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, To be good enough to inform the House how many ocean armour-clad cruisers are at present in commission, stating number, calibre, and description of guns, also coal endurance of each ship; how many vessels of this type are being built; when they are likely to be finished; how intended to be armed; coal endurance; and ocean-going speed; if he can state how many coast and ocean-going torpedo craft are in commission, and how many are in course of construction; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the condition of the Navy?

SIR THOMAS BRASSEY: The information asked for cannot be conveniently given in reply to a Question. It has already been partially supplied in the Return presented in the last Session of Parliament by my hon. Friend the present Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and I cannot anticipate the statement which is to be made on Monday next on behalf of the Government with regard to the Navy.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE CROWN SOLICITOR FOR DUBLIN.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What are the arrangements with the new Crown Solicitor for Dublin, by reason of which Mr. George Bolton's special services in connection with the administration of the Crimes Act are to be dispensed with; is it part of the functions of the Crown Solicitor for Dublin to undertake investigations in distant parts of the country, as in the cases of the Maamtrasna, Clonbar, and Ballyforen murders; if it be, why did not Mr. Anderson perform that duty; if it be not, why is Mr. Coll asked to undertake it; for what reasons was Mr. Bolton selected from the county Tipperary for these special duties; did he receive an autograph letter of thanks from Earl Spencer for his services; and, why have his services in this special department been discontinued?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. WALKER): Mr. Anderson was appointed in 1859. His duties were confined to criminal business arising in the County and City of Dublin. He resigned his office last month, and Mr. Coll was appointed in his place. A Commission appointed last year to report on the existing system of Crown Solicitors reported that it was desirable that the Crown Solicitor for Dublin should be required to devote his entire time to the duties of his office, and be bound on the direction of the Attorney General to take up the conduct of any special case or special legal business. Mr. Coll was appointed on those terms, and the conduct of any special case will henceforth devolve upon him. Mr. Bolton was selected for the special cases referred to on account of the ability and efficiency with which he had always discharged his duties in the County Tipperary. After the close of the Maamtrasna case Lord Spencer sent to several of the officials engaged, including Mr. Bolton, a letter expressing his sense of the services they had rendered in the unravelling of a great crime and bringing its perpetrators to justice.

ARMY—DEFICIENCY OF MILITIA OFFICERS.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Secretary of State for War, If his attention has been called to the Confidential Reports of Officers commanding Militia Battalions and Brigades, with reference to the large and increasing deficiency of Militia Officers, called for by the Adjutant General in August last; whether this deficiency now amounts to upwards of 700; and, what steps it is proposed to take to remedy this state of things?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the confidential Reports referred to were now under consideration. The deficiency amongst Militia officers at the present time amounted to 857, including which had been lately submitted to the Line. He thought it would be better not to give a digest of the Reports until some decision had been come to as to the steps to be taken in the matter.

CIVIL SERVICE (IRELAND)—MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD.

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Clifford Lloyd is at present in the service of the Irish Government; and, if so, in what capacity; and, whether he is receiving pay or pension of any sort from the Irish Government; and, if he is not in their service at present, at what time was his pay stopped?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Mr. Lloyd is at present on the list of Resident Magistrates of the first class, and receives the pay and allowances of that rank. He is at present on leave of absence with pay. This is practically the only case, I am told, in which leave has been granted other than for private purposes since 1880.

MR. O'KELLY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether, during his presence in Egypt, he was in receipt of pay?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Not from the British Government.

MR. O'KELLY: During his present absence from Egypt is he in receipt of Egyptian pay?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir.

MR. O'KELLY: I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs when the Egyptian pay of Mr. Clifford Lloyd ceased.

MR. KENNY: Can the right hon. Gentleman say how long the Government proposed to continue Mr. Clifford Lloyd in the enjoyment of pay without any duties?

[No reply.]

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—RATING—BALTINGLASS UNION, CO. WICKLOW.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If, as President of the Local Government Board in Ireland, the subject of an investigation granted by his predecessor in office into charges brought on behalf of the ratepayers of Baltinglass Union, county Wicklow, against Mr. Dagg, clerk of the Union, and George Driver, rate collector, has been brought under his notice; whether it is the fact that the following persons have been excluded from the Register by their action: Edward Byrne, Denis Halpin, Garret Byrne, Edward Cusack, Peter Reilly, James Brophy, and Patrick Byrne; whether he has observed, with reference to Edward Byrne's case, the following statement in the Report of the Poor Law Inspector, who presided at the inquiry—

"The clerk of the Union admits . . . complaint is well founded. He erroneously placed the word 'objected' opposite the voter's name, although the rates were duly paid on the 29th, June, 1883;"

whether he has noted that Denis Halpin's complaint is that he objected for insufficient rating, but the clerk alleges he objected to insufficient rating, the amount being £13 5s. £11 15s. separate, and £1 10s. his share of mountain pasture; whether he has observed, in the case of Garret Byrne, that he was duly rated and voted on a former occasion, but that the name was altered on the rate-book by erasing his name, and writing "reps Martin Byrne" over it; whether the inspector reports—

"The rate-book contains an entry 'Reps Martin Byrne,' and that entry appeared to me to have been written over an erasure of more than a blot;"

whether he has noted, with regard to Conservative voters, that the name of William Vavasour was improperly retained on the rate-book after he had ceased to be a ratepayer, and had been struck off by the Valuation Office; whether he has noted that Rate Collector George Driver had his own name down twice in 1882 and three times in 1883; whether many previous complaints have been made from various quarters alleging partizan action on the part of Poor Law officials, in which "mistakes" and "errors of judgment" were pleaded in excuse; and, whether he approves the decision of his subordinates who do not think that there are grounds for deeming the Clerk of the Union and Mr. Driver to be unworthy of further confidence by reason of wilful dereliction of duty on their part?

MR. MCCOAN: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers I would like to ask whether substantially identical complaints were not addressed to the late Chief Secretary for Ireland last Session; whether he in reply did not state that the charges against Mr. Dagg were fully investigated by an Inspector of the Local Government Board, and disapproved; and whether the present repetition of these complaints is not a vexatious attempt to reopen a question already settled?

MR. O'BRIEN: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman at the same time whether the junior Member for Wicklow has recently visited his constituents?

MR. CAMPBELL BANNERMAN: In reply to my hon. Friend I can only say that the Question which stands on the Paper does appear to relate to a matter which has already been disposed of by competent authority. An inquiry has recently been held, as promised, by an Inspector of the Local Government Board into certain complaints made against officers of Baltinglass Union in connection with the election of Guardians, and in regard to the discharge of duties under the Parliamentary Voters' Act. The hon. Member will hardly ex- me within the limits of an answer to a Question to enter into details as to the several cases he refers to. He is, I believe, in communication with the Local Government Board on the subject. The Board has communicated to the Guardians the result of the Inspector's inquiry, and stated that, having carefully considered the facts elicited at the inquiry, they do not think that there are grounds for deeming the officers complained of to be unworthy of confidence, by reason of wilful dereliction of duty—although, no doubt, some mistakes had been made. I see no sufficient reason to dissent from that view. With regard to the complaints in respect of the proceedings under the Parliamentary Voters' Act, the hon. Member is no doubt aware that it is open to any person who may consider himself aggrieved to institute proceedings.

MR. W. J. CORBET: With regard to the Question put by my hon. Colleague, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is not aware that the investigation to which my Question refers was held on the 17th September last, long after the one held last year?

EGYPT—EXPEDITION UP THE NILE —NUMBER AND COST OF BOATS.

MR. MARRIOTT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can give the number of the boats already sent from this Country for the Nile Expedition, the cost of each boat, and the several amounts paid for transporting such boats from the places where they were made to the port of embarkation from this Country to Alexandria, and from Alexandria to their ultimate destination?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Eight hundred boats were obtained at an average price delivered at the port of embarkation of £85. They were sent from this country to Alexandria at a cost of £20 each, and their transmission from Alexandria to Halfa cost £40 each.

EGYPT—THE ALEXANDRIAN INDEMNITIES—MESSRS. LINADINO, RALLI, & CO.

MR. MARRIOTT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that the Egyptian Government have agreed to pay Messrs. Linadino, Ralli, and Co. eighty per cent. or any per-centage of their indemnity claim; and, if so, if he can give any reason why this firm should be treated differently to the rest of those entitled to indemnities?

EGYPT—CRIME AND OUTRAGE.

MR. MARRIOTT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can lay upon the Table of the House a Return specifying the number of murders, robberies, and other outrages committed in Lower Egypt during the months of September and October; and, whether numbers of people who have hitherto lived in their country houses (abâdiéhs) have not during the past two weeks been sending their families to reside in Cairo for safety?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Her Majesty's Government are not in a position to lay such a Return as is mentioned by the hon. Member, nor have they received any information to the effect that families are being sent from the country to Cairo for safety. A Special Commission has been instituted in Lower Egypt to put an end to the frequent acts of brigandage which have been committed.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—MR.

R. W. GAMBLE, Q.C., COUNTY COURT JUDGE OF ARMAGH.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it has come to the knowledge of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland that Mr. R. W. Gamble, Q.C., County Court Judge of Armagh, has detained in his hands, for upwards of two weeks, a number of decrees sent to him during the Armagh Sessions for signature, to the great inconvenience, and possible loss, of suitors; whether Mr. Gamble will be admonished; and, whether the Government will bring in a Bill to render the Judge's signature to decrees unnecessary, and to substitute a court seal therefor, so as to obviate the embarrassment constantly caused by County Court Judges detaining decrees for an unnecessary period?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Beyond the suggestion in the Question, the Lord Chancellor has no knowledge that any decrees sent to the County Court Judge of Armagh for signature were detained by him. There is some necessary delay caused by comparison with the records. The County Court Judges are not responsible to the Government. It will be remembered that last Session a Bill was introduced by my hon. Friend the senior Member for Monaghan for the purpose, amongst others, of substituting a seal for signature. That Bill was, in this respect, supported by the Government; but it met with such opposition that the hon. Member was obliged to withdraw it.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—JAMES

B. M'CONNELL, PETTY SESSIONS CLERK, DROMORE.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Irish Government is aware that James B. M'Connell, Petty Sessions Clerk of Dromore, county Down, was adjudicated a bankrupt; and, whether, under these circumstances, it is in accordance with the rules of the Civil Service to retain him in his position?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Mr. M'Connell became a bankrupt between eight and nine years ago. The fact of his bankruptcy came at the time under the notice of the Government of the day. Petty Sessions clerks, who are not, strictly speaking, Civil servants, and are not paid out of Imperial funds, were not then treated as within the spirit of the Civil Service Rule as to bankruptcy. The bankruptcy proceedings ended in the appropriation of £40 a-year from salary to the creditors, and the clerk's dismissal now would deprive them of the instalments which continue to be paid by this appropriation. This would make a retrospective application of the Civil Service Rule in this case very unjust.

ARMY—THE LATE PAYMASTERS ELLIOTT AND HARRIS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Financial Secretary for War, Whether the public accounts of Paymaster Elliott, attached to the 2nd Battalion Yorkshire Regiment, and of Paymaster Harris, attached to the 3rd Dragoon Guards, were found in a satisfactory state when those officers died?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: I am glad, Sir, to be able to say that the accounts of these deceased officers were found to be completely satisfactory by the Boards which reported upon them immediately after their death. I protest, however, against such a Question being put, unless some strong ground existed for anticipating a contrary answer. The officers are dead, and, however innocent, such Questions suggest a slur on their memory which, unjustifiable though it be, tends to cause pain to their relatives?

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — OVER- PRESSURE IN BOARD SCHOOLS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council, Whether the strongly-marked difference of opinion in the London School Board as to the expediency of the Board, rather than the Education Department, undertaking an inquiry into the alleged overpressure in elementary schools, and the fact that the National Union of Elementary Teachers, representing 13,000 teachers, have endorsed the conclusions of Dr. Crichton Browne and condemned the Report of Mr. Fitch, will induce him to reconsider his refusal to institute an inquiry by impartial medical men into the grievances complained of?

MR. MUNDELLA: I cannot admit the accuracy of the latter part of the hon. Member's statement. The letter from the Secretary of the National Union of Elementary Teachers distinctly states that—

"Into the medical part of Dr. Browne's Report the Executive are not prepared to enter."

I am daily in receipt of evidence from teachers, many of whom are members of the National Union, entirely dissenting from the views set forth in Mr. Heller's letter. I may also remind the hon. Member that there are 50,000 teachers in England and Wales—not including pupil teachers—and 6,000 certificated teachers in Scotland. The London School Board having the whole matter under their consideration, I must decline to take any step which would practically take it out of their hands.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE LOWER CONGO—THE INTERNATIONAL AFRICAN ASSOCIATION.

MR. DODDS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the Government are aware that the Congo traders of all Nationalities are opposed to the protection of the Lower Congo by the so-called International Association; if the Government are aware that this Association is believed, on trustworthy evidence, to be either a trading concern or interested in trading projects; and, if, therefore, the Government will use their influence at the Berlin Conference to protect the traders by the establishment of an International European protectorate over the territories of the Lower Congo?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The status and proceedings of the International African Association do not come within the scope of the Conference. I have already explained what the objects of the Conference are, and the Papers which I have laid to-day will explain this more fully.

NAVY—H.M.S. "ACTIVE"—BURSTING OF A GUN.

MR. FRENCH-BREWSTER asked the Surveyor General of Ordnance, Whether it is true, as stated in the public Press, that a six-inch breech-loading gun has burst during practice on board H.M.S. Active; and, if so, whether the gun in question was of steel or iron, and of the latest pattern?

MR. BRAND: It is true that a gun burst during practice on board Her Majesty's ship Active. It was a mark II. 6-inch breech-loading gun, having a steel tube and a wrought-iron jacket. The latest pattern of the 6-inch gun is built entirely of steel.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked whether the Government could give any information as to the cause of the accident, and whether the gun itself exhibited any sign of weakness?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: And where the gun was made—at Woolwich Arsenal or not?

MR. BRAND, in reply, said, that he had not received a final Report; but there was no reason to believe that the accident was due to any fault in construction. The gun was made at Elswick, but was of Woolwich design. It was fully proved, and successfully stood the test. He might also say that the burst occurred at a point not subject to great pressure. It was intended to appoint a Committee to inquire into the cause of the accident.

ARMY—MEDICAL DEPARTMENT—SURGEONS MAJOR.

COLONEL WALROND asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any reason why a communication should not be made to a Surgeon Major that he is not to be promoted to the rank of Brigade Surgeon as soon as it is decided that he is to be passed over, instead of allowing him only to become acquainted with the fact by seeing it in The Gazette.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: It is distinctly laid down in the Royal Warrant that Surgeons Major are to be selected for promotion to the higher ranks of the Medical Staff. Under such a system, therefore, promotion is not necessarily the rejection of an incompetent officer, but the selection of the and over written for advertisement is intended to have notification to him of his non-selection.

Beer; and I am not that that officer is does not happen to be ment, nor do I see e is intended to have notification to him of his non-selection.

had attempted the life of one of his servants with a revolver; and, whether any entry of the information was made in the barrack journal; and, if so, why Colonel Thackwell was not prosecuted?

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) ACT, 1832, SECTION 14—SEIZURE OF PAPERS.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, For what reason one of the papers of Mr. Matthew Harris of Ballinasloe, seized by the police, have not been returned; and, if they orders will be given that they shall be at once restored to their owner?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Nearly all the papers seized were returned to Mr. Harris's solicitor a few days ago. The few still retained will be the subject of further consideration, and a final conclusion will be come to in regard to them without delay.

MR. PARNELL: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman under what Act these papers belonging to Mr. Harris were seized, and under what Act they were detained so long?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I presume under the Prevention of Crime Act, though that is a point on which I cannot express a legal opinion; but I presume under the 14th section.

MR. PARNELL: Perhaps the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland, who is present, would kindly state under what section of that Act these papers were seized? As I understand it, the 14th section only authorized the seizure of papers in reference to which there was a suspicion of an illegal act being committed.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: That would probably be the case in this instance. Perhaps the hon. Member would kindly give Notice of the Question.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—
COLONEL THACKWELL, WHITEGATE, COUNTY CAVAN.

MR. DEASY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that about a year ago the Constabulary at Whitegate, county of Cork, received information that Colonel Thackwell, a resident in that district,

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Two and a-half years ago—not one year as has been represented to the hon. Member—some disturbance occurred at Colonel Thackwell's residence. He sent a message to the police barrack that he had been assaulted by one of his servants, and he asked that some of the police might be sent up. On their arrival they found that matters had calmed down. It appeared that Colonel Thackwell had fired a shot in the air; but it is not a fact that he had attempted the life of one of his servants. The matter was closely investigated by the District Inspector at the time. There was an entry in the barrack journal; but there was no ground for prosecution.

POLICE ACTS (IRELAND)—EXTRA
POLICE TAX IN GALWAY AND SOUTH
MAYO.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he would take into consideration the low price of stock and produce in the West of Ireland, and also the peaceable state of the Country; and if Her Majesty's Government would mark their appreciation of these facts by remitting the present and future payments of Extra Police Taxes in Galway and South Mayo?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not perfectly certain whether the hon. and gallant Member intends in the latter part of his Question to refer to the remission of the payment or to the removal of the extra police in the districts he has named. Any question as to the removal or the diminution of the extra police in any particular district must depend upon the state of that district. During the last three years there has been a reduction in the number of the extra police of 205 in Galway and of 135 in Mayo; but the question as to the remission of the payment of the extra police taxes hardly comes within the discretion of Her Majesty's Government. I think that the subject is one that may shortly be brought under the consideration of Parliament in connection with another subject.

SCOTLAND—ADMINISTRATION OF SCOTCH AFFAIRS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, since one Irish Bill has already passed this House, and since he has suggested the possibility of passing a Bill to settle the relations to one another of the Australian Colonies, Her Majesty's Government will immediately reintroduce the Bill to settle the relations between the two parts of this island by the appointment of a Scotch Secretary, upon which both parties were substantially agreed at the end of last Session, and by which a Minister may be forthwith provided to look after the Crofter question, and other urgent Scotch affairs? The hon. Member added that on reference to the Notice Paper, it would be seen that after the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer there was no more serious business than a Bill for Women's Suffrage.

MR. GLADSTONE: We do not propose to bring in this important Bill at the present time. It may be quite true that the House will have its labours during this Sitting occasionally considerably shortened, or it may not be true that I should not reckon on our adjourning early to-night until we have actually adjourned. In that respect I should certainly not like to count my chickens before they are hatched. But we do not think that we could draw a distinction between the Scotch Bill to which the hon. Member refers and a number of other measures which are really both important and urgent. This measure is doubtless important, and I do not deny that it is urgent; but I do not think that it is a measure that could be, with satisfaction to the House or in conformity of the spirit of the pledges which we have given to the House, taken out of the mass of the Government measures hanging over and propose it at once to the House for adoption.

EGYPT (EVENTS IN THE SOUDAN)— GENERAL GORDON.

COLONEL STANLEY: I wish to ask the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can, without inconvenience to the Public Service, give to the House further details with regard to the letter which has been received from General Gordon?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON:

We have received an abstract of the letter of General Gordon which was received by Major Kitchener, dated, I think, the 4th of November. The contents of that letter have been stated with tolerable accuracy in the newspapers, so far at least as it is expedient to make their contents public at present. It appears that General Gordon himself mentions that the Mahdi knows everything, so that care must be taken as to what is published. In these circumstances, the House will, I am sure, support Her Majesty's Government in declining to communicate any information which might be of use to General Gordon's enemies; and I trust that I may also be allowed to take this opportunity of expressing the hope that the Press—who, no doubt, will receive from their numerous Correspondents information sent to them without any bad intention, but which it would be undesirable to publish—will exercise some discretion in the face of that statement by General Gordon, that the Mahdi knows all about the military operations. I am not certain whether two items in the abstract have yet been published in the newspapers. One is that the Greek and Austrian Consuls are all right, and the other is that General Gordon wishes the newspapers to say that he has received letters through Major Kitchener from Sir Samuel Baker, his sister, and Mr. Stanley from the Congo; but he does not want to have more private letters sent, as it is too great a risk. That, I think, is all the information in addition to what has been stated in the newspapers. I should add that news has been received from another source that the friendly tribes have captured a convoy of 3,000 camels which were on their way from the River Gash to join the enemy.

NAVY ESTIMATES—DEFENCE OF COALING STATIONS.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I understand, from the Correspondence which has recently been published on the defence of our coaling stations abroad, that a certain small expenditure has been sanctioned by the Treasury for the purpose, and I should hope that it may be incurred during the present year. I am anxious to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when a Bill withdrawn.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS), in rising to move a Resolution increasing the Income Tax, said: Sir Arthur Otway, the figures in the Budget Estimate which I brought before the House in the month of April last were as follow:—We estimated that the Revenue, after deducting a small remission on account of the Carriage Duty, would amount to £85,533,000, and that the Expenditure—and here I include a small Supplementary Estimate for Civil Services, but I do not include the Vote of Credit for Egypt of £300,000—would amount to £85,427,000, leaving a surplus of £106,000. I have no remark to make, at the present time, as to the Expenditure. I think that it is proceeding pretty nearly on the lines of the Appropriation Act; and, so far as any further Supplementary Estimates for Civil Services are concerned, which may have to be proposed to Parliament in the early part of next Session, I think that they may be, as they have been generally of late years, expected to be met by the savings under other heads. As far as the Revenue is concerned, we have reason to anticipate a small increase upon the Estimate as I laid it before the Committee, though I should be sorry at the present time to give any precise figure for that increase. Well, that being the state of things as to the Budget and the Civil Service Supplementary Estimates of last Session, I will now proceed to the Supplementary Estimates for the Army and Navy. During the last Session the House adopted as a Vote of Credit in connection with General Gordon, an appropriation of £300,000; and last week the Committee of Supply passed Resolu-

—voting, in connection with the Soudan, £1,000,000 for Army Service and £324,000 for Navy Service, making £1,324,000 in all; and in connection with the operations in Bechuanaland £675,000 for the Army and £50,000 for the Navy, or £725,000; and these three heads—namely, the Vote of Credit last Session, the Vote for the Soudan Expedition, and the Vote for the Bechuanaland Expedition, amount altogether to £2,349,000. I repeat, then, that on the corrected Budget Estimates of last Session there will be a surplus of £106,000; that in the Revenue we might expect some improvement; and, further, that any Supplementary Estimates to be proposed next Session will probably be met by savings; so I think we should be safe, under the circumstances, in taking the present fiscal position as one which, if we do not add to the Revenue, will leave us a deficit on account of the year of about £2,000,000. Well, Sir, it has been my duty to consider from what sources of Revenue it would be proper, in the month of November, to propose to the Committee to make good that sum, and having carefully considered all the sources of taxation to which it has been reasonable to look, I am able to say that I could not recommend any change in our fiscal system with respect to indirect taxation for so temporary a purpose as the improvement of the Revenue in the remaining months of the year. Any such change would have a very disturbing effect upon our trade on whatever article the duty might be increased; and, besides, it would, if it only extended to the next four months, produce a small and unsatisfactory amount of Revenue, unless the increased rate of duty were very great indeed. Under these circumstances, then, I see no alternative but to propose to the House a small addition to the Income Tax. Now, Sir, it has more than once happened that such an addition to the Income Tax has been proposed, either early or late in the Autumn of the year; for instance, the last addition was in 1882, when the House voted an addition of  $1\frac{1}{2}d.$  to the Income Tax for the operations in Egypt; and there is a case which resembles in some respects—but only in some respects—the present, and that was when the House voted an addition of  $1d.$  to the Income Tax of 1867 on account of the Abyssinian War. The late Mr. Ward Hunt, who moved that Vote, proposed it in Parliament on the 28th of November, a little later in the year than I am proposing an addition now. That Vote was at that time adopted without practically any question in Parliament, and the Income Tax was raised from  $4d.$  to  $5d.$  in the pound. I propose to adopt a similar measure now, and to ask the Committee to approve an addition of  $1d.$  to the Income Tax, raising it from  $5d.$  to  $6d.$  in the pound for this financial year. I will state to the House, as precisely as I can estimate it, the financial effect of that increase. If hon. Members will refer back to the statement I made in opening the Budget, or will refer to the weekly Returns of Revenue and Expenditure, in which there is a column stating the anticipated amount received from Income Tax, under the head of Revenue, they will see that a  $5d.$  Income Tax is estimated to produce—and this year it will receive no assistance from a larger rate than in the previous year—£2,010,000 for each  $1d.$ , or, in all, £10,050,000. If the rate is increased to  $6d.$  in the pound, the amount for each penny will not be quite so large. We anticipate that it will be at the rate of £1,995,000 per  $1d.$ , or that  $6d.$  will produce £11,970,000. That gives an increase in the receipts from the  $6d.$  Income Tax over the  $5d.$  Income Tax of £1,920,000. Now, all this £1,920,000 it will not be possible to receive before April 1. We cannot estimate that we should receive during the financial year closing at the end of March next more than £1,200,000. So that £720,000 will be received on and after the 1st of April next, and that is a somewhat better proportion than that which Mr. Ward Hunt expected to get, and still better than what he actually got. It is quite unnecessary, on the present occasion, to go into details as to the system of collecting Income Tax, and how it will now be possible to receive a somewhat larger portion of the addition of  $1d.$  than Mr. Ward Hunt received in 1867-8. But these are the figures we have arrived at after very careful consultation with the Revenue officers, showing that £1,200,000 is what we hope will be received during the present financial year, and that £720,000 will be received after the end of the financial year. Upon that the only remark I have to make is, that the balances, as we expect them to stand at the end of the financial year, will be quite sufficient to bear that charge of £720,000; these balances being recouped during the early part of the next financial year, as the remainder of the proceeds of the additional  $1d.$  comes in. Sir Arthur Otway, that is the simple proposal I have to make to the Committee. As I said before, I do not think that, at this time of the financial year, we can have recourse to any tax other than the Income Tax. I, therefore, trust that the Committee will adopt the proposal to raise that tax for the present year from  $5d.$  to  $6d.$  I shall be happy, as I can address the Committee more than once, and as my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney) will also be able to do so, to give the Committee any information on questions of detail arising out of questions asked us in debate. But, at present, all that it is necessary for me to do is to move the formal Resolution, which I now put into your hands.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, in addition to the Duties of Income Tax granted by ‘the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1884,’ there shall be charged, collected, and paid for the year which commenced on the sixth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four, in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act of the sixteenth and seventeenth years of Her Majesty’s reign, chapter thirty-four, the following Duties of Income Tax (that is to say):

For every Twenty Shillings of the annual value or amount of Property, Profits, and Gains chargeable under Schedules (A), (C), (D), or (E) of the said Act, the Duty of One Penny;

And for every Twenty Shillings of the annual value of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Heritages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act, the Duty of One Halfpenny; Provided always, That, with the view of securing the additional Duties and affording the proper rights of deduction in respect thereof in the case of Dividends, Interest, or other annual sums due or payable half-yearly or quarterly in the course of the said year, where one of the half-yearly payments or two of the quarterly payments shall have been made, the other half-yearly payment or quarterly payments shall be charged with the additional Duty of Two Pence for every Twenty Shillings of the amount thereof; and where three of the quarterly payments shall have been made, the other quarterly payment shall be charged with the additional Duty of Four Pence for every Twenty Shillings of the amount thereof.

"Provided also, That the charge under this Resolution shall be deemed to be satisfied by an addition of one-fifth of the amount of the Duties assessed under 'The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1854,' to such amount, and payment of such addition therewith."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is very short; but it is of so startling a nature that I think it requires instant comment, because, taking the most favourable view of his own Estimates, we see here a Liberal Chancellor of the Exchequer, pledged to peace, economy, and retrenchment, coming down to the House, and admitting a deficiency of nearly £800,000. When the original Estimates of Revenue were before the Committee, in connection with the Budget of the present year, there was a unanimous opinion expressed on this side of the House, in which I certainly joined, that Her Majesty's Government had not made sufficient allowance for contingencies which were more or less certain to arise. It was a matter of almost absolute certainty that an Expedition of some kind or other would have to be sent to Egypt; but the Government made no provision for such an Expedition. We have the high authority of the Prime Minister for believing that nothing is more inconvenient to trade and commerce than to bring in a second Budget in the middle of the financial year; but now, when trade is most depressed, down comes the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, just when the trading communities have made their arrangements to meet the financial burdens of the year, with an addition of 2d. to the Income Tax for the last half-year. But, unsatisfactory as this is, it is not all. Meagre as the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is, and unsatisfactory as the main outlines of it are, I very much fear that a much more unsatisfactory statement will have to be made a few months hence. There is not a single man in the House who believes that the Estimates, large as they are, which have been presented by the Government, will in any way be sufficient. I cannot understand how any Government, with a knowledge of the magnitude of the Expedition they are sending out up the Nile, could present Estimates of so small a character as £1,000,000. It is perfectly clear that the object has been not to cover the actual expense, but to give the Government a plausible excuse for increasing the Income Tax by 1d. only during the present year. The one maxim which the Prime Minister is always insisting upon is, that on every occasion we ought to square our accounts for the year, and that there is no greater act of immorality in reference to finance than for a Government, deliberately, with their eyes open, to present a Budget with a deficiency. That was the one solitary remnant left of the financial policy laid down by the Prime Minister in Mid Lothian; and even that has now gone. I think, before we assent to this proposal, we ought to have a clear Estimate of what our liabilities for this year will probably be, and what our Expenditure will amount to. It is perfectly clear that, under the most favourable Estimates, there will be a deficiency of something like £1,000,000 for the present year. The Government are about to propose large additional Estimates for the Navy. Where is the money to come from? Then there is to be an addition to the fortifications used for the protection of our coaling stations. Where is the money to come from? On Tuesday next the House is to have a statement from the Prime Minister as to what charges are to be put on the English taxpayers for the finances of Egypt—a burden imposed upon the trade of this country in order to support the policy of Her Majesty's Ministers in Egypt, which has practically brought that country to a state of bankruptcy. Under those circumstances, I say that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer comes down to the House, and asks for power to impose additional taxation, he ought to give us some idea of the liabilities we have already incurred. We have heard a great deal of the extravagance of the late Government. Let me place before the Committee a statement of the Expenditure of the present Government. They commenced with an initial Expenditure of £85,500,000. To that we must add the extra receipts of the previous improvements in the Revenue, bringing it up to £86,300,000. A further addition must be made of the amount paid by India for Home Establishments, included in the Revenue of the previous year, which brings the total Expenditure of the present Government to £87,300,000. That is exclusive of the Supplementary Estimates. The Committee has sanctioned Votes to the amount of £2,300,000 more, so that the Expenditure of Her Majesty's Government, pledged as they are to peace, retrenchment, and economy, amounts this year to the enormous figure of £89,600,000. Now, Sir, these are startling figures; and if this were an exceptional year, one might pass them by without comment; but I have here a Statistical Abstract, published this year, showing the Expenditure during the past five years, and I find that this is not an abnormal year, but that every year Her Majesty's Government have been in Office the Expenditure of the country has increased at an unparalleled rate. If the Committee will allow me, I would ask their attention for a moment or two while I place before them the enormous dimensions which the Expenditure during the past five years has attained. I cannot estimate what the actual Expenditure of this year will be; but I assume that if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer realizes the income which he has estimated that he will obtain, and adding the sums previously paid for extra receipts on behalf of the Army and Navy, and £1,000,000 paid for the Home Establishments in connection with India, the Estimate for this year's Revenue will amount to upwards of £89,000,000. In the preceding year, making the same calculations, and including the extra receipts, the Expenditure was £87,300,000; about £87,000,000 in the year before; about £85,000,000 in the year before that; and £82,000,000 in the year preceding. Adding the Expenditure in those five years together, I find that, since the present Government have been in Office, should the Estimates of the present year be confirmed, the Expenditure of the country has amounted to the enormous sum of nearly £436,000,000. Now, Sir, the late Government were turned out of Office chiefly because the nation was told by the Prime Minister that they had adopted a policy so expensive that it was beyond the capacity of the nation to bear. Well, I will take the income of the last five years the Conservatives were in power, and I find that it only amounted to £399,000,000, showing a balance against the present Government of £37,000,000. But there are two deductions to be made from that. I give the Government credit, at the present moment, for having more than paid their way. I make an allowance on that account of £1,500,000. I deduct that sum from their Expenditure, and I also admit that we failed by £6,500,000 to cover our Expenditure, and that will increase the actual income we received by £6,500,000, which represents a failure of income during the five years the Conservative Party were in power. Allowing, therefore, £1,500,000 for the Liberal surplus and £6,500,000 for Conservative deficiencies, it will still be found that the income which the Government have received during the last five years is £29,000,000 over and above that received by their Predecessors in their five years of Office. Their Expenditure, taking the most moderate estimate, has been more than £29,000,000 above that of the Conservative Party. It has been asserted on Liberal platforms, and by the Prime Minister in Mid Lothian, that the increased Expenditure has been owing to the Government having to pay the debts of their Predecessors.

MR. GLADSTONE: I spoke of the engagements inherited from our Predecessors.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: It is quite possible for the late Government to assert that if the different and proper arrangements they had made in Afghanistan and in connection with Eastern affairs had been completely carried out by their Successors, things might possibly not have been placed in so unfavourable a position when they came into Office. Therefore, I think they can afford to leave out of the present discussion the engagements which they inherited from their Predecessors, but the present Government have spent, during five years of Office, £29,000,000 more than was spent by the late Government during their five years' tenure of Office. It is asserted that this is due, to a very large extent, to their paying off the debts of their Predecessors, and that the increase arises from the annual increase of the charges in reference to the reduction of the National Debt. Now, my hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) has for some time past promulgated that theory; but he has moved for a Return which annihilates it. If he will take the trouble to look at that Return, which shows all the payments made on behalf of the National Debt during the last 10 years, he will find that we paid £135,000,000, and that Her Majesty's present Government have paid £140,000,000, making a difference of £5,000,000 only. Well, I give the Government the full credit and benefit of that difference of £5,000,000, and also of the £3,750,000 paid to India on account of the Afghan War, and, deducting those sums from the £29,000,000 I have alluded to as their excessive Expenditure, there still remains upwards of £20,000,000 to be accounted for; and I assert, and I challenge contradiction, that the whole of that £20,000,000 is entirely due to increased Expenditure connected with the Army, Navy, and Civil Services, or, in other words, that Her Majesty's Government, who came in power to practice economy and to reverse the extravagant measures of their Predecessors, in five years have expended an average of £4,000,000 per annum more than the late Ministry did. These are startling facts, and, unfortunately, there are symptoms which indicate at the present moment that the Revenue has lost much of its elasticity; and for the first time in the history of the Income Tax it is showing signs of going back, or, at any rate, of being deprived of that progress which has distinguished it in past years. Under these circumstances, it may be asked, What are we to do? I suppose we have no alternative but to assent to the proposal of Her Majesty's Government. When the Prime Minister was in Mid Lothian, he set up a defence on behalf of the Expenditure of his Government. I read that defence, which was a very ingenious one, with the care and attention which everything that falls from the right hon. Gentleman deserves to receive; but it most unquestionably involves heretical principles in regard to finance, and absolutely immoral arithmetic. Allow me to explain what I mean. The right hon. Gentleman, for the purpose of defending the Expenditure of Her Majesty's Government, laid down certain doctrines, which I contend that both sides of the House ought at once emphatically to repudiate. He deducted from his Expenditure the amount by which the National Debt has been reduced during the time the present Government have been in Office. He deducted that from the Expenditure, and because the amount by which the National Debt had been reduced was greater during his term of Office than during the term of the late Government, the right hon. Gentleman went on to argue, before his audience, that his Expenditure had been less than that of the late Government. I maintain that that is a most dangerous and immoral doctrine, because nearly the whole, if not the whole, of that reduction of Debt, took place under the automatic operation of the system of Terminable Annuities. When filling the Office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, my right hon. Friend beside me (Sir Stafford Northcote) pointed out more than once the effect of the operation, and showed that, while reducing the Debt, they began, at the same time, to incur fresh liabilities. The Prime Minister has set up his argument on a doctrine which I never heard advanced before by a Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, that he got no benefit from the Terminable Annuities set up by his Predecessors.

MR. GLADSTONE: What is the noble Lord quoting from?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I am speaking only from my memory, and I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he endorses the doctrine set up by the Prime Minister, because the right hon. Gentleman has resuscitated the system of setting up Terminable Annuities, and the sole object of setting up Terminable Annuities is for the purpose of reducing Debt. The amount set apart for the purpose of the Debt, in order that an annual reduction may take place, is, no doubt, independent of the Expenditure in connection with the Army, Navy, and Civil Service; and no Chancellor of the Exchequer, or any Member of the Government, has, I believe, attempted to justify any excessive Expenditure by the plea that, under the automatic process of Terminable Annuities, there was an increase in the amount of Debt paid off. If that principle is allowed to prevail, we should derive no advantage from the extinction of Terminable Annuities, because the Expenditure on the Army, Navy, and Civil Service would be increased to an equivalent amount. The Return which the hon. Member for the University of London obtained puts that point in the clearest possible manner. Take two periods—say, 1874 and 1884. The annual charge for the total service of the Debt in the first year was £26,100,000; but the amount which, under the automatic process of Terminable Annuities, was paid off yearly, was £3,100,000. Ten years later, in 1884, the total charge for the Debt, including the Sinking Fund, was £28,100,000, or an increase of £2,000,000; but, by the automatic process of Terminable Annuities, no less than £6,700,000 will be paid off, and the Prime Minister, in Mid Lothian, credited himself with the difference in charge, and with the increased amount of Terminable Annuities paid off, because they were approaching termination. What I contend is that he had no right whatever to do that, or to set up the doctrine that because, under the process of Terminable Annuities, they are still reducing Debt, that, therefore, they are entitled to the same amount to increase the National Expenditure on the Army, Navy, and Civil Service. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. I see that he does not like the practical application of his own theory.

MR. GLADSTONE: I only want the noble Lord to be a little more accurate in the statement he makes. I distinctly declined to say that I was satisfied with the state of the Expenditure. So far from setting up any theory of the kind imputed to me, I never said anything of the sort.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: That has nothing to do with my point, or my argument. I do not suppose that the Prime Minister is alone in his dissatisfaction at the state of the Expenditure. I venture to say that there is not a single person in the country who does not agree with him. I have his speech here. He began by warning those he addressed to be on their guard against the Tories, and he concluded by saying that he had laid the figures before his audience, and that he challenged any man to shake them or deny their correctness. All I am doing now is to submit the figures of the right hon. Gentleman to a fair criticism. The argument the right hon. Gentleman used was that, deducting from the Expenditure the amount of Debt paid off during the time he has been in Office—because the Debt was less than during the time the late Ministry were in Office—he was entitled to contend that therefore his Expenditure was less. But the reason why he paid off more was because certain Terminable Annuities were approaching their termination, and they were handed over to him at the time the present Government came into Office. It did not involve any fresh charge; but the operation of those Annuities undoubtedly did diminish annually, to an increased amount, the principal of the National Debt. Then, I say, that if the Prime Minister is justified in setting up his theory, he might deduct from his annual Expenditure the amount by which, under Terminable Annuities, the Debt is annually reduced; and, in that case, there ought to be an end to the system of Terminable Annuities altogether, so as not to allow the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Prime Minister to set up a doctrine so dangerous and detrimental to economy as that which the Prime Minister was pleased to present to his Mid Lothian constituents. I will deal with only one other point. The right hon. Gentleman deducted from the comparative Expenditure of the present and the late Governments the cost of collecting the Revenue. Why should he deduct the cost of collecting the Revenue? We keep up such large establishments of the Army and Navy, for the purpose of protecting the Revenue, and we maintain another establishment—the Civil Service—for the purpose of collecting it. If we deduct one, why should we not deduct the other? The cost of collection and of protection are both dead charge upon the Revenue; and the reason why the right hon. Gentleman deducted the cost of collecting the Revenue was because the cost was greater under the present Government than under the late Government, and if he had included it the figures would not have come out as he wished them. There was one sentiment which the Prime Minister gave utterance to in Mid Lothian which was a very admirable one—namely, that it was the policy of the Government that regulated the Expenditure. What I want to know is, what the policy of the Government has been in regulating this Expenditure, which is the largest Expenditure we have ever known? We are now asked to sanction the means of sending out two Expeditions, one to South Africa and the other to the North of Africa. I do not propose to trench upon the discussion which unquestionably will arise, both as regards the Expedition to South Africa, as well as that to the Soudan, and in regard to the arrangement of affairs by Her Majesty's Government. But I recollect that, two years ago, when Lord Derby was asked to put an end to certain outrages which had taken place in Bechuanaland, the noble Lord gave a characteristic reply. He said—"What will it cost? It will cost more than the fee simple of the whole country is worth." Has the fee simple of land in Bechuanaland increased so largely that Her Majesty's Government are now justified in sending out an Expedition? Again, they are sending out another Expedition to Egypt to bring home three distinguished officers of Her Majesty's Government at Khartoum, two of whom have, unfortunately, been murdered since the Expedition was decided upon. I cannot help recollecting that not more than two years ago, when General Hicks asked for assistance, a mocking reply was sent out to our Representative to this effect—"Report quickly the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, but take care to give no advice." Now, however, the Khedive is threatened with a plethora of advice, and one of the most important of Her Majesty's Ministers has been sent out in order that he may advise his Colleagues as to the best course to be followed. I think it would have been a better and a more simple process for Her Majesty's Government to have given their directions straight to their Representatives in Egypt. There was a remarkable statement published, not long ago, by those who were specially appointed by Her Majesty's Government to inquire into the condition of Egyptian finance, and I think the Government will do well to bear it mind.

Lord George Hamilton

The statement was that there is a law in Egypt by which every Egyptian subject sent to the Soudan is entitled, if wounded, to a pension; and if killed, his family are entitled to remuneration. This report states that in consequence of the operations in the Soudan there are no less than 40,000 persons or families entitled to pensions from the Egyptian Government. I do not say that all these 40,000 persons lost their lives, or were wounded through the negligence of Her Majesty's Government; but, unquestionably, most of them have, and the result is, that not only has a serious amount of life been sacrificed, but that an enormous tax has been inflicted upon the Egyptian Government, which it is altogether unable to bear, and it will have to be, in some shape or other, transferred to the shoulders of the English taxpayers. [Cries of "No!"] Well, we shall see. My impression is that some such proposal will have to be made to Parliament. I have stated the reason why I rose to take part in this discussion; and I hope we shall have, on the part of the Prime Minister, if not a repudiation of the words he is reported to have used in Mid Lothian, at any rate an emphatic repudiation of the doctrine which they conveyed.

MR. GLADSTONE: My point was, that the sums paid for the reduction of Debt might be deducted from the ultimate Expenditure.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: That is not exactly the point. What I maintain is, that if you set up Terminable Annuities, annually increasing in amount, you have no right to deduct the principal so reduced from your annual Expenditure. I say that if you do deduct it—and I understand the Prime Minister to say it may be deducted from the Expenditure—any Minister, by adopting such a process, could make his figures less than another Minister who had been in Office under less favourable circumstances. That is what the Prime Minister stated at Mid Lothian, and I am convinced that on no other occasion except upon the hustings would the Prime Minister have repeated that doctrine. Although I sympathize very much with the unfortunate taxpayers who will have to pay this extra 2d. in the pound Income Tax in one sense, I trust that this extra imposition of taxation will bear good fruit. It will bring home to everyone what is the post and the price of a policy of perpetual vacillation. Her Majesty's Government have had great advantages. They have had the largest majority ever known; they are led by the ablest Parliamentary tactician it is possible for the House to possess. Yet what have they done? They have succeeded, by their foreign and Colonial policy, in lowering the reputation and in endangering the interests of the country in every direction. [Cries of "No!"] I say "Yes;" and, in accomplishing this unlucky result, they have succeeded in wasting more money and in sacrificing more lives than the most aggressive of their Predecessors. I hope the sharpness and unpleasantness of the lesson will not be forgotten by the country, and that it will bring home to the country this fact—that, in the administration of an Empire like that of England, there is no policy so ruinous and expensive as that which is dictated not by natural exigencies, but by the internal discords of the political Party which happens for the time being to be Office.

MR. RYLANDS said, that when he had the honour of bringing under the notice of the House a Resolution in favour of a reduction of National Expenditure, he was anxious to avoid, as far as he could, any comparison between Conservative and Liberal finance; and he had urged then, as he ventured to urge now, that what the Committee had to consider in regard to the Expenditure of the country was, not how it could promote Party interests or throw responsibility on one Party or the other, but whether the position in which the country was placed was such as to be advantageous to the public or satisfactory to the taxpayer. He did not propose to follow the noble Lord opposite (Lord George Hamilton) into the remarks he had made, and especially into those in which, in advertising to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the noble Lord had attempted to show that the present Government had been much more extravagant than their Predecessors; nor would he venture to enter into the wider field the noble Lord had opened up, as to the conduct of the Government in reference to high matters of policy in Egypt and South Africa. He (Mr. Rylands) took it for granted that all those matters would come before the House in a legitimate manner, when they could be discussed, as no doubt they ought to be discussed, in reference to all their bearings on the administration of the country, and in the interests of the taxpayers at large. He had not been surprised at the nature of the proposal made to the Committee that evening by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. No hon. Member could feel surprised, after having seen the Government following so closely in the footsteps of their Predecessors, that now, in the month of November, in utter disregard of the doctrine that there should only be one Budget in the course of the year, the House of Commons should be called upon to make provision for two Budgets. They were to have fresh taxation. What was it for? He fully admitted, with his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that if they were to have fresh taxation, it would be intolerable to impose it in the way of indirect taxation. He believed the Committee would fully concur in that view; but was it not a fact, and was it not felt throughout the country to be a fact, that the owners of precarious incomes were unjustly treated by the imposition of the Income Tax? Could anybody contend that real property was fairly treated in regard to taxation? [Cries of "Yes!"] How about the probate duty? Was it not a fact that millions of taxation were imposed upon the earnings of the industrious portions of the community in taxes, while the most stable property of the community escaped? Had not the Prime Minister admitted, in Mid Lothian, the injustice—and they all believed it to be an injustice—inflicted upon those who had a precarious income by the imposition of the Income Tax, and yet things were allowed to drift on, and no effort was made to remedy that injustice. And now, at a time of grievous commercial depression—at a time when capital was receiving a very miserable return—often no return at all; when every trade and every industry was suffering, the Government proposed to make the burden still heavier. [An hon. MEMBER: Free Trade.] He declined to be any party to the raising of that question. But he must say that at such a time as this, for the Government to come down to give another turn of the screw, at a period of great depression, and at a time when the injustice in the mode of levying taxation was left without a remedy, would, he was satisfied, be productive of great irritation and annoyance to the country. He would only remind the House that, at a period when, on every ground, people of this country ought to be dealt with leniently on the score of taxation and expenditure, it was proposed to increase their burdens. Hon. Gentlemen opposite talked about local burdens; and, no doubt, they were quite right in asserting that, at the present moment, the people of this country were bearing an enormous burden in the shape of local expenditure, not only for what they wanted for themselves at the present moment, but for the deficiencies of their Predecessors. [Cries of "No!"] That was certainly the fact. Were not the present generation improving the sewerage and sanitary arrangements of the towns, and building schools, and carrying out other local improvements which their ancestors had neglected. These works were being done now, and the people were taking the burden of making permanent improvements upon their own shoulders for the benefit of posterity. Hon. Gentlemen opposite knew perfectly well that the localities were not only discharging duties which belonged to their Predecessors, but that they were bearing burdens for the relief of their Successors. And what was the time when this additional burden was proposed? It was imposed at a moment when no relief of taxation was attempted by reducing indirect taxation, and when no attempt was made, by diminution of taxation, to give a stimulus to the industry of the country. It was at such a moment that Her Majesty's Government brought in measures for paying off the National Debt; and this very year, when we were paying £7,000,000 towards the reduction of the National Debt, Her Majesty's Government came down and proposed to place upon the shoulders of the taxpayers an additional burden to be raised by this most objectionable system of taxation. Of course, he protested against it. He believed the Expenditure of Her Majesty's Government was altogether unjustifiable. The fact that he sat on that side of the House would never induce him to support Her Majesty's Government in an Expenditure which he believed to be unwarrantable. No doubt, some persons said it was a matter of policy, and that a great deal of the Expenditure of the country absolutely depended on such policy. What was it, however, that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said to him (Mr. Rylands) in regard to the Motion for a reduction of Expenditure which he had brought forward last Session? His right hon. Friend told him that the Treasury were most carefully investigating various branches of Expenditure with a view to secure economy. He (Mr. Rylands) had seen no evidence of the result of any such investigation. On the contrary, the Expenditure had gone on increasing, and he had seen great branches of Expenditure, in which he believed there was enormous waste of money, continued without any attempt being made, permanently, to grapple with the evil. They were about to have in their hands a most important Report from a Departmental Committee in regard to the Dockyards. He had no doubt that very considerable economy might be effected in the administration of the Dockyards, notwithstanding the fact that they wanted more ships and greater naval power. It was admitted, even by those who were interested in the matter, that the Dockyard system was a most extravagant and inefficient system. In point of fact, he had been told by a Member of the Committee on the other side of the House—a man of the highest position, character, judgment, and experience—that, in his opinion, at least 20 per cent might be saved in the cost of administering the Dockyards. The result, if the Expenditure was 20 per cent higher than it ought to be—and he had no doubt that it was, from his own personal knowledge of manufacturing operations—there was a waste of at least £1,000,000, or even £2,000,000 a-year, in connection with the Dockyards; and as this waste had been going on for many years, the exercise of greater economy would have provided the country with a considerable number of good iron-clads. But the extravagant expenditure of money still went on. What were the Government doing in order to stop it? Nothing whatever. But although they failed to do anything to reduce the expenditure in those branches of the Department where it was now excessive, or to prevent the waste of £1,000,000 or £2,000,000 per annum, they came down now, and asked the Committee for 1*d.* additional Income Tax. No doubt, the Committee would grant it. Committees of Supply and Ways and Means always granted this kind of taxation, and never took into consideration how the people were suffering. He was sorry to see that that was a point which his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer never realized. The Prime Minister and his right hon. Friend constantly boasted of their surpluses, and took pride to themselves and to the Government for the fact that there was a surplus. They were constantly informing the House that they always had a surplus; that they had done this and that out of the surplus; and that they had paid certain sums out of the surplus. But where did the surplus come from? The Government did not manufacture it. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by some administrative legerdemain, could manage to produce a large surplus without going to the pockets of the people of the country he would be the most admirable and charming Chancellor of the Exchequer who had ever sat on the Treasury Bench. Unfortunately, the right hon. Gentleman did not profess to get a surplus in any other way than by taking it out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the country. What did that money represent? There were millions of men in this country who, whenever they wanted additional capital in order to carry on their industrial enterprises, had to pay 6, 8, or 10 per cent for it; and, nevertheless, the Government took out of the pockets of these poor men a certain proportion of that capital which they were not going to use for the service of the nation, but which would remain as a surplus to clear off their debts. In reality they were clearing off the obligations of the country by money taken from the pockets of people to whom it was worth from 5 to 10 per cent, when they were quite able to clear off their obligations by money raised at 3 per cent. What on earth could be the justification of such a policy? He must say that he entertained an earnest hope that the Franchise Question would soon be out of the way; because, so long as it stood in the way, neither the House of Commons nor the country would devote their attention to any other question. He maintained that there were many other matters to which the attention of the House and of the country ought to be turned, and one of the most urgent was that which concerned the Expenditure of the country, the obligations of the country, and the imposition of burdens upon the people in the shape of taxation. He had constantly spoken in that House against the extravagant Expenditure of the Government. He knew the feeling of a great body of the ratepayers, and he was perfectly satisfied that sooner or later, whichever Party was extravagant and imposed undue burdens upon the country, would be called to account by the taxpayers, and no mere comparison between Conservative and Liberal finance would be a sufficient answer to the complaint of the people. On the contrary, the people would express their opinions in unanswerable language, and they would show by their votes that their complaint was against the undue and unnecessary burden of taxation. He was glad to hear from the Leader of the Opposition, from right hon. Gentlemen who had acted as his Colleagues, particularly from the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), and from other leading Members of the Conservative Party, that they were in favour of economizing the National Expenditure. They appeared anxious to show that in regard to the Public Expenditure they were not as bad as they were thought to be, nor as bad as other people. He (Mr. Rylands) had always been struck, however, by the fact that their performances were very different from their promises; and that, although they professed economy in reference to the Expenditure of the country, they failed to show it in their acts. It had been said that "Hypocrisy was the homage which vice paid to virtue;" and they had at least the satisfaction of seeing, from what might be called the financial hypocrisy of the Front Benches, that whilst maintaining excessive expenditure, leading Members on both sides of the House still recognized the demands of public opinion in favour of national economy. He had no intention of opposing the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he could not help regretting that the Government had not endeavoured to solve the present difficulty in some other way. He regretted extremely that, at that time of the year, the Government had not seen their way to throw this additional tax upon property, rather than upon industrial incomes. He should, however, have felt still more gratified to find that the Government, by economical administration, had not been driven, at that late period of the year, to ask the House of Commons to sanction a further increase of taxation.

MR. GORST said, he wished to ask a question, because he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been purposely vague in one part of his statement, and that the right hon. Gentleman had not put before the Committee the exact financial result of this operation. If he rightly understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer, his previous Budget, above any provision made for any new source of expenditure, left him with a surplus of £106,000, including certain Supplementary Estimates, passed in the previous year. Apart from the new War Expenditure they were now called upon to incur, there was a small surplus of £106,000. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that, although there might be a small increase of income above the Estimate before them, the whole of that increase would be swallowed up by some Civil Service Supplementary Estimates in the coming Session.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. CHILDERS): No. What I said was that the Civil Service Supplementary Estimates to be proposed in February would probably be met by savings on other Votes.

MR. GORST asked if he was to understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that there would be a small estimated increase of income available for meeting the present War Expenditure? If that were the case, would the right hon. Gentleman tell the Committee what the amount of that increase would be, because otherwise there would be no means of dealing with it? So far as the right hon. Gentleman had condescended to actual figures, he had not met, by a good deal, the increased expenditure the House had voted. The House had voted increased expenditure to the amount of £2,349,000, and the right hon. Gentleman only proposed an increased taxation that would yield £1,930,000, leaving a deficit of £419,000. If from that was deducted the surplus of £106,000, which existed upon the former Estimates, the net result of the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman would be a deficit of £313,000. The question he wished to ask was, whether the net result of the various Budget proposals was that the country was left, at the end of the financial year, with a deficit of £313,000. If that were not so, he thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to tell the House from what other source he expected to make up the deficiency, and what the amount of such increased income would be upon which he estimated an increase of ordinary taxation equivalent to £313,000. The Committee ought to receive that information, or otherwise the Estimates of the right hon. Gentleman would remain in a hazy form, even if they did not result in a positive deficit. What he wished to have an explanation upon was, whether it was possible, under the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as they stood, to meet the Expenditure of the year out of the income of the year?

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he sympathized a great deal with the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) in reference to the reduction of the Expenditure of the country, and also as to the desirability of the economical question being, as far as possible, removed from the disputed arena of Party politics. But, unfortunately, the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), who opened the discussion, had made a purely Party speech. The noble Lord had made a Party attack upon the Government; and, not content with that, he had supplemented an attack on the finance of the Government with another attack upon their foreign and Egyptian policy. He (Mr. H. H. Fowler) found no fault with the noble Lord for doing that; but he proposed, for a moment or two, to answer what he might call the fighting portion of the noble Lord's speech, totally irrespective of the question raised by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). The noble Lord credited Her Majesty's Government and their followers with the total increase of the National Expenditure, and had tried, with great effect, to trace the large increase in the total Expenditure of the country, which had taken place during the present Administration, to the results of their foreign policy. But he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had observed in the speech of the noble Lord, what he had often noticed in the speeches of Conservative orators, a singular silence with regard to a comparison of the Expenditure of the last Conservative Government and of the Liberal Administration which preceded it. The figures which prevailed between 1870 and 1874 were many millions less than the figures which prevailed between 1874 and 1879; and he thought the noble Lord would find that one of the charges against Conservative finance which was made in 1880, was that the effect of that finance had been steadily, and he was afraid permanently, to raise the general Expenditure of the country. The late Government, when they acceded to Office, found a low rate of Expenditure, which they steadily increased, partly by their financial policy and partly by their foreign policy. The present Government, when they succeeded the Conservative Government, found a very high rate of Expenditure. The noble Lord tried to convince the Committee that that Expenditure had been very largely increased by the present Administration. In dealing with the increase, he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) submitted that there was nothing more delusive and nothing more absurd than to say that the Expenditure of this country was the total sum which appeared in the Financial Abstract, whether it was £89,000,000, £87,000,000, or £82,000,000, as the case might be. The Government of this country, in addition to the ordinary Expenditure required for the Army, Navy, and Civil Services, carried on a large trading concern; it acted as a banking concern, and it also performed certain services for the public for which it received fees. The more trade it did the larger the Expenditure; the more banking it did the larger the Expenditure; the more service it rendered to the country in respect to the item for which the fees were received, the larger the gross Expenditure. Nothing could be more misleading than an Abstract annually presented to show the Expenditure of the country, which, as a matter of fact, might be twisted to any purpose whatever. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) had for some years past—since 1867—annually moved for Returns in which the Income and Expenditure of the nation were analyzed. That Return gave, for instance, the gross expenditure of the Post Office on the one side, and the cost of working the Post Office on the other, and then credited the income of the country with the net balance; and, in the same way, all the other branches of the Public Service were dealt with. The figures taken from that sheet were signed by the Secretary to the Treasury in the last and the present Administrations, and might be taken to be strictly accurate. Indeed, he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) knew they were accurate from having checked them with the Financial Account of the Public Income and Expenditure, from which the noble Lord opposite (Lord George Hamilton) had taken his figures. The noble Lord took the Expenditure of the late Government for four years and the Expenditure of the present Administration during the last four years. [LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: No; for five years.] He proposed to take the Expenditure for four years. He found that the Expenditure of the late Administration was £288,000,000 during the four years; while the net Expenditure of the present Administration during the last four years had been £299,000,000. He was not going to argue that that did not, on the face of it, show that the Expenditure had been increased under the present Administration during the past four years by £11,000,000. How had that increase arisen? The noble Lord gave them some figures showing a very large increase in reference to the sums paid by the two Governments for the reduction of the Public Debt; but the gross entries as to the cost of the Public Debt were again misleading. The net amount paid during the last four years of the last Administration for Debt charge was £109,600,000. The present Government had had to pay, and it had paid, £113,401,000, or an increase of more than £4,000,000. Of course, the explanation of that was self-evident. The permanent Debt charge of the country for the five years which had lapsed since the present Government came into power had increased. The last act of the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) was to add Terminable Annuities for five years, in order to repay the deficit of the Administration. That sum had, therefore, to be found by the present Government, and the increased charge paid by them for interest and repayment of Debt during the time they had been in Office had been upwards of £4,000,000. Then there were £2,500,000 for the Afghan War. He did not pretend to say whether that contribution was wrong or not; but, as a matter of fact, the present Government had paid £2,500,000 in aid of the Indian Revenue in respect of the charge for the Afghan War. In addition, they had had a very large extra Expenditure occasioned by the state of things in Ireland. Further, there had been a considerable increase of Expenditure in consequence of the principle established in 1874—that most vicious and disastrous principle of subventions in aid of local taxation, which, if not speedily dealt with, would land the country in most serious difficulties. That item was steadily increasing. Then there had been a large increase, and it was one in which he rejoiced—a large increase on account of education. He took it for granted that, although there had been a good many things predicted as to what the coming Democracy would do when the Franchise Bill was passed, there was one thing it would not do—it would not economize the Education Act; and, whatever Votes might be cut down, there would be no attempt to effect economy in that Department of the Public Expenditure. Then, in addition, they had had the Egyptian Expenditure, which already amounted to something like £4,000,000, and would probably amount to a good many millions more. But hon. Members opposite should be the last persons to cry out against the Egyptian Expenditure; for they had—and certainly nobody more eloquently than the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex—all along called upon the Government to put down its foot firmly, and proceed to decisive measures. [Cheers from the Opposition.] He had anticipated those cheers. And if the Government were to proceed to measures of annexation, protection, or something more, the present Expenditure would be a mere bagatelle compared with what the country would be involved in when these disastrous steps were undertaken. Under these circumstances, he thought the explanation of the increase in the present Expenditure was clear. The causes could be traced, and if the House chose to arrest the cause it knew exactly the springs it ought to touch. He was not disposed to argue with his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) as to the best mode of meeting the Expenditure. He did not know what else the Government could do, except to put the additional Expenditure upon the Income Tax. After all, he rather agreed with the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex that those who called for and advocated a policy of warlike expeditions should pay the piper. As a Representative of a large constituency, who had to earn its daily bread by its daily toil, he should have felt strongly inclined to oppose any attempt to increase the duty on tea, or on any other article of daily consumption. The House of Commons and the country had sanctioned this Expenditure in Egypt on behalf of General Gordon, and would have held any Ministry to blame who had refused to send out an Expedition, however much they might differ as to the policy of sending General Gordon out in the first instance. When the great question as to economy came before the House again, he should only be too happy to do what little there was in his power to support the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex, or hon. Gentlemen who sat around him, in proposing a reduction of the National Expenditure. He was sorry to see that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), in one of the addresses he had made during the Recess, had indulged in some somewhat satirical remarks at the expense of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) and himself (Mr. H. H. Fowler), accusing them of being ready to run away whenever any proposition was made for a real Committee to inquire into this question of the National Expenditure. He (Mr. H. H. Fowler) could assure the right hon. Baronet that he was labouring entirely under a mistake. He was deeply disappointed that the Government had not appointed a Committee. He had understood that a Committee was promised by the Prime Minister 12 months ago; and if nothing was done in that direction at the commencement of next Session, he should endeavour to take the sense of the House upon the question. He held that they would never get any effective system of control over the National Expenditure until they adopted the principle of devolution. He believed that if three Standing Committees were appointed—one to deal with the Army Estimates, another with the Navy Estimates, and a third with the Civil Service Estimates—and that if those Committees had the Estimates before them at the commencement of the Session in the same way that Bills were now referred to Grand Committees, the House would be saved a great waste of time in Committee of Supply, and a considerable amount of labour which, as a rule, produced very trifling and unsatisfactory results.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I have listened, as the Committee always does, with great interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler); and he may be certain that this side of the House would receive, in a cordial spirit, any proposals he may make that would tend to the simplification of the Business of the House, or the promotion of economy in the Public Service. I own that, for my own part, I am most anxious that there should be a most careful investigation into the Expenditure of the country; but, on the other hand, I should deprecate, in the strongest manner, any devolution of the responsibility of the Treasury, with whom it rests, to propose to Parliament economical Estimates, for which the Government alone are responsible. If the House were to take into its own hands the supervision of the Estimates of every Public Department, there might be a tendency on the part of the Department to go behind the Treasury to the Committee, and to set the Treasury, in some respects, at defiance in regard to its proposals and recommendations, throwing on the Committee, with the comparatively insufficient information in its possession, the responsibility of deciding what the Expenditure shall be. Therefore, while I concur with the hon. Gentleman that something should be done on the responsibility of the Government, with a view of checking the vast growth of Expenditure which has taken place during the past few years, still I trust the House will take no steps whatever to relieve the Treasury of its proper and Constitutional responsibility. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) drew attention to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated his surplus this year at £106,000; and he then went on to show that there had been Supplementary Estimates for the Expeditions to the Soudan and Beshuanaland amounting to £2,349,000, leaving an apparent deficit of £2,243,000, which requires to be provided for. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that he anticipates that there will be some growth of the Public Revenue to meet a portion of this Expenditure; but the right hon. Gentleman did not indicate how much. Assuming it to be £250,000, I am sure we shall be extremely glad to get a growth of public income to the extent of £250,000. But he then provides, by imposing an additional Income Tax of 1*d.* in the pound, for a gross receipt of £1,920,000; but from that tax of 1*d.* only £1,200,000 will be received during the financial year. The result, in the face of the account, will be a deficiency of £1,000,000, unless there is that growth of income which the Chancellor of the Exchequer expects. But, even if there is that growth of £250,000, there will still remain a sum of £750,000 which will have to be paid out of the balances, and which will not be contributed by the 1*d.* of Income Tax received during the present year; and £750,000 will go to the help of next year's Revenue, and not towards this year's Expenditure or this year's Debts. The result will be that the £750,000, or £1,000,000—whichever you may please to call it—will be expended out of the sum which would otherwise go towards the reduction of the National Debt. Therefore, the Chancellor of the Exchequer departs from the understanding entered into by the Prime Minister, to pay the Expenditure of the year out of the taxation of the year, and he reduces the amount which would otherwise be applied to the reduction of the National Debt by £750,000. I think I am correct in my assumption that he suggests the amount will be made good from the surplus of the Income Tax which will come into next year's account. The right hon. Gentleman knows very well that every year is dealt with by itself, and it can hardly be expected that he will estimate for a surplus of £750,000 to pay off the National Debt which may be accumulated in the course of the present year. There is one other point to which I wish to refer. There is an expectation that some proposals may be made to Parliament in regard to the condition of the Navy, and no provision is made in this Estimate for those proposals. I am not one of those who desire that a large or a panic Expenditure should be made in respect of any part of the Public Service; but I think it necessary, in the interests of the country, that some expenditure upon the Navy should be provided for now, and that such provision should not be postponed until next year, the provision including the acceleration of the construction of ships, the supply of torpedo vessels, and other important matters. I have no desire to anticipate the discussion which we are promised next Monday; but I wish to point out that we are not making financial provision for all the deficiencies which are in sight during the Session, but that we are ignoring a subject upon which I feel convinced the country feels very warmly and very deeply, and for which there is an absolute necessity to make some provision. I honestly feel that, as completely as there is a necessity for making a provision for fire-engines or fire-escapes, there is this necessity for further provision at this moment; and I think it would be most insane on the part of any Government to postpone making that provision for another three or four months, in the hope that the danger which may be apprehended may be put off for an equal period of which we have no knowledge and no forecast. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will make it quite clear whether I am right or wrong in the assumption that there is a deficiency of £750,000 on the face of the account, which will have to be paid out of the balances.

MR. GLADSTONE: I only propose to detain the Committee for a few minutes. I have no intention of interfering with the functions of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon this occasion; but I left the House just now, and on my return I found the noble Lord opposite (Lord George Hamilton) engaged, as is his manner, in a lively and vigorous attack upon myself. As upon this occasion it is not desirable to enter into these questions at any length; and as I wish to take upon myself the whole responsibility of some doctrines which the noble Lord has charged upon me, and which he considers formidable, but which I regard in the contrary light, I feel bound to make a few observations in reply to his speech. There is a slight difference between us—a difference which I am afraid is not likely to be reconciled. Still, there is one point with regard to which I should like to make a modification, which I will explain in a few moments. I am not quite sure whether the noble Lord intends to say that whenever an Act of Parliament has been passed which provides that certain sums shall be paid out of the Consolidated Fund for the year for the reduction of the National Debt, the payment of that money for the purpose for which it is required by law ought to be set down to the credit of those who passed the Act requiring it to be made. [Lord GEORGE HAMILTON: No.] Very good. I am quite right in that. In my opinion it is those who find the money for paying the National Debt who ought to have the credit of paying it, and not those who merely write upon paper, in an Act of Parliament, an enactment stating that such things shall be done. But then the noble Lord contended that I had committed an error in taking credit for the entire reduction of the capital of the Debt in the four years of the present Government, because he said that of the sum which was paid on account of Terminable Annuities, a small amount went to interest in the four years of the late Government, and a larger amount to the capital of the Debt. Upon that subject I differ in principle from the noble Lord; and I hold, and I am prepared to argue at length, if it should become necessary for me to do so, that every Government is entitled to take credit for the amount of the reduction of the capital of the Debt which is effected during the time of their tenure of Office. I hold that to be quite indisputable. I believe that I should gain by the adoption of the opposite doctrine, for this reason—that the proportion of capital Debt paid off under the form of Terminable Annuities is smallest at the commencement of the operation. Now, Sir, I have myself been a great founder of Terminable Annuities; and that being so, if I were to adopt the rule of the noble

Lord, and to go back to all the time when I have been most directly responsible for the finance of the country, and to bring the account down to the present time, I should profit considerably by the adoption of it. But I do not admit that rule. I hold that the operations of a Government on the reduction of Debt are not to be measured by the amount it pays for interest, which merely satisfies the claim of the stockholder, but are to be measured exclusively by the reduction effected upon the capital. There is another question upon which the noble Lord touched. The noble Lord appeared to think that I was quite wrong to proceed as I did—that is, having, first of all, set up the gross Expenditure of the country, then to proceed to deduct the cost of collection. I will tell the noble Lord what I think upon that matter. Had I been dealing with the Budget in the House of Commons, when it would either have been expedient, proper, or practicable to enter into a great multitude of minute details, I should not have denied that by looking to the cost of collection you may trace, to a certain extent, the result of economical or lax administration, and, therefore, to some limited extent, I am prepared to admit that that observation of the noble Lord is just. It may be said that one Government would have saved £200,000 in cost of collection which the other Government had not saved. That is a very small matter, and a thing which is quite right to be set out in a minute and careful exposition, such as may be made in this House when the question at large is under discussion; but it is absurd to introduce such matters, and perfectly impossible to make them intelligible in a statement which must be given summarily and in a few figures to an audience in the country. It is quite true the noble Lord may say that you would have realized a larger profit from the Post Office if no great changes had been introduced into the administration of that Department under the present Government. I think that is true, and some small sums might be put down to the credit of the Government, when I come to a comparison of Expenditure; but then I am bound to say that, if I am to do that, I must look to many other matters for which I have not taken credit. I must look at the automatic growth of these Votes, and especially those charged upon us by our Predecessors; and I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that if I give the late Government credit for not having spent that money, I must also say that they would not have given the public that accommodation which they now enjoy—such as the Parcel Post, and divers other changes which the present Government have effected. If I should give the late Government credit for £200,000 on that account, and then take to ourselves credit for the automatic growth of certain Votes, all of which we owe to the late Government, we should be very considerably the gainers by the transaction. I think it is quite clear that, in point of principle, for purposes of just comparison of Expenditure, the cost of collection ought to be deducted. Speaking generally, we divide the cost of collection in this way. The Customs Department and the Inland Revenue Department incur a certain amount of the cost of collection, which does not vary very greatly; and I believe that both of those Departments—particularly the Inland Revenue—have been conducted with special regard to economy. The cost, however, does not vary very largely from year to year. But when you look at the combined business of the Post Office, the Telegraph, and the Parcel Post, that is a vast undertaking, the business of which is constantly augmenting, and in which the working Expenditure forms a very large proportion of the whole cost; and to leave all that out in calculating the gross Expenditure of the Department, and then to make your comparison, would be nothing less than absolutely ridiculous. What I have said elsewhere upon this subject is perfectly just, and I am prepared to abide by the consequences of it. I am prepared to abide by what I said, which was this—I admitted that, at first sight, on the gross Expenditure, there was an apparent balance of, I believe, £13,000,000 against us on the four years; and I ended by showing that, upon the real Expenditure, there was a balance to our credit of between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000. But I did not stop at that point—I stopped there for a moment because I had said all that was matter of fact. But then I went on to say that, with regard to our Expenditure, we must take into view questions in which we had had to meet charges entailed upon us, as we conceived, by the policy of our Predecessors. First, I took the payment of £4,750,000 which we had made on account of the Afghan War; and that, added to the other £4,750,000 already brought up, will make £9,500,000. But I went a great deal beyond that, and I did not scruple to go a great deal beyond that; and in every place, here and elsewhere, as long as I have the faculty of speech, and the duty of speech, I shall contend that the whole of our War Charges are due entirely to the policy of the late Government. The whole of the War Charges connected with the Transvaal, and the whole of the War Charges connected with Egypt, are due to our Predecessors. [Laughter.] The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) is a profound student of these matters. I do not dispute his right to laugh in my face at the most serious conclusion I pronounce. That method of argument he is perfectly welcome to continue, as far as I am concerned; but, at the same time, do not let him think it too great a presumption on my part if I place my opinion against his; or if, honestly, I tell him, as I think I may, that on the whole, if not quite, I am nearly as capable of forming an opinion upon this subject as he is. I am aware that the hon. Gentleman has explained what his opinion was; but still I cannot withdraw altogether the opinion which I expressed last year, and which I express now. I was glad to hear the speech of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), which I thought was a perfectly consistent speech. One point he referred to was of a practical nature—that which concerned the appointment of Financial Committees—respecting which I believe he said he intended to make a Motion, which I admit he will be quite right in making. He will understand that the pledge we gave was a prospective pledge, relating to the commencement of next Session. My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) laid down certain doctrines; in the first place, about the National Debt. Does he consider the scope of those doctrines? They are utterly opposed to any paying off of the National Debt whatever. What he says is, that we are paying 3 per cent for our money, and that many men who are engaged in commercial transactions are paying 10 per cent. Does my hon. Friend consider how far this doctrine goes? If it is cruel to take money to pay off the Debt, because we take the money from men who are paying 10 per cent, and are only relieving the State of 3 per cent, he ought to go farther still. If there is anything in the argument of my hon. Friend, it is an argument to show that the making of the National Debt is the most economical arrangement possible. Does he mean that the Debt ought to be increased, or does he mean that it ought to remain stationary? If he means that it ought to remain stationary, how does he stop the application of his own argument? How does he answer those who think that it ought to be increased? If, instead of voting £10,000,000 for the Navy, we borrowed it, we should raise it at 3 per cent; whereas, if we raised it by taxation, we should be taking the money from men who are paying for it 10 per cent. Well, then, my hon. Friend argued strongly for economy, and said that he felt he had no part of the responsibility for these increased charges. I thought he used a phrase which is not altogether gracious when he spoke of "financial hypocrisy." God forbid that I should apply it to anybody. If applied at all, it should be applied to people whose language and actions are in contradiction, and I am not sure that my hon. Friend was quite clear on that point. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has had a very heavy charge to meet for Egypt and the Soudan, which will come near to £7,000,000. I think I remember a speech of the hon. Member for Burnley, which, instead of being conceived in the spirit of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson)—who I perfectly admit has a right to come down upon us, and to say what he thinks on this matter—recommended and advised a war policy. My hon. Friend must really take his choice; he cannot have the luxury of making speeches of that class, and at the same time the luxury of protesting against the increased Expenditure.

MR. RYLANDS: Allow me to remind the right hon. Gentleman that from this place in the House I denounced as strongly as possible the bombardment of Alexandria; but I subsequently stated that, the Government having committed themselves to that act, I thought it necessary that they should take such a decided policy as would allow everyone to understand what that policy was.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am perfectly ready to argue with my hon. Friend with reference to the bombardment of Alexandria, and to ask him what he would have done at that time; but that does not help my hon. Friend to the slightest extent, because it is since then that he said that a decided policy should be adopted; and, if so, why does he now make objection to the cost of it? He says now, I confess, that a decided policy ought to be adopted; but we all know what is the effect of language like that. Surely he cannot, with consistency, complain of an addition to the Income Tax, for the cost which is the necessary result of that policy. Well, Sir, my hon. Friend is strongly in favour of economy in the Dockyards. I hope he will be able to effect it. We entirely agree with him. My hon. Friend, however, slipped in a very awkward phrase, from his point of view, when he said we wanted more ships. Will my hon. Friend undertake to build us more ships out of the economies which he is to effect in the Dockyards? If he will undertake to say that, then he is perfectly right in protesting against this increased Income Tax, in casting blame upon the Government, and even in talking of financial hypocrisy. Well, Sir, the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) also finds fault with the increased Expenditure, and yet he and his Party on every occasion when increase of Expenditure is in question urge on that increase of Expenditure. There has been no increase of Establishments which has taken place that has not been strongly supported by those who sit about the noble Lord, and which I expect will be further strongly supported before a week or a fortnight is over. Now the noble Lord asks, "What is the policy which entails this vast Expenditure?" I will tell the noble Lord. It consists mainly of two propositions. One of them is, that of creating no new cause of quarrel except in deference to some imperative claim of interest or honour. That proposition, Sir, is the rule upon which we have acted without deviation from the time of our assuming the reins of Government, and we have created no new cause of quarrel whatever with any Power or person. We have not had the grand conception with which those who preceded us were either blessed or plagued. We have been content to be as abstinent and as quiet as we could, and we have constantly been censured by opponents for having adopted a policy of non-interference, and for having caused the influence of this country no longer to be felt in war, and for disclaiming all the grand and high-sounding sentences as to ascendancy in the Councils of Europe. The other principle on which we have acted is this, to keep the strictest faith in the execution of obligations from the policy of which obligations we entirely dissent. That is the history of our proceedings in South Africa and in Egypt. Those are the two countries in which the great and most unhappy military charges of the present Government have been incurred. But everything that we have had to lay out with regard to Zululand, Bechuanaland, and the Transvaal grew unhappily out of that ill-omened and most dishonourable annexation of the Transvaal by the late Government—an annexation effected in spite of the protest of more, I think, than nine-tenths of the people, when the pledge had been given that the country should not be annexed, except in conformity with their view. What are we doing in Bechuanaland now? We gave certain pledges to certain Chiefs, and how came those pledges to be given? Simply, in connection with the hostile relations established in the Transvaal. Of course, it is competent to hon. Gentlemen opposite to say—"It is not our proceedings, it is your mismanagement." [Laughter.] I do not complain of that language, and I say it is a matter of opinion between us, and our contention is not to be met by scornful laughter, a weapon which, I must say, is too much growing into use, and with respect to which those who are specially responsible set the worst example. Sir, on this question, I should speak for myself, for probably no man's conscience can be lighter on the Question of Egypt than my own, because I told hon. Gentlemen opposite in 1876—eight years ago—what would come of their first intervention, of the first attempt to bring the Government into the management of Egyptian affairs. They listened for two years, and they soon afterwards went out of Office. Then came the double engagement to keep the Khedive on the Throne, and to work in exclusive connection with France. Then began an inextricable

ins which cannot be
n. not a step that we taken which has not been the y consequence of that—I do guilty, for I believe it was nded—but that most unhappy fortunate proceeding. Although ve heard plenty of objection taken he policy of the Government, no Gentleman opposite has shown us alternative policy. How were we escape from the position in which we were bound to support, so long as he did not misbehave himself, a particular person on a Foreign Throne, and to support that person in conjunction with another country, and to do nothing without the assent of that country?
That was the condition which we inherited, and out of which every item of Expenditure one by one arose; and we are told now, forsooth, that we are responsible for the tens of thousands of lives which have been lost; that we are responsible for the war in the Soudan!
Why, when you had control, did you not settle the question of the Soudan? ["It was not alive."] Not alive! Why, the Soudan had been in revolt almost continuously; it had only been kept down by foreign arms from the time of the first and most unhappy effort to occupy it. Well, Sir, the noble Lord, who thinks he makes a strong point of it, says—"You are responsible for the 40,000 or 50,000 lives lost." Why, it would be far more rational if I were to tell him that his Government were responsible for the hundreds of thousands of lives lost in the Russo-Turkish War.
[Laughter.] The noble Lord laughs
now. I did not laugh when the noble Lord made the statement I have just referred to. I received it with an amount of respect which I think was far greater than it deserved. I never attempted to make the late Government responsible for the hundreds of thousands of lives which were lost in the Russo-Turkish War. But I say, without the slightest hesitation, that, in my opinion, a rational policy—and I have pointed to that policy long ago—would have prevented the loss of every one of those lives. That, Sir, is the state of the case as regards the Russo-Turkish War. We have had terrible engagements entailed upon us.
We shall leave behind us, if we retire from Office, sad engagements. We have had frightful difficulties to contend with, from which in several quarters we have extricated the country. We found, in the Treaty of Berlin, alive and burning, two questions relating to Greece and Montenegro, either of which might have involved Europe in another mighty conflagration. Both those questions were settled without the shedding of one drop of blood. We found 50,000 or 70,000 men necessary in Afghanistan to oppose a gallant people, although imperfectly civilized, trodden down by the iron heel of military power. That war was perhaps as remarkable for guilt and folly as is recorded in any part of history. Afghanistan became free. Afghanistan is again friendly, so far as the memory of recent wrongs can be effaced by efforts to do right; and the 40,000 men whom India had to find for the performance of that odious task have returned from that country to the North-West Frontier. I admit that from South Africa we have not been able to extricate ourselves. South Africa, in my recollection, has always been a standing difficulty. I am sorry that I have been obliged to make this statement. The noble Lord has compelled me to do so; I could not sit here and receive his charge with respect to the 50,000 lives, for which he said, in his mild and moderate language, we are responsible in consequence of our perpetual vacillation, by which these lives have been sacrificed and our honour lowered. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes; our honour has been lowered since you annexed the Transvaal against its will. Our honour is lowered since you drove the friendly Ruler of Afghanistan into the grave, and went into that country without cause and without justification, and inflicted upon the country all those miseries of war of which we read the harrowing details. Why, if you had been treated with that severity with which you treated us, what would you have said?

We never took the dreadful case of the murder of Cavagnari in that spirit; I am not aware that any Gentleman in this House charged that upon the late Government. What would have been said to us, if such a treacherous thing had happened in our time? No, Sir, we have endeavoured to struggle with the difficulties with which we were confronted. I am now going to make an observation that will, I think, be admitted, so far as it goes, to be true on both sides of the House. My observation is, that during the last 10 years the foreign policy of this country has presented a much more disturbed aspect than the policy of the 10 years that preceded it. It is quite true that if we were to quit Office we should hand over difficult and complex questions of policy to our Successors; but I trust that we should receive a just and equitable consideration from them. But it is also true, in our judgment, that we had handed over to us a set of such questions as was never handed over by one Government to another. We may pass over to our Successors a painful inheritance. We received a painful inheritance. But has it always been the case that every outgoing Administration has given to its Successors a legacy of difficulty and despair, as now seems to be the case? No, Sir. In 1874, when the late Government came into Office, the Foreign Secretary of that Government declared that in every portion of the world the foreign relations of this country were thoroughly satisfactory. Not a single difficulty of any kind had been passed over by us to those who were our Successors. The present occasion only admits of broad and general statements in answer to the broad and general statements which have been made against the Government. I am ready to fortify and defend those statements at every point and on every fair occasion, and I am perfectly convinced that the nation will do justice to us under the difficulties with which we have had to contend and the efforts we have made to overcome them.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, we have been, I must say, rather surprised with a considerable portion of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. I do not deny that he is quite within his right in following up some observations of my noble Friend (Lord George Hamilton), and upon them hanging a general discussion on the whole foreign policy of the present Government and its Predecessors. But I am bound to say that I think the Committee has rather been led away from the immediate questions submitted to us, and from the points of my noble Friend's speech. At the same time, it is impossible for me entirely to pass over some observations of the right hon. Gentleman in the concluding portion of his speech. He has again, and in a very marked manner, repeated the charge which he has so often brought against his Predecessors, and the excuse that all that has gone wrong is to be attributed to some action on the part of the late Government. Now, it is a very remarkable thing that we have never had the benefit of that kind of argument applied to ourselves. I was reminded by my noble Friend near me of a possible parallel in the case of the Abyssinian Expedition. There is nothing on which the right hon. Gentleman is so fond of twitting the late Lord Derby's Administration with as the Abyssinian Expedition. It is all put down to us; and yet, according to the method of the right hon. Gentleman, every shilling expended in that Expedition—I was going to say every life that was lost, but there was no life lost—every shilling was due entirely, not to our action but to that of Lord John Russell, who never answered the letter of the King of Abyssinia, and thereby made the Expedition necessary. That is exactly as good an answer and as good a case as many of those which the right hon. Gentleman is so fond of putting forward. But there is something rather remarkable in the way in which the right hon. Gentleman deals with these questions, and goes back to the root of the evil. If he would go back to the very beginning of all things in every case, there would be something in it; but in this, as in all cases, he selects a convenient point from which to start. I entirely deny the propriety of his charging us with all the consequences of our relations with Egypt, and all the war and all the misery that has been occasioned within the last few years. Let us for a moment grant his method of argument. He says all the difficulty arose from our opening certain relations with Egypt; but he does not take his start from the beginning of our relations with Egypt, when he says he warned us as to the result of the connection which subsisted between us and some of the financial arrangements in that country. No; because Lord Derby was then in Office—but he chooses the period at which Lord Derby left Office, and takes an act when Lord Salisbury was at the Foreign Office, and founds upon it his accusations against us. I object to his taking these things in assuming that the whole of the Government is from the acts of their Predecessors. The acts of their Predecessors do not flow from the earlier acts which are those of Lord Derby, but come from the original sin and mischief of Lord Salisbury, and from that has come all the sins of Lord Beaconsfield's later years and all the misery and mismanagement of the present Government. That, I think, is one of the most extraordinary assumptions to make upon the credulity of the House of Commons that it is possible to conceive. He turns upon us, and he says—"You took a certain line with regard to the Dual Control, and in consequence of that it became necessary for us to go step by step into the bombardment of the Alexandrian forts, into the battle of Tel-el-Kebir, into all the putting down of Arabi and his men, and into the further proceedings we have had to take with regard to the troubles in the Soudan and so forth; all these things came from your misconduct in having signed a Paper in which there was a certain provision for what is called the Dual Control." Why really, Sir, that is mocking the common sense of the House. You ask what we would have done on this point or on that. There are many points on which we should have taken a line which would, as we believe, have entirely prevented and stopped all this mischief and trouble. I take the familiar case of the Soudan, and I think if you had taken a reasonable and common-sense line when Hicks Pasha was going into the Soudan, if you had then said you would either support or prohibit that Expedition, none of these difficulties with which we are now beset would have occurred. "But" says the right hon. Gentleman, "that has nothing to do with it; it was Lord Salisbury having agreed to the Dual Control that was the cause of Hicks Pasha being killed, and the cause of Gordon going out, and the cause of this Expedition up the Nile."

MR. GLADSTONE: I never said it was the cause of Hicks Pasha being killed, or in any way made the late Government responsible for that disaster.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I thought that was part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech—that it was intended to be immediately relevant to the question before us, which is the supply of funds for the Expedition up the Nile, and which is directly connected with the operations in the Soudan. But I do not desire to go at full length into all these questions; all I say is that, if we are to discuss them as questions of the foreign policy of the Government, the right hon. Gentleman will find that he cannot maintain, and that no one will support him in maintaining, the doctrine he so constantly endeavours to establish—that everything is due to the actions of his Predecessors. Now, with regard to the Transvaal. We may have been right, or we may not have been right, in the action we took in respect to the annexation of the Transvaal; but, certainly, many hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House, who are great authorities on this subject, found no fault with what was done by us, but, on the contrary, they approved of what was done by us. [AN HON. MEMBER: Lord Kimberley!] Yes; Lord Kimberley and others, Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone). But whether that was so or not, I maintain that the Government, when they had to deal with the question, had before them two courses, either of which they might have taken; they might have maintained the act of their Predecessors, or they might have reversed it. They did neither the one, nor the other. If they had at once reversed it, if they had said—"This thing is so shocking, so bad, that our consciences will not tolerate it," they could, without the slightest sully of the British honour, have retired from the Transvaal; they could have made whatever terms they pleased with the Transvaal Government and have retired, with the conviction that they had done nothing to lower the honour and prestige of England. They might, on the other hand, have maintained the position; that they could have done—and they themselves have often told us—they could have put down the resistance of the Boers, by sending a very small amount of force. But they did neither the one, nor the other. They did not give back the Transvaal; they endeavoured to enforce the annexation; they brought about fighting and bloodshed, and then they gave way in a manner which lowered fatally our position in the country, and when we were obliged by the commonest feelings of honour to make stipulations for the protection of certain of the Native races and of our Native allies, the effect of those stipulations was destroyed by the manner in which the Government had previously acted. You have no right to come down here and say all this is due to our action. It was not to our action, but it was to your action it was due. [An hon. MEMBER: Inaction.] Well, action or inaction, whichever you please; it was due to a bit of both. It was due to action, not deliberately, or carefully, or well-prepared, but action which was taken up as it were from hand-to-mouth, and which turns out much more expensive and wretched in the end. That is a point to be borne in mind in reference to the matter for which we are now providing the funds. Are we really assured that sufficient provision has been made? Are we satisfied that the expenditure which we are called upon to incur, and much of which, I believe, might have been avoided even later in the proceedings by a more distinct military policy—that is a point I will not now go into—but are we assured that we are taking enough for this Expedition, or shall we not find that we have again and again to come to Parliament for fresh supplies in this matter? Sir, I have ventured to make these few remarks upon a point to which the right hon. Gentleman leads us in the course of his very eloquent but rather discursive speech. There are several other matters upon which I am tempted to say a few words, and I trust I may be allowed to say them, though they are of a less general character—they have reference to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman in answer to the observations of my noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), and I do not think the right hon. Gentleman understood the point which my noble Friend, as I comprehended him, was making. What my noble Friend said was this—"If you are to compare the Expenditure of one Government with the Expenditure of another Government, if you are to say this Government has spent more or less than its Predecessor, you must consider what method or course you ought to adopt in order to bring about a fair comparison." And my noble Friend added that the comparison which the Prime Minister drew, in a speech he made recently in Edinburgh, upon this subject was an unfair comparison, because in the course of that comparison he deducted what he had no right to deduct. The question is, that one Government had spent so much upon the Army, Navy, Civil Services, and other sources of Expenditure, and the other Government had spent so much more. "Then," says the right hon. Gentleman, "you must deduct from the Expenditure on the part of my Government what has gone in the way of reduction of Debt; you must not deduct what we have paid in the reduction of Debt, but you must debit the amount of Debt we have got rid of," very much as you might say, when you are comparing the Navy Estimates, you must not ask how many millions one Government spent on the Navy, and how many millions the other Government spent upon the same Service, but you may deduct from the Expenditure of one Government the greater value of the ships you have obtained than the other Government obtained. It may be very proper, if you are comparing the best method of paying off Debt, to say you will have it paid off by Terminable Annuities or by redeeming so much from year to year. That is a fair question to argue, and you may be in a position to say you make out a case for better finance by adopting one or the other system. But if you are to compare Expenditure, you may set aside what you have paid for expenditure upon the Debt, and you may very fairly compare the amounts which are applied to the redemption of Debt; but if you apply those amounts to one system it will answer your purpose for your comparison, but if you apply them to another system it will not. If you apply £2,000,000, let us say, in setting up Terminable Annuities and in reducing Debt, the interest in the first years becoming less and less, and the principal in the first years becoming more and more—if you apply £2,000,000 a-year in that way, that is an expenditure of £2,000,000 a-year. You produce a certain result by it. Suppose, on the other hand, we take the system of applying £2,000,000 out of the Exchequer, without setting up Terminable Annuities, for the redemption of Debt to the amount of £2,000,000 a-year, you expend precisely the same in each year upon the Debt. It may be a question whether the one system is better than the other; but you have no right to deduct from your Expenditure that which is not the money you have spent in paying Debt, but the money you have gained by paying Debt. This may be a very academical discussion; but my noble Friend points his moral in a very important and significant way—and here I invite the attention of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler). My noble Friend says that if it has to be placed to the credit of a Government that it has redeemed a certain quantity of Debt, and that that is to be an excuse and a reason for its increased Expenditure, then it will follow that a Government which spends more and more upon the Army, Navy, Civil Services, or anything else, may get off without any blame on that account, because, at the same time, it has been redeeming a large amount of Debt. Is it to be argued that a Government's Expenditure is not to be reckoned as large as it really is because this fictitious sum by which it has reduced Debt is to be deducted by it? The right hon. Gentleman has, to a certain extent, explained or more fully stated what he intended upon another question which I will advert to. I only wish he had done so in Mid Lothian, to the people whom he was addressing, because they, no doubt, went away impressed with the rough statement he made. He says it was not possible for him to go into detail.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. With regard to the Debt, I might have added some explanation on the question of the collection of Revenue. I did not enter into that; but if I had, I should have put down some items to our credit on the other side.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: With regard to the collection of Revenue, the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly at liberty to put down any items that he pleases, and to claim credit for them in a general view of his finance; but when he compares Expenditure with Expenditure, he ought to compare Expenditure with Expenditure; and we complain that that is not what he did do. There is no doubt it is monstrously unfair and unjust to shut out altogether the collection of the Revenue as an expenditure not belonging to the Expenditure of the Government. It may be that the expenses of collection are small sums when compared with the millions we are talking of; but there is no man knows better, or has preached more warmly, than the right hon. Gentleman himself that the small sums are the important ones to look to in the general administration of finance. It is exactly upon such matters as the collection of Revenue that you have an opportunity of making small economies, and of taking care that what you spend is spent properly and as economically as possible. The right hon. Gentleman knows quite well that, in many of these cases, it is not merely the expenditure on the Parcel Post or anything of that sort, but it is the expenditure on the Services—the salaries of those employed, for instance—which come into consideration. Let him remember that there is one charge for the collection which does vary according to the amount of Revenue, and that is the charge for the collection of the Income Tax. If you have a high Income Tax, your expenditure on collection will be large, because the higher the amount to be collected the larger the percentage amounts to. But, then, all that brings you back to the question how far that is due to the policy of the Government? How came you to have this large charge in Income Tax? How came you to bring about this larger charge for collection? These are all matters which cannot be satisfactorily dealt with in the rough; and if we are really to go into a comparison of these matters, I say we ought to have that Committee of which we are continually hearing, but which we are never encouraged to see. I think this matter could be very fairly considered by a Committee. Certainly, I should be quite prepared to go into the Committee, with a view of arguing fairly the question of these different kinds of expenditure, and of arguing the question to which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton refers—namely, the system of advances to meet local charges. I do not remember whether there was anything else in my noble Friend's speech upon which I need comment. I had intended to rise to make the observations I have made upon these two points—the collection of the Revenue, and the method of dealing with the Debt; but I was led further afield by the latter part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. I must say that that speech did not impress me with the conviction that the right hon. Gentleman was satisfied with the whole course of the policy of his Government in these matters. I thought there was a good deal more of the French proverb, "That a man who excuses himself, accuses himself," than was altogether comfortable to the right hon. Gentleman. There was no occasion to have gone so fully into the matter, and I do not wish now to raise any question with regard to the actual expenditure which is now proposed. It was a matter of necessity for the honour of the country that steps should be taken to rescue General Gordon. How General Gordon has got into the position in which he now finds himself, and how the Government have contracted obligations to him, are matters which will have to be very seriously answered by the Government. No matter what the answer is, it leaves the duty of the country as regards the provision that is to be made for General Gordon's rescue absolutely untouched. Therefore, I have no difficulty to raise in voting the funds which may be necessary, though I do feel the very great disadvantage of being asked to make a Vote of the character that is now asked for by the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Childers)—breaking in through all the arrangements of the year at this inconvenient time, and at a time when I am afraid there is a great deal of distress in the country—breaking in with an irregular Budget, and making this demand upon the income of the country.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that, as the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) had specially referred to him, he should just like to say that he adhered to his previous statements, though it was unnecessary for him to defend them at length, because the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had so ably done it. He (Sir John Lubbock) regretted, as much as he possibly could, the large increases which had taken place in our National Expenditure; but he would like to remind the Committee when those increases began. For several years, up to 1874—the year of the accession to Office of the Conservative Government—there were but very small increases in our National Expenditure. They could hardly expect that there should be no increase; because, of course, there were certain automatic increases like that on Education, which he was sure none of them regretted. But the great and remarkable increases in our National Expenditure began in 1874, and rose in the five years, from 1875 to 1880, by no less than £10,000,000. The nominal increase of Expenditure had in the gross in the last four years been £13,000,000. But, during the latter period, £5,000,000 more had been appropriated towards the repayment of Debt, and £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 had been increased expenditure on the Post Office, with reference to which he should say a word or two by-and-bye. There had also been a very considerable Grant in Aid, amounting in the four years to more than £3,000,000, for National Education. The present Government had paid £7,000,000 for the War Expenditure of their Predecessors. As far as he could make out, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) and his supporters incurred a War Expenditure of £12,000,000, of which they only paid £4,000,000; while the present Government had incurred a War Expenditure of £6,000,000, but they had paid off £13,000,000 of War Expenditure. That, also, had to be taken into consideration, when they were comparing the Expenditure of the two Governments. The right hon. Baronet who had just sat down referred at some length to the items for the collection of Revenue. But the main increase which had taken place there had been on the head of the Post Office. If they compared the year 1880 with last year, the increase was from £3,800,000 to £4,500,000, which was an increase of £700,000. But, then, what had been the difference in the receipts? The receipts, which were, in 1880, £6,300,000, had increased to £7,700,000, and, therefore, although there had been an increase of expenditure on the part of the Post Office of £700,000, there had been an increase of revenue under the same head of very nearly double that amount. If they compared the cost of collection of the Customs and Inland Revenue, they found there had been a very slight increase, and, in some years, even a decrease, under that head. As so much had turned this evening upon the question of economy, perhaps it would be well to take the last year of the Conservative Government, and contrast it with the year 1884. They would find that, in 1884, the real Expenditure of the country had been almost exactly what it was in the last year of the Conservative Administration; but when they came to look into the different items, there was a very considerable difference. In 1880, the cost of collection was £2,700,000; but, so far from there being, in 1884, the increase which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to imagine, the cost had actually diminished to £2,679,000, so that there had been a certain economy. Well, then, under the head of Education the expenditure in 1880 was £3,400,000, and in 1884, £4,000,000. That was an increase of £600,000; but it was an increase which neither side of the House would complain of. Furthermore, the Grants in Aid were, in 1880, £4,980,000, and in 1884, £5,600,000, showing, under that head, an increase, which he deplored as much as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton did, and for which hon. Members opposite were mainly responsible, of upwards of £600,000. But, of course, whether they regretted it or not, that was not really an addition to the Expenditure of the country, but an amount provided for in one way instead of in another. The cost of the ordinary Civil Services had increased from £5,700,000 to £6,100,000; but when the Committee remembered how much additional expense was thrown on the country under the head of Civil Services in connection with the government of Ireland, he thought they could not wonder there had been that slight increase. The charge on account of Debt was £27,350,000 in 1880, and £28,190,000 in 1884; but that, of course, they all knew was not really part of the Expenditure of the country, but a diminution of the indebtedness of the country. And, then, lastly, the net amount for the Army and Navy was £28,500,000 in 1880, and £26,800,000 in 1884, showing, the Committee would see, a very considerable decrease in 1884 over 1880. He (Sir John Lubbock) thought the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) would have done well if, instead of dealing with vague generalities, he had taken, for instance, the last year of the Conservative Administration and 1884, and shown the Committee where the present Government had been extravagant. He (Sir John Lubbock) had endeavoured to give to the Committee

the figures for those two years, and, as far as he was able to judge, he thought the Expenditure of the present Government, looked at from that point of view—and he maintained it was a right one—would contrast favourably with the Expenditure of their Predecessors, though he must confess he was disappointed that more had not been done in this respect. But, after all, this was very much a question of policy. There were two distinct questions before them that evening—one, whether the Government had been economical in their Expenditure; and, the other, whether their policy had led to unnecessary Expenditure. He, for his part, regretted, as much as any hon. Member who had spoken, the great increase of Expenditure. How had it arisen? The origin of the Egyptian policy of the Government dated from the great meeting at Willis's Rooms, attended by the Leaders of the Opposition, and having reference to the Egyptian policy of Her Majesty's Government. The Expedition to the Soudan, which he always regretted, was almost forced on Her Majesty's Government by hon. Gentlemen opposite; and it was well known that all through the Recess Members of the Opposition had been urging upon the Government to interfere actively in Bechuanaland. Deeply as he deplored the great increase of our National Expenditure, he thought that, when the country came to consider the matter, they would arrive at the conclusion that right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite were mainly responsible for the increase.

Mr. ONSLOW said, he had not intended taking part in the debate, and should not have done so had it not been for some remarks which had been made with reference to him by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone). He desired to make a personal explanation. Somehow or other, whenever anyone opposite the Treasury Bench smiled at the Prime Minister's observations, the right hon. Gentleman always came down with a fell swoop of his oratory upon his (Mr. Onslow's) unfortunate head. In spite of that, he should always smile—as he had done that night—whenever the Prime Minister said something utterly ridiculous and monstrous. With all due deference to the Chairman, he (Mr. Onslow) had never interrupted the Prime Minister. He certainly laughed; but did not think he had interrupted the right hon. Gentleman in any way.

MR. GLADSTONE: If the hon. Gentleman says that when he laughed he did not intend to interrupt me, I am quite willing to withdraw any reference I may have made to him. I certainly thought, however, that I had the best evidence of interruption on his part.

THE CHAIRMAN: Since the hon. Gentleman has referred to a ruling of mine, I must say that he made a most disorderly interruption by calling out the name "Harcourt!" across the House. He did so in such an audible manner that I was obliged to call attention to the interruption.

MR. ONSLOW said, that an hon. Gentleman behind him had called out "Harcourt! Harcourt!" and he (Mr. Onslow) had merely repeated it. He, however, was pitched upon—as was always the case—as if he was the only one smiling. He should continue, if he thought proper, to laugh at the assertions of the Prime Minister, especially when he contended that the failure of the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government, and the Expenditure it entailed, was wholly owing to the Conservative Government, which preceded him in Office. The right hon. Gentleman stated that it was partly owing to the policy of his Predecessors in regard to Afghanistan that £4,500,000 was given to India; but the policy pursued by the right hon. Gentleman in handing over that money was entirely deprecated by the Conservative Party. The policy of Her Majesty's Government had nothing to do with the Afghan War at all. The Opposition said India did not require to be paid that money, and India never asked for it; but it was the policy of the Government to give it. The policy they pursued was diametrically opposed to that recommended by the Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had only come down on them for £1,000,000 for the present financial year; but he ought to let them know before the next financial year—before the next Budget, which would probably be in March—whether the Estimate would be exceeded or not. It appeared to him (Mr. Onslow) that the present financial proposal was not for the purpose of defraying this specific Expenditure of £1,000,000; but that a 2d. Income Tax might yield a certain amount, and the Estimate of the cost of the Expedition had been framed accordingly. He believed that a great deal more than £1,000,000 had already been spent, exclusive of the £300,000 voted last August; and he therefore thought the Committee and the country had a right to know the total amount which was likely to be spent on the Nile Expedition. It might be that the money asked for the Bechuanaland Expedition had not yet been spent; but some information ought to be given as to how much would be spent by next March on this Expedition to relieve General Gordon. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) had told them that the Expedition was not only to relieve General Gordon, but to establish a settled form of Government at Khartoum; and, that being so, it was obvious that it would entail a vast amount of expenditure upon this country, irrespective of the cost of the Expedition itself. The cost of keeping our troops in the Soudan whilst a settled form of Government was established would be very great. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) was always preaching economy in Committee; but, whenever it came to a vote with the Speaker in the Chair, his vote was diametrically opposed to the opinions he had previously expressed. Though the hon. Gentleman was a great economist, and went in for economy all round, not even his capacity would be able to reduce the Expenditure which was going on at the present time. In his (Mr. Onslow's) opinion, the Expenditure of the country must go on increasing, whether it was in respect of Education, the Army, or the Navy. They would never get a reduction of Expenditure, no matter how many Committees were appointed to investigate the matter. With regard to Revenue, they never knew one year what was likely to happen the next, as a great deal depended upon the weather and the seasons. It was impossible to reckon upon the Revenue being elastic or expanding; but Expenditure must always go on increasing. He deprecated entirely the imposition of this £2,000,000 upon one class of taxpayers. It was a very easy thing for the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to raise the sum on the Income Tax; he could do it with one stroke of his pen; and it was to be hoped that when the right hon. Gentleman, or whoever might succeed him in the meantime, came forward with his Budget next March, the extra expenditure caused by what was going on now would not be put entirely upon the shoulders of one class of taxpayers in the country.

MR. WADDY said, he rose chiefly for the purpose of quoting a passage from a speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote.) Both he and the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) had stated that the principle adopted by the Prime Minister, in a speech he delivered in Edinburgh, in deducting the charges for the collection of Revenue, was "monstrously unfair." What he (Mr. Waddy) wished to do was to make a comparison between the views of the right hon. Baronet in Office, and those entertained by him out of Office. On the 20th of December, 1879, it so happened that the right hon. Baronet had to defend his own finance against an attack made upon it by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, then in Opposition. The right hon. Baronet quoted what had been said about himself, and these were his words—and he (Mr. Waddy) was anxious that the Committee should compare the statement that night about "monstrous unfairness" with what he would proceed to read. The right hon. Baronet said—

"Mr. Gladstone takes the Expenditure of the last year of his own Government and compares it with that of the published accounts of the complete year 1878-9 under the Conservative Government, and he does it in a very fair way, because he deducts on either side the cost of the charges of collecting the Revenue, and he gives a comparison of the net receipts only; and, so far, I have not a word to say against him."

That was, word for word, exactly what was said by the right hon. Baronet, on the 20th of December, 1879, at Leeds, where he was endeavouring, as far as he could, to answer the terrible onslaught that had been shortly before made on him by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone). He (Mr. Waddy) did not propose, after what had been said that night, to enter into the general question. He would not allow himself to be tempted to do so by what was said by the hon. Gentleman who last spoke (Mr. Onslow) with reference to India. He would not go into the cause of the expenditure—the shameful breach of honour by the late Government, in first imposing a large taxation on the people of India, and pledging the honour of the country that the amount raised by that taxation should be spent in famine insurance, and then taking every penny of it, and spending it in gunpowder. He would remind the Committee of this, however—that the real mischief was not accounted for by the operation of Terminable Annuities. The real mischief was caused by the piling up by the late Government, during their term of Office, of the Unfunded Debt. If anyone would take the trouble to look into the matter, that would be found to account for everything. Reference to only four or five sets of figures would show exactly what he meant. When the late Government went into Office, in 1874, they found an Unfunded Debt of £4,500,000, and a balance in the Exchequer of £7,500,000. When they left Office that Unfunded Debt, which they found at £4,500,000, had risen to £27,000,000; and the balance in the Exchequer, which they found at £7,500,000, they had reduced to £3,000,000. It was, in reality, £2,273,000, because £1,000,000 they had borrowed, to put a better look on the matter, from the Bank of England. But, giving them the benefit of their own calculation, £3,000,000 was nearly the amount they left. Now, on the other hand, whilst the late Government had increased the Unfunded Debt from £4,500,000 to £27,000,000, the present Government had reduced it from £27,000,000 to £14,000,000, and had raised the balance in the Exchequer from £3,000,000 to £5,500,000. Whilst the late Government had been paying off Terminable Annuities on the one hand, they had been piling up the Unfunded Debt to a more than proportionate extent. [Mr. Gorst: No, no!] Yes. It was impossible here, at that time, to go in detail through all the figures; but if the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gorst) would examine into the matter, he would find that the increase in the Unfunded Debt was the mischief wrought by the late Government. He (Mr. Waddy) knew very well that the Terminable Annuities were paying off Debt; but if the hon. and learned Gentleman would compare the amount automatically paid off by one Government with that paid off by the other, and then look at the amount the Unfunded Debt had been increased by each, he would find the difference accounted for. [An hon. MEMBER: The local loans!] He was reminded of the local loans. The difference there—in the interest, because the capital did not come into the account, being accounted for in another way—was about £800,000 in favour of the present Government. As to the other question raised—the question of the Post Office and the Telegraphs—he would not add one single remark to what had been already said, except to give the figures for the four years not mentioned by the noble Lord opposite (Lord George Hamilton). The Post Office and Telegraph receipts from 1877 to 1880 were £30,000,000, while for the years from 1881 to 1884 they were £35,000,000. It was true there had been an additional expenditure of £3,750,000, or nearly; but in that there had been £500,000 extra expenditure, or something of that kind, in respect of the Parcel Post, and the profit had been £1,570,000 odd. That was extremely good business; and, therefore, it was right to deduct it in the way that was so satisfactory to the right hon. Baronet in 1879, but which now he had discovered, in some way or other, to be “monstrously unfair.”

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): I think, Sir, the time has now come when I ought to answer one or two questions put to me by the various hon. Members who have spoken, and the challenge rather pointedly addressed to me. I will do so in as few words as I possibly can. The right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) asked me pointedly—and his question was repeated by the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow)—Are we asking enough provision in this Estimate? For an answer to that I would refer the Committee to the statement made by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) the other day, on the Votes for Bechuanaland and the Soudan. He then stated that he believed it might possibly be found that, as to the Soudan, we might want something more; but that, as to Bechuanaland, it was a full Estimate; and, taking the two together, he believed we had asked enough. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) made a calculation by which he arrived at £300,000 as the sum by which, according to me, the original Estimate of Revenue will be exceeded—and asked me whether I hope that the Revenue will be increased by that amount. Another hon. Member made it £250,000. Well, I decline to give an exact figure. I think there will be a moderate increase in the receipts; and if it is one-quarter per cent on the whole amount, it will be not far from the sum that the hon. Gentleman names. The noble Lord opposite (Lord George Hamilton) drew the attention of the Committee to certain figures for the purpose of comparing the Expenditure of the present Government during the past four years with the Expenditure of the late Government during the previous four years. In reply to the noble Lord, I will refer the Committee to the annual Return of the net Expenditure of the country charged on the taxes, which has been frequently declared by the Treasuries of both political Parties to afford the sound basis of comparison between different years. For this year it is No. 273 of last Session. On pages 2, 3, 4, and 5 the Return shows that the whole charge on the taxpayer between April, 1880, and March, 1884, amounted to £283,000,000; while the whole charge on the taxpayer in the four years 1876-80 amounted to £275,000,000. There was thus an increase of £8,000,000 in the years 1880-4; but that increase is explained in the following way:—We have spent £2,000,000 more on Education, £3,400,000 more in Votes in aid of Local Taxation, and £4,500,000 as a contribution to India. What we have paid off of Debt in hard money amounts to £14,000,000 more than what was paid off in the four years preceding our accession to Office. These sums come together to £23,900,000—that is to say, nearly £16,000,000 more than the increase of charge. Further, I would remind the House that, although it is true that we have had to raise more taxation in those four years, we have had to do so in order to meet not only our own Expenditure, but the deficits of the three previous years, amounting to £7,300,000. I hope that hon. Gentlemen who really care to obtain accurate figures as to recent expenditure will observe that we spent upon the Army and Navy, in the four years ending March, 1884, £101,800,000, while the net charge in the preceding four years was £101,500,000. The net cost of the Civil Services in 1880-4 was £24,500,000, and in 1876-80, £23,000,000. Anyone who takes the pains may verify these figures from the Return I have named.

original subscribers of this
g a long series of volumes, to the exclusion of more modern works, are apt to discard these antiquated though valuable records.
From these causes it is to be feared that many sets now of value have been sacrificed.

Unwilling that these national muniments should perish, Mr. Cornelius Buck has been instructed to purchase the earlier volumes of the Third Series, commencing with the REFORMED PARLIAMENT—including the whole Reign of William IV.—and the two first Parliaments of the Reign of Victoria—namely, to 1847.

The fair market value will be given for these volumes; or the Sessions of recent Parliaments will be given in exchange.
